(3) Pilate resents Christ's answer, and takes it very ill, v. 35. This is a direct answer to Christ's question, v. 34. Christ had asked him whether he spoke of himself. "No," says he; "am I a Jew?" Observe with what disdain Pilate asks, Am I a Jew? A man of sense and honour reckoned it a scandal to be counted a Jew. Christ had asked him whether others told him. "Yes," says he, "and those thine own people, and the priests; and therefore I have nothing to do but to proceed upon their information." Christ had declined answering that question, Art thou the king of the Jews? And therefore Pilate puts another question: "What hast thou done? Surely there cannot be all this smoke without some fire, what is it?"

(4) Christ, in his next reply, gives a more full answer to Pilate's former question, Art thou a king? explaining in what sense he was a king, v. 36.

[1] An account of the nature and constitution of Christ's kingdom: It is not of this world. Christ is a king, and has a kingdom, but not of this world. Its rise is not from this world. Its nature is not worldly; it is a kingdom within men, set up in their hearts and consciences. Its guards and supports are not worldly; its weapons are spiritual. Its tendency and design are not worldly. Its subjects, though they are in the world, yet are not of the world. They are neither the world's pupils nor its darlings, neither governed by its wisdom nor enriched with its wealth.

[2] An evidence of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom produced. If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews. His followers did not offer to fight; there was no uproar, no attempt to rescue him. He did not order them to fight; nay, he forbade them, knowing that what would have been the destruction of any worldly kingdom would be the advancement and establishment of his. Now you may see my kingdom is not from hence; in the world, but not of it.

(5) In answer to Pilate's further query, he replies yet more directly, v. 37. Pilate's plain question: "Art thou a king then? Thou speakest of a kingdom thou hast; art thou then, in any sense, a king? Explain thyself." The good confession which our Lord Jesus witnessed before Pontius Pilate: Thou sayest that I am a king, that is, It is as thou sayest, I am a king. He grants himself to be a king, though not in the sense that Pilate meant. Though Christ took upon him the form of a servant, yet even then he justly claimed the honour and authority of a king. He explains himself, and shows how he is a king, as he came to bear witness of the truth; he rules in the minds of men by the power of truth. He came to be a witness, a witness for the God that made the world, and against sin that ruins the world, and by this word of his testimony he sets up and keeps up, his kingdom. Christ's errand into the world, and his business in the world, were to bear witness to the truth. To reveal it, to discover to the world that which otherwise could not have been known concerning God and his goodwill to men, ch. xvii. 26. To confirm it. By his miracles he bore witness to the truth of religion, that all men through him might believe. Now by doing this he is a king, and sets up a kingdom. The spirit and genius, of Christ's kingdom, is truth, divine truth. When he said, I am the truth, he said, in effect, I am a king. He conquers by the convincing evidence of truth; he rules by the commanding power of truth. He came a light into the world, and rules as the sun by day. The subjects of this kingdom are those that are of the truth. All that are in love with truth will hear the voice of Christ, for greater, better, surer, sweeter truths can nowhere be found than are found in Christ, by whom grace and truth came.

(6) Pilate, hereupon, puts a good question to him, but does not stay for an answer, v. 38. He said, What is truth? and immediately went out again. It is certain that this was a good question. Truth is that pearl of great price which the human understanding is in quest of; for it cannot rest but in that which is, or at least is apprehended to be, truth. But many put this question that have not patience enough to persevere in their search after truth, or not humility and sincerity enough to receive it when they have found it. It is uncertain with what design Pilate asked this question. Perhaps he spoke it as a learner, as one that began to think well of Christ. Some think he spoke it as a judge, enquiring further into the cause: "Tell me what the truth of it is, the true state of this matter." Others think he spoke it as a scoffer: "Thou talkest of truth; canst thou tell what truth is, or give me a definition of it?" Like men of no religion, who take a pleasure in bantering all religions, he ridicules both sides; and therefore Christ made him no reply. But, though Christ would not tell Pilate what is truth, he has told his disciples, and by them has told us, ch. xiv. 6.

III. The result of both these conferences with the prosecutors and the prisoner (v. 38–40).

1. The judge appeared his friend.

(1) He publicly declared him innocent, v. 38. I find in him no fault at all. Nothing criminal appears against him. This solemn declaration of Christ's innocency was, [1] For the justification and honour of the Lord Jesus. Though he was treated as the worst of malefactors he had never merited such treatment. [2] For explaining the design and intention of his death, that he did not die for any sin of his own, and therefore he died as a sacrifice for our sins, and that, one man should die for the people, ch. xi. 50. [3] For aggravating the sin of the Jews that prosecuted him with so much violence. Our Lord Jesus, though brought in not guilty, is still run down as a malefactor, and his blood thirsted for.

(2) He proposed an expedient for his discharge (v. 39): You have a custom, that I should release to you a prisoner at the passover; shall it be this king of the Jews. It was an appeal to the people, as appears, Matt. xxvii. 15. Probably he had heard how this Jesus had been attended but the other day with the hosannas of the common people, and therefore he made no doubt but they would demand the release of Jesus. He allows their custom, in honour of the passover, which was a memorial of their release. He offers to release Jesus to them, according to the custom. If he found no fault in him, he was bound in conscience to discharge him. But he was willing to trim the matter, and please all sides, being governed more by worldly wisdom than by the rules of equity.

2. The people appeared his enemies (v. 40): They cried all again, Not this man, but Barabbas. Observe how fierce and outrageous they were. Pilate proposed the thing to them calmly, but they resolved in it a heat, and gave in their resolution with clamour and noise. There is cause to suspect a deficiency of reason and justice on that side which calls in the assistance of popular tumult. How foolish and absurd they were, as is intimated in the short account here given of the other candidate: Now Barabbas was a robber, and therefore, [1] A breaker of the law of God; and yet he shall be spared. [2] An enemy to the public safety and personal property. The clamour of the town is wont to be against robbers, yet here it is for one. Thus those do who prefer their sins before Christ. Sin is a robber, and yet foolishly chosen rather than Christ, who would truly enrich us.

CHAP. XIX

When he comes to the sufferings and death of Christ he repeats what had been before related, with considerable enlargements, as one that desired to know nothing but Christ and him crucified. I. The remainder of Christ's trial before Pilate, ver. 1–15. II. Sentence given, and execution done upon it, ver. 16–18. III. The title over his head, ver. 19–22. IV. The parting of his garment, ver. 23, 24. V. The care he took of his mother, ver. 25–27. VI. The giving him vinegar to drink, ver. 28, 29. VII. His dying word, ver. 30. VIII. The piercing of his side, ver. 31–37. IX. The burial of his body, ver. 38–42.

Here is a further account of the unfair trial which they gave to our Lord Jesus. The prosecutors carried it on with great confusion among the people, and the judge with great confusion in his own breast.

I. The judge abuses the prisoner, though he declares him innocent, and hopes therewith to pacify the prosecutors.

1. He ordered him to be whipped as a criminal, v. 1. Pilate, being disappointed in his project of releasing him upon the people's choice, took Jesus, and scourged him. Matthew and Mark mention his scourging after his condemnation, but here it appears to have been before. Luke speaks of Pilate's offering to chastise him, and let him go, which must be before sentence. This scourging of him was designed only to pacify the Jews. The Roman scourgings were ordinarily very severe, not limited, as among the Jews, to forty stripes; yet this pain and shame Christ submitted to for our sakes. (1) That the scripture might be fulfilled, which spoke of the chastisement of our peace being upon him (Isa. liii 5). He himself likewise had foretold it, Matt. xx. 19; Mark x. 34; Luke xviii. 33. (2) That by his stripes we might be healed. The physician scourged, and so the patient healed. (3) That stripes, for his sake, might be sanctified and made easy to his followers. Christ's stripes take out the sting of theirs.

2. He turned him over to his soldiers, to be ridiculed and made sport with as a fool (v. 2, 3): The soldiers put a crown of thorns upon his head; they put on him a purple robe; and they complimented him with, Hail, king of the Jews, and then smote him with their hands.

(1) See here the baseness and injustice of Pilate. Pilate did this: To oblige his soldiers' merry humour, and perhaps his own too. Herod, as well as his men of war, had just before done the same, Luke xxiii. 11. It was as good as a stage-play to them, now that it was a festival time. To oblige the Jews' malicious humour.

(2) See here the rudeness and insolence of the soldiers. Thus hath Christ's holy religion been basely misrepresented, dressed up by bad men at their pleasure, and so exposed to contempt and ridicule. They clothe him with a mock-robe. And as Christ is here represented as a king in conceit only, so is his religion as a concern in conceit only, and God and the soul, sin and duty, heaven and hell, are with many all chimeras. They crown him with thorns, as if to submit to the control of God and conscience were to thrust one's head into a thicket of thorns; but this is an unjust imputation; thorns and snares are in the way of the froward, but roses and laurels in religion's ways.

(3) See here the wonderful condescension of our Lord Jesus. Great and generous minds can bear anything better than ignominy, yet this the great and holy Jesus submitted to for us. See and admire, the invincible patience of a sufferer, the invincible love and kindness of a Saviour. Herein he commended his love, that he would not only die for us, but die as a fool dies. He endureth the pain; not the pangs of death only, but, as if these were too little, he submitted to those previous pains. Shall we complain of a thorn in the flesh, and of being buffeted by affliction. Christ humbled himself to bear those thorns in the head, and those buffetings, to save and teach us. He despised the shame, the shame of a fool's coat, and the mock-respect paid him, with, Hail, king of the Jews. He that bore these sham honours was recompensed with real honours, and so shall we, if we patiently suffer shame for him.

II. Pilate presents him to the prosecutors in hope that they would now be satisfied, v. 4, 5. Here he proposes two things to their consideration:

1. That he had not found anything in him which made him obnoxious to the Roman government (v. 4): I find no fault in him. If he found no fault in him, why did he bring him out to his prosecutors, and not immediately release him, as he ought to have done? Thinking to trim the matter, to please the people by scourging Christ, and save his conscience by not crucifying him, behold he does both. It is common for those who think to keep themselves from greater sins by venturing upon less sins to run into both.

2. That he had done that to him which would make him the less dangerous to them and to their government, v. 5. He brought him out to them, wearing the crown of thorns, his head and face all bloody, and said, Behold the man, treating him as a slave, and exposing him to contempt, after which he supposed the people would never look upon him with any respect. Little did Pilate think with what veneration even these sufferings of Christ would in after ages be commemorated by the best and greatest of men. Our Lord Jesus shows himself dressed up in all the marks of ignominy. He came forth, willing to be made a spectacle. Did he go forth thus bearing our reproach? Let us go forth to him bearing his reproach. Pilate saith unto them, with a design to appease them, Behold the man; not so much to move their pity, Behold a man worthy your compassion, as to silence their jealousies, Behold a man not worthy your suspicion. The word however is very affecting: Behold the man. It is good for everyone of us to behold the man Christ Jesus in his sufferings. "Behold him, and mourn because of him. Behold him, and love him; be still looking unto Jesus."

III. The prosecutors were but the more exasperated, v. 6, 7.

1. Their clamour and outrage. The chief priests cried out, and their officers joined with them in crying, Crucify him, crucify him. The common people perhaps would have acquiesced in Pilate's declaration of his innocency. Their malice against Christ was unreasonable and most absurd, in that they offer not to make good their charge against him; but, though he be innocent, he must be crucified. It was insatiable and very cruel. Neither the extremity of his scourging, nor his patience under it, could mollify them in the least. It was violent and exceedingly resolute; they will have it their own way. Were they so violent in running down our Lord Jesus, and in crying, Crucify him, crucify him? and shall not we be vigorous and zealous in crying, Crown him, Crown him? Shall not our love to him quicken our endeavours for him and his kingdom?

2. The check Pilate gave to their fury: "Take you him and crucify him." He knew they could not, they durst not, crucify him; but it is as if he should say, "You shall not make me a drudge to your malice." A good resolve, if he would but have stuck to it. He found no fault in him, and therefore should not have continued to parley with the prosecutors. Those that would be safe from sin should be deaf to temptation. Nay, he should have secured the prisoner from their insults. But Pilate had not courage enough to act according to his conscience.

3. The further colour which the prosecutors gave to their demand (v. 7): We have a law, and by our law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God. They made their boast of the law. They had indeed an excellent law, but in vain did they boast of their law, when they abused it to such bad purposes. They discover a restless and inveterate malice against our Lord Jesus. They urged this, that he pretended himself a God. Thus they turn every stone to take him off. They pervert the law, and make that the instrument of their malice. It was true that blasphemers were to be put to death. Whoever falsely pretended to be the Son of God was guilty of blasphemy. It was false that Christ pretended to be the Son of God, for he really was so. That which was his honour, and might have been their happiness, they impute to him as a crime, for which he ought to die; yet he ought not to be crucified, for this was no death inflicted by their law.

IV. The judge brings the prisoner again to his trial, upon this new suggestion.

1. The concern Pilate was in, when he heard this alleged (v. 8): When he heard that his prisoner pretended not to royalty only, but to deity, he was the more afraid. There was the more danger of offending the people if he should acquit him. Though he might hope to pacify their rage against a pretended king, he could never reconcile them to a pretended God. There was the more danger of offending his own conscience if he should condemn him. "Is he one" (thinks Pilate) "that makes himself the Son of God? and what if it should prove that he is so? What will become of me then?"

2. His further examination of our Lord Jesus thereupon, v. 9. He resumed the debate, went into the judgment-hall, and asked Christ, Whence art thou?

(1) The place he chose for this examination: He went into the judgment-hall for privacy, that he might be out of the noise and clamour of the crowd. Those that would find out the truth as it is in Jesus must get out of the noise of prejudice, and retire as it were into the judgment-hall, to converse with Christ alone.

(2) The question he put to him: Whence art thou? Art thou from men or from heaven? From beneath or from above?

(3) The silence of our Lord Jesus; but Jesus gave him no answer. This was not a sullen silence, in contempt of the court, nor was it because he knew not what to say. It was a patient silence. This silence loudly bespoke his submission to his Father's will in his present sufferings. He was silent, because he would say nothing to hinder his sufferings. It was a prudent silence. When the chief priests asked him, Art thou the Son of the Blessed? he answered, I am; but when Pilate asked him he knew he did not understand his own question, having no notion of the Messiah, and of his being the Son of God, and therefore to what purpose should he reply to him whose head was filled with the pagan theology?

(4) The haughty check which Pilate gave him for his silence (v. 10): "Speakest thou not unto me? Knowest thou not that I have power to crucify thee, and have power to release thee?" Observe here how Pilate magnifies himself, and boasts of his own authority. Men in power are apt to be puffed up with their power, and the more absolute and arbitrary it is the more it gratifies and humours their pride. How he tramples upon our blessed Saviour: Speakest thou not unto me? He reflects upon him as if he were undutiful and disrespectful to those in authority or as if he were ungrateful to one that had been tender of him, as if he were unwise for himself. If Christ had indeed sought to save his life, now had been his time to have spoken.

(5) Christ's pertinent answer to this check, v. 11.

[1] He boldly rebukes his arrogance: "Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above." Though Christ did not think fit to answer him when he was impertinent, yet he did think fit to answer him when he was imperious. When Pilate used his power, Christ silently submitted to it; but, when he grew proud of it, he made him know himself: "All the power thou hast is given thee from above." His power in general, as a magistrate, was a limited power, and he could do no more than God would suffer him to do. Let the proud oppressors know that there is a higher than they. And let this silence the murmurings of the oppressed, let it comfort them that their persecutors can do no more than God will let them. Pilate never fancied himself to look so great as now, when he sat in judgment upon such a prisoner as this, who was looked upon by many as the Son of God and king of Israel. But Christ lets him know that he was herein but an instrument in God's hand.

[2] He mildly excuses his sin, in comparison with the sin of the ringleaders: "Therefore he that delivered me unto thee lies under greater guilt." It is plainly intimated that what Pilate did was sin, a great sin, and that the forces which the Jews put upon him would not justify him. The guilt of others will not acquit us, nor will it avail in the great day to say that others were worse than we. Yet theirs that delivered him to Pilate was the greater sin. By this it appears that all sins are not equal, but some more heinous than others. He that delivered Christ to Pilate was either, 1. The people of the Jews, who cried out, Crucify him, crucify him. They had seen Christ's miracles, which Pilate had not, and therefore it was much worse in them to appear against him than in Pilate. 2. Or Caiaphas in particular, who first advised his death, ch. xi. 49, 50. The sin of Caiaphas was abundantly greater than the sin of Pilate. Caiaphas prosecuted Christ from pure enmity and of malice prepense. Pilate condemned him purely for fear of the people, and it was a hasty resolution which he had not time to cool upon. 3. Some think Christ means Judas. The sin of Judas was, upon many accounts, greater than the sin of Pilate. The sin of Judas was a leading sin, and let in all that followed. He was a guide to them that took Jesus.

V. Pilate struggles with the Jews to deliver Jesus out of their hands, but in vain.

1. Pilate seems more zealous than before to get Jesus discharged (v. 12): Thenceforth, though Christ found fault with him, he still continued to find no fault in Christ, but sought to release him. If Pilate's policy had not prevailed above his justice, he would not have been long seeking to release him, but would have done it.

2. The Jews were more violent to get Jesus crucified. Still they carry on their design with noise and clamour as before. They laboured to get him cried down by a multitude, and it is no hard matter to pack a mob. A few madmen may out-shout many wise men, and then fancy themselves to speak the sense (when it is but the nonsense) of a nation, but it is not so easy a thing to change the sense of the people as it is to misrepresent it. In this outcry they sought: To blacken the prisoner as an enemy to Caesar. They will have it that he speaks against Caesar. It has always been the artifice of the enemies of religion to represent it as hurtful to kings and provinces, when it would be highly beneficial to both. To frighten the judge, as no friend to Caesar: "If thou let this man go thou art not Caesar's friend." They intimate a threatening that they would inform against him, and here they touched him in a sensible and very tender part. A pretended zeal for that which is good often serves to cover a real malice against that which is better.

3. Pilate slightly endeavoured to banter them out of their fury, and yet, in doing this, yielded to the rapid stream, v. 13–15. After he had seemed now as if he would have made a vigorous resistance upon this attack (v. 12), he basely surrendered.

(1) What it was that shocked Pilate (v. 13): "When he heard that saying, that he could not be sure of Caesar's favour, if he did not put Jesus to death, then he thought it was time to look about him." Those that bind up their happiness in the favour of men make themselves an easy prey to the temptations of Satan.

(2) What preparation was made for a definitive sentence upon this matter: Pilate brought Jesus forth, and then sat down in the judgment-seat. Christ was condemned with all the ceremony that could be. Notice is here taken of the place and time. The place where Christ was condemned: in a place called the Pavement, but in Hebrew, Gabbatha, probably the place where he used to sit to try causes or criminals. The time, v. 14. It was the preparation of the passover, and about the sixth hour. 1. The day: It was the preparation of the passover, that is, for the passover-sabbath. It was when they should have been purging out the old leaven, to get ready for the passover; but the better the day the worse the deed. 2. The hour: It was about the sixth hour. Some ancient Greek and Latin manuscripts read it about the third hour, which agrees with Mark xv. 25. And it appears by Matt. xxvii. 45 that he was upon the cross before the sixth hour. From the third to the sixth hour (which was, as we call it, church-time) on that day, they were employed in this wickedness; so that for this day, though they were priests, they dropped the temple-service.

(3) The rencounter Pilate had with the Jews, endeavouring in vain to stem the tide of their rage. He saith unto the Jews: "Behold your king, that is, him whom you accuse as a pretender to the crown. Is this a man likely to be dangerous to the government?" Pilate, though he was far from meaning so, seems as if he were the voice of God to them. Christ, now crowned with thorns, is, as a king at his coronation, offered to the people: "Behold your king." They cried out with the greatest indignation, Away with him, away with him. "Take him, he is none of ours; we disown him; away with him out of our sight." Had not Christ been thus rejected of men, we had been for ever rejected of God. It shows how we ought to treat our sins. We are often in scripture said to crucify sin, in conformity to Christ's death. With a pious indignation we should run down sin in us, as they with an impious indignation ran him down who was made sin for us. Pilate, willing to have Jesus released, asks them, Shall I crucify your king? To stop their mouths, by showing them how absurd it was for them to reject one who offered himself to them to be their king. Though he saw no cause to fear him, they might see cause to hope for something from him. To stop the mouth of his own conscience. "If this Jesus be a king" (thinks Pilate), "he is only king of the Jews. If they refuse him, and will have their king crucified, what is that to me?" The chief priests cried out, We have no king but Caesar. This they knew would please Pilate, and so they hoped to carry their point, though at the same time they hated Caesar and his government. What a righteous thing it was with God to bring upon them that ruin by the Romans which followed not long after. They adhere to Caesar, and to Caesar they shall go. God soon gave them enough of their Caesars. Henceforward they were rebels to the Caesars, and the Caesars tyrants to them, and their disaffection ended in the overthrow of their place and nation. It is just with God to make that a scourge and plague to us which we prefer before Christ.

We have here sentence of death passed upon our Lord Jesus, and execution done soon after. A mighty struggle Pilate had had within him; but at length his convictions yielded, and his corruptions prevailed, the fear of man having a greater power over him than the fear of God.

I. Pilate gave judgment against Christ and signed the warrant for his execution, v. 16. Pilate sinned against his conscience; he had again and again pronounced him innocent, and yet at last condemned him as guilty. He was a man of a haughty and implacable spirit. Fearing therefore that he should be complained of, he was willing to gratify the Jews. Now this makes the matter much worse. For a man that was so wilful in other things, and of so fierce a resolution, to be overcome in a thing of this nature, shows him to be a bad man indeed, that could better bear the wronging of his conscience than the crossing of his humour. He endeavoured to transfer the guilt upon the Jews. He delivered him to the prosecutors, the chief priests and elders; so excusing the wrong to his own conscience with this, that it was but a permissive condemnation, and that he did not put Christ to death, but only connived at those that did it.

II. Judgment was no sooner given than the prosecutors, having gained their point, resolved to lose no time lest Pilate should change his mind. And also lest there should be an uproar among the people. It were well if we would be thus expeditious in that which is good, and not stay for more difficulties.

1. They immediately hurried away the prisoner. The chief priests greedily flew upon the prey which they had been long waiting for. Or they, that is, the soldiers, took him and led him away. Both the priests and the soldiers joined in leading him away. By the law of Moses the prosecutors were to be the executioners. And the priests here were proud of the office. He was led forth for us, that we might escape.

2. To add to his misery, they obliged him to carry his cross (v. 17), according to the custom among the Romans. Their crosses did not stand up constantly. Everyone that was crucified had a cross of his own. Christ's carrying his cross may be considered as a part of his sufferings; he endured the cross literally. The blessed body of the Lord Jesus was tender; it had now lately been harassed and tired out; his shoulders were sore with the stripes they had given him; every jog of the cross would renew his smart, and be apt to strike the thorns he was crowned with into his head; yet all this he patiently underwent. He was made a curse for us, and therefore on him was the cross. Our Master hereby taught all his disciples to take up their cross, and follow him. Whatever cross he calls us out to bear at any time, we must remember that he bore the cross first. He bore that end of the cross that had the curse upon it; this was the heavy end; and hence all that are his are enabled to call their afflictions for him light.

3. They brought him to the place of execution: He went forth, not dragged against his will, but voluntary in his sufferings. He went forth out of the city, for he was crucified without the gate, Heb. xiii. 12. And, to put the greater infamy upon his sufferings, he was brought to the common place of execution, a place called Golgotha, the place of a skull. There Christ suffered, because he was made sin for us.

4. There they crucified him, and the other malefactors with him (v. 18): There they crucified him. (1) What death Christ died; the death of the cross, a bloody, painful, shameful death, a cursed death. He was lifted up as the brazen serpent. His hands were stretched out to invite and embrace us. (2) In what company he died: Two others with him. This exposed him much to the people's contempt and hatred, who are apt to judge of persons by the lump, and are not curious in distinguishing, and would conclude him not only a malefactor because he was yoked with malefactors, but the worst of the three because put in the midst. But thus the scripture was fulfilled, He was numbered among the transgressors. He died among the criminals, and mingled his blood with theirs who were sacrificed to public justice.

And now let us pause awhile, and with an eye of faith look upon Jesus. Was ever sorrow like unto his sorrow? See him bleeding, see him struggling, see him dying, see him and love him, love him and live to him, and study what we shall render.

Verses 19–30

Here are some remarkable circumstances of Christ's dying more fully related than before.

I. The title set up over his head.

1. The inscription itself which Pilate wrote, and ordered to be fixed to the top of the cross, declaring the cause for which he was crucified, v. 19. It was this, Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews. Pilate intended this for his reproach, that he, being Jesus of Nazareth, should pretend to be king of the Jews, and set up in competition with Caesar. But God overruled this matter: That it might be a further testimony to the innocence of our Lord Jesus; for here was an accusation which, as it was worded, contained no crime. That it might show forth his dignity and honour. This is Jesus a Saviour, dying for the good of his people, as Caiaphas had foretold.

2. The notice taken of this inscription (v. 20): Many of the Jews read it, not only those of Jerusalem, but those from other countries, that came up to worship at the feast. Multitudes read it, and it occasioned a great variety of reflections and speculations. Christ himself was set for a sign, a title. The title was so much read: Because the place where Jesus was crucified, though without the gate, was yet nigh the city. It is an advantage to have the means of knowing Christ brought to our doors. Because it was written in Hebrew, and Greek, and Latin; they all understood one or other of these languages. Everyone would be curious to enquire what it was which was so industriously published in the three most-known languages. In each of these Christ is proclaimed king. It was intimated thereby that Jesus Christ should be a Saviour to all nations, and not to the Jews only; and also that every nation should hear in their own tongue the wonderful works of the Redeemer. It teaches us that the knowledge of Christ ought to be diffused throughout every nation in their own tongue, that people may converse as freely with the scriptures as they do with their neighbours.

3. The offence which the prosecutors took at it, v. 21. They would not have it written, the king of the Jews; but that he said I am the king of the Jews. Here they show themselves: Very spiteful and malicious against Christ. To justify themselves they thought themselves concerned to represent him as a usurper of honours and powers that he was not entitled to. Foolishly jealous of the honour of their nation. They scorned to have it said that this was their king. Very impertinent and troublesome to Pilate. They could not but be sensible that they had forced him, against his mind, to condemn Christ. Though they had charged him with pretending to be the king of the Jews, yet they had not proved it

4. The judge's resolution to adhere to it: "What I have written I have written."

1. Hereby an affront was put upon the chief priests. By this inscription he insinuates: That, notwithstanding their pretences, they were not sincere in their affections to Caesar and his government. That such a king as this, so mean and despicable, was good enough to be the king of the Jews. That they had been very unjust in prosecuting this Jesus, when there was no fault to be found in him.

2. Hereby honour was done to the Lord Jesus. Pilate stuck to it with resolution, that he was the king of the Jews. When the Jews reject Christ Pilate, a Gentile, sticks to it that he is a king, which was an earnest of what came to pass soon after, when the Gentiles submitted to the kingdom of the Messiah.

II. The dividing of his garments among the executioners, v. 23, 24. Four soldiers were employed, who, when they had crucified Jesus, had nailed him to the cross, and lifted it up, and him upon it, and nothing more was to be done than to wait his expiring, went to make a dividend of his clothes. And so they made four parts, as nearly of the same value as they could, to every soldier a part; but his coat, without seam, woven from the top throughout, they cast lots for it. 1. The shame they put upon our Lord Jesus. The shame of nakedness came in with sin. He therefore who was made sin for us bore that shame. 2. The wages with which these soldiers paid themselves for crucifying Christ. They were willing to do it for his old clothes. Nothing is to be done so bad, but there will be found men bad enough to do it for a trifle. 3. The sport they made about his seamless coat. We read not of anything about him valuable or remarkable but this. Tradition says, his mother wove it for him, and adds this further, that it was made for him when he was a child. But this is a groundless fancy. The soldiers thought it a pity to rend it for then it would unravel; they would therefore cast lots for it. While Christ was in his dying agonies, they were merrily dividing his spoils. The preserving of Christ's seamless coat is commonly alluded to to show the care all Christians ought to take that they rend not the church of Christ with strifes and divisions. 4. The fulfilling of the scripture in this. David, in spirit, foretold this very circumstance of Christ's sufferings, in that passage, Ps. xxii. 18. These things therefore the soldiers did.

III. The care that he took of his poor mother.

1. His mother attends him to his death (v. 25): There stood by the cross his mother, and some of his relations and friends with her. At first, they stood near, as it is said here; but afterwards, it is probable, the soldiers forced them to stand afar off, as it is said in Matthew and Mark. See here the tender affection of these pious women. When all his disciples, except John, had forsaken him, they continued their attendance on him. They were not deterred by the fury of the enemy nor the horror of the sight; they could not rescue him nor relieve him, yet they attended him. We may easily suppose what an affliction it was to these poor women to see him thus abused, especially to the blessed virgin. Now was fulfilled Simeon's word, A sword shall pierce through thy own soul, Luke ii. 35. His torments were her tortures, and her heart bled with his wounds. We may justly admire the power of divine grace in supporting these women, especially the virgin Mary. We do not find his mother wringing her hands or making an outcry; but standing by the cross, and her friends with her. Surely she and they were strengthened by a divine power to this degree of patience. We know not what we can bear till we are tried, and then we know who has said, My grace is sufficient for thee.

2. He tenderly provides for his mother. It is probable that Joseph was long since dead, and that her son Jesus had supported her, and now that he was dying what would become of her? He saw her standing by, and he saw John standing not far off, and so he settled a new relation between his beloved mother and his beloved disciple: "Woman, behold thy son," and to him, "Behold thy mother." And so from that hour that disciple took her to his own home.

(1) The care Christ took of his dear mother. He was not so much taken up with a sense of his sufferings as to forget his friends. He had no other way to provide for his mother than by his interest in a friend, which he does here. He calls her woman, not mother, because mother would have been a cutting word to her that was already wounded to the heart with grief. He directs her to look upon John as her son. An instance of divine goodness. Sometimes, when God removes one comfort from us, he raises up another for us, perhaps where we looked not for it. Let none therefore reckon all gone with one cistern dried up, for from the same fountain another may be filled. An instance of filial duty. Christ has here taught children to provide for the comfort of their aged parents. Children at their death, according to their ability, should provide for their parents, if they survive them, and need their kindness.

(2) The confidence he reposed in the beloved disciple. It is to him he says, Behold thy mother. This was an honour put upon John, and a testimony both to his prudence and to his fidelity. It is a great honour to be employed for Christ, and to be entrusted with any of his interest in the world. It would be a care and some charge to John; but he cheerfully accepted it, and took her to his own home. Those that truly love Christ, and are beloved of him, will be glad of an opportunity to do any service to him or his.

IV. The fulfilling of the scripture, in the giving of him vinegar to drink, v. 28, 29.

1. How much respect Christ showed to the scripture (v. 28): Knowing that all things were accomplished, that the scripture might be fulfilled, he saith, I thirst.

(1) It was not at all strange that he was thirsty. Well might he thirst after all the toil and hurry which he had undergone, and being now in the agonies of death, ready to expire purely by the loss of blood and extremity of pain.

(2) But the reason of his complaining of it is somewhat surprising; it is the only word he spoke that looked like complaint of his outward sufferings. He cried, I thirst. He would thus express the travail of his soul. He thirsted after the accomplishment of the work of our redemption. He would thus take care to see the scripture fulfilled. Hitherto, all had been accomplished, and he knew it. The scripture had foretold his thirst, and therefore he himself related it, because it could not otherwise be known, saying, I thirst. The scripture had foretold that in his thirst he should have vinegar given him to drink, Ps. lxix. 21.

2. See how little respect his persecutors showed to him (v. 29): There was set a vessel full of vinegar, probably according to the custom at all executions of this nature; with this they filled a sponge, and they put it upon hyssop, a hyssop-stalk, and with this heaved it to his mouth. A drop of water would have cooled his tongue better than a draught of vinegar. When heaven denied him a beam of light earth denied him a drop of water, and put vinegar in the room of it.

V. The dying word wherewith he breathed out his soul (v. 30): When he had received the vinegar he said, It is finished; and, with that, bowed his head, and gave up the ghost.

1. What he said, and we may suppose him to say it with triumph and exultation—It is finished. (1) It is finished, that is, the malice and enmity of his persecutors had now done their worst. (2) It is finished, that is, the counsel and commandment of his Father concerning his sufferings were now fulfilled. He had said, when he entered upon his sufferings, Father, thy will be done; and now he saith with pleasure, It is done. (3) It is finished, that is, all the types and prophecies of the Old Testament, which pointed at the sufferings of the Messiah, were accomplished and answered. (4) It is finished, that is, the ceremonial law is abolished. The substance is now come, and all the shadows are done away. (5) It is finished, that is, sin is finished, and an end made of transgression.

The Lamb of God was sacrificed to take away the sin of the world, and it is done. (6) It is finished, that is, his sufferings were now finished. The storm is over, the worst is past, and he is just entering upon the joy set before him. Let all that suffer for Christ, and with Christ, comfort themselves with this, that yet a little while and they also shall say, It is finished. (7) It is finished, that is, his life was now finished, he was just ready to breathe his last. This we must all come to shortly. (8) It is finished, that is, the work of man's redemption and salvation is now completed, a fatal blow given to the power of Satan, a fountain of grace opened that shall ever flow. He that has begun a good work will perform it; the mystery of God shall be finished.

2. What he did: He bowed his head, and gave up the ghost. He gave up the ghost. His life was not forcibly extorted from him, but freely resigned. He had said, Father, into thy hands I commit my spirit, and, accordingly, he did give up his spirit, paid down the price of pardon and life at his Father's hands. He bowed his head. Those that were crucified, in dying stretched up their heads to gasp for breath, and did not drop their heads till they had breathed their last; but Christ bowed his head first, composing himself, as it were, to fall asleep.

This passage concerning the piercing of Christ's side after his death is recorded only by this evangelist.

I. Observe the superstition of the Jews, which occasioned it (v. 31): Because it was the preparation for the sabbath, and that sabbath day was a high day, they would not have the dead bodies to remain on the crosses on the sabbath-day, but besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that then they might be buried out of sight. 1. The esteem they would be thought to have for the approaching sabbath. Every sabbath day is a holy day, and a good day, but this was a high day, a great day. Sacrament-days, supper-days, communion-days are high days, and there ought to be more than ordinary preparation for them. 2. The reproach which they reckoned it would be to that day if the dead bodies should be left hanging on the crosses. Dead bodies were not to be left at any time. Many strangers from all parts being then at Jerusalem, it would have been an offence to them; nor could they well bear the sight of Christ's crucified body. 3. Their petition to Pilate, that their bodies, now as good as dead, might be despatched by the breaking of their legs, which would carry them off in the most exquisite pain. The pretended sanctity of hypocrites is abominable. They made no conscience of bringing an innocent and excellent person to the cross, and yet scrupled letting a dead body hang upon the cross.

II. The despatching of the two thieves that were crucified with him, v. 32. Pilate gave orders as they desired; and the soldiers came and broke the legs of the two thieves. One of these thieves was a penitent, and had received from Christ an assurance that he should shortly be with him in paradise, and yet died in the same pain and misery that the other thief did. The extremity of dying agonies is no obstruction to the living comforts that wait for holy souls on the other side death.

III. The trial that was made whether Christ was dead or no.

1. They supposed him to be dead, and therefore did not break his legs, v. 33. Jesus died in less time than persons crucified ordinarily did. It was to show that he laid down his life of himself. He yielded to death, yet he was not conquered. His enemies were satisfied he was really dead.

2. Because they would be sure he was dead they would put it past dispute. One of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side and forthwith came thereout blood and water, v. 34.

(1) The soldier hereby designed to decide the question whether he was dead or no, and by this honourable wound in his side to supersede the ignominious method of despatch they took with the other two. Tradition says that this soldier's name was Longinus.

(2) But God had a further design herein. To give an evidence of the truth of his death, in order to the proof of his resurrection. He was certainly dead, for this spear broke up the very fountains of life. To give an illustration of the design of his death. There was much of mystery in it, and its being so solemnly attested (v. 35) intimates there was something miraculous in it. It was very significant; this same apostle refers to it as a very considerable thing, 1 John v. 6, 8. The opening of his side was significant. When we would protest our sincerity, we wish there were a window in our hearts, that the thoughts and intents of them might be visible to all. Through this window, opened in Christ's side, you may look into his heart, and see love flaming there, love strong as death. The blood and water that flowed out of it were significant. They signified the two great benefits which all believers partake of through Christ —blood for atonement, water for purification. Guilt contracted must be expiated by blood; stains contracted must be done away by the water of purification. These two must always go together. Christ has joined them together, and we must not think to put them asunder. They both flowed from the pierced side of our Redeemer. They signified the two great ordinances of baptism and the Lord's supper. It is not the water in the font that will be to us the washing of regeneration, but the water out of the side of Christ; not the blood of the grape that will refresh the soul, but the blood out of the side of Christ.

IV. The attestation of the truth of this by an eye-witness (v. 35), the evangelist himself.

1. What a competent witness he was of the matters of fact. What he bore record of he saw; he was an eye-witness of it. What he saw he faithfully bore record of; he told not only the truth, but the whole truth. His record is undoubtedly true, for he wrote from the dictates of the Spirit of truth. He had himself a full assurance of the truth of what he wrote: He knows that he saith true. He therefore witnessed these things, that we might believe; to draw men to believe the gospel in order to their eternal welfare.

2. What care he showed in this particular instance. Let this silence the fears of weak Christians, and encourage their hopes. There came both water and blood out of Christ's pierced side, both to justify and sanctify them; and if you ask, How can we be sure of this? you may be sure, for he that saw it bore record.

V. The accomplishment of the scripture in all this (v. 36): That the scripture might be fulfilled.

1. The scripture was fulfilled in the preserving of his legs from being broken; therein that word was fulfilled, A bone of him shall not be broken. There was a promise of this made indeed to all the righteous, but principally pointing at Jesus Christ the righteous (Ps. xxxiv. 20). There was a type of this in the paschal lamb (Num. ix. 12): You shall not break any bone of it. He is the Lamb of God (ch. i. 29), and, as the true passover, his bones were kept unbroken. There was a significancy in it; the strength of the body is in the bones. The Hebrew word for the bones signifies the strength. Though he be crucified in weakness his strength to save is not at all broken. Sin breaks our bones but it did not break Christ's bones; he stood firm under the burden, mighty to save.

2. The scripture was fulfilled in the piercing of his side (v. 27): They shall look on me whom they had pierced; so it is written, Zech. xii. 10. It is here implied that the Messiah shall be pierced; and here it had a more full accomplishment than in the piercing of his hands and feet. It is promised that when the Spirit is poured out they shall look on him and mourn. This was in part fulfilled when many of those that were his betrayers and murderers were pricked to the heart, and brought to believe in him. We have all been guilty of piercing the Lord Jesus, and are all concerned with suitable affections to look on him.

We have here an account of the burial of the blessed body of our Lord Jesus. Come and see a burial that conquered the grave, and buried it, a burial that beautified the grave and softened it for all believers.

I. The body begged, v. 38. This was done by Joseph of Arimathea, of whom no mention is made in all the New Testament story, but only in the narrative which each of the evangelists gives us of Christ's burial. 1. The character of this Joseph. He was a disciple of Christ in secret, a better friend to Christ than he would willingly be known to be. It was his honour that he was a disciple of Christ; and some such there are, that are themselves great men, and unavoidably linked with bad men. But it was his weakness that he was so secretly. Christ may have many that are his disciples sincerely, though secretly; better secretly than not at all, especially, if like Joseph, here, they grow stronger and stronger. Some who in less trials have been timorous, yet in greater have been very courageous; so Joseph here. To Pilate the governor he went boldly, and yet feared the Jews. The impotent malice of those that can but censure, and revile, is sometimes more formidable even to wise and good men than one would think. 2. The part he bore in this affair. He, having access to Pilate, desired leave of him to dispose of the body. His disciples were gone; if nobody appeared, the Jews or soldiers would bury him with the thieves. When God has work to do he can find out such as are proper to do it, and embolden them for it. Observe it as an instance of the humiliation of Christ, that his dead body lay at the mercy of a heathen judge, and must be begged before it could be buried.

II. The embalming prepared, v. 39. This was done by Nicodemus, another person of quality, and in a public post. He brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes. 1. The character of Nicodemus, which is much the same with that of Joseph; he was a secret friend to Christ. He at first came to Jesus by night, but now owned him publicly, as before, ch. vii. 50, 51. That grace which at first is like a bruised reed may afterwards become like a strong cedar. It is a wonder that Joseph and Nicodemus, men of such interest, did not appear sooner, and solicit Pilate not to condemn Christ. Begging his life would have been a nobler piece of service than begging his body. 2. The kindness of Nicodemus. Joseph served Christ with his interest, Nicodemus with his purse. Probably, they agreed it between them, because they were straightened in time. But why did they made this ado about Christ's dead body? Some think we may see in it the weakness of their faith. What need of such furniture of the grave for one that, like a way-faring man, did but turn aside into it, to tarry for a night or two? However, we may plainly see in it the strength of their love. Hereby they showed the value they had for his person and doctrine, and that it was not lessened by the reproach of the cross. They showed not only the charitable respect of committing his body to the earth, but the honourable respect shown to great men. This they might do, and yet believe and look for his resurrection. Since God designed honour for this body, they would put honour upon it.

III. The body got ready, v. 40. They took it, and, having washed it from blood and dust, wound it in linen clothes, with the spices, as the manner of the Jews is to bury. Here was care taken of Christ's body: It was wound in linen clothes. Among clothing that belongs to us, Christ put on even the grave-clothes, to make them easy to us, and to enable us to call them our wedding-clothes. Dead bodies and graves are noisome and offensive. No ointment or perfume can rejoice the heart so as the grave of our Redeemer does, where there is faith to perceive the fragrant odours of it. In conformity to this example, we ought to have regard to the dead bodies of Christians; not to enshrine and adore their relics, but carefully to deposit them, the dust in the dust, as those who believe that the dead bodies of the saints are still united to Christ. The resurrection of the saints will be in virtue of Christ's resurrection, and therefore in burying them we should have an eye to Christ's burial.

IV. The grave pitched upon, in a garden which belonged to Joseph of Arimathea, very near the place where he was crucified. There was a sepulchre not yet used.

1. Christ was buried without the city, for thus the manner of the Jews was to bury. There was then a peculiar reason for it, because the touching of a grave contracted a ceremonial pollution: but now that the resurrection of Christ has altered the property of the grave, we need not keep at such a distance from it. Those that would not superstitiously, but by faith, visit the holy sepulchre, must go forth out of the noise of this world.

2. Christ was buried in a garden. Joseph had his sepulchre in his garden that it might be a memento: To himself while living. The garden is a proper place for meditation, and a sepulchre there may furnish us with a proper subject for meditation. To his heirs and successors when he was gone. It is good to acquaint ourselves with the place of our fathers' sepulchres; and perhaps we might make our own less formidable if we made theirs more familiar. In a sepulchre in a garden Christ's body was laid. In the garden of Eden death and the grave first received their power, and now in a garden they are conquered.

3. He was buried in a new sepulchre. This was so ordered, (1) For the honour of Christ. He that was born from a virgin-womb must rise from a virgin-tomb. (2) For the confirming of the truth of his resurrection, that it might not be suggested that it was not he, but some other that rose. He that has made all things new has new-made the grave for us.

V. The funeral solemnized (v. 42): There laid they Jesus. There they laid him because it was the preparation day.

1. The deference which the Jews paid to the sabbath, and to the day of preparation. This day had been ill kept by the chief priests, who called themselves the church, but was well kept by the disciples of Christ, who were branded as dangerous to the church; and it is often so. They would not put off the funeral till the sabbath day, because the sabbath is to be a day of holy rest and joy. They would not drive it too late on the day of preparation for the sabbath.

2. The convenience they took of an adjoining sepulchre; the sepulchre they made use of was nigh at hand. It was so ordered that he should be laid in a sepulchre nigh at hand: Because he was to lie there but awhile, as in an inn, and therefore he took the first that offered itself. Because this was a new sepulchre. Those that prepared it little thought who should handsel it. We are hereby taught not to be over-curious in the place of our burial. Where the tree falls, why should it not lie? For Christ was buried in the sepulchre that was next at hand.

Thus without pomp or solemnity is the body of Jesus laid in the cold and silent grave. Here lies death itself slain, and the grave conquered. Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory.

CHAP. XX

This evangelist, though he began not his gospel as the rest did yet concludes it as they did, with the history of Christ's resurrection; not of the thing itself, but of the proofs and evidences of it. The proofs of Christ's resurrection, which we have in this chapter, are, I. Such as occurred immediately at the sepulchre. 1. The sepulchre found empty, ver. 1–10. 2. Two angels appearing to Mary Magdalene at the sepulchre, ver. 11–13. 3. Christ himself appearing to her, ver. 14–18. II. Such as occurred afterwards at the meetings of the apostles. 1. At one, the same day at evening that Christ rose, when Thomas was absent, ver. 19–25. 2. At another, that day seven-night, when Thomas was with them, ver. 26–31.

There was no one thing of which the apostles were more concerned to produce substantial proof than the resurrection of their Master, 1. Because it was that which he himself appealed to as the last and most cogent proof of his being the Messiah. And therefore enemies were most solicitous to stifle the notice of this. 2. Because it was upon this the performance of his undertaking for our redemption and salvation did depend. 3. Because he never showed himself alive after his resurrection to all the people, Acts x. 40, 41. But the demonstrations of his resurrection should be reserved as a favour for his particular friends, and by them be published to the world, that those might be blessed who have not seen, and yet have believed.

In these verses we have the first step towards the proof of Christ's resurrection, which is, that the sepulchre was found empty.

I. Mary Magdalene, coming to the sepulchre, finds the stone taken away. This evangelist does not mention the other women that went with Mary Magdalene, but her only. Much was forgiven her, therefore she loved much. She had shown her affection to him while he lived, attended his doctrine, ministered to him of her substance, Luke viii. 2, 3. The continued instances of her respect to him at and after his death prove the sincerity of her love. Love to Christ, if it be cordial, will be constant. Her love to Christ was strong as death, the death of the cross, for it stood by that.

1. She came to the sepulchre, to wash the dead body with her tears, for she went to the grave, to weep there, and to anoint it with the ointment she had prepared. It must be an extraordinary affection to the person which will endear his grave to us. It is especially frightful to the weak and timorous sex. Love to Christ will take off the terror of death and the grave. If we cannot come to Christ but through that darksome valley, even in that, if we love him, we shall fear no evil.

2. She came as soon as she could. Upon the first day of the week, as soon as ever the sabbath was gone. This was the first Christian sabbath, and she begins it accordingly with enquiries after Christ. She came early, while it was yet dark. Those who would seek Christ so as to find him must seek him early. Seek him solicitously; be up early for fear of missing him. Seek him industriously. Seek him betimes. That day is in a fair way to be well ended that is thus begun. Those that diligently enquire after Christ while it is yet dark shall have such light given them concerning him as shall shine more and more.

3. She found the stone taken away, which she had seen rolled to the door of the sepulchre. Now this was, (1) A surprise to her. Christ crucified is the fountain of life. His grave is one of the wells of salvation; if we come to it in faith, we shall find the stone rolled away and free access to the comforts of it. Surprising comforts are the frequent encouragements of early seekers. (2) The beginning of a glorious discovery; the Lord was risen, though she did not at first apprehend it so. Those that are most constant in their adherence to Christ have commonly the first and sweetest notices of the divine grace. Mary Magdalene, who followed Christ to the last in his humiliation, met him with the first in his exaltation.

II. Finding the stone taken away, she hastens back to Peter and John: "They have taken the Lord out of the sepulchre, and we know not where they have laid him." She found the stone gone, looked into the grave, and saw it empty. Now one would expect that the first thought that offered itself would have been, Surely the Lord is risen; for whenever he had told them that he should be crucified, he still subjoined in the same breath that the third day he should rise again. Could she now see the grave empty, and yet have no thought of the resurrection enter into her mind? When we come to reflect upon our own conduct in a cloudy and dark day, we shall stand amazed at our dulness and forgetfulness, that we could miss of such thoughts as afterwards appear obvious. She suggested, They have taken away the Lord. Whatever was her suspicion, it seems it was a great vexation and disturbance to her that the body was gone; whereas, if she had understood it rightly, nothing could be more happy. Weak believers often make that the matter of their complaint which is really just ground of hope, and matter of joy. She did not stand poring upon the grief herself, but acquaints her friends with it. The communication of sorrows is one good improvement of the communion of saints. Peter, though he had denied his Master, had not deserted his Master's friends; by this appears the sincerity of his repentance. And the disciples' keeping up their intimacy with him as formerly, teaches us to restore those that have been faulty. If God has received them upon their repentance, why should not we?

III. Peter and John go with all speed to the sepulchre, v. 3, 4. Some think that the other disciples were with Peter and John when the news came; for they told these things to the eleven, Luke xxiv. 9. Yet none of them went to the sepulchre but Peter and John, who were often distinguished from the rest by special favours. It is well when those that are more honoured than others with the privileges of disciples are more active than others in the duty of disciples, more willing to take pains and run hazards. See here what use we should make of the experience of others. When Mary told them what she had seen, they would go and see with their own eyes. Do others tell us of the comfort and benefit of ordinances? Let us be engaged thereby to make trial of them. See how ready we should be to share with our friends in their cares and fears. Peter and John hastened to the sepulchre. See what haste we should make in a good work. Peter and John consulted neither their ease nor their gravity, but ran to the sepulchre. See what a good thing it is to have good company in a good work. See what a laudable emulation it is among disciples to strive which shall excel in that which is good. It was no breach of ill manners for John to outrun Peter. We must do our best, and neither envy those that can do better, nor despise those that do as they can, though they come behind. He that got foremost in this race was the disciple whom Jesus loved. Sense of Christ's love to us, kindling love in us to him again, will make us to excel in virtue. He that was cast behind was Peter, who had denied his Master, and was in sorrow and shame for it. When conscience is offended we lose ground.

IV. Peter and John, having come to the sepulchre, prosecute the enquiry.

1. John went no further than Mary Magdalene had done. He had the curiosity to look into the sepulchre, and saw it was empty. He stooped down, and looked in. Those that would find the knowledge of Christ must stoop down, and look in. Yet he had not courage to go into the sepulchre. The warmest affections are not always accompanied with the boldest resolutions.

2. Peter went in first and made a more exact discovery than John had done, v. 6, 7. While John was with much caution looking in, he came, and with great courage went into the sepulchre. The boldness of Peter, and how God dispenses his gifts variously. John could out-run Peter, but Peter could out-dare John. Some disciples are quick, and they are useful to quicken those that are slow; others are bold, and they are useful to embolden those that are timorous. Those who in good earnest seek after Christ must not frighten themselves with bugbears and foolish fancies. Good Christians need not be afraid of the grave, since Christ has lain in it. Let us therefore not indulge, but conquer, the fear we are apt to conceive upon the sight of a dead body, or being alone among the graves. We must be willing to go through the grave to Christ; that way he went to his glory, and so must we. If we cannot see God's face and live, better die than never see it. The posture in which he found things in the sepulchre. Christ had left his grave-clothes behind him there. He laid them aside because he arose to die no more. Lazarus came out with his grave-clothes on, for he was to use them again. When we arise from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, we must leave our grave-clothes behind us, must put off all our corruptions. Christ left those in the grave, as it were, for our use; if the grave be a bed to the saints, thus he hath sheeted that bed, and made it ready for them. The grave-clothes were found in very good order, which serves for an evidence that his body was not stolen away while men slept. Peter's boldness encouraged John; now he took heart and ventured in (v. 8), and he saw and believed. He began to believe that Jesus was risen to life again.

(1) John followed Peter in venturing. He durst not have gone into the sepulchre if Peter had not gone in first. It is good to be emboldened in a good work by the boldness of others. The dread of difficulty and danger will be taken off by observing the resolution and courage of others. Perhaps John's quickness had made Peter run faster, and now Peter's boldness makes John venture further. John not only associated with Peter, but thought it no disparagement to follow him.

(2) John got the start of Peter in believing. Peter saw and wondered (Luke xxiv. 12), but John saw and believed. A mind disposed to contemplation may perhaps sooner receive the evidence of divine truth than a mind disposed to action. But what was the reason that they were so slow of heart to believe? The evangelist tells us (v. 9), as yet they knew not the scripture that he must rise again from the dead. First, How unapt the disciples themselves were, at first, to believe the resurrection of Christ, which confirms the testimony they afterwards gave with so much assurance concerning it; for, by their backwardness to believe it, it appears that they were not credulous concerning it, nor of those simple ones that believe every word. It was to them as a strange thing, and one of the furthest things from their thoughts. Peter and John were so shy of believing it at first that nothing less than the most convincing proof could bring them to testify it afterwards with so much assurance. Hereby it appears that they were not only honest men, who would not deceive others, but cautious men, who would not themselves be imposed upon. Secondly, The reason of their slowness to believe; because as yet they knew not the scripture. This seems to be the evangelist's acknowledgment of his own fault among the rest.

3. Peter and John pursued their enquiry no further, hovering between faith and unbelief (v. 10): The disciples went away to their own home. For fear of being taken up upon suspicion of a design to steal away the body, or of being charged with it now that it was gone. In difficult dangerous times it is hard even for good men to go on in their work with the resolution that becomes them. Because they were at a loss, and knew not what to do next, nor what to make of what they had seen; which is an instance of their weakness as yet. It is probable that the rest of the disciples were together; to them they return, to make report of what they had discovered. It is observable that before Peter and John came to the sepulchre an angel had appeared there, rolled away the stone, frightened the guard, and comforted the women; as soon as they were gone from the sepulchre, Mary Magdalene here sees two angels in the sepulchre (v. 12), and yet Peter and John come to the sepulchre, and go into it, and see none. Angels appear and disappear at pleasure, according to the orders and instructions given them. They may be, and are really, where they are not visibly. This favour was shown to those who were early and constant in their enquiries after Christ, and was the reward of those that came first and stayed last, but denied to those that made a transient visit.

I. The constancy and fervency of Mary Magdalene's affection to the Lord Jesus, v. 11.

1. She stayed at the sepulchre, when Peter and John were gone, because there her Master had lain. This good woman, though she has lost him, will abide by his grave for his sake, and continue in his love even when she wants the comfort of it.

2. She stayed there weeping, and these tears loudly bespoke her affection to her Master. Those that have lost Christ have cause to weep. Those that seek Christ must weep, not for him, but for themselves.

3. As she wept, she looked into the sepulchre. When we are in search of something that we have lost we look again and again in the place where we last left it, and expected to have found it. Weeping must not hinder seeking. Though she wept, she stooped down and looked in.

II. The vision she had of two angels in the sepulchre, v. 12.

1. The description of the persons she saw. They were two angels in white, sitting one at the head, and the other at the feet, of the grave. Their nature. They were angels, messengers from heaven, sent on purpose: To honour the Son. Now that the Son of God was again to be brought into the world, the angels have a charge to attend him, as they did at his birth. To comfort the saints, and, by giving them notice that the Lord was risen, to prepare them for the sight of him. Their number: two, not a multitude of the heavenly host, to sing praise, only two, to bear witness. Their array: They were in white, denoting their purity and holiness. Glorified saints, when they come to be as the angels, shall walk with Christ in white. Their posture and place: They sat in Christ's grave. These angels went into the grave, to teach us not to be afraid of it. Matters are so ordered that the grave is not much out of our way to heaven. These angelic guards, keeping possession of the sepulchre, when they had frightened away the guards, represents Christ's victory over the powers of darkness. Their sitting to face one another, one at his bed's head, the other at his bed's feet, may also remind us of the two cherubim, placed one at either end of the mercy-seat, looking one at another. Christ crucified was the great propitiary, at the head and feet of which were these two cherubim, not with flaming swords, to keep us from, but welcome messengers, to direct us to, the way of life.

2. Their compassionate enquiry into the cause of Mary Magdalene's grief (v. 13): Woman, why weepest thou? A rebuke to her weeping: "Why weepest thou, when thou hast cause to rejoice?" Many of the floods of our tears would dry away before such a search as this into the fountain of them. It was designed to show how much angels are concerned at the griefs of the saints. Christians should thus sympathize with one another. It was only to make an occasion of informing her of that which would turn her mourning into rejoicing.

3. The melancholy account of her present distress: Because they have taken away the blessed body I came to embalm, and I know not where they have laid it. (1) The weakness of her faith. We often perplex ourselves needlessly with imaginary difficulties, which faith would discover to us as real advantages. (2) The strength of her love. Mary Magdalene is not diverted from her enquiries by the surprise of the vision, nor satisfied with the honour of it; but still she harps upon the same string: They have taken away my Lord. A sight of angels and their smiles will not suffice without a sight of Christ and God's smiles in him. Nay, the sight of angels is but an opportunity of pursuing her enquiries after Christ. The angels asked her, Why weepest thou? I have cause enough to weep, says she, for they have taken away my Lord. None know, but those who have experienced it, the sorrow of a deserted soul, that has had comfortable evidences of the love of God in Christ, but has now lost them, and walks in darkness.

III. Christ's appearing to her while she was talking with the angels. Christ himself steps in. Mary would fain know where her Lord is, and behold he is at her right hand. Those that will be content with nothing short of a sight of Christ shall be put off with nothing less. Christ, in manifesting himself to those that seek him, often outdoes their expectations. Mary longs to see the dead body of Christ, and behold she sees him alive. Thus he does for his praying people more than they are able to ask or think.

(1) He did at first conceal himself from her.

[1] He stood as a common person, and she looked upon him accordingly, v. 14. She turned herself back from talking with the angels, and sees Jesus himself standing, and yet she knew not that it was Jesus. The Lord is nigh unto them that are of a broken heart (Ps. xxxiv. 18), nearer than they are aware. Those that seek Christ, though they do not see him, may yet be sure he is not far from them. Those that diligently seek the Lord will turn every way in their enquiry after him. Mary turned herself back, in hopes of some discoveries. It was her earnest desire in seeking that made her turn every way. Christ is often near his people, and they are not aware of him. She knew not that it was Jesus.

[2] He asked her a common question, and she answered him accordingly, v. 15.

First, The question he asked her was what anyone would have asked her: "Woman, why weepest thou? Whom seekest thou?" It should seem, this was the first word Christ spoke after his resurrection: "Why weepest thou?" Christ takes cognizance: Of his people's griefs, and enquires, Why weep you? Of his people's cares, and enquires, Whom seek you, and what would you have? When he knows they are seeking him, yet he will know it from them.

Secondly, The reply she made him is natural enough. Supposing him to be the gardener, Sir, if thou hast carried him hence, pray tell me where thou hast laid him, and I will take him away. 1. The error of her understanding. She supposed our Lord Jesus to be the gardener. Troubled spirits, in a cloudy and dark day, are apt to misrepresent Christ to themselves. 2. The truth of her affection. See how her heart was set upon finding Christ. She puts the question to everyone she meets. When she speaks of Christ, she does not name him; but, If thou have borne him hence, taking it for granted that this gardener was full of thoughts concerning this Jesus as well as she. Another evidence of the strength of her affection was that, wherever he was laid, she would undertake to remove him. Such a body was much more than she could pretend to carry; but true love thinks it can do no more than it can, and makes nothing of difficulties. Christ needs not to stay where he is thought a burden.

(2) How Christ at length made himself known to her, and gave her infallible assurances of his resurrection.

[1] How Christ discovered himself to this good woman (v. 16): Jesus saith unto her, Mary. It was said with that air of kindness with which he was wont to speak to her. Now he changed his voice, and spoke like himself, not like the gardener. Christ's sheep know his voice, ch. x. 4. This one word, Mary, was like that to the disciples in the storm, It is I.

[2] How readily she received this discovery. She turned herself and said, Rabboni, My Master. The title of respect she gives him: My Master. Rabbon was with them a more honourable title than Rabbi; and therefore Mary chooses that, and adds a note of appropriation, My great Master. Notwithstanding the freedom of communion which Christ is pleased to admit us to, he is our Master. With what liveliness of affection she gives this title to Christ. She turned from the angels to look unto Jesus. We must take off our regards from all creatures, even the brightest and best, to fix them upon Christ. When she thought it had been the gardener, she looked another way while speaking to him; but now that she knew the voice of Christ she turned herself.

[3] The further instructions that Christ gave her (v. 17): "Touch me not, but go and carry the news to the disciples."

First, He diverts her from the expectation of familiar society and conversation with him at this time: Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended. Mary was ready to express her joy by affectionate embraces of him, which Christ here forbids at this time. Touch me not for I am to ascend to heaven. He bade the disciples touch him, for the confirmation of their faith. She must believe him, and adore him, but must not expect to be familiar with him as formerly. He forbids her to dote upon his bodily presence, and leads her to the spiritual communion which she should have with him after he was ascended to his Father. Though I am not yet ascended, go to my brethren, and tell them, I am to ascend. As before his death, so now after his resurrection, he still harps upon this. They must look higher than his bodily presence, and look further than the present state of things. "Touch me not, stay not now to make any further enquiries, or give any further expressions of joy, for I am not yet ascended. The best service thou canst do now is to carry the tidings to the disciples; lose no time therefore, but go away with all speed." Mary must not stay to talk with her Master, but must carry his message; for it is a day of good tidings.

Secondly, He directs her what message to carry to his disciples: But go to my brethren, and tell them that I ascend. To whom this message is sent: Go to my brethren with it. He was now entering upon his glory, yet he owns his disciples as his brethren. He had called them friends, but never brethren till now.

Though Christ be high, yet he is not haughty. Notwithstanding his elevation, he disdains not to own his poor relations. He had never seen them together since they all forsook him and fled. He forgives, he forgets, and does not upbraid. By whom it is sent: by Mary Magdalene, out of whom had been cast seven devils. This was her reward for her constancy in adhering to Christ; she becomes an apostle to the apostles. What the message itself is: I ascend to my Father.

a. Our joint-relation to God, resulting from our union with Christ, is an unspeakable comfort. He says, He is my Father, and your Father; my God, and your God. It is the great dignity of believers that the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is, in him, their Father. He is ours by a gracious adoption; yet even this warrants us to call him, as Christ did, Abba, Father. It is the great condescension of Christ that he is pleased to own the believer's God for his God: My God, your God: the God of the Redeemer, to support him, that he might be the God of the redeemed, to save them.

b. Christ's ascension into heaven is likewise an unspeakable comfort: "Tell them I must shortly ascend." (a) A word of caution to these disciples, not to expect the continuance of his bodily presence on earth. "I am risen, not to stay with them, but to go on their errand to heaven." Thus those who are raised to a spiritual life must reckon that they rise to ascend. Let them not think that this earth is to be their home and rest; no, being born from heaven, they are bound for heaven. I ascend, therefore must I seek things above. (b) A word of comfort to them, and to all that shall believe in him through their word; he was then ascending, he is now ascended to his Father, and our Father. He says it with triumph, that those who love him may rejoice. He ascended as our forerunner, to prepare a place for us, and to be ready to receive us.

Some make these words, I ascend to my God and your God, to include a promise of our resurrection. Because I live, you shall live also.

IV. Here is Mary Magdalene's faithful report to the disciples (v. 18): She came and told the disciples that she had seen the Lord. Peter and John had left her seeking him carefully with tears, and would not stay to seek him with her. Now she found it was a living body and a glorified one; so that she found what she sought, and, what was infinitely better, she had joy in her sight of the Master herself. When God comforts us, it is with this design, that we may comfort others. And as she told them what she had seen, so also what she had heard; that he had spoken these things unto her as a message to be delivered to them.

The infallible proof of Christ's resurrection was his showing himself alive, Acts i. 3. In these verses, we have an account of his first appearance to the college of the disciples, on the day on which he rose. He had sent them the tidings of his resurrection, but to confirm their faith in him, he came himself, that they might not have it by hearsay only, but might themselves be eye-witnesses of his being alive.

I. When and where this appearance was, v. 19. It was the same day, being the first day of the week.

There are three secondary ordinances (as I may call them) instituted by our Lord Jesus, to continue in his church; these are, the Lord's day, solemn assemblies, and a standing ministry. The mind of Christ concerning each of these is plainly intimated to us in these verses: of the first two, here, in the circumstances of this appearance, the other v. 21.

1. Here is a Christian sabbath observed by the disciples, and owned by our Lord Jesus. The visit Christ made to his disciples was on the first day of the week. And the first day of the week is (I think) the only day of the week, or month, or year, that is ever mentioned by number in all the New Testament; and this is several times spoken of as a day religiously observed. Thus, in effect, he blessed and sanctified that day.

2. Here is a Christian assembly solemnized by the disciples, and also owned by the Lord Jesus. Probably the disciples met here for some religious exercise, to pray together. They met to know one another's minds, strengthen one another's hands, and concert proper measures to be taken in the present critical juncture. This meeting was private, because they durst not appear publicly. They met in a house, but they kept the door shut, that they might not be seen together, and that none might come among them but such as they knew; for they feared the Jews. Those sheep of the flock were scattered in the storm; but sheep are sociable, and will come together again. It is no new thing for the assemblies of Christ's disciples to be driven into corners, and forced into the wilderness. God's people have been often obliged to enter into their chambers, and shut their doors, as here, for fear of the Jews.

II. What was said and done in this visit Christ made to his disciples. When they were assembled, Jesus came among them. Where two or three are gathered together in his name, he will be in the midst of them. He came, though the doors were shut. It is a comfort to Christ's disciples, when their solemn assemblies are reduced to privacy, that no doors can shut out Christ's presence from them. We have five things in this appearance of Christ:

1. His kind and familiar salutation of his disciples: He said, Peace be unto you. The phrase was common, but the sense was now peculiar. Peace be unto you is as much as, All good be to you, all peace always by all means. Christ had left them his peace for their legacy, ch. xiv. 27. He here makes prompt payment of the legacy: Peace be unto you. Peace with God, peace in your own consciences, peace with one another; all this peace be with you; not peace with the world, but peace in Christ. His sudden appearing in the midst of them, could not but put them into some disorder and consternation, the noise of which waves he stills with this word, Peace be unto you.

2. His clear and undeniable manifestation of himself to them, v. 20. And here observe: The method he took to convince them of the truth of his resurrection. None could desire a further proof than the scars or marks of the wounds in the body. The marks of the wounds remained in the body of the Lord Jesus even after his resurrection, that they might be demonstrations of the truth of it. Conquerors glory in the marks of their wounds. Christ's wounds were to speak on earth that it was he himself, and therefore he arose with them; they were to speak in heaven, in the intercession he must ever live to make, and therefore he ascended with them. These marks he showed to his disciples, for their conviction. They had not only the satisfaction of seeing him look with the same countenance, and hearing him speak with the same voice, but they had the further evidence of these peculiar marks: he opened his hands to them, that they might see the marks of the wounds on them; he opened his breast, to show them the wound there. The exalted Redeemer will ever show himself open-handed and open-hearted to all his faithful friends and followers. The impression it made upon them. They were convinced that they saw the Lord; so was their faith confirmed. Thus many true believers, who, while they were weak, feared their comforts were but imaginary, afterwards find them, through grace, real and substantial. Then they were glad. The evangelist seems to write it with somewhat of transport and triumph. Then! then! were the disciples glad, when they saw the Lord. How would it revive the heart of these disciples to hear that Jesus is again alive! It is life from the dead to them. Now that word of Christ was fulfilled (ch. xvi. 22), I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice. This wiped away all tears from their eyes.

3. The commission he gave them to be his agents in the planting of his church, v. 21.

(1) The preface to their commission, which was the solemn repetition of the salutation before: Peace be unto you. The former salutation was to still the tumult of their fear, that they might calmly attend to the proofs of his resurrection; this was to reduce the transport of their joy, that they might sedately hear what he had further to say to them. To encourage them to accept of the commission he was giving them. In the issue, it would be peace to them. Christ was now sending the disciples to publish peace to the world, and he here not only confers it upon them but commits it to them as a trust to be by them transmitted.

(2) The commission itself: As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you. It is easy to understand how Christ sent them; he appointed them to go on with his work upon earth. He sent them authorized with a divine warrant, armed with a divine power. Hence they were called apostles—men sent. But how Christ sent them as the Father sent him is not so easily understood; certainly their commissions and powers were infinitely inferior to his. [1] Their work was of the same kind with his, and they were to go on where he left off. As he was sent to bear witness to the truth, so were they; not to be mediators of the reconciliation, but only preachers and publishers of it. As the Father sent him to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, so he sent them into all the world. [2] He had a power to send them equal to that which the Father had to send him. By the same authority that the Father sent me do I send you. Had he an incontestable authority, and an irresistible ability, for his work? so had they for theirs. As the Father hath sent me: by virtue of the authority given him as a Mediator, he gave authority to them, to act for him, and in his name, so that those who received them, or rejected them, received or rejected him, and him that sent him, ch. xiii. 20.

4. The qualifying of them (v. 22): He breathed on them, and said, Receive ye the Holy Ghost.

(1) The sign he used: He breathed on them; not only to show them, by this breath of life, that he himself was really alive, but to signify to them the spiritual life and power which they should receive from him. As the breath of the Almighty gave life to man and began the old world, so the breath of the mighty Saviour gave life to his ministers, and began a new world. The Spirit is the breath of Christ, proceeding from the Son. The breath of God is put for the power of his wrath, but the breath of Christ signifies the power of his grace; the breathing of threatenings is changed into the breathings of love by the mediation of Christ. The Spirit is the gift of Christ. The apostles communicated the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands, for they could only carry it as messengers; but Christ conferred the Holy Ghost by breathing, for he is the author of the gift.

(2) The solemn grant he made: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." First, Christ hereby gives them assurance of the Spirit's aid in their future work: "I send you, and you shall have the Spirit to go along with you." Whom Christ employs he will clothe with his Spirit, and furnish with all needful powers. Secondly, He hereby gives them experience of the Spirit's influences in their present case. He had shown them his hands and his side, to convince them of the truth of his resurrection. "Therefore receive ye the Holy Ghost, to work faith in you." They were now in danger of the Jews: "Therefore receive ye the Holy Ghost, to work courage in you." What Christ said to them he says to all true believers, Receive ye the Holy Ghost.

5. One particular branch of the power given them particularized (v. 23): "Whosesoever sins you remit, they are remitted to them; and whosesoever sins you retain, they are retained." How this follows upon their receiving the Holy Ghost; for, if they had not had an extraordinary spirit of discerning, they had not been fit to be entrusted with such an authority. Yet it must be understood as a general charter to the church and her ministers, encouraging the faithful stewards of the mysteries of God to stand to the gospel they were sent to preach, for that God himself will stand to it. Christ, being risen for our justification, sends his gospel heralds to proclaim the act of indemnity now passed. Those whom the gospel acquits shall be acquitted, and those whom the gospel condemns shall be condemned, which puts immense honour upon the ministry, and should put immense courage into ministers. Two ways, and both as having authority: (1) By sound doctrine. They are commissioned to tell the world that salvation is to be had upon gospel terms, and no other. (2) By a strict discipline, applying the general rule of the gospel to particular persons.

III. The incredulity of Thomas, which introduced Christ's second appearance.

1. Here is Thomas's absence, v. 24. He is said to be one of the twelve, though now eleven. They were but eleven, and one of them was missing: Christ's disciples will never be all together till the general assembly at the great day. By his absence he missed the satisfaction of seeing his Master risen, and of sharing with the disciples in their joy upon that occasion.

2. The account which the other disciples gave him, v. 25. They said unto him, We have seen the Lord. It seems, though Thomas was then from them, he was not long from them; absentees for a time must not be condemned as apostates for ever: Thomas is not Judas. With what exultation they speak it. "We have seen the Lord, and we wish thou hadst been here, to see him too." The disciples of Christ should endeavour to build up one another in their most holy faith, both by repeating what they have heard to those that were absent, and also by communicating what they have experienced. Those that by faith have seen the Lord, and tasted that he is gracious, should tell others what God has done for their souls; only let boasting be excluded.

3. The objections Thomas raised against the evidence. "Except I shall not only see in his hands the print of the nails, but put my finger into it, and thrust my hand into the wound in his side, I will not believe." Some conjecture him to have been a man of a rough, morose temper, apt to speak peevishly; for all good people are not alike happy in their temper. There was certainly much amiss in his conduct. He had either not heeded, or not duly regarded, what Christ had so often said, that he would rise again the third day. He did not pay a just deference to the testimony of his fellow-disciples. They all ten of them concurred in the testimony with great assurance; and yet he could not persuade himself to say that their record was true. It was not, however, their veracity that he questioned, but their prudence; he feared they were too credulous. He tempted Christ when he would be convinced by his own method, or not at all. Thomas ties up his faith to this evidence. Either he will be humoured, and have his fancy gratified, or he will not believe. The open avowal of this in the presence of the disciples was an offence and discouragement to them. As one coward makes many, so does one unbeliever, one sceptic. His proclaiming his infidelity, and that so peremptorily, might be of ill consequence to the rest.

Verses 26–31

We have here an account of another appearance of Christ, when Thomas was now with them.

I. When it was: After eight days, which must therefore be, as that was, the first day of the week.

1. He deferred his next appearance for some time, to show his disciples that he was as one that belonged to another world, and visited this only now and then, when there was occasion. In the beginning of his ministry he had been forty days unseen, tempted by the evil Spirit. In the beginning of his glory he was forty days, for the most part unseen, attended by good spirits.

2. He deferred it so long as seven days. That he might put a rebuke upon Thomas for his incredulity. He cannot have such another opportunity for several days. He that slips one tide must stay a good while for another. A very melancholy week Thomas had of it, while the other disciples were full of joy. That he might try the faith and patience of the rest. They had gained a great point when they were satisfied that they had seen the Lord. He would try whether they could keep the ground they had got. He would gradually wean them from his bodily presence, which they had depended too much upon. That he might put an honour upon the first day of the week, and give a plain intimation of his will, that it should be observed in his church as the Christian sabbath. The religious observance of that day has been thence transmitted down to us through every age of the church.

II. Where, and how, Christ made them this visit. It was at Jerusalem, for the doors were shut now, as before, for fear of the Jews. Thomas was with them; though he had withdrawn himself once, yet not a second time. When we have lost one opportunity, we should give the more earnest heed to lay hold on the next. It is a good sign if such a loss whet our desires, and a bad sign if it cool them. The disciples admitted him among them. They did not receive him to doubtful disputation, but bade him welcome to come and see. Christ did not appear to Thomas till he found him in society with the rest of his disciples. He would have all the disciples witnesses of the rebuke he gave to Thomas, and yet withal of the tender care he had of him. Christ came in among them, and stood in the midst. See the condescension of our Lord Jesus. For the benefit of his church, he lingered on earth, and visited the little private meetings of his poor disciples, and is in the midst of them. He saluted them all as he had done before; he said, Peace be unto you. This was no vain repetition, but significant of the abundant peace which Christ gives, and of the continuance of his blessings.

III. What passed between Christ and Thomas at this meeting; and that only is recorded.

1. Christ's gracious condescension to Thomas, v. 27. He singled him out from the rest: "Reach hither, thy finger, and behold my hands, the print of the nails; reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side." (1) An implicit rebuke of Thomas's incredulity, in the plain reference to what Thomas had said, answering it word for word. There is not an unbelieving word on our tongues, no, nor thought in our minds, but it is known to the Lord Jesus. (2) An express condescension to his weakness. He suffers his wisdom to be prescribed to. Christ is pleased here to accommodate himself even to Thomas's fancy in a needless thing, rather than leave him in his unbelief. He suffers his wounds to be raked into, allows Thomas even to thrust his hand into his side, if then at last he would believe. Thus, for the confirmation of our faith, he has instituted an ordinance on purpose to keep his death in remembrance. And in that ordinance wherein we show the Lord's death we are called, as it were, to put our finger into the print of the nails. Reach hither thy hand to him, who reacheth forth his helping, inviting, giving hand to thee.

It is an affecting word with which Christ closes up what he had to say to Thomas: Be not faithless but believing. This warning is given to us all: Be not faithless; for, if we are faithless, we are Christless and graceless, hopeless and joyless.

2. Thomas's believing consent to Jesus Christ. He is now ashamed of his incredulity, and cries out, My Lord and my God, v. 28. We are not told whether he did put his finger into the print of the nails. Christ says (v. 29), Thou hast seen, and believed; seeing sufficed. And now faith comes off a conqueror.

(1) Thomas is now fully satisfied of the truth of Christ's resurrection. His slowness and backwardness to believe may help to strengthen our faith.

(2) He therefore believed him to be Lord and God, and we are to believe him so. [1] We must believe his deity—that he is God; not a man made God, but God made man. [2] His mediation—that he is Lord, the one Lord, to settle the great concerns that lie between God and man, and to establish the correspondence that was necessary to our happiness.

(3) He consented to him as his Lord and his God. We must accept of Christ to be that to us which the Father hath appointed him. This is the vital act of faith, He is mine.

(4) He made an open profession of this. He says it to Christ, Thou art my Lord and my God; or, speaking to his brethren, This is my Lord and my God. Do we accept of Christ as our Lord God? We must go to him, and tell him so, tell others so, as those that triumph in our relation to Christ. Thomas speaks with an ardency of affection as one that took hold of Christ with all his might, My Lord and my God.

3. The judgment of Christ upon the whole (v. 29): "Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed; but blessed are those that have not seen, and yet have believed." Christ owns Thomas a believer. Sound and sincere believers, though they be slow and weak, shall be graciously accepted of the Lord Jesus. No sooner did Thomas consent to Christ than Christ gives him the comfort of it, and lets him know that he believes. He upbraids him with his former incredulity. He had been so backward to believe, and came so slowly to his own comforts. Those that in sincerity have closed with Christ see a great deal of reason to lament that they did not do it sooner. It was not without much ado that he was brought to believe at last. If no evidence must be admitted but that of our own senses, and we must believe nothing but what we ourselves are eye-witnesses of, how must the world be converted to the faith of Christ? He is therefore justly blamed for laying so much stress upon this.

He commends the faith of those who believe upon easier terms. Thomas, as a believer, was truly blessed; but rather blessed are those that have not seen Christ's miracles, and especially his resurrection; blessed are those that see not these, and yet believe in Christ. This may look forward upon those who should afterwards believe, the Gentiles, who had never seen Christ in the flesh. This faith is more praiseworthy than theirs who saw and believed. It evidences a better temper of mind in those that do believe. He that believes upon that sight has his resistance conquered by a sort of violence; but he that believes without it is more noble. It is a greater instance of the power of divine grace. Flesh and blood contribute more to their faith that see and believe, than to theirs who see not and yet believe.

IV. The remark which the evangelist makes like an historian drawing towards a conclusion, v. 30, 31.

1. He assures us that many other things occurred, which are not written in the book; many signs. There were other signs, many others, for the confirmation of our faith. Those that recorded the resurrection of Christ were not put to fish for evidence, to take up such short and scanty proofs as they could find, and make up the rest with conjecture. No, they had evidence enough and to spare. The disciples, in whose presence these other signs were done, were to be preachers of Christ's resurrection to others, and therefore it was requisite they should have proofs of it in abundance. We need not ask why they were not all written, or why not more than these, or others than these. Had this history been a mere human composition, it had been swelled with a multitude of depositions and affidavits, to prove the contested truth of Christ's resurrection; but, being a divine history, the penmen write with a noble security, sufficient to convince those that were willing to be taught and to condemn those that were obstinate in their unbelief; and, if this satisfy not, more would not. Men produce all they have to say, that they may gain credit; but God does not, for he can give faith. Had this history been written for the entertainment of the curious, it would have been more copious, but it was written to bring men to believe, and enough is said to answer that intention.

2. He instructs us in the design of recording what we do find here (v. 31): "That you might believe upon these evidences; that you might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God."

(1) The design of those that wrote the gospel. The evangelists wrote without any view of temporal benefit to themselves or others, but to bring men to Christ and heaven, and to persuade men to believe.

(2) The duty of those that read and hear the gospel. It is their duty to believe, to embrace, the doctrine of Christ. [1] What the great gospel truth is which we are to believe—that Jesus is that Christ, that Son of God. He is the Christ, anointed of God to be a prince and a Saviour. He is the Son of God, endued with the power of God and entitled to the glory of God. [2] What the great gospel blessedness is which we are to hope for—That believing we shall have life through his name. This is: To direct our faith. Life through Christ's name is what we must propose to ourselves as the fulness of our joy. To encourage our faith. Upon the prospect of some great advantage, men will venture far; and greater advantage there cannot be than that which is offered by the words of this life. It includes both spiritual life and eternal life. Both are through Christ's name and both indefeasibly sure to all true believers.

CHAP. XXI

The evangelist seemed to have concluded his history. New matter occurring, he begins again. He had said that there were many other signs which Jesus did. And in this chapter he mentions one, Christ's appearance to some of his disciples at the sea of Tiberias. I. How he discovered himself to them as they were fishing, filled their net, and then very familiarly came and dined with them upon what they had caught, ver. 1–14. II. What discourse he had with Peter after dinner. 1. Concerning himself, ver. 15–19. 2. Concerning John, ver. 20–23. III. The solemn conclusion of this gospel, ver. 24, 25.

We have here an account of Christ's appearance to his disciples at the sea of Tiberias. 1. Let us compare this appearance with those that went before. In those Christ showed himself to his disciples when they were met upon a Lord's day, and when they were all together; but in this he showed himself to some of them upon a week-day, when they were fishing. Christ has many ways of making himself known to his people; sometimes by his Spirit he visits them when they are employed in common business. 2. Let us compare it with that which followed at the mountain in Galilee, where Christ had appointed them to meet him, Matt. xxviii. 16. Now this appearance was while they were waiting for that, that they might not be weary of waiting.

I. Who they were to whom Christ now showed himself (v. 2): not to all the twelve, but to seven of them only. Nathanael is mentioned as one of them, whom we have not met with since ch. i. But some think he was the same with Bartholomew. It is good for the disciples of Christ to be much together; in common conversation, and about common business. Christ chose to manifest himself to them when they were together, that they might be joint witnesses of the same matter of fact. Thomas was one of them, and is named next to Peter, as if he now kept closer to the meetings of the apostles than ever.

II. How they were employed, v. 3.

1. Their agreement to go a-fishing. For my part, says Peter, I will go a-fishing; We will go with thee then, say they. Though commonly two of a trade cannot agree, yet they could. They did it, (1) To redeem time, and not be idle. The hour for entering upon action was not come. Now, in the meantime, rather than do nothing, they would go a-fishing; not for recreation, but for business. It is an instance likewise of their industry, and bespeaks them good husbands of their time. While they were waiting, they would not be idling. Those who would give an account of their time with joy should contrive to fill up the vacancies of it. (2) That they might help to maintain themselves and not be burdensome to any.

2. Their disappointment in their fishing. That night they caught nothing. The hand of the diligent often returns empty. Even good men may come short of desired success in their honest undertakings. Providence so ordered it that all that night they should catch nothing, that the miraculous draught of fishes in the morning might be the more acceptable. In those disappointments which to us are very grievous God has often designs that are very gracious.

III. After what manner Christ made himself known to them. It is said (v. 1), He showed himself. Four things are observable in the appearance of Christ to them:

1. He showed himself to them seasonably (v. 4): When the morning was now come, Jesus stood on the shore. Christ's time of making himself known to his people is when they are most at a loss. When they think they have lost themselves, he will let them know that they have not lost him. Christ appeared to them, not walking upon the water, but standing upon the shore, because now they were to make towards him. It is a comfort to us, when our passage is rough and stormy, that our Master is at shore, and we are hastening to him.

2. He showed himself to them gradually. The disciples knew not, all at once, that it was Jesus. Christ is often nearer to us than we think he is.

3. He showed himself to them by an instance of his pity, v. 5. He called to them, Children, "Lads have you any meat?" (1) The compellation is very familiar; he speaks unto them with the care and tenderness of a father: Children. They were not children in age, but they were his children, the children which God had given him. (2) The question is very kind: Have you any meat? The Lord is for the body, 1 Cor. vi. 13. Christ takes cognizance of the temporal wants of his people, and has promised them not only grace sufficient, but food convenient. Christ looks into the cottages of the poor, and asks, Children, have you any meat? Christ takes care of them, takes care for them. Christ has herein set us an example of compassionate concern for our brethren. There are many poor householders disabled for labour, or disappointed in it, that are reduced to straits, whom the rich should enquire after thus, Have you any meat? For the most necessitous are commonly the least clamorous. The disciples gave a short answer. They said, No. Christ put the question to them, not because he did not know their wants, but because he would know them from them. Those that would have supplies from Christ must own themselves empty and needy.

4. He showed himself to them by an instance of his power (v. 6): he ordered them to cast the net on the right side of the ship. And then they, who were going home empty-handed, were enriched with a great draught of fishes. (1) The orders Christ gave them, and the promise annexed to those orders: Cast the net there in such a place, and you shall find. Divine providence extends itself to things most minute, and they are happy that know how to take hints thence in the conduct of their affairs. (2) Their obedience of these orders, and the good success of it. As yet they knew not that it was Jesus; however, they were willing to be advised by anybody. In being thus observant of strangers, they were obedient to their Master unawares. And it sped wonderfully well; now they had a draught that paid them for all their pains. There is nothing lost by observing Christ's orders. Now the draught of fishes may be considered, [1] As a miracle in itself. Christ manifests himself to his people by doing that for them which none else can do. [2] As a mercy to them. When their ingenuity and industry failed them, the power of Christ came in opportunely for their relief. [3] As the memorial of a former mercy, with which Christ had formerly recompensed Peter for the loan of his boat, Luke v. 4, &c. Both that and this affected him much, as meeting him in his own element, in his own employment. Latter favours are designed to bring to mind former favours, that eaten bread may not be forgotten. [4] As a mystery, and very significant of that work to which Christ was now sending them forth. When, soon after this, three thousand were converted in one day, then the net was cast on the right side of the ship. It is an encouragement to Christ's ministers to continue their diligence in their work. One happy draught, at length, may be sufficient to repay many years of toil at the gospel net.

IV. How the disciples received this discovery, v. 7, 8.

1. John was the most intelligent and quick-sighted disciple. He whom Jesus loved was the first that said, It is the Lord. His secret is with his favourites. When John was himself aware that it was the Lord, he communicated his knowledge to those with him. Those that know Christ themselves should endeavour to bring others acquainted with him; we need not engross him, there is enough in him for us all. John tells Peter particularly, knowing he would be glad to see him above any of them.

2. Peter was the most zealous and warmhearted disciple; for as soon as he heard it was the Lord the ship could not hold him, but into the sea he throws himself that he might come first to Christ. He showed his respect to Christ by girding his fisher's coat about him, that he might appear before his Master in the best clothes he had, and he girt it to him that he might make the best of his way through the water to Christ. He showed the strength of his affection to Christ by casting himself into the sea; and either wading or swimming to shore, to come to him. He cast himself into the sea with precipitation; sink or swim, he would show his goodwill and aim to be with Jesus. Peter had had much forgiven, and made it appear he loved much by his willingness to run hazards, to come to him. Those that have been with Jesus will be willing to swim through a stormy sea to come to him.

3. The rest of the disciples were careful and honest hearted. They hastened in the boat to the shore, and made the best of their way (v. 8). (1) How variously God dispenses his gifts. Some excel, as Peter and John; are very eminent in gifts and graces; others are but ordinary disciples, that mind their duty, and are faithful to him, and yet both the one and the other, the eminent and the obscure, shall sit down together with Christ in glory; nay, and perhaps the last shall be first. Some, like John, are eminently contemplative, have great gifts of knowledge, and serve the church with them; others, like Peter, are eminently active and courageous, and are thus very serviceable to their generation. Some are useful as the church's eyes, others as the church's hands, and all for the good of the body. (2) What a great deal of difference there may be between some good people and others in the way of their honouring Christ, and yet both accepted of him. Peter ought not to be censured for casting himself into the sea, but commended for his zeal and the strength of his affection; and so must those be who, in love to Christ, quit the world, with Mary, to sit at his feet. But others serve Christ more in the affairs of the world. They continue in that ship, drag the net, and bring the fish to shore, as the other disciples here; and such ought not to be censured as worldly, for they, in their place, are as truly serving Christ as the other, even in serving tables. Christ was well placed with both, and so must we be.

V. What entertainment the Lord Jesus gave them.

1. He had provision ready for them. When they came to land, wet and cold, weary and hungry, they found a good fire there to warm them and dry them, and fish and bread. We need not be curious in enquiring whence this fire, and fish, and bread. Here was nothing stately or delicate. We should be content with mean things, for Christ was. We may be comforted in this instance of Christ's care of his disciples. He kindly provided for those fishermen, when they came weary from their work. It is encouraging to Christ's ministers that they may depend upon him who employs them to provide for them. Let them content themselves with what they have here; they have better things in reserve.

2. He called for some of that which they had caught, v. 10, 11.

(1) The command Christ gave them to bring their draught of fish to shore: "Bring of the fish hither, which you have now caught." He would have them eat the labour of their hands. What is got by God's blessing on our own industry and honest labour hath a peculiar sweetness in it. Christ would hereby teach us to use what we have. He would have them taste the gifts of his miraculous bounty. The benefits Christ bestows upon us are not to be buried and laid up, but to be used and laid out. He would give a specimen of the spiritual entertainment he has for all believers—that he sups with them, and they with him. Ministers, who are fishers of men, must bring all they catch to their Master.

(2) Their obedience to this command, v. 11. It was said (v. 6), They were not able to draw the net to shore, for the multitude of fishes. Thus the fishers of men, when they have enclosed souls in the gospel net, cannot bring them to shore, and complete the good work begun, without the continued influence of the divine grace. Who it was that was most active in landing the fishes: it was Peter, who, as in the former instance (v. 7), had shown a more zealous affection to his Master's person than any of them, so in this he showed a more ready obedience to his Master's command; but all that are faithful are not alike forward. The number of the fishes that were caught. They were in all a hundred and fifty and three, and all great fishes. A further instance of Christ's care of them: For all there were so many and great fishes too, yet was not the net broken; so that they lost none of their fish, nor damaged their net. The net of the gospel has enclosed multitudes, three thousand in one day, and yet is not broken; it is still as mighty as ever to bring souls to God.

3. He invited them to dinner. Observing that they were afraid to ask him, Who art thou? because they knew it was their Lord, he called to them very familiarly, Come and dine.

(1) See here how free Christ was with his disciples; he treated them as friends. Come, and dine with me. The call Christ gives his disciples into communion with him in grace here. Christ is a friend; come, dine with him, he will bid you welcome. The call he will give them into the fruition of him in glory hereafter. Christ has wherewithal to dine all his friends and followers; there is room and provision enough for them all.

(2) See how reverent the disciples were before Christ. They were somewhat shy of using the freedom he invited them to. None of them durst ask him, Who art thou? Either, because they would not be so bold with him. They had very good reason to think it was he, and could be no other. Or, because they would not so far betray their own folly. They must be stupid indeed if they questioned whether it was he or no. We should be ashamed of our distrusts. Groundless doubts must be stifled, and not started.

4. He carved for them, as the master of the feast, v. 13. He comes, and takes bread himself, and gives them, and fish likewise. The entertainment here was but ordinary; it was only a fish-dinner, plain and homely. Hunger is the best sauce. Christ showed himself alive by eating, not showed himself a prince by feasting. Christ himself began. He would show that he had a true body, which was capable of eating. The apostles produced this as one proof of his resurrection, that they had eaten and drank with him, Acts x. 41. He gave the meat about to all his guests. He not only provided it for them, but he himself divided it among them, and put it into their hands. Thus to him we owe the application, as well as the purchase, of the benefits of redemption.

The evangelist leave them at dinner, and makes this remark (v. 14): This is now the third time that Jesus showed himself alive to his disciples. Though he had appeared to Mary, to the women, to the two disciples, and to Cephas, yet he had but twice before this appeared to any company of them together. This is taken notice of, (1) For confirming the truth of his resurrection; the vision was doubled, was trebled, for the thing was certain. (2) As an instance of Christ's continued kindness to his disciples; once, and again, and a third time, he visited them. It is good to keep account of Christ's gracious visits. This is now the third; have we made a due improvement of the first and second? This is the third, perhaps it may be the last.

We have here Christ's discourse with Peter after dinner.

I. He examines his love to him, and gives him a charge concerning his flock, v. 15–17.

1. When Christ entered into this discourse with Peter.—It was after they had dined. Christ foresaw that what he had to say to Peter would give him some uneasiness. Peter was conscious to himself that he had incurred his Master's displeasure, and could expect no other than to be upbraided with his ingratitude. Twice, if not thrice, he had seen his Master since his resurrection, and he said not a word to him of it. We may suppose Peter full of doubts upon what terms he stood with his Master; sometimes hoping the best, yet not without some fears. But now, at length, his Master put him out of his pain. When they had dined together, in token of reconciliation, then discoursed he with him about it as with a friend. Peter had reproached himself for it, and therefore Christ did not reproach him for it. Being satisfied in his sincerity, the offence was not only forgiven, but forgotten; and Christ let him know that he was as dear to him as ever. Herein he has given us an encouraging instance of his tenderness towards penitents.

2. What was the discourse itself. Here was the same question three times asked, the same answer three times returned, and the same reply three times given. The same thing was repeated by our Saviour, the more to affect Peter. It is repeated by the evangelist, the more to affect us, and all that read it.

(1) Three times Christ asks Peter whether he loves him or no. The first time the question is, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these? Now he calls him: Simon, son of Jonas. He speaks to him by name, the more to affect him, as Luke xxii. 31. Simon, Simon. He does not call him Cephas, nor Peter, the name he had given him, but his original name, Simon. Yet he gives him no hard language, but as he had called him when he pronounced him blessed, Simon Bar-jona, Matt. xvi. 17. How he catechises him: Lovest thou me more than these?

First, Lovest thou me? If we would try whether we are Christ's disciples indeed, this must be the enquiry, Do we love him? 1. His fall had given occasion to doubt of his love: "Peter, I have cause to suspect thy love; for if thou hadst loved me thou wouldst not have been ashamed and afraid to own me in my sufferings." We must not reckon it an affront to have our sincerity questioned, when we ourselves have done that which makes it questionable. The question is affecting: "Dost thou love me? Give but proof of this, and the affront shall be passed by, and no more said of it." Peter had professed himself a penitent, witness his tears; he was now upon his probation as a penitent; but the question is not, "Simon, how much hast thou wept?" but, "Dost thou love me?" It is this that will make the other expressions of repentance acceptable. Much is forgiven her, not because she wept much, but because she loved much. 2. His function would give occasion for the exercise of his love. Before Christ would commit his sheep to his care, he asked him, Lovest thou me? Christ has such a tender regard to his flock that he will not trust it with any but those that love him. Those that do not truly love Christ will never truly love the souls of men; nor will that minister love his work that does not love his Master. Nothing but the love of Christ will constrain ministers to go cheerfully through the difficulties and discouragements they meet with in their work. But this love will make their work easy, and them in good earnest in it.

Secondly, Lovest thou me more than these? 1. "Lovest thou me more than thou lovest these?" Dost thou love me more than thou dost James or John, or Andrew? Those do not love Christ aright that do not love him better than the best friend they have in the world. 2. "Lovest thou me more than these love me," more than any of the rest of the disciples love me? And then the question is intended to upbraid him with his vain-glorious boast, Though all men should deny thee, yet will not I. Or, to intimate to him that he had now more reason to love him than any of them had, for more had been forgiven to him than to any of them. It is no breach of the peace to strive which shall love Christ best.

Thirdly, The second and third time that Christ put this question, 1. He left out the comparison more than these, because Peter modestly left it out, not willing to compare himself with his brethren, much less to prefer himself before them. Though we cannot say, We love Christ more than others do, yet we shall be accepted if we can say, We love him indeed. 2. In the last he altered the word. In the first two enquiries, the original word is: Dost thou retain a kindness for me? In answer to which Peter uses another word, more emphatic, I love thee dearly. In putting the question the last time, Christ uses that word.

(2) Three times Peter returns the same answer to Christ: Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. [1] Peter does not pretend to love Christ more than the rest of the disciples did. Though we must aim to be better than others, yet we must, in lowliness of mind, esteem others better than ourselves; for we know more evil of ourselves than we do of any of our brethren. [2] Yet he professes again and again that he loves Christ: Yea, Lord, surely I love thee. He had a grateful sense of his kindness, his desire was towards him, and his delight in him, as one he should be unspeakably happy in. This amounts to a profession of repentance for his sin, for it grieves us to have affronted one we love; and to a promise of adherence to him for the future: Lord, I love thee, and will never leave thee. Christ prayed that his faith might not fail (Luke xxii. 32), and, because his faith did not fail, his love did not; for faith will work by love. Christ puts his trial upon this issue: Dost thou love me? And Peter joins issue upon it: Lord, I love thee. [3] He appeals to Christ himself for the proof of it: Thou knowest that I love thee; and the third time yet more emphatically: Thou knowest all things, thou knowest that I love thee. He calls Christ himself to witness. Peter was sure that Christ knew all things, and particularly that he knew the heart. Peter was satisfied of this, that Christ, who knew all things, knew the sincerity of his love to him. It is a terror to a hypocrite to think that Christ knows all things. But it is a comfort to a sincere Christian. Christ knows us better than we know ourselves. Though we know not our own uprightness, he knows it. [4] He was grieved when Christ asked him the third time, Lovest thou me? v. 17. It put him in mind of his threefold denial of Christ. Every remembrance of past sins, even pardoned sins, renews the sorrow of a true penitent. It put him in fear lest his Master foresaw some further miscarriage of his. "Surely," thinks Peter, "my Master would not thus put me upon the rack if he did not see some cause for it. What would become of me if I should be again tempted?"

(3) Three times Christ committed the care of his flock to Peter: Feed my lambs; feed my sheep; feed my sheep. Those whom Christ committed to Peter's care were his lambs and his sheep. In this flock some are lambs, others are sheep. The Shepherd here takes care of both, and of the lambs first, for upon all occasions he showed a particular tenderness for them. The charge he gives him concerning them is to feed them. The word used in v. 15, 17, strictly signifies to give them food; but the word used in v. 16 signifies more largely to do all the offices of a shepherd to them. It is the duty of all Christ's ministers to feed his lambs and sheep. Feed them, that is, teach them. Feed them, that is, "Lead them to the green pastures, ministering all the ordinances to them. Feed them by personal application to their respective state and case; not only lay meat before them, but feed those with it that are wilful and will not, or weak and cannot feed themselves." But why did he give this charge particularly to Peter? The particular application to Peter here was designed to restore him to his apostleship, now that he repented. This commission given to Peter was an evidence that Christ was reconciled to him, else he would never have reposed such a confidence in him. Christ, when he forgave Peter, trusted him with the most valuable treasure he had on earth. It was designed to quicken him to a diligent discharge of his office as an apostle. Peter was always forward to speak and act, and, lest he should be tempted to take upon him the directing of the shepherds, he is charged to feed the sheep. If he will be doing, let him do this, and pretend no further. What Christ said to him he said to all his disciples; he charged them all, not only to be fishers of men by the conversion of sinners, but feeders of the flock, by the edification of saints.

II. Having confirmed to him the honour of an apostle, he now tells him of further preferment designed him—the honour of a martyr.

1. How his martyrdom is foretold (v. 18): Thou shalt stretch forth thy hands and another shall gird thee (as a prisoner that is pinioned) and carry thee whither thou wouldest not.

(1) He prefaces the notice he gives to Peter of his sufferings with a solemn asseveration, Verily, verily, I say unto thee. It was not spoken of as a thing probable, but as a thing certain, I say it to thee. As Christ foresaw all his own sufferings, so he foresaw the sufferings of all his followers. Having charged him to feed his sheep, he bids him not to expect ease and honour in it, but trouble and persecution.

(2) He foretells particularly that he should die by the hands of an executioner. The tradition of the ancients informs us that Peter was crucified at Rome under Nero. The pomp and solemnity of an execution add much to the terror of death. Death, in these horrid shapes, has often been the lot of Christ's faithful ones. It was a violent death that he should be carried to, such a death as even innocent nature could not think of without dread. He that puts on the Christian does not put off the man. Christ himself prayed against the bitter cup. A natural aversion to pain and death is well reconcilable with a holy submission to the will of God in both.

(3) He compares this with his former liberty. "Time was when thou girdedst thyself and walkedst whither thou wouldest." Where trouble comes we are apt to fret the more at the grievances of restraint, sickness, and poverty, because we have known the sweets of liberty, health, and plenty. But we may turn it the other way: "How many years of prosperity have I enjoyed more than I deserved and improved? And, having received good, shall I not receive evil also?" What a change may possibly be made with us, as to our condition in this world! What a change is presently made with those that leave all to follow Christ! They must no longer walk whither they will, but whither he will.

(4) Christ tells Peter he should suffer thus in his old age. His enemies would hasten him out of the world violently when he was about to retire out of it peaceably. God would shelter him from the rage of his enemies till he should come to be old, that he might be made the fitter for sufferings, and the church might the longer enjoy his services.

2. The explication of this prediction (v. 19), This spoke he to Peter, signifying by what death he should glorify God. It is not only appointed to all once to die, but it is appointed to each what death he shall die. There is one way into the world, but many ways out, and God has determined which way we should go. It is the great concern of every good man, whatever death he dies, to glorify God in it. When we die patiently, die cheerfully, and die usefully, we glorify God in dying. The death of the martyrs was in a special manner for the glorifying of God. The blood of the martyrs has been the seed of the church.

Those who thereby at such an expense honour him he will honour.

3. The word of command he gives him hereupon: When he had spoken thus, he saith unto him, Follow me. This word, Follow me, was a further confirmation of his restoration to his Master's favour, for Follow me was the first call. It was an explication of the prediction of his sufferings. Follow me: "Expect to be treated as I have been, for the disciple is not greater than his Lord." It was to encourage him in faithfulness and diligence in his work as an apostle. He had told him to feed his sheep, and let him set his Master before him as an example. Herein they did follow him, and it was their present honour; who would be ashamed to follow such a leader? Hereafter they should follow him, and that would be their future happiness. Those that faithfully follow Christ in grace shall certainly follow him to glory.

I. The conference Christ had with Peter concerning John.

1. The eye Peter cast upon him (v. 20): Peter followed him, and turning about he sees the disciple whom Jesus loved following likewise. (1) How John is described. He does not name himself, but gives such a description of himself as sufficiently informs us whom he meant. He was the disciple whom Jesus loved. It is probable that mention is here made of John's having leaned on Jesus's breast and his enquiring concerning the traitor, which he did at the instigation of Peter (ch. xiii. 24), as a reason why Peter made the following enquiry concerning him. Then John was in the favourite's place, and he improved the opportunity to oblige Peter. And now that Peter was in the favourite's place, called to take a walk with Christ, he thought himself bound in gratitude to put such a question for John as he thought would oblige him, we all being desirous to know things to come. As we have interest at the throne of grace, we should improve it for the benefit of one another. This is the communion of saints. (2) What he did: He also followed Jesus; where he was there also would this servant of his be. What Christ said to Peter he took as said to himself; for that word of command, Follow me, was given to all the disciples. (3) The notice Peter took of it: He, turning about, seeth him. [1] A culpable diversion from following his Master. The best men find it hard to attend upon the Lord without distraction. A needless and unseasonable regard to our brethren often diverts us from communion with God. Or, [2] A laudable concern for his fellow-disciples. He was not so elevated with the honour his Master did him as to deny a kind look to one that followed.

2. The enquiry Peter made concerning him (v. 21): "Lord, and what shall this man do? What shall be his work, and his lot?" Now this may be taken as the language, (1) Of concern for John, and kindness to him. Here comes thy beloved disciple, hast thou nothing to say to him? Wilt thou not tell how he must be employed, and how he must be honoured? (2) Or of uneasiness at what Christ had said to him concerning his sufferings: "Lord, must I alone be carried whither I would not? Must this man have no share of the cross?" (3) Or of curiosity, and a fond desire of knowing things to come. It seems, by Christ's answer, there was something amiss in the question. He seems more concerned for another than for himself. So apt are we to be busy in other men's matters, but negligent in the concerns of our own souls—quick-sighted abroad, but dim-sighted at home. He seems more concerned about events than about duty. We need not ask, "What shall be the lot of those that shall come after us?" Scripture-predictions must be eyed for the directing of our consciences, not the satisfiying or our curiosity.

3. Christ's reply to this enquiry (v. 22), "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee. Follow thou me."

(1) There seems to be here an intimation of Christ's purpose concerning John. That he should not die a violent death, like Peter, but should tarry till Christ himself came by a natural death to fetch him to himself. The most credible of the ancient historians tell us that John was the only one of all the twelve that did not actually die a martyr. He at length died in his bed in a good old age. Though the crown of martyrdom is bright and glorious, yet the beloved disciple comes short of it.

(2) Others think that it is only a rebuke to Peter's curiosity. "Suppose I should design that John should never die, what does that concern thee? I have told thee how thou must die; it is enough for thee to know that, Follow thou me." It is the will of Christ that his disciples should mind their own present duty, and not be curious about future events concerning either themselves or others. There are many things we are apt to be solicitous about that are nothing to us. Other people's characters are nothing to us; it is out of our line to judge them. Other people's affairs are nothing to us to intermeddle in. What do you think will become of such and such? is a common question, which may easily be answered with another: What is that to me? To his own Master he stands or falls. Secret things belong not to us. The great thing that is all in all to us is duty, and not event; for duty is ours, events are God's. Now all our duty is summed up in this one of following Christ. And, if we will closely attend to the duty of following Christ, we shall find neither heart nor time to meddle with that which does not belong to us.

4. The mistake which arose from this saying of Christ, that that disciple should not die.

(1) The easy rise of a mistake in the church by misconstruing the sayings of Christ. Because John must not die a martyr, they conclude he must not die at all. They were inclined to expect it because they could not choose but desire it. We are apt to dote too much on men and means, instruments and external helps; whereas God will change his workmen, and yet carry on his work. There is no need of immortal ministers to be the guides of the church, while it is under the conduct of an eternal Spirit. Perhaps they were confirmed in their expectations when they now found that John survived all the rest of the apostles. However, it took rise from a saying of Christ's, misunderstood, and then made a saying of the church. Hence learn the uncertainly of human tradition, and the folly of building our faith upon it. Here was a tradition, an apostolical tradition, a saying that went abroad among the brethren. It was early; it was common; it was public; and yet it was false. Let the scripture be its own interpreter and explain itself. The aptness of men to misinterpret the sayings of Christ. The scriptures themselves have been wrested by the unlearned and unstable.

(2) The easy rectifying of such mistakes by adhering to the word of Christ. So the evangelist here corrects that saying among the brethren, by repeating the very words of Christ. He said, If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? He said so, and no more. Let the words of Christ speak for themselves. The best end of men's controversies would be to keep to the express words of scripture. Scripture language is the safest and most proper vehicle of scripture truth. As the scripture itself is the best weapon wherewith to wound all dangerous errors, so the scripture itself is the best weapon-salve to heal the wounds that are made by different modes of expression concerning the same truths. Those that cannot agree in the same logic and metaphysics, may yet agree in the same scripture terms, and then may agree to love one another.

II. We have here the conclusion of this gospel, v. 24, 25.

1. This gospel concludes with an account of the penman of it (v. 24): This is the disciple which testifies of these things to the present age, and wrote these things for the benefit of posterity. Those who wrote the history of Christ were not ashamed to put their names to it. John here does in effect subscribe his name. The record of Christ's life and death was drawn up by men of known integrity, who were ready to seal it with their blood. Those who wrote the history of Christ wrote upon their own knowledge. The penman of this history was a disciple, one that had leaned on Christ's breast, that had himself heard his sermons, had seen his miracles, and the proofs of his resurrection. This is he who testifies what he was well assured of. Those who wrote the history of Christ, as they testified what they had seen, so they wrote what they had first testified. It was published by word of mouth, with the greatest assurance, before it was committed to writing. What they wrote they wrote as an affidavit, which they would abide by. It was graciously appointed that the history of Christ should be put into writing, that it might spread to every place, and last through every age.

2. It concludes with an attestation of the truth of what had been here related: We know that his testimony is true. The testimony of one who is an eye-witness, is of unspotted reputation, and puts it into writing for the greater certainty, is an unexceptionable evidence. We know, that is, All the world knows, that the testimony of such a one is valid. The truth of the gospel comes confirmed by all the evidence we can rationally desire or expect. Then let the doctrine recommend itself, and let the miracles prove it to be of God. It expresses the satisfaction of the churches at that time concerning the truth of what is here related. Not as if an inspired writing needed any attestation from men, but hereby they recommended it to the notice of the churches. Or, it expresses the evangelist's own assurance of the truth of what he wrote. The evangelists themselves were entirely satisfied of the truth of what they have testified and transmitted to us. They ventured both this life and the other upon it; threw away this life, and depended upon another.

3. It concludes with an et cetera, with a reference to many other things said and done by our Lord Jesus, v. 25. If they should be written at large, even the world itself could not contain the books that might be written. If it be asked why the gospels are not larger, it may be answered,

(1) It was not because they had exhausted their subject, and had nothing more to write that was worth writing. Everything that Christ said and did was worth our notice. His miracles were many, very many, of many kinds, and the same often repeated. The repetition of the miracles before a great variety of witnesses, helped very much to prove them true miracles. Every new miracle rendered the report of the former the more credible; and the multitude of them renders the whole report incontestable. When we speak of Christ, we have a copious subject before us; the reality exceeds the report, and, after all, the one half is not told us. St. Paul quotes one of Christ's sayings, which is not recorded by any of the evangelists (Acts xx. 35), and doubtless there were many more.

(2) But it was for these three reasons: Because it was not needful to write more. What is written is a sufficient revelation of the doctrine of Christ and the proof of it. If we do not believe and improve what is written, neither should we if there had been much more. It was not possible to write all. It would be such a large and overgrown history as never was; such as would jostle out all other writings, and leave us no room for them. It would have been an endless thing. It was not advisable to write much; for the world, in a moral sense, could not contain the books that should be written. The world could not contain. It is the word that is used, ch. viii. 37, "My word has no place in you." They would have been so many that they would have found no room. All people's time would have been spent in reading, and other duties would thereby have been crowded out. Much is overlooked of what is written, much forgotten, and much made the matter of doubtful disputation; this would have been the case much more if there had been such a world of books. Especially since it was requisite that what was written should be meditated upon and expounded, which God wisely thought fit to leave room for. Let us be thankful for the books that are written, and not prize them the less for their plainness and brevity, and long to be above, where our capacities shall be so elevated and enlarged that there will be no danger of their being over-loaded.

The evangelist, concluding with Amen, thereby sets to his seal, and let us set to ours, an Amen of faith, that it is true, all true; and an Amen of satisfaction in what is written, as able to make us wise to salvation. Amen; so be it.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES

We have with an abundant satisfaction seen the foundation of our holy religion laid in the history of our blessed Saviour. Upon this rock the Christian church is built. How it began to be built upon this rock comes next to be related in this book.

The history of this book may be considered,

I. As looking back to the preceding gospels. The promises there made we here find made good, particularly the great promises of the descent of the Holy Ghost. The powers there lodged in them we here find exerted in miracles wrought on the bodies of people—miracles of mercy, miracles of judgment, and much greater miracles wrought on the minds of people. The proofs of Christ's resurrection with which the gospels closed are here abundantly corroborated according to the word of Christ, that his resurrection should be the most convincing proof of his divine mission. Christ had told his disciples that they should be his witnesses, and this book brings them in witnessing for him. That day-spring from on high the first appearing of which we there discerned we here find shining more and more. The kingdom of heaven, which was then at hand, is here set up. Christ's predictions of the virulent persecutions which the preachers of the gospel should be afflicted with we here find abundantly fulfilled, and also the assurances he gave them of extraordinary supports and comforts under their sufferings. This latter part of the history of the New Testament exactly answers to the word of Christ in the former part of it: and thus they mutually confirm and illustrate each other.

II. As looking forward to the following epistles. This book introduces them and is a key to them. We are members of the Christian church, that tabernacle of God among men. Now this book gives us an account of the framing and rearing of that tabernacle. The four gospels showed us how the foundation of that house was laid; this shows us how the superstructure began to be raised; Among the Jews and Samaritans; among the Gentiles.

Two things more are to be observed concerning this book: (1) The penman of it. It was written by Luke, who wrote the third of the four gospels, which bears his name. This Luke was very much a companion of Paul in his services and sufferings. Only Luke is with me, 2 Tim. iv. 11. We may know by his style in the latter part of this book when and where he was with him, for then he writes, We did so and so, as ch. xvi. 10; xx. 6. (2) The title of it: The Acts of the Apostles. [1] It is the history of the apostles; yet there is in it the history of Stephen, Barnabas, and some other apostolical men. It is the history of Peter and Paul only that is here recorded; Peter the apostle of the circumcision, and Paul the apostle of the Gentiles, Gal. ii. 7. [2] It is called their acts, or doings. The apostles were active men; and though the wonders they did were by the word, yet they are fitly called their acts; they spoke, and it was done.

CHAP. I

The inspired historian begins his narrative of the Acts of the Apostles, I. With a reference to his gospel, inscribing this, as he had done that, to his friend Theophilus, ver. 1, 2. II. With a summary of the proofs of Christ's resurrection, his conference with his disciples, and the instructions he gave them during the forty days of his continuance on earth, ver. 3–5. III. With a particular narrative of Christ's ascension into heaven, ver 6–11. IV. With a general idea of the embryo of the Christian church, ver. 12–14. V. With a particular account of the filling up of the vacancy that was made in the sacred college by the death of Judas, by the electing of Matthias in his room, ver. 15–26.

I. Theophilus is put in mind, and we in him, of St. Luke's gospel, which it will be of use for us to cast an eye upon.

1. His patron, to whom he dedicates this book, is Theophilus, v. 1. The directing some of the books of the scripture so is an intimation to each of us to receive them as if directed to us in particular, to us by name.

2. His gospel is here called the former treatise which he had made. He made the former treatise, and now is divinely inspired to make this, for Christ's scholars must go on towards perfection, and not think that their former labours will excuse them from further labours. St. Luke, because he had laid the foundation in a former treatise, will build upon it in this. Let not new sermons and new books make us forget old ones, but put us in mind of them, and help us to improve them.

3. The contents of his gospel were that, all that, which Jesus began both to do and teach. (1) Christ both did and taught. Those are the best ministers that both do and teach, whose lives are a constant sermon. (2) He began both to do and teach; he laid the foundation. His apostles were to carry on and continue what he began. Christ set them in, and then left them to go on, but sent his Spirit to empower them. It is a comfort to those who are endeavouring to carry on the work of the gospel that Christ himself began it. (3) The four evangelists, and Luke particularly, have handed down to us all that Jesus began both to do and to teach; not all the particulars; but all the heads, that by them we may judge of the rest.

4. The period of the evangelical story is fixed to the day in which he was taken up, v. 2. Then it was that he left this world, and his bodily presence was no more in it.

II. The truth of Christ's resurrection is maintained and evidenced, v. 3. The great evidence of his resurrection was that he showed himself alive to his apostles; and he was seen of them. 1. The proofs were infallible, both that he was alive (he walked and talked with them, he ate and drank with them) and that it was he himself, and not another; for he showed them again and again the marks of the wounds in his hands, and feet, and side. 2. They were many, and often repeated: He was seen by them forty days, not constantly residing with them, but frequently appearing to them.

III. A general hint given of the instructions he furnished his disciples with. He instructed them concerning the work they were to do: He gave commandments to the apostles whom he had chosen. Those whom he elected into the apostleship expected he should give them preferments, instead of which he gave them commandments. He gave them commandments through the Holy Ghost. In giving them the Holy Ghost, he gave them his commandments; for the Comforter will be a commander. He instructed them concerning the doctrine they were to preach: He spoke to them of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God. He had given them a general idea of that kingdom, but here he instructed them more in the nature of it, as a kingdom of grace in this world and of glory in the other, to prepare them to receive the Holy Ghost, and to go through that which they were designed for. It was one of the proofs of Christ's resurrection; the disciples, to whom he showed himself alive, knew that it was he, not only by what he showed them, but by what he said to them. None but he could speak thus clearly, thus fully, of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God.

IV. A particular assurance given them that they should now shortly receive the Holy Ghost (v. 4, 5).

1. The command he gives them to wait. This was to raise their expectations. They must wait till the time appointed, which is now not many days hence. Those that by faith hope promised mercies will come must with patience wait till they do come. They must wait in the place appointed, in Jerusalem. There Christ was put to shame, there he will have this honour done him, and this favour is done to Jerusalem to teach us to forgive our enemies and persecutors. The apostles were now to put on a public character. Jerusalem was the fittest candlestick for those lights to be set up in

2. The assurance he gives them that they shall not wait in vain.

(1) The blessing designed them shall come: You shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost. They had already been breathed upon with the Holy Ghost (John xx. 22), and they had found the benefit of it; but now they shall have larger measures of his gifts, graces, and comforts. "You shall be cleansed and purified by the Holy Ghost," as the priests were baptized and washed with water, when they were consecrated to the sacred function: "They had the sign; you shall have the thing signified. You shall hereby be more effectually than ever engaged to your Master. You shall be tied so fast to Christ that you shall never forsake him again."

(2) Now this gift of the Holy Ghost he speaks of,

[1] As the promise of the Father, which they had heard of him, and might therefore depend upon. First, The Spirit was given by promise. The Spirit of God is not given as the spirit of men is given us, but by the word of God. That the gift may be the more valuable. That it may be the more sure. That it may be of grace, and may be received by faith. As Christ, so the Spirit, is received by faith. Secondly, It was the promise of the Father,—of Christ's Father; of our Father. He will give the Spirit as the Father of mercies; it is the promise of the Father. Thirdly, This promise of the Father they had heard from Christ many a time. He assured them, again and again, that the Comforter should come. This confirms the promise of God that we have heard it from Jesus Christ.

[2] As the prediction of John Baptist (v. 5): "You have not only heard it from me, but you had it from John; he said (Matt. iii. 11), I indeed baptize you with water, but he that comes after me shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." It is a great honour that Christ now does to John. Thus he confirmeth the word of his servants, his messengers. But Christ can do more than any of his ministers. It is an honour to them to be employed in dispensing the means of grace, but it is his prerogative to give the Spirit of grace.

(3) Now this gift of the Holy Ghost thus promised is that which we find the apostles received in the next chapter, for in that this promise had its full accomplishment. Other scriptures speak of the gift of the Holy Ghost to ordinary believers; this speaks of that particular power which the first preachers of the gospel were endued with. By virtue of this promise we receive the New Testament as of divine inspiration.

They came together to be the witnesses of his ascension.

I. The question they asked him at this interview. Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel? Two ways this may be taken:

1. "Surely thou wilt not at all restore it to the present rulers of Israel. What! Shall those that hate and persecute thee and us be trusted with power?" Or rather,

2. "Surely thou wilt now restore it to the Jewish nation, as far as it will submit to thee." Now two things were amiss in this question:

(1) Their expectation of the thing itself. They thought Christ would restore the kingdom to Israel, whereas Christ came to set up his own kingdom, and that a kingdom of heaven, not to restore the kingdom to Israel, an earthly kingdom. See here, [1] How apt even good men are to place the happiness of the church too much in external pomp and power. We are told to expect the cross in this world, and to wait for the kingdom in the other world. [2] How apt we are to retain what we have imbibed, and how hard it is to get over the prejudices of education. The disciples were long before they could be brought to have any idea of his kingdom as spiritual. [3] How naturally we are biased in favour of our own people. The kingdoms of this world were to become his whether Israel should sink or swim. [4] How apt we are to misunderstand scripture and to expound scripture by our schemes, whereas we ought to form our schemes by the scriptures.

(2) Their enquiry concerning the time of it: "Lord, wilt thou do it at this time?" They were inquisitive into that which their Master had never encouraged them to enquire into. They were impatient for the setting up of that kingdom in which they promised themselves so great a share. Christ had told them that they should sit on thrones (Luke xxii. 30), and now nothing will serve them but they must be in the throne immediately.

II. The check which Christ gave to this question, v. 7: It is not for you to know the times and seasons. That mistake would soon be rectified by the pouring out of the Spirit, after which they never had any more thoughts of the temporal kingdom. There is a sense of the expectation which is true, the setting up of the gospel kingdom in the world. But he checks their enquiry after the time.

1. The knowledge of this is not allowed to them: It is not for you to know. (1) Christ is now parting from them, and yet he gives them this rebuke; a caution to his church to take heed of splitting upon the rock which was fatal to our first parents—an inordinate desire of forbidden knowledge. (2) Christ had given his disciples a great deal of knowledge above others. He here lets them understand that there were some things which it was not for them to know. We shall see how little reason we have to be proud of our knowledge when we consider how many things we are ignorant of. (3) Christ had given his disciples instructions sufficient for the discharge of their duty, and in this knowledge he will have them to be satisfied. (4) Christ had himself told his disciples the things pertaining to the kingdom of God, and had promised that the Spirit should show them things to come. He had likewise given them signs of the times. But they must not expect nor desire to know either all the particulars of future events or the exact times of them. As to the times and seasons of the year, we know, in general, there will be summer and winter counterchanged, but we know not particularly which day will be fair or which foul, either in summer or in winter. What this or that particular day will bring forth we cannot tell, but must accommodate ourselves to it, whatever it is, and make the best of it.

2. The knowledge of it is reserved to God; it is what the Father hath put in his own power. None besides can reveal the times and seasons to come. He has not thought fit to let you know the times and seasons. He hath not said that he will not give you to know something more than you do of the times and seasons, but he has put it in his own power to do it or not, as he thinks fit.

III. He appoints them their work, and with authority assures them of success in it. "Know this (v. 8) that you shall receive a spiritual power, by the descent of the Holy Ghost upon you, you shall be witnesses unto me; and your testimony shall be received here in Jerusalem, in the country about, and all the world over," v. 8. If Christ make us serviceable to his honour in our own day and generation, let this be enough for us. Christ here tells them,

1. That their work should be honourable and glorious: You shall be witnesses unto me. They shall proclaim him king. They must openly and solemnly preach his gospel to the world. They shall confirm their testimony, not as witnesses do, with an oath, but with the divine seal of miracles and supernatural gifts: You shall be martyrs to me; for they attested the truth of the gospel with their sufferings, even unto death.

2. That their power for this work should be sufficient. They had not strength of their own for it, nor wisdom nor courage enough. "But you shall receive the power of the Holy Ghost coming upon you. You shall have power to preach the gospel, and to confirm it both by miracles and by sufferings." Those whom he employs in his service he will qualify for it.

3. That their influence should be great and very extensive: "You shall be witnesses: In Jerusalem; there you must begin. Your light shall thence shine throughout all Judæa. Thence you shall proceed to Samaria. Your usefulness shall reach to the uttermost part of the earth."

IV. Having left these instructions with them, he leaves them (v. 9): When he had spoken these things he blessed them (so we were told, Luke xxiv. 50); and while they beheld him, he was taken up, and a cloud received him out of their sight. He began his ascension in the sight of his disciples, even while they beheld. They saw him go up towards heaven, and had actually their eye upon him with so much care and earnestness of mind that they could not be deceived. He vanished out of their sight, in a cloud. It was a bright cloud that overshadowed him in his transfiguration, and most probably this was so, Matt. xvii. 5. By the clouds there is a sort of communication kept up between the upper and lower world; in them the vapours are sent up from the earth, and the dews sent down from heaven. Fitly therefore does he ascend in a cloud who is the Mediator between God and man, by whom God's mercies come down upon us and our prayers come up to him. This was the last that was seen of him.

V. The disciples, when he had gone out of their sight, yet still continued looking up steadfastly to heaven (v. 10). 1. Perhaps they hoped that Christ would come back to them again, so much did they still dote upon his bodily presence, though he had told them that it was expedient for them that he should go away. 2. Perhaps they expected to see some change in the visible heavens now upon Christ's ascension. Christ had told them that hereafter they should see heaven opened (John i. 51), and why should not they expect it now?

VI. Two angels appeared to them. To show how much Christ had at heart the concerns of his church on earth, he sent back to his disciples two of those that came to meet him, who appear as two men in white apparel. Now we are told what the angels said to them, 1. To check their curiosity: You men of Galilee, why stand you gazing up into heaven? What would you see? You have seen all that you were called together to see, and why do you look any further? Why stand you gazing? Christ's disciples should never stand at a gaze, because they have a sure rule to go by. 2. To confirm their faith concerning Christ's second coming. Their Master had often told them of this: "This same Jesus, who is taken up from you into heaven will come in like manner thence, as you have seen him go thither." (1) "This same Jesus, who came once in disgrace to be judged, will come again in glory to judge." (2) "He shall come in like manner. He is gone away in a cloud. You have now lost the sight of him in the clouds; and whither he is gone you cannot follow him now, but shall then." When we stand gazing and trifling, the consideration of our Master's second coming should quicken and awaken us; and, when we stand gazing and trembling, the consideration of it should comfort and encourage us.

I. When Christ ascended—from the mount of Olives (v. 12). There he began his sufferings, and therefore there he rolled away the reproach of them by his glorious ascension. Thus would he enter upon his kingdom in the sight of Jerusalem. This mount is here said to be near Jerusalem, a sabbath day's journey from it; no further than devout people used to walk out on a sabbath evening, after the public worship was over, for meditation. Some reckon it a thousand paces; some seven furlongs. Thus far it is a rule to us, not to journey on the sabbath any more than in order to the sabbath work; and as far as is necessary to this we are not only allowed, but enjoined.

II. Whither the disciples returned: They came to Jerusalem, according to their Master's appointment. It should seem that though immediately after Christ's resurrection they were watched, yet after it was known that they were gone into Galilee no notice was taken of their return to Jerusalem. God can find out hiding-places for his people in the midst of their enemies. At Jerusalem they went up into an upper room, and there abode. There they assembled every day, in expectation of the descent of the Spirit. They were continually in the temple (Luke xxiv. 53), but that was in the courts of the temple, at the hours of prayer, where they could not be hindered from attending; but, it should seem, this upper room was in a private house.

III. Who the disciples were, that kept together. The eleven apostles are here named (v. 13), so is Mary the mother of our Lord (v. 14), and it is the last time that ever any mention is made of her. There were others, the brethren of our Lord, and, to make up the hundred and twenty spoken of (v. 15), we may suppose that all or most of the seventy disciples were with them.

IV. How they spent their time: They all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication. They prayed, and made supplication. All God's people are praying people. It was now a time of trouble and danger, and, Is any afflicted? Let him pray. They had new work before them, and, before they entered upon it, they were instant in prayer to God. Before they were first sent forth Christ spent time in prayer for them, and now they spent time in prayer for themselves. Those are in the best frame to receive spiritual blessings that are in a praying frame. God will be enquired of for promised mercies, and the nearer the performance seems to be the more earnest we should be in prayer for it. They continued in prayer. It is said (Luke xxiv. 53), They were praising and blessing God; here, They continued in prayer and supplication. Praise for the promise is a decent way of begging for the performance, and praise for former mercy of begging further mercy. They did this with one accord. Those who so keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace are best prepared to receive the comforts of the Holy Ghost.

The sin of Judas made a vacancy in the college of the apostles. If they were but eleven, it would occasion everyone to enquire what had become of the twelfth; therefore care was taken, to fill up the vacancy.

I. The persons concerned in this affair. The house consisted of about a hundred and twenty. This was the number of the names, that is, the persons. Here was the beginning of the Christian church: this hundred and twenty was the grain of mustard-seed that grew into a tree, the leaven that leavened the whole lump. The speaker was Peter, who had been, and still was, the most forward man. Peter, being designed to be the apostle of the circumcision, while the sacred story stays among the Jews, he is still brought in, as afterwards, when it comes to speak of the Gentiles, it keeps to the story of Paul.

II. The proposal which Peter made for the choice of another apostle. He stood up in the midst of the disciples, v. 15.

1. The account he gives of the vacancy made by the death of Judas, in which he is very particular, and takes notice of the fulfilling of the scriptures in it.

(1) The power to which Judas had been advanced (v. 17): He was numbered with us, and had obtained part of this ministry. What will it avail us to be added to the number of Christians, if we partake not of the spirit and nature of Christians?

(2) The sin of Judas. He was guide to those that took Jesus. He had the impudence to appear openly at the head of the party that seized him. He went before them to the place, and gave the word of command: That same is he, hold him fast. Ringleaders in sin are the worst of sinners.

(3) The ruin of Judas by this sin. Perceiving the chief priests to seek the life of Christ and his disciples, he thought to save his by going over to them, and not only so, but to get an estate under them. [1] He lost his money shamefully enough (v. 18): He purchased a field with the thirty pieces of silver, which were the reward of his iniquity. He thought to have purchased a field for himself, but it proved the purchase of a field to bury strangers in; and what was he or any of his the better for this? [2] He lost his life more shamefully. We were told (Matt. xxvii. 5) that he went away in despair; here it is added, he fell headlong. He burst asunder in the midst, so that all his bowels tumbled out. Bowelling is part of the punishment of traitors.

(4) The public notice that was taken of this: It was known to all the dwellers in Jerusalem. It was, as it were, put into the newspapers, and was all the talk of the town, as a remarkable judgment of God upon him that betrayed his Master, v. 19. It was in everybody's mouth, and nobody disputed the truth of the fact. It was known, that is, it was known to be true. Here is one proof of the notoriety of the thing mentioned, that the field was called Aceldama —the field of blood, because it was bought with the price of blood.

(5) The fulfilling of the scriptures in this, that it must needs be fulfilled, v. 16. Let none be surprised nor stumble at it, for David had not only foretold his sin, but had also foretold his punishment: Let his habitation be desolate. The substitution of another in his room. His bishopric, or his office shall another take. We are not to think the worse of any office that God has instituted either for the wickedness of any that are in that office or for the ignominious punishment of that wickedness; nor will God suffer any purpose of his to be frustrated, or any work of his to be undone, for the miscarriages of those that are entrusted therewith. Judas is hanged, but his bishopric is not lost. Christ's cause shall never be lost for want of witnesses.

2. The motion he makes for the choice of another apostle, v. 21, 22. (1) How the person must be qualified that must fill up the vacancy. It must be one of these men that have companied with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto that same day that he was taken up from us. Those that have been diligent in the discharge of their duty in a lower station, are fittest to be preferred to a higher; those that have been faithful in a little shall be entrusted with more. None shall be an apostle but one that has companied with the apostles, and that continually. (2) To what work he is called. He must be a witness with us of his resurrection. By this it appears that others of the disciples were with the eleven when Christ appeared to them. The great thing which the apostles were to attest to the world was Christ's resurrection. See what the apostles were ordained to, not to a secular dignity and dominion, but to preach Christ, and the power of his resurrection.

III. The nomination of the person that was to succeed Judas.

1. Two, who were known to have been Christ's constant attendants, were set up as candidates for the place (v. 23): They appointed two. The two they nominated were Joseph and Matthias, of neither of whom do we read elsewhere. These two were both of them so well qualified for the office, that they could not tell which of them was the fitter, but all agreed it must be one of these two.

2. They applied to God by prayer for direction, which of these two? v. 24, 25. (1) They appeal to God as the searcher of hearts: "Thou, Lord, who knowest the hearts of all men." When an apostle was to be chosen he must be chosen by his heart and the temper and disposition of that. It is comfortable to us, in our prayers for the welfare of the church and its ministers, that the God to whom we pray knows the hearts of all men, can make them fit for his purpose by giving them another spirit. (2) They desire to know which of these God had chosen: Lord, show us this. It is fit that God should choose his own servants. (3) They are ready to receive him as a brother whom God hath chosen, to take part of this ministry and apostleship from which Judas by transgression fell, that he might go to his own place, the place of a traitor, the fittest place for him. Those that betray Christ, as they fall from the dignity of relation to him, so they fall into all misery. Our Saviour had said that Judas's own place should be such that it had been better for him that he had never been born (Matt. xxvi. 24). (4) The doubt was determined by lot (v. 26), which is an appeal to God, and lawful to be used for determining matters not otherwise determinable, provided it be done in a solemn religious manner, and with prayer, the prayer of faith. Thus the number of the apostles was made up.

CHAP. II

Between the promise of the Spirit and his coming there were but a few days; and during those days the apostles lay perfectly wind-bound, and not offering to preach. But in this chapter the north wind and the south wind awake, and then they awake, and we have them in the pulpit presently. Here is, I. The descent of the Spirit on the day of pentecost, ver. 1–4. II. The various speculations among the people that were now met in Jerusalem from all parts, ver. 5–13. III. The sermon which Peter preached wherein he shows that this pouring out of the Spirit was the accomplishment of an Old Testament promise (ver. 14–21), that it was a confirmation of Christ's being the Messiah (ver. 22–32), and that it was a fruit and evidence of his ascension into heaven, ver. 23–36. IV. The good effect of this sermon in the conversion of many to the faith of Christ, ver. 37–41. V. The eminent piety and charity of those primitive Christians, ver. 42–47.

We have here an account of the descent of the Holy Ghost.

I. When, and where, this was done.

1. It was when the day of pentecost was fully come. (1) The Holy Ghost came down at the time of a solemn feast, because there was then a great concourse of people to Jerusalem from all parts, which would make the fame of it to be spread the sooner and further. Thus now, as before at the passover, the Jewish feasts served to toll the bell for gospel services. (2) This feast of pentecost was kept in remembrance of the giving of the law upon Mount Sinai. Fitly, therefore, is the Holy Ghost given at that feast, in fire and in tongues, for the promulgation of the evangelical law, not as that to one nation, but to every creature. (3) This feast of pentecost happened on the first day of the week, which was a confirmation of it to be the Christian sabbath, to be a standing memorial in his church of those two great blessings—the resurrection of Christ, and the pouring out of the Spirit. Every Lord's day in the year, I think, there should be a full and particular notice taken in our prayers and praises of these.

2. It was when they were all with one accord in one place. What place it was we are not told particularly. But it was at Jerusalem, because this had been the place which God chose, and the prophecy was that thence the word of the Lord should go forth. Here God had promised to meet them and bless them; here therefore he meets them with this blessing of blessings. He did this honour to Jerusalem, to teach us not to fall out with places, for God has his remnant in all places; he had this in Jerusalem. Here the disciples were in one place. And here they were with one accord. They had prayed more together of late than usual (ch. i. 14), and this made them love one another better. By his grace he thus prepared them for the gift of the Holy Ghost; for that blessed dove comes not where there is noise and clamour, but moves upon the face of the still waters, not the rugged ones. Would we have the Spirit poured out upon us from on high? Let us all be of one accord; let us agree to love one another.

II. How, and in what manner, the Holy Ghost came upon them. We often read in the Old Testament of God's coming down in a cloud. And Christ went up to heaven in a cloud. But the Holy Ghost did not descend in a cloud; for he was to dispel and scatter the clouds that overspread men's minds.

1. Here is an audible summons given them to awaken their expectations, v. 2. It came suddenly, but was at the height immediately. It came sooner than they expected, and startled even those that were now together waiting. It was a sound from heaven. It was the sound of a wind, for the way of the Spirit is like that of the wind (John iii. 8), thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whence it comes nor whither it goes. It was a rushing mighty wind; it was strong and violent, and came with great force, as if it would bear down all before it. This was to signify the powerful influences and operations of the Spirit of God. It filled not only the room, but all the house where they were sitting. This wind filling the house would strike an awe upon the disciples, and help to put them into a very serious frame, for the receiving of the Holy Ghost. Thus the convictions of the Spirit make way for his comforts; and the rough blasts of that blessed wind prepare the soul for its soft and gentle gales.

2. Here is a visible sign of the gift. They saw cloven tongues, like as of fire (v. 3), and it sat, rested upon each of them. There is a meteor which naturalists call ignis lambens—a gentle flame, not a devouring fire; such was this.

(1) There was an outward sensible sign, for the confirming of the faith of the disciples themselves.

(2) The sign given was fire, that John Baptist's saying concerning Christ might be fulfilled, He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire. They were now celebrating the memorial of the giving of the law upon mount Sinai; and as that was given in fire, so is the gospel. The Spirit, like fire, melts the heart, burns up the dross, and kindles pious and devout affections in the soul. This is that fire which Christ came to send upon the earth.

(3) This fire appeared in cloven tongues. The operations of the Spirit were many; that of speaking with divers tongues was one, and to that this sign had a reference. They were tongues. By him Christ would speak to the world, and he gave the Spirit to the disciples to endue them with a power to publish and proclaim to the world what they knew. These tongues were cloven. The tongues were divided, and yet they still continued all of one accord; for there may be a sincere unity of affections where yet there is a diversity of expression.

(4) This fire sat upon them to denote the constant residence of the Holy Ghost with them. The disciples of Christ had the gifts of the Spirit always with them, though the sign, we may suppose, soon disappeared.

III. What was the immediate effect of this? 1. They were all filled with the Holy Ghost. They were filled with the graces of the Spirit, and were more than ever under his sanctifying influences. They were more filled with the comforts of the Spirit, rejoiced more than ever in the love of Christ and the hope of heaven. They were also filled with the gifts of the Holy Ghost. They were endued with miraculous powers for the furtherance of the gospel. It seems evident that not only the twelve apostles, but all the hundred and twenty disciples were filled with the Holy Ghost alike at this time. The all here must refer to the all that were together, v. 1. 2. They began to speak with other tongues, besides their native language. They spoke not matters of common conversation, but the word of God, and the praises of his name, as the Spirit gave them utterance. We may suppose that they understood not only themselves but one another too. They spoke not from any previous thought or meditation, but as the Spirit gave them utterance; he furnished them with the matter as well as the language. Now this was, (1) A very great miracle; it was a miracle upon the mind, for in the mind words are framed. They had not only never learned these languages, for aught that appears, they had never so much as heard these languages spoken. They were neither scholars nor travellers. Peter indeed was forward enough to speak in his own tongue, but the rest of them were no spokesmen. He that made man's mouth new-made theirs. (2) A very proper, needful, and serviceable miracle. The language the disciples spoke was Syriac, a dialect of the Hebrew. They were commissioned to preach the gospel to every creature, to disciple all nations. But here is an insuperable difficulty at the threshold. And therefore, to prove that Christ could give authority to preach to the nations, he gives ability to preach to them in their own language. This may well be reckoned, all things considered, a greater work than the miraculous cures Christ wrought. It was the first effect of the pouring out of the Spirit upon them.

We have here an account of the public notice that was taken of this extraordinary gift.

I. The great concourse of people that there was now at Jerusalem. There were dwelling at Jerusalem Jews that were devout men, out of every nation under heaven, denoting that there were some from most of the then known parts of the world. Jerusalem at that time was a rendezvous of religious people. 1. We may here see what were some of those countries whence those strangers came (v. 9–11), some from the eastern countries, as the Parthians, Medes, Elamites, and dwellers in Mesopotamia; thence we come in order to Judæa. Next come the inhabitants of Cappadocia, Pontus, and that country which was particularly called Asia. Next come the dwellers in Phrygia and Pamphylia, which lay westward, also the strangers of Rome; there were some also that dwelt in the southern parts of Egypt, in the parts of Libya about Cyrene; there were also some from the island of Crete, and some from the deserts of Arabia; but they were all either Jews originally, or proselytes to the Jewish religion. The Jewish writers about this time speak of the Jews as dwelling everywhere through the whole earth; and that there is not a people upon earth among whom some Jews do not inhabit. 2. We may enquire what brought all those Jews and proselytes together to Jerusalem at this time? for they are said to dwell there. There was at this time a general expectation of the appearing of the Messiah. This brought those who were most zealous and devout to Jerusalem, to sojourn there.

II. The amazement with which these strangers were seized when they heard the disciples speak in their own tongues.

1. They observe that the speakers are all Galileans, that know no other than their mother tongue (v. 7). God chose the weak and foolish things of the world to confound the wise and mighty.

2. They acknowledge that they spoke intelligibly and readily their own language; We hear every man in our own tongue wherein we were born (v. 8). We do hear them speak in our tongues the wonderful works of God, v. 11. It was not only a surprise, but a pleasing surprise, to them to hear the language of their own country spoken. (1) The things they heard the apostles discourse of were the wonderful works of God, the great things of God. It is probable that the apostles spoke of Christ, and redemption by him, and the grace of the gospel; and these are indeed the great things of God. (2) They heard them both praise God for these great things and instruct the people concerning these things, in their own tongue. Now though, perhaps they were got to be so much masters of the Jewish language that they could have understood the meaning of the disciples if they had spoken that language, yet this was more strange, and helped to convince their judgment, that this doctrine was of God. It was more kind, and helped to engage their affections. And this is to us a plain intimation of the mind and will of God, that the scriptures should be read, and public worship performed, in the vulgar languages of the nations.

3. They wonder at it (v. 12): They were all amazed; they were in doubt what the meaning of it was. They asked themselves and one another—What is the tendency of this? They will turn aside, and see this great sight.

III. The scorn which some made of it, probably the scribes and Pharisees, and chief priests; they said, These men are full of new wine, they have drunk too much this festival-time, v. 13. These, being native Jews, knew not, as the others did, that what was spoken was really the languages of other nations, and therefore took it to be gibberish and nonsense, such as drunkards sometimes talk. And, if they called the Master of the house a wine-bibber, no marvel if they so called those of his household.

We have here the first-fruits of the Spirit, in the sermon which Peter preached immediately, directed to the Jews, even to those that mocked; for he begins with the notice of that (v. 15), and addresses his discourse (v. 14) to the men of Judæa and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. It was not by Peter's preaching only, but that of all, that three thousand souls were that day converted, but Peter's sermon only is recorded. He that had sneakingly denied Christ now as courageously confesses him.

I. His introduction: Peter stood up (v. 14) with the eleven. Those that were of greatest authority stood up to speak to the scoffing Jews. Thus among Christ's ministers, some of greater gifts are called out to instruct those that oppose themselves, to take hold of sword and spear. Peter lifted up his voice, as one that was both well assured of what he said, and was neither afraid nor ashamed to own it. He applied himself to the men of Judæa, "and you especially that dwell at Jerusalem, be this known unto you, and hearken to my words."

II. His answer to their blasphemous calumny (v. 15): "These men are not drunken, as you suppose. These disciples of Christ, that now speak with other tongues, speak good sense, and know what they say. You cannot think they are drunk, for it is but the third hour of the day," nine of the clock in the morning; and before this time, on the sabbaths and solemn feasts, the Jews did not eat nor drink.

III. His account of the miraculous effusion of the Spirit. Two things he resolves it into: that it was the fulfilling of the scripture, and the fruit of Christ's resurrection and ascension.

1. That it was the accomplishment of the prophecies of the Old Testament. He specifies one, that of the prophet Joel, ch. ii. 28. It is observable that though Peter was filled with the Holy Ghost, yet he did not set aside the scriptures, nor think himself above them. Christ's scholars never learn above their Bible.

(1) The text itself that Peter quotes, v. 17–21. It refers to the last days, the times of the gospel, which are called the last days because the dispensation of God's kingdom among men, which the gospel sets up, is the last dispensation of divine grace. "It was prophesied of and promised, and therefore you ought to expect it, and not to be surprised at it; to desire it, and bid it welcome." The apostle quotes the whole paragraph, for it is good to take scripture entire; now it was foretold,

[1] That there should be a more plentiful and extensive effusion of the Spirit of grace from on high than had ever yet been. Now the Spirit shall be poured out, not only upon the Jews, but upon all flesh, Gentiles as well as Jews. The Jewish doctors taught that the Spirit came only upon wise and rich men, and such as were of the seed of Israel; but God will not tie himself to their rules.

[2] That the Spirit should be in them a Spirit of prophecy. This power shall be given without distinction of sex—not only your sons, but your daughters shall prophesy; without distinction of age—both your young men and your old men shall see visions, and dream dreams, the servants and handmaids shall receive of the Spirit, and shall prophesy (v. 18); men and women, whom God calls his servants and his handmaids. The mention of the daughters (v. 17) and the handmaidens (v. 18) would make one think that the women (ch. i. 14) received the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost, as well as the men.

[3] That one great thing which they should prophesy of should be the judgment that was coming upon the Jewish nation. Those that would not submit to the power of God's grace should fall and lie under the pourings out of the vials of his wrath. Those shall break that will not bend. First, The destruction of Jerusalem, which was about forty years after Christ's death, is here called that great and notable day of the Lord. The desolation itself was such as was never brought upon any place or nation, either before or since. It was the day of the Lord, for it was the day of his vengeance upon that people for crucifying Christ. It was a little day of judgment; it was a notable day. The destruction of the Jews was the deliverance of the Christians. Secondly, The terrible presages of that destruction are here foretold: There shall be wonders in heaven above, the sun turned into darkness and the moon into blood; and signs too in the earth beneath, blood and fire. Josephus, in his preface to his history of the wars of the Jews, speaks of the signs and prodigies that preceded them, terrible thunders, lightnings, and earthquakes; there was a fiery comet that hung over the city for a year, and a flaming sword was seen pointing down upon it. The fire and vapour of smoke literally came to pass in the burning of their cities, and towns, and synagogues, and temple at last. Thirdly, The signal preservation of the Lord's people is here promised (v. 21): Whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord Jesus shall be saved. In the destruction by the Romans not one Christian perished. The saved remnant are a praying people: they call on the name of the Lord. It is the name of the Lord which they call upon that is their strong tower.

(2) The application of this prophecy to the present event (v. 16): This is that which was spoken by the prophet Joel. This is that effusion of the Spirit upon all flesh which should come, and we are to look for no other. This Spirit of grace, the Advocate, or Comforter, that was given now, according to the promise, will, according to the same promise, continue with the church on earth to the end.

2. That it was the gift of Christ. From this gift of the Holy Ghost, he takes occasion to preach unto them Jesus (v. 22): "You men of Israel, hear these words."

(1) An abstract of the history of the life of Christ, v. 22. He calls him Jesus of Nazareth. He was a man approved of God among you, censured and condemned by men, but approved of God: a man marked out by God. "You yourselves are witnesses how he became famous by miracles, wonders, and signs, which God did by him; for no man could do such works unless God were with him." See what a stress Peter lays upon Christ's miracles. The matter of fact was not to be denied: "They were done in the midst of you, as you yourselves also know. You have been eye-witnesses of his miracles." The inference from them cannot be disputed; certainly God approved him, declared him to be the Son of God and the Saviour of the world.

(2) An account of his death and sufferings. This was the greatest miracle of all, that a man approved of God should thus seem to be abandoned of him; and a man thus approved among the people, should be thus abandoned by them too. But both these mysteries are here explained (v. 23). As God's act; and in him it was an act of wonderful grace and wisdom. He delivered him to death. And yet there was nothing in this that signified the disapproving of him; for it was done by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. This reconciled him to the cross: Father, thy will be done; and Father, glorify thy name. As the people's act; and in them it was an act of prodigious sin and folly. It was their voluntary act and deed, from a principle morally evil, and therefore "they were wicked hands with which you have crucified and slain him." It is probable that some of those were here present who had cried, Crucify him, crucify him. He charges it particularly on them the more effectually to bring them to faith and repentance.

(3) An attestation of his resurrection (v. 24): Whom God raised up; the same that delivered him to death delivers him from death.

[1] He describes his resurrection: God loosed the pains of death, because it was impossible that he should be holden of it. From these pains and sorrows of soul the Father loosed him, when at his death he said, It is finished. Most refer this to the resurrection of Christ's body. Christ was imprisoned for our debt, was thrown into the bands of death; but it was not possible he should be detained there, for he had life in himself and had conquered the prince of death.

[2] He attests the truth of his resurrection (v. 32): God hath raised him up, whereof we all are witnesses. They received power, by the descent of the Holy Ghost upon them, on purpose that they might be skilful, faithful, and courageous witnesses.

[3] He showed it to be the fulfilling of the scripture, it was impossible that he should be holden by death and the grave; for David speaks of his being raised.

First, The text quoted at large (v. 25–28). 1. The constant regard that our Lord Jesus had to his Father: I foresaw the Lord before me continually. He set before him his Father's glory as his end in all—for he saw that his sufferings would redound abundantly to the honour of God. 2. The assurance he had of his Father's presence and power: "He is on my right hand, that I should not be moved." If God be at our right hand we shall not be moved. 3. The cheerfulness with which our Lord Jesus went on in his work. "I shall not be moved, therefore doth my heart rejoice, and my tongue is glad." It was a constant pleasure to our Lord Jesus to look to the end of his work, it does his heart good to think how the issue would answer the design. 4. The happy issue of his death and sufferings. My flesh shall rest; it shall rest in hope, that thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; what follows is the matter of his hope. (1) The soul shall not continue in a state of separation from the body: "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell" (in hades, in the invisible state, so hades properly signifies). (2) The body shall lie but a little while in the grave: Thou wilt not suffer thy Holy One to see corruption. He must die, but he must not see corruption. (3) His death and sufferings should be an inlet to a blessed immortality: "Thou hast made known to me the ways of life, and by me made them known to the world, and laid them open." (4) That all his sorrows and sufferings should end in perfect felicity: Thou shalt make me full of joy with thy countenance. The reward set before him was joy, a fulness of joy, and that in God's countenance. That is the joy of our Lord, into which all his shall enter, and in which they shall be for ever happy.

Secondly, The comment upon this text. He addresses himself to them with a title of respect, Men and brethren, v. 29. "Give me leave freely to speak to you concerning the patriarch David. David cannot be understood here as speaking of himself, but of the Christ to come." He could not say that of himself, for he died, and was buried, and his sepulchre remained in Jerusalem till now. He could never say of himself that he should not see corruption; for it was plain he did see corruption. Therefore certainly he spoke it as a prophet, with an eye to the Messiah. David knew that the Messiah should descend from his loins (v. 30), that God had sworn to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne. When our Lord Jesus was born, it was promised that the Lord God would give him the throne of his Father David, Luke i. 32. According to the spirit, and by his divine nature, he was to be David's Lord, not his son. When he says that his soul should not be left in its separate state, nor his flesh see corruption, without doubt he must be understood to speak of the resurrection of Christ, v. 31. And as Christ died, so he rose again, according to the scriptures; and that he did so we are witnesses. Here is a glance at his ascension too. As David did not rise from the dead, so neither did he ascend into the heavens, v. 34. And further, in another psalm, he plainly shows that he spoke of another person, and such another as was his Lord (Ps. cx. 1): "The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand until I make thy foes thy footstool," v. 35.

(4) The application of this discourse.

[1] This explains the meaning of the present wonderful effusion of the Spirit. Some of the people had asked (v. 12), What meaneth this? I will tell you the meaning of it, says Peter. This Jesus being exalted by the right hand of God, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, hath shed forth this which you now see and hear. The gift of the Holy Ghost was a performance of divine promises already made; this is the promise that includes all the rest. It was a pledge of all divine favours further intended; what you now see and hear is but an earnest of greater things.

[2] This proves that Christ Jesus is the true Messiah and Saviour of the world; this he closes his sermon with (v. 36): Therefore let all the house of Israel know assuredly that God has made that same Jesus whom you have crucified both Lord and Christ. They were charged to tell no man that he was Jesus the Christ till after his resurrection (Matt. xvii. 9); but now it must be proclaimed. It is not proposed as probable, but deposed as certain: Let them know it assuredly. First, That God has glorified him whom they have crucified. God had glorified him, and the indignities they had done him served as a foil to his lustre. Secondly, That he has glorified him to such a degree as to make him both Lord and Christ. This is the great truth of the gospel that that same Jesus that was crucified at Jerusalem is Lord and Christ.

We have seen the wonderful effect of the pouring out of the Spirit, in its influence upon the preachers of the gospel. We are now to see another blessed fruit of the pouring out of the Spirit in its influence upon the hearers of the gospel. From the first delivery of that divine message, it appeared that there was a divine power going along with it. We have here the first-fruits of that vast harvest of souls which by it were gathered in to Jesus Christ. Let us see the method of it.

I. They were put upon a serious enquiry, v. 37. When they heard they were pricked to the heart, and, under a deep concern applied themselves to the preachers with this question, What shall we do? It was very strange that such impressions should be made upon such hard hearts all of a sudden. Peter had charged them with having a hand, a wicked hand, in his death, which was likely to have exasperated them against him; yet, when they heard this plain scriptural sermon, they were much affected with it.

1. It put them in pain: They were pricked in their hearts. Peter awakened their consciences, touched them to the quick. Sinners, when their eyes are opened, cannot but be pricked to the heart for sin.

2. It put them upon enquiry.

(1) To whom they thus addressed themselves: To Peter and to the rest of the apostles. By them they had been convinced, and therefore by them they expect to be counselled and comforted. They call them men and brethren, as Peter had called them (v. 29): it is a style of friendship and love. Ministers are spiritual physicians, and it is good for people to be free and familiar with those ministers, as men and their brethren, who deal for their souls as for their own.

(2) What the address is: What shall we do? [1] They speak as men at a stand, that did not know what to do: "Is that Jesus whom we have crucified both Lord and Christ? Then what will become of us who crucified him?" No way of being happy but by seeing ourselves miserable. When we find ourselves in danger of being lost for ever, there is hope of our being made for ever. [2] They speak as men at a point, that were resolved to do anything they should be directed to immediately. Those that are convinced of sin would gladly know the way to peace and pardon.

II. Peter and the other apostles direct them in short what they must do, v. 38, 39. Sinners convinced must be encouraged; though their case is sad it is not desperate, there is hope for them.

1. He here shows them the course they must take. Repent; this is a plank after shipwreck. This was the same duty that John the Baptist and Christ had preached, and it is still insisted on: "Repent, repent; change your mind, change your way." Be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ; that is, "firmly believe the doctrine of Christ, and make an open solemn profession of this, and renounce your infidelity." They must be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ. Believe in the name of Jesus, that he is the Christ, the Messias promised to the fathers. They must be baptized in his name for the remission of sins. This is pressed upon each particular person: Every one of you. "Even those of you that have been the greatest sinners, if they repent and believe, are welcome to be baptized. There is grace enough in Christ for everyone of you, be you ever so many, and grace suited to the case of everyone."

2. He gives them encouragement to take this course: (1) "It shall be for the remission of sins." Repent of your sin, and it shall not be your ruin; be baptized into the faith of Christ, and in truth you shall be justified. Aim at this, and depend upon Christ for it, and this you shall have. (2) "You shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost as well as we." All that receive the remission of sins receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. (3) "Your children shall still have an interest in the covenant, for the promise of the remission of sins, and the gift of the Holy Ghost, is to you and to your children," v. 39. Now it is proper for an Israelite to ask, "What must be done with my children? Must they be thrown out, or taken in with me?" "Taken in" (says Peter) "by all means; for the promise is as much to you and to your children now as ever it was." (4) "Though the promise is still extended to your children, yet it is not confined to you and them, but the benefit of it is designed for all that are afar off." To this general the following limitation must refer, even as many of them, as many particular persons in each nation, as the Lord our God shall call. God can make his call to reach those that are ever so far off.

III. These directions are followed with a needful caution (v. 40): With many other words did he testify. He had said much in a little (v. 38, 39), yet he had more to say. When we have heard those words which have done our souls good, we cannot but wish to hear more. Among other things he said, Save yourselves from this untoward generation. "Give diligence to save yourselves from their ruin. Repent, and be baptized; and then you shall not be sharers in destruction with those with whom you have been sharers in sin. In order to this continue not with them in their sin. Save yourselves from this untoward generation. Partake not with them in their sins, that you share not with them in their plagues." To separate ourselves from wicked people is the only way to save ourselves from them. If we consider whither they are hastening, we shall see it is better to have the trouble of swimming against their stream than the danger of being carried down their stream. Those that repent of their sins, and give up themselves to Jesus Christ, must evidence their sincerity by breaking off all intimate society with wicked people.

IV. Here is the happy success and issue of this, v. 41. The Spirit wrought with the word, and wrought wonders by it. These same persons that had many of them been eye-witnesses of the death of Christ, were yet wrought upon by the preaching of the word. They received the word; and then only the word does us good, when we do receive it, and bid it welcome. They gladly received it. Herod heard the word gladly, but these gladly received it. They were baptized and enrolled themselves among the disciples of Christ by that sacred rite and ceremony which he had instituted. Those that receive the Christian covenant ought to receive the Christian baptism. Hereby there were added to the disciples to the number of about three thousand souls that same day. All those that had received the Holy Ghost had their tongues at work to preach, and their hands at work to baptize; for it was time to be busy, when such a harvest was to be gathered in. The conversion of these three thousand with these words was a greater work than the feeding of four or five thousand with a few loaves. These were added to them. When we take God for our God, we must take his people to be our people.

In these verses we have the history of the truly primitive church, its state of infancy indeed, but, like that, the state of its greatest innocence.

I. They kept close to holy ordinances. Christianity will dispose the soul to communion with God in all those ways wherein he has appointed us to meet him and promised to meet us.

1. They were diligent and constant in their attendance upon the preaching of the word. They continued in the apostles' doctrine. Those who have given up their names to Christ must make conscience of hearing his word.

2. They kept up the communion of saints. They continued in fellowship (v. 42), and continued daily with one accord in the temple, v. 46. They were much together. Wherever you saw one disciple, you would see more, like birds of a feather. See how these Christians love one another. They had fellowship with one another in religious worship. They met in the temple: there was their rendezvous; for joint-fellowship with God is the best fellowship we can have with one another. They were daily in the temple. Worshipping God is to be our daily work. They were with one accord; not only no discord nor strife, but a great deal of holy love among them.

3. They frequently joined in the ordinance of the Lord's supper. They continued in the breaking of bread. They broke bread from house to house; they administered that ordinance in private houses; and they went from one to another of these little synagogues or domestic chapels, and there celebrated the eucharist with those that usually met there to worship God.

4. They continued in prayers. After the Spirit was poured out, as well as before, they continued instant in prayer; for prayer will never be superseded till it comes to be swallowed up in everlasting praise.

5. They abounded in thanksgiving; were continually praising God, v. 47. This should have a part in every prayer, and not be crowded into a corner.

II. They were loving one to another and their joining together in holy ordinances very much endeared them to one another.

1. They had frequent meetings for Christian converse (v. 44): All that believed were together. They associated together, and so both expressed and increased their mutual love.

2. They had all things common. There was such a readiness to help one another that it might be said, They had all things common, according to the law of friendship.

3. They were very cheerful; they did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart. They brought the comforts of God's table along with them to their own. It made them very pleasant, and enlarged their hearts with holy joy. None have such cause to be cheerful as good Christians have; it is a pity but that they should always have hearts to be so. It made them very liberal to their poor brethren. They did eat their meat with singleness of heart—with liberality of heart; so some: they did not eat their morsels alone, but bade the poor welcome to their table. It becomes Christians to be open-hearted and open-handed.

4. They raised a fund for charity (v. 45): They sold their possessions and goods, and parted the money to their brethren, as every man had need. This was to destroy not property, but selfishness. Herein, probably, they had an eye to the command which Christ gave to the rich man, as a test of his sincerity, Sell that thou hast, and give to the poor. Not that this was intended for an example to be a constant binding rule. But here the case was extraordinary. They were under no obligation of a divine command to do this, as appears by what Peter said to Ananias (ch. v. 4): Was it not in thine own power? But it was a very commendable instance of their love to their brethren, their compassion to the poor, and their great zeal for the encouraging of Christianity, and the nursing of it in its infancy. Our rule is, to give according as God has blessed us.

III. God owned them, and gave them signal tokens of his presence with them (v. 43): Many wonders and signs were done by the apostles.

But the Lord's giving them power to work miracles was not all he did for them; he added to the church daily. The word in their mouths did wonders, and God blessed their endeavours.

IV. The people were influenced by it. They feared them (v. 43): Fear came upon every soul. They had abundance of spiritual gifts that were truly honourable, which possessed men with an inward reverence for them. The souls of people were strangely influenced by their awful preaching and living. They favoured them. Though we have reason to think there were those that despised them, yet far the greater part of the common people had a kindness for them—they had favour with all the people. Here we find them in favour with them all, by which it appears that their prosecuting Christ was a sort of force put upon them by the artifices of the priests; now they returned to their wits, to their right mind. Undissembled piety and charity will command respect; and cheerfulness in serving God will recommend religion to those that are without. They fell over to them. Some or other were daily coming in, and they were such as should be saved.

CHAP. III

In this chapter we have a miracle and a sermon. I. The miracle was the healing of a man that was lame from his birth (ver. 1–8), and the impression which this made upon the people, ver. 9–11. II. The scope of the sermon which was to bring people to Christ, to repent of their sin in crucifying him (ver. 12–19), to believe in him now that he was glorified ver. 20–26.

We were told in general (ch. ii. 43) that many signs and wonders were done by the apostles. Here we have one given us for an instance.

I. The persons by whose ministry this miracle was wrought were Peter and John.

Peter and John had each of them a brother among the twelve, yet now they seem to be knit together more closely than either of them to his brother, for the bond of friendship is sometimes stronger than that of relation. Peter and John seem to have had a peculiar intimacy after Christ's resurrection more than before. It was good evidence of Peter's acceptance with God, upon his repentance, that Christ's favourite was made his bosom friend.

II. The time and place are here set down. It was in the temple, whither Peter and John went up together. There were the shoals of fish among which the net of the gospel was to be cast. It is good to go up to the temple, to attend on public ordinances; and it is comfortable to go up together to the temple. The best society is society in worshipping God. It was at the hour of prayer. There must be a house of prayer and an hour of prayer. It is of use for private Christians so far to have their hours of prayer as may serve, though not to bind, yet to remind, conscience.

III. The patient on whom this miraculous cure was wrought, v. 2. He was a poor lame beggar at the temple gate. 1. He was a cripple, not by accident, but born so. He was lame from his mother's womb. Such piteous cases show us what we all are by nature spiritually: without strength, lame from our birth, unable to work or walk in God's service. 2. He was a beggar. Being unable to work for his living, he must live upon alms; such are God's poor. He was laid daily at one of the gates of the temple to ask alms of those that entered into the temple. Those that need, and cannot work, must not be ashamed to beg. Our prayers and our alms should go together. Objects of charity should be in a particular manner welcome to us when we go up to the temple to pray; it is a pity that common beggars at church doors should any of them be of such a character as to discourage charity; but they ought not always to be overlooked: some there are surely that merit regard, and better feed ten drones, yea, and some wasps, than let one bee starve. The gate of the temple at which he was laid is here named: it was called Beautiful. It was no diminution to the beauty of this gate that a poor man lay there begging. 3. He begged of Peter and John (v. 3), begged an alms; this was the utmost he expected from them. He asked an alms, and had a cure.

IV. We have here the method of the cure.

1. His expectations were raised. Peter, instead of turning his eyes from him, fastened his eyes upon him, v. 4. John did so too, they said, Look on us. This gave him cause to expect that he should receive something from them, and therefore he gave heed to them, v. 5. We must come to God with hearts fixed and expectations raised. We must look up to heaven and expect to receive.

2. His expectation of an alms was disappointed. Peter said, "Silver and gold have I none." It is not often that Christ's friends and favourites have abundance of the wealth of this world. Peter and John had abundance of money laid at their feet, but this was appropriated to the maintenance of the poor of the church. Public trusts ought to be strictly and faithfully observed. Many who are well inclined to works of charity are yet not in a capacity of doing anything considerable, while others, who have wherewithal to do much, have not a heart to do anything.

3. His expectations were quite outdone. Peter had no money to give him. He had that which was better, such a power from heaven, as to be able to cure his disease. Those who are poor in the world may yet be rich, very rich, in spiritual gifts. He gave him that which was better—the cure of his disease. This would enable him to work for his living, so that he would not need to beg any more; nay, he would have to give to those that needed. When Peter had no silver and gold to give, yet (says he) such as I have I give thee. Those who have not silver and gold have their limbs and senses, and with these may be serviceable to the blind, and lame, and sick, and if they be not, neither would they give to them if they had silver and gold. How the cure was wrought. Peter bids a lame man rise up and walk, which would have been a banter upon him if he had not premised in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth. He bids the cripple rise up and walk. If he attempt to rise and walk, and depend upon a divine power to enable him to do it, he shall be enabled; and by rising and walking he must evidence that that power has wrought upon him; and then let him take the comfort, and let God have the praise. Peter lent his hand, and helped him (v. 7): He took him by the right hand and lifted him up. When God by his word commands us to rise, and walk in the way of his commandments, he will give his Spirit to take us by the hand, and lift us up. If we set ourselves to do what we can, God has promised his grace to enable us to do what we cannot. His feet and ankle-bones received strength; he does his part, and Peter does his, and yet it is Christ that does all: it is he that puts strength into him.

V. Here is the impression which this cure made upon the patient himself. He leaped up, in obedience to the command, Arise. He started up, as one refreshed with sleep, that questioned not his own strength. The incomes of strength were sudden, and he was no less sudden in showing them. He stood, and walked. He trod strongly, and moved steadily; and this was to manifest the cure. Those who have had experience of the working of divine grace upon them should evidence what they have experienced. Has God put strength into us? Let us stand up resolutely for him, and walk cheerfully with him. He held Peter and John, v. 11. We need not ask why he held them. I believe he scarcely knew himself: but it was in a transport of joy that he embraced them. Thus he testified his affection to them; he held them, and would not let them go. Those whom God hath healed love those whom he made instruments of their healing, and see the need of their further help. He entered with them into the temple. His strong affection to them held them; but it could not hold them so fast as to keep them out of the temple. He is resolved to go with them, and the rather because they are going into the temple. Like the impotent man whom Christ cured, he was presently found in the temple, John v. 14. He was there walking, and leaping, and praising God. The strength God has given us, both in mind and body, should be made use of to his praise. This man, as soon as he could leap, leaped for joy in God, and praised him. All true converts walk and praise God; but perhaps young converts leap more in his praises.

VI. How the people that were eye-witnesses of this miracle were influenced by it. 1. They were entirely satisfied in the truth of the miracle. They knew it was he that sat begging at the beautiful gate of the temple, v. 10. He had sat there so long that they all knew him. They now saw him walking and praising God (v. 9). He was now as loud in praising God as he had before been in begging relief. Mercies are then perfected, when they are sanctified. 2. They were astonished at it: They were filled with wonder and amazement (v. 10); greatly wondering, v. 11. There seems to have been this effect of the pouring out of the Spirit, that the people were much more affected with the miracles the apostles wrought than they had been with those that had been wrought by Christ himself. 3. They gathered about Peter and John: All the people ran together unto them in Solomon's porch. Here the people met, to see this great sight.

We have here the sermon which Peter preached. When Peter saw it. When he saw the people got together in a crowd, he took that opportunity to preach Christ to them. When he saw the people affected with the miracle, he sowed the gospel seed in the ground which was thus prepared to receive it. When he saw the people ready to adore him and John, he diverted their respect from them, that it might be directed to Christ only.

I. He humbly disclaims the honour of the miracle. He addresses himself to them as men of Israel, men to whom pertained, not only the law and the promises, but the gospel and the performances. Two things he asks them: 1. Why they were so surprised at the miracle itself: Why marvel you at this? It was indeed marvellous, but it was no more than what Christ had done many a time. It was but a little before that Christ had raised Lazarus from the dead; and why should this then seem so strange? Stupid people think that strange now which might have been familiar to them if it had not been their own fault. Christ had lately risen from the dead himself; why did they not marvel at this? 2. Why they gave so much of the praise of it to them, who were only the instruments of it: Why look you so earnestly on us? It was certain that they had made this man to walk, by which it appeared that the apostles not only were sent of God, but were sent to be blessings to the world. Yet they did not do it by any power or holiness of their own. The power they did it by was wholly derived from Christ. The power which Christ gave them to do it they had not deserved: it was not by their own holiness. Peter was a sinful man. Yet he wrought miracles in Christ's name. It was the people's fault that they attributed it to their power and holiness. The instruments of God's favour to us, must not be idolized. It was the praise of Peter and John that they would not take the honour of this miracle to themselves, but carefully transmitted it to Christ. Useful men must see to it that they be very humble.

II. He preaches Christ to them.

1. He preaches Christ, as the true Messiah promised to the fathers (v. 13). He is Jesus the Son of God. He is his Son Jesus; to him dear as a Son; to us, Jesus, a Saviour. God hath glorified him, in raising him up. He hath glorified him as the God of our fathers, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob. God sent him into the world, pursuant to the promises made to those patriarchs. The gospel they preached was the revelation of the mind and will of the God of Abraham.

2. He charges them flatly and plainly with the murder of this Jesus: "You delivered him up, and you of the common people were influenced to clamour against him, as if he had been a public grievance." You denied him, and you disowned him, could not look upon him as the Messiah, because he came not in external pomp and power; you denied him in the presence of Pilate. "You were worse than Pilate, for he would have released him, if you had let him follow his own judgment. You denied the holy One and the Just." The holiness and justice of the Lord Jesus, which are something more than his innocency, were a great aggravation of the sin of those that put him to death. "You desired a murderer to be released, and Christ crucified." You killed the prince of life. "You preserved a murderer, a destroyer of life; and destroyed the Saviour, the author of life. You killed the prince of life, and so not only forsook, but rebelled against your own mercies."

3. He attests his resurrection as before, ch. ii. 32. "You thought the prince of life might be deprived of his life. But of his resurrection we are all witnesses."

4. He ascribes the cure of this impotent man to the power of Christ (v. 16): His name, through faith in his name, has made this man strong. He repeats it again, The faith which is by him hath given him this soundness. (1) He appeals to themselves concerning the truth of the miracle; the man on whom it was wrought is one whom you see, and know. The miracle was wrought publicly, in the presence of you all, in the gate of the temple. The cure is complete; it is a perfect soundness; you see the man walks and leaps. (2) He acquaints them with the power by which it was wrought. It is done by the name of Christ. That name which Christ has above every name; his authority, his command has done it; as writs run in the king's name, though it is an inferior officer that executes them. The power of Christ is fetched in through faith in his name, and it is for his sake, that he may have the glory of it. Those that wrought this miracle by faith derived power from Christ to work it, and therefore returned all the glory to him. Peter both confirmed the great gospel truth they were to preach to the world—that Jesus Christ is the fountain of all power and grace, and the great healer and Saviour —and recommended the great gospel duty of faith in him as the only way of receiving benefit by him. Thus does Peter preach unto them Jesus, and him crucified.

III. He encourages them to hope that they might find mercy; he does all he can to convince them, yet is careful not to drive them to despair. 1. He mollifies their crime by a candid imputation of it to their ignorance. He saw it needful to mitigate the rigour of the charge by calling them brethren; and well might he call them so, for he had been himself a brother with them in this iniquity: he had denied the Holy One and the Just, and sworn that he did not know him. I know that through ignorance you did it, as did also your rulers, v. 17. This was the language of Peter's charity, and teaches us to make the best of those whom we desire to make better. He has the example of his Master's praying for his crucifiers, and pleading in their behalf that they knew not what they did. Perhaps some of the rulers, and of the people did it through malice; but the generality went down the stream, and did it through ignorance. 2. He mollifies the effects of their crime, it was according to the scriptures (v. 18). So he himself saith: Thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer. "You fulfilled the scripture, and did not know it; God, by your hands, hath fulfilled what he showed by the mouth of all his prophets, that Christ should suffer; this was his design but you had views of your own, and were altogether ignorant of this design. God was fulfilling the scripture when you were gratifying your own passions." This is no extenuation at all of their sin in hating and persecuting Christ to the death, yet it was an encouragment to them to repent, and hope for mercy. The death and sufferings of Christ were for the remission of sins, and the ground of that display of mercy for which he now encouraged them to hope.

IV. He exhorts them all to turn Christians.

1. He tells them what they must believe. They must believe that Jesus Christ is the promised seed, v. 25. Jesus, who was of the seed of Abraham, according to the flesh, and in him all the families of the earth are blessed, and not the families of Israel only. They must believe that Jesus Christ is a prophet, that prophet like unto Moses whom God had promised to raise up to them from among their brethren, v. 22. Christ is a prophet, for by him God speaks unto us. He is a prophet like unto Moses. He was a deliverer of his people out of bondage, like Moses. Moses was faithful as a servant, Christ as a Son. Moses was a pattern of meekness and patience, so is Christ. There was no prophet like unto Moses, but a greater than Moses is here where Christ is. He is a prophet of God's raising up. He was raised up unto Israel in the first place. They had the first offer of divine grace made to them; and therefore he was raised up from among them. If he come to his own, one would think, they should receive him. The Old Testament church was blessed with many prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, v. 24; but, these servants being abused, last of all God sent them his Son. They must believe that times of refreshing will come from the presence of the Lord (v. 19), and that they will be the times of the restitution of all things, v. 21. The absence of the Lord occasions many of the securities of sinners and the distrusts of saints; but his presence is hastening on, which will for ever silence both. The presence of the Lord will introduce, (1) The restitution of all things (v. 21); the renovation of the whole creation; that end of all things which God hath spoken of by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began. This is more clearly and plainly revealed in the New Testament than it had been before. (2) With this will come the times of refreshing (v. 19), like a cool shade to those that have borne the burden and heat of the day. All Christians look for a rest that remains for the people of God, after the travails and toils of their present state. The refreshing that then comes from the presence of the Lord will continue eternally in the presence of the Lord.

2. He tells them what they must do. They must repent; they must begin anew. Peter, who had himself denied Christ, repented, and he would have them to do so too. They must be converted, must face about; they must return to the Lord their God. It is not enough to repent of sin, but we must be converted from it, and not return to it again. They must hear Christ, the great prophet: "Him shall you hear in all things whatsoever he shall say unto you. Hear him with a divine faith, as prophets should be heard. Hear him in all things; let his laws govern all your actions. Whatever he saith to you, bid it welcome." It is at our peril if we turn a deaf ear to his call (v. 23): Every soul that will not hear that prophet shall be destroyed from among the people. Those that will not be advised by the Saviour can expect no other than to fall into the hands of the destroyer.

3. He tells them what they might expect.

(1) That they should have the pardon of their sins (v. 19): Repent, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out. The remission of sin is the blotting of it out. When God forgives sin he remembers it no more against the sinner; it is forgotten, as that which is blotted out. We cannot expect our sins should be pardoned unless we repent of them, and turn from them to God. If no repentance, no remission. Hopes of the pardon of sin upon repentance should be a powerful inducement to us to repent. This was the first and great argument, Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand. The most comfortable fruit of the forgiveness of our sins will be when the times of refreshing shall come. During these times of toil and conflict (doubts and fears within, troubles and dangers without) we cannot have that full satisfaction of our pardon, and in it, that we shall have when the refreshing times come, which shall wipe away all tears.

(2) That they should have the comfort of Christ's coming (v. 20, 21): "He shall send Jesus Christ, that before was preached unto you. If you repent and be converted, you shall find no want of him; some way or other he shall be seen of you." We must not expect Christ's personal presence with us in this world; for the heavens, which received him out of the sight of the disciples, must retain him till the end of time. We must live by that faith in him which is the evidence of things not seen. Yet it is promised that he shall be sent to all that repent and are converted (v. 20): "He shall send Jesus Christ, who was preached to you. You shall have his spiritual presence. He that is sent into the world shall be sent to you; you shall have the comfort of his being sent. The sending of Christ to judge the world, at the end of time, will be a blessing to you." It seems to refer to this, for till then the heavens must receive him, v. 21.

4. He tells them what ground they had to expect these things, if they were converted to Christ.

(1) As Israelites they were, above any other, God's favourite nation. You are the children of the prophets and of the covenant. A double privilege. [1] They were the children of the prophets. You are of that people from among whom prophets were raised up, and to whom prophets were sent. Those of the latter ages of the church, when prophecy had ceased, might yet be fitly called the children of the prophets, because they heard the voices of the prophets, which were read in their synagogues every sabbath day, ch. xiii. 27. Now this should quicken them to embrace Christ. Those that are blessed with prophets and prophecy (as all are that have the scriptures) are concerned not to receive the grace of God therein in vain. [2] They were the children, that is, the heirs, of the covenant which God made with our Fathers. "The promise of the Messiah was made to you, and therefore you may hope it shall be made good to you." If all the kindreds of the earth were to be blessed in Christ, much more that kindred, his kinsmen according to the flesh.

(2) As Israelites, they had the first offer of the grace of the New Testament. To them the Redeemer was first sent, which was an encouragement to them to hope that if they did repent, and were converted, he should be yet further sent for their comfort (v. 20): He shall send Jesus Christ, for to you first he hath sent him, v. 26. Unto you first, God, having raised up his Son Jesus from the dead, sent him to bless you, especially that great blessing of turning every one of you from his iniquities. [1] We are here told whence Christ had his mission: God raised up his Son Jesus, and sent him. God raised him up when he constituted him a prophet. He sent him to bear witness of the truth, sent him to seek and save lost souls. Some refer the raising of him up to the resurrection. Though having raised him up, he seemed presently to take him from us, yet he did really send him afresh to us in his gospel and Spirit. [2] To whom he was sent: "Unto you first, you that are the children of the prophets, and of the covenant." The personal ministry of Christ, as that of the prophets, was confined to the Jews; to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and he forbade the disciples he then sent forth to go any further. After his resurrection, he was to be preached indeed to all nations, but they must begin at Jerusalem, Luke xxiv. 47. And, when they went to other nations, they first preached to the Jews they found therein. So far were they from being excluded for their putting Christ to death, that, when he is risen, he is first sent to them. [3] On what errand he was sent: "He is sent to you first, to bless you; not to condemn you, as you deserve, but to justify you." Christ's errand into the world was to bless us, and, when he left the world, he left a blessing behind him, for he was parted from the disciples as he blessed them, Luke xxiv. 51. It is by Christ that God sends blessings to us, and through him only we can expect to receive them. The great blessing was the turning of us away from our iniquities, that we may be qualified to receive all other blessings. Sin is that to which naturally we cleave; the design of divine grace is to turn us from it, nay, to turn us against it, that we may not only forsake it, but hate it. "Therefore, do your part: repent, and be converted, because Christ is ready to do his, in turning you from your iniquities, and so blessing you."

CHAP. IV

Here, I. Peter and John are taken up and committed to jail, ver. 1–4. II. They are examined by a committee of the great sanhedrim, ver. 5–7. III. They bravely avow what they have done, and preach Christ to their persecutors, ver. 8–12. IV. Their persecutors enjoin them silence, and so dismiss them, ver. 13–22. V. They apply to God by prayer, for the further operations of that grace which they had already experienced, ver. 23–30 VI. God owns them by manifest tokens of his presence with them, ver. 31-33. VII. The believers had their hearts knit together in holy love, and the church flourished more than ever, ver. 33–37.

We have here the powers of darkness appearing against them to put a stop to them. Let Christ's servants be ever so resolute, Satan's agents will be spiteful; and therefore, let Satan's agents be ever so spiteful, Christ's servants ought to be resolute.

I. The apostles, Peter and John, went on in their work, and did not labour in vain.

1. The preachers faithfully deliver the doctrine of Christ: They spoke unto the people, v. 1. They taught the people; taught those that as yet did not believe, for their conviction and conversion; and taught those that did believe, for their comfort and establishment. They preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead. The doctrine of the resurrection of the dead was verified in Jesus. They preached the resurrection of Christ as their warrant for what they did. It is secured by him to all believers. This they preached through Jesus Christ, attainable through him, and through him only. They meddled not with matters of state, but kept to their business, and preached to the people heaven as their end and Christ as their way.

2. The hearers cheerfully receive it (v. 4): Many of those who heard the word believed, to the number of about five thousand. Though the preachers were persecuted, the word prevailed; for sometimes the church's suffering days have been her growing days: the days of her infancy were so.

II. The chief priests and their party did what they could to crush them; their hands were tied awhile, but their hearts were not in the least changed. 1. Who they were that appeared against the apostles. They were the priests. With them was joined the captain of the temple, who, it is supposed, was a Roman officer. Still here were both Jews and Gentiles confederate against Christ. The Sadducees also, who denied the being of spirits and the future state, were zealous against them. 2. How they stood affected to the apostles' preaching: They were grieved that they taught the people, v. 2. It grieved them, both that the gospel doctrine was preached, and that the people were so ready to hear it. It vexed them to see that his gospel got ground, instead of losing it. Miserable is their case to whom the glory of Christ's kingdom is a grief. It grieved them that the apostles preached through Jesus the resurrection from the dead. The Sadducees were grieved that the resurrection from the dead was preached; for they opposed that doctrine. The chief priests were grieved that they preached the resurrection of the dead through Jesus; they would rather give up that important article than have it preached and proved to be through Jesus. 3. How far they proceeded against the apostles (v. 3): They laid hands on them, and put them in hold until the next day. See how God trains up his servants for sufferings by degrees; now they resist unto bonds only, but afterwards to blood.

We have here the trial of Peter and John before the judges of the ecclesiastical court.

I. Here is the court set. An extraordinary court, it should seem, was called on purpose upon this occasion. 1. The time when the court sat (v. 5)—on the morrow. They adjourned it to the morrow, and no longer; for they were impatient to get them silenced. 2. The place where—in Jerusalem (v. 6), where there were so many that looked for redemption before it came, yet there were more that would not look upon it when it did come. 3. The judges of the court. (1) Their general character: they were rulers, elders, and scribes, v. 5. The scribes were men of learning. The rulers and elders were men in power. The gospel of Christ had both the learning and power of the world against it. (2) The names of some of them, who were most considerable. Here were Annas and Caiaphas, ringleaders in this persecution; Annas the president of the sanhedrim, and Caiaphas the high priest (though Annas is here called so). However they were both equally malignant against Christ and his gospel. There were others likewise that were of the kindred of the high priest, who having dependence on him, would be sure to say as he said. Great relations, and not good, have been a snare to many.

II. The prisoners are arraigned, v. 7. They are brought to the bar; they set them in the midst, for the sanhedrim sat in a circle. The question they asked them was, "By what power, or by what name, have you done this? Who commissioned you to preach such a doctrine as this, and empowered you to work such a miracle as this?" They knew very well that they preached Jesus (v. 2), yet they asked them, to tease them, and try if they could get anything out of them that looked criminal.

III. The plea they put in, not so much to clear and secure themselves as to advance the name and honour of their Master.

1. By whom this plea was drawn up: it was dictated by the Holy Ghost. The apostles set themselves to preach Christ and then Christ made good to them his promise, that the Holy Ghost should give them in that same hour what they should speak. Christ's faithful advocates shall never want instructions, Mark xiii. 11.

2. To whom it was given in: Peter addresses himself to the judges of the court, as the rulers of the people, and elders of Israel; for the wickedness of those in power does not divest them of their power, but the consideration of the power they are entrusted with should prevail to divest them of their wickedness.

3. What the plea is.

(1) What they did was in the name of Jesus Christ, which was a direct answer to the question the court asked them (v. 9, 10): "If we this day be examined for a good deed done to the impotent man, by what means, or by whom, he is made whole, we have an answer ready. Be it known to you all, and not to you only, but to all the people of Israel that by the name of Jesus Christ, whom you crucified, and whom God hath raised from the dead, even by him doth this man stand here before you whole, a monument of the power of the Lord Jesus." He justifies what he and his colleague had done in curing the lame man. It was a good deed. "Now, if we be reckoned with for this good deed, we have no reason to be ashamed. Let those be ashamed who bring us into trouble for it." It is no new thing for good men to suffer ill for doing well. He transfers all the praise and glory of this good deed to Jesus Christ. "It is by him, and not by any power of ours, that this man is cured. Let the Lord alone be exalted, no matter what becomes of us." He charges it upon the judges themselves, that they had been the murderers of this Jesus: "It is he whom you crucified." He endeavours to convince them of sin, of that sin which was most likely to startle conscience—their putting Christ to death. Peter will miss no occasion to tell them of it. He attests the resurrection of Christ as the strongest testimony for him, and against his persecutors: "God raised him from the dead; they took away his life, but God gave it to him again." He preaches this to all the bystanders: "Be it known to you all, to all the people of Israel, that wonders are wrought in the name of Jesus, not by repeating it as a charm, but believing in it as a divine revelation of grace and goodwill to men.

(2) The name of this Jesus is that name alone by which we can be saved. It is not an indifferent thing, but of absolute necessity, that people believe in this name, and call upon it. We are obliged to it in duty to God, and in compliance with his designs (v. 11): "This is the stone which was set at nought of you builders, you that are the rulers of the people, and the elders of Israel, that should be the builders of the church. Here was a stone offered you, to be put in the chief place of the building; but you rejected it, threw it by as good for nothing. But this stone is now become the head of the corner." Probably St. Peter here chose to make use of this quotation because Christ had himself made use of it not long before this, Matt. xxi. 42. Scripture is a tried weapon in our spiritual conflicts: let us therefore stick to it. We are obliged to it for our own interest. We cannot be saved but by Jesus Christ (v. 12): Neither is there salvation in any other. As there is no other name by which diseased bodies can be cured, so there is no other by which sinful souls can be saved. Our salvation is our chief concern. Our salvation is not in ourselves; we can destroy ourselves, but we cannot save ourselves. This is the honour of Christ's name, that it is the only name whereby we must be saved. This name is given. God has appointed it. It is given under heaven. He has all power both in the upper and in the lower world. It is given among men, who need salvation. We may be saved by his name, and we cannot be saved by any other. How far those may find favour with God who have not the knowledge of Christ, yet live up to the light they have, it is not our business to determine. Whatever saving favour such may receive it is upon the account of Christ, and for his sake only; so that still there is no salvation in any other.

IV. The stand that the court was put to, v. 13, 14.

1. They could not deny the cure of the lame man to be both a good deed and a miracle. They had nothing to say against it (v. 14).

2. They could not face down Peter and John. This was a miracle not inferior to the cure of the lame man. They see the boldness of Peter and John, v. 13. They appeared not only undaunted by the rulers, but daring and daunting to them. The courage of Christ's faithful confessors has often been the confusion of their cruel persecutors. (1) What increased their wonder: They perceived that they were unlearned and ignorant men. They enquired and found that they were born in Galilee, that they were bred fishermen, and had no learned education. And yet speak to them of the Messiah and his kingdom, and they speak so pertinently and so fluently, and are so ready in the scriptures that the most learned judge upon the bench is not able to answer them. They were ignorant men—men that had not any public character or employment, which made them wonder to see what freedom they took. (2) What made their wonder in a great measure to cease: they took knowledge of them that they had been with Jesus. When they understood that they had been with Jesus they knew what to impute their boldness to. Those that have been with Jesus should conduct themselves, in everything, so that those who converse with them may take knowledge of them that they have been with Jesus. One may know that they have been in the mount by the shining of their faces.

We have here the issue of the trial. They came off now with flying colours.

I. Here is the consultation of the court and their proceeding thereupon.

1. The prisoners were ordered to withdraw (v. 15): They commanded them to go aside out of the council, willing enough to get clear of them (they spoke so home to their consciences). The designs of Christ's enemies are carried on in close cabals, as if they would hide their counsels from the Lord.

2. A debate arose upon this matter: They conferred among themselves. The question proposed was, What shall we do to these men? v. 16. If they would have yielded to the convincing commanding power of truth, it had been easy to say what they should do to these men. But, when men will not be persuaded to do what they should do, it is no marvel that they are ever and anon at a loss what to do.

3. They came at last to a resolution, in two things:

(1) That it was not safe to punish the apostles. Now they could not find how they might punish Peter and John, because of the people. They knew it would be an unrighteous thing to punish them, and therefore should have been restrained from it by the fear of God; but they considered it only as a dangerous thing, and therefore were held in from it only by the fear of the people. [1] The people were convinced of the truth of the miracle; it was a notable miracle—a known miracle. This was a known instance of the power of Christ, and a proof of his doctrine. That it was wrought for the confirmation of the doctrine they preached, was manifest to all that dwelt in Jerusalem: it was an opinion universally received. They themselves, with all the craftiness and all the effrontery they had, could not deny it to be a true miracle; everybody would have hooted at them if they had. They could easily deny it to their own consciences, but not to the world. [2] All men glorified God for that which was done. Even those that were not persuaded by it to believe in Christ could not but give praise to God for it.

(2) That it was nevertheless necessary to silence them for the future, v. 17, 18. All their care is that the doctrine of Christ spread no further among the people; as if that healing institution were a plague begun, the contagion of which must be stopped. To prevent the further spreading of this doctrine, [1] They charge the apostles never to preach it any more, that no man speak at all nor teach in the name of Jesus, v. 18. "Not only that you do not preach this doctrine publicly, but that you speak henceforth to no man, not to any particular person privately, in this name," v. 17. There is not a greater service done to the devil's kingdom than the silencing of faithful ministers, and putting those under a bushel that are the lights of the world. [2] They threaten them if they do: it is at their peril. Christ had not only charged them to preach the gospel to every creature, but had promised to bear them out in it. Those who know how to put a just value upon Christ's promises know how to put a just contempt upon the world's threatenings.

II. Here is the courageous resolution of the prisoners to go on in their work, and their declaration of this resolution, v. 19, 20. Peter and John jointly put in the answer: "Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge you; for we cannot forbear speaking the things which we have seen and heard." The prudence of the serpent would have directed them to be silent. But the boldness of the lion directed them thus to set their persecutors at defiance. They justify themselves in it with two things: 1. The command of God: "You charge us not to preach the gospel; he has charged us to preach it; now whom must we obey, God or you?" Nothing can be more absurd than to hearken unto weak and fallible men more than unto a God that is infinitely wise and holy. The case is so plain and self-evident, that we will venture to leave it to yourselves to judge of it. Can you think it right in the sight of God to break a divine command in obedience to a human injunction? 2. The convictions of their consciences. They could not but speak those things which they had seen and heard. (1) They felt the influence of it upon themselves, what a blessed change it had wrought upon them. Those speak the doctrine of Christ best that have felt the power of it. (2) They knew the importance of it to others. They look with concern upon perishing souls, and know that they cannot escape eternal ruin but by Jesus Christ, and therefore will be faithful to them in giving them warning. They are things which we have seen and heard, and therefore are fully assured of ourselves: and things which we only have seen and heard, and therefore, if we do not publish them, who will? Who can?

III. Here is the discharge of the prisoners (v. 21): They further threatened them, and then let them go. 1. Because they durst not contradict the people, who glorified God for that which was done. As rulers by the ordinance of God are made a terror and restraint to wicked people, so people are sometimes by the providence of God made a terror and restraint to wicked rulers. 2. Because they could not contradict the miracle: For (v. 22) the man was above forty years old on whom this miracle of healing was shown. The miracle was so much the greater, he having been lame from his mother's womb, ch. iii. 2. If those that have been long accustomed to evil, are cured of their spiritual impotency to good, the power of divine grace is therein so much the more magnified. The truth of it was so much the better attested; for the man being above forty years old, he was able when he was asked, to speak for himself.

We hear no more at present of the chief priests, but are to attend those two witnesses.

I. Their return to their brethren (v. 23): Being let go, they went to their own company. As soon as ever they were at liberty, they went to their old friends. 1. Though God had highly honoured them, in calling them out to be his witnesses, yet they were not puffed up with the honour done them, but went to their own company. No advancement in gifts or usefulness should make us think ourselves above either the duties or the privileges of the communion of saints. 2. Though their enemies had severely threatened them, yet they went to their own company. Christ's followers do best in company, provided it be in their own company.

II. The account they gave them of what had passed: They reported all that the chief priests and elders had said to them. They related it to them, 1. That they might know what to expect both from men and from God. From men they might expect everything that was terrifying, but from God everything that was encouraging. 2. That they might have it recorded for the confirmation of our faith touching the resurrection of Christ. These apostles told the chief priests to their faces that God had raised up Jesus from the dead. They had not the confidence to deny it, but, in the silliest and most sneaking manner imaginable, bade the apostles not to tell anybody of it. 3. That they might now join with them in prayers and praises.

III. Their address to God upon this occasion: When they heard they lifted up their voice to God with one accord, v. 24. One in the name of the rest lifted up his voice to God and the rest joined with him, with one mind (so the word signifies); their hearts went along with him, and so, though but one spoke, they all prayed.

1. Their adoration of God as the Creator of the world (v. 24). They said, "O Lord, thou art God our Master and sovereign Ruler" (so the word signifies), "thou art the God who hast made heaven and earth, and the sea." The heathen worship gods which they have made, we are worshipping the God that made us and all the world. And it is very proper to begin our prayers, as well as our creed, with the acknowledgment of this, that God is the Father almighty, Maker of heaven and earth, and of all things visible and invisible. The Christian religion was intended to confirm and improve, not to eclipse nor jostle out, the truths and dictates of natural religion. It is a great encouragement to God's servants that they serve the God that made all things, and is able to strengthen them under all their difficulties.

2. Their reconciling themselves to the present dispensations of Providence, by reflecting upon the Old Testament, v. 25, 26. Thus he spoke by the mouth of his servant David. Let it not therefore be a surprise to them, for the scripture must be fulfilled. It was foretold, Ps. ii. 1, 2. (1) That the heathen would rage at Christ and his kingdom. (2) That the people would imagine all the things that could be against it. (3) That the kings of the earth, particularly, would stand up in opposition to the kingdom of Christ. (4) That the rulers would gather together against God and Christ. Where the power is in many rulers, councils, and senates, they gather together against the Lord and against his Christ. What is done against Christ, God takes as done against himself. Christianity was opposed and fought against by them, and yet it made its way.

3. Their representation of the present accomplishment of those predictions. What was foretold we see fulfilled, v. 27, 28. It is of a truth that Herod and Pilate, the two Roman governors with the people of Israel, were gathered together against thy holy child Jesus whom thou hast anointed. (1) The wise and holy designs God had concerning Christ. He is here called the child Jesus. The word signifies both a son and a servant. He was the Son of God; and yet in the work of redemption he acted as his Father's servant. It was he whom God anointed, and thence he was called the Lord's Christ, v. 26. God that anointed Christ determined what should be done to him. He was anointed to be a Saviour, and therefore it was determined he should be a sacrifice to make atonement for sin. He must die. God wisely determined before by what hands it should be done. He must therefore be delivered into the hands of sinners. God's hand and his counsel determined it. His hand and his counsel always agree: for whatsoever the Lord pleased that did he. (2) The wicked and unholy instruments that were employed in the executing of this design. Herod and Pilate, Gentiles and Jews, who had been at variance with each other, united against Christ. Sin is not the less evil for God's bringing good out of it, but he is by this the more glorified.

4. Their petition with reference to the case at this time.

(1) That God would take cognizance of the malice of their enemies: Now, Lord, behold their threatenings, v. 29. And now, Lord; there is an emphasis upon the now. Then is God's time to appear for his people, when the power of their enemies is most daring and threatening. They do not dictate to God what he shall do, but refer themselves to him. To thee we appeal, behold their threatenings, and either tie their hands or turn their hearts. It is a comfort to us that if we be unjustly threatened we may make ourselves easy to spreading the case before the Lord, and leaving it with him.

(2) That God, by his grace, would keep up their spirits: Grant unto thy servants that with all boldness they may speak thy word. Their prayer is not, "Lord, behold their threatenings, and frighten them," but, "Behold their threatenings, and animate us." They do not pray, "Lord, give us a fair opportunity to retire from our work, now that it is become dangerous"; but, "Lord, give us grace to go on in our work, and not to be afraid." Those that are sent on God's errands ought to deliver their message with boldness, not doubting of what they say, nor of being borne out in saying it. God is to be sought unto for an ability to speak his word with boldness. The threatenings of our enemies should rather stir us up to so much the more courage. Are they daring that fight against Christ? For shame, let not us be sneaking that are for him.

(3) That God would still give them power to work miracles for the confirmation of the doctrine they preached: Lord, grant us boldness, by stretching forth thy hand to heal. Nothing emboldens faithful ministers more in their work than the tokens of God's presence with them. They pray: That signs and wonders might be done by the name of the holy child Jesus, which would be convincing to the people, and confounding to the enemies. It is the honour of Christ that they aim at that the wonders might be done by the name of Jesus.

IV. The gracious answer God gave. God gave them a sign of the acceptance of their prayers (v. 31): When they had prayed, the place was shaken where they were assembled together. This shaking of the place was designed to awaken and raise their expectations, and to give them a sensible token that God was with them of a truth. This was to show them what reason they had to fear God more, and then they would fear man less. The place was shaken, that their faith might be established and unshaken. God gave them greater degrees of his Spirit. Their prayer, without doubt, was accepted, for it was answered: They were all filled with the Holy Ghost, by which they were not only encouraged, but enabled to speak the word of God with boldness. The Holy Ghost taught them not only what to speak, but how to speak. They were filled with the Holy Ghost at the bar (v. 8), and now filled with the Holy Ghost in the pulpit. We have here an instance of the performance of that promise, that God will give the Holy Spirit to those that ask him (Luke xi. 13), for it was in answer to prayer that they were filled with the Holy Ghost: we have also an example of the improvement of that gift; have it and use it, use it and have more of it. They spoke the word with all boldness. Talents must be traded with, not buried.

I. The disciples loved one another dearly. The multitude of those that believed were of one heart, and of one soul (v. 32). 1. There were multitudes that believed; even in Jerusalem there were three thousand converted on one day, and five thousand on another, and, besides these, there were added to the church daily. The increase of the church is the glory of it. 2. They were all of one heart, and of one soul. Though there were many, very many, of different ages, tempers, and conditions, in the world, they were unanimous in the faith of Christ, and, being all joined to the Lord, they were joined to one another in holy love. This was the blessed fruit of Christ's dying precept to his disciples, to love one another, and his dying prayer for them, that they all might be one. They were all of one heart, and one soul. Thus it was then, and we may not despair of seeing it so again.

II. The ministers went on in their work with great vigour and success (v. 33). With great power gave the apostles witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus. The resurrection of Christ, rightly understood, will let us into the great mysteries of religion. By the great power wherewith the apostles attested the resurrection may be meant the great vigour, spirit, and courage, with which they published this doctrine; they did it not softly and diffidently, but with liveliness and resolution. Or it may mean the miracles which they wrought to confirm their doctrine. God himself, in them, bearing witness too.

III. The beauty of the Lord our God shone upon them: Great grace was upon them all, grace that had something great in it (magnificent and very extraordinary) was upon them all. Christ poured out abundance of grace upon them. There were evident fruits of this grace in all they said and did. Some think it includes the favour they were in with the people. Everyone saw a beauty and excellency in them, and respected them.

IV. They were very liberal to the poor.

1. They insisted not upon property, which even children seem to have a sense of and a jealousy for, and which worldly people triumph in. No man said that aught of the things which he possessed was his own, v. 32. They did not take away property, but they were indifferent to it. They did not call it their own, because they had, in affection, forsaken all for Christ. We can call nothing our own but sin. No man said that what he had was his own; for he was ready to distribute, willing to communicate. Those that had estates were not solicitous to lay up, but very willing to lay out, and would straiten themselves to help their brethren. Meum—mine, and tuum—thine, are the great makebates. Men's holding their own, and grasping at more than their own, are the rise of wars and fightings.

2. They abounded in charity, they had all things common; for (v. 34) there was not any among them that lacked. As there were many poor that received the gospel, so there were some rich that were able to maintain them, and the grace of God made them willing. The gospel hath laid all things common, not so that the poor are allowed to rob the rich, but so that the rich are appointed to relieve the poor.

3. They did many of them sell their estates: As many as had possession of lands or houses sold them, v. 34. We are here told what they did with the money that was so raised: They laid it at the apostles' feet—they left it to them to be disposed of as they thought fit. Distribution was made unto every man according as he had need. Great care ought to be taken in the distribution of public charity. That it be given to such as have need. Those who have real need, above all, those that are reduced to want for well doing ought to be taken care of, and provided for. That it be given to every man according as he has need, without partiality or respect of persons.

Here is one particular person mentioned: Barnabas, afterwards Paul's colleague. [1] The account here given concerning him, v. 36. His name was Joses; he was of the tribe of Levi. He was born in Cyprus, a great way off from Jerusalem. Notice is taken of the apostles' changing his name after he associated with them. He was respected by the apostles, who, in token of their value for him, gave him a name, Barnabas. A son of consolation (so we read it)—a cheerful Christian, and this enlarged his heart in charity to the poor; eminent for comforting the Lord's people; he had an admirable facility that way. There were two among the apostles that were called Boanerges—sons of thunder (Mark iii. 17); but here was a son of consolation with them. Each had his several gift. Let the one search the wound, and then let the other heal it and bind it up. [2] Here is an account of his great generosity. This is particularly taken notice of, because of the eminency of his services afterwards in the church of God. Or perhaps this is mentioned because it was a leading card, and an example to others: He having land, he sold it, brought the money, and laid it at the apostles' feet. And he lost nothing upon the balance of the account, when he himself was, in effect, numbered among the apostles, by that word of the Holy Ghost, Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them, ch. xiii. 2. Thus, for the respect he showed to the apostles as apostles, he had an apostle's reward.

CHAP. V

I. The sin and punishment of Ananias and Sapphira, ver. 1–11. II. The flourishing state of the church, ver. 12–16. III. The imprisonment of the apostles, and their miraculous discharge out of prison, ver. 17–26. IV. Their arraignment before the great sanhedrim, ver. 27–33. V. Gamaliel's counsel concerning them, and their concurrence, for the present, with this advice, ver. 34–40. VI. The apostles' cheerful progress in their work.

The chapter begins with a melancholy but. As every man, so every church, in its best state has its but. The disciples seemed to be all exceedingly good; but there were hypocrites among them. There is a mixture of bad with good in the best societies of this side heaven; tares will grow among the wheat until the harvest. They came up to that perfection which Christ recommended to the rich young man—they sold what they had, and gave to the poor; but even that proved a cloak and cover of hypocrisy. The signs and wonders which the apostles wrought were hitherto miracles of mercy; but now comes in a miracle of judgment that God may be both loved and feared.

I. The sin of Ananias and Sapphira his wife. 1. They were ambitious of being thought eminent disciples when really they were not true disciples. They sold a possession, and brought the money to the apostles' feet, that they might not seem to be behind the very chief of believers. It is possible that hypocrites may deny themselves in one thing, but then it is to serve themselves in another. Ananias and Sapphira would take upon them a profession of Christianity, and make a fair show in the flesh with it, when they knew they could not go through with the Christian profession. It is often of fatal consequence for people to go a greater length in profession than their inward principle will admit of. 2. They were covetous of the wealth of the world, and distrustful of God and his providence: They sold their land, and in a pang of zeal, designed to dedicate the whole of the purchase-money to pious uses; but, when the money was received, their heart failed them, and they kept back part of the price (v. 2), because they loved the money. They could not take God's word that they should be provided for, but thought they would play a wiser part than the rest had done, and lay up for a rainy day. As if there were not an all-sufficiency in God to make up the whole to them. If they had been thorough-paced worldlings, they would not have sold their possession; and, if they had been thorough-paced Christians, they would not have detained part of the price. 3. They thought to deceive the apostles, and make them believe they brought the whole purchase-money. They came and laid the money at the apostles' feet, as if it were their all.

II. The indictment of Ananias, which proved both his condemnation and execution for this sin. When he brought the money Peter took him to task about it. He charges him peremptorily with the crime, showing it to him in its own colour, v. 3, 4. The Spirit of God in Peter not only discovered the fact but likewise discerned the principle of reigning infidelity in the heart of Ananias, which was at the bottom of it. Had it been a sin of infirmity, through the surprise of a temptation, Peter would have bidden him go home, and repent of his folly. He here showed him,

1. The origin of his sin: Satan filled his heart; he not only suggested it to him, and put it into his head, but hurried him on with resolution to do it.

2. The sin itself: He lied to the Holy Ghost; a sin of such a heinous nature that he could not have been guilty of it if Satan had not filled his heart. We read it, to lie unto the Holy Ghost, which reading is countenanced by v. 4, Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God. Ananias told a lie; he told Peter that he had sold a possession and this was the purchase-money. He did as the rest did who brought the whole price, and would be thought to do so, and expected the praise those had that did so. Many are brought to gross lying by reigning pride, and affectation of the applause of men, particularly in works of charity to the poor. Those that boast of good works they never did, or promise good works they never do, or make the good works they do more or better than really they are, come under the guilt of Ananias's lie. He told this lie to the Holy Ghost. It was not so much to the apostles as to the Holy Ghost in them that the money was brought, and that was said which was said, v. 4, Thou hast not lied unto men but thou hast lied unto God.

3. The aggravations of the sin (v. 4): While it remained, was it not thine own? And, after it was sold, was it not in thine own power? (1) "Thou wast under no temptation to keep back part of the price; before it was sold it was thy own, and when it was sold it was in thy own power to dispose of the money at thy pleasure." Or, (2) "Thou wast under no necessity of selling thy land at all, nor bringing any of the money to the apostles' feet. Thou mightest have kept the money, if thou hadst pleased, and the land too." It is better not to vow than to vow and not to pay, so better had it been for him not to have pretended to do the good work than thus to do it by the halves. "When it was sold, it was in thine own power; but it was not so when it was vowed." Thus, in giving our hearts to God, we are not admitted to divide them. Satan, like the mother whose own the child was not, would take up with a half; but God will have all or none.

4. All this guilt is charged upon him: Why hast thou conceived this thing in thine heart? He is said to have conceived it in his own heart, which shows that we cannot extenuate our sins by laying the fault of them upon the devil; he tempts, but he cannot force. The close of the charge is very high, but very just: Thou hast not lied unto men, but unto God. If we think to put a cheat upon God, we shall prove in the end to have put a fatal cheat upon our own souls.

III. The death and burial of Ananias, v. 5, 6.

1. He died upon the spot: Ananias, hearing these words, was speechless: he had nothing to say for himself; but this was not all. He fell down, and gave up the ghost. See the power of the word of God in the mouth of the apostles. As there are those whom the gospel justifies, so there are those whom it condemns. This punishment of Ananias may seem severe, but we are sure it was just. It was a great affront which Ananias put upon the Holy Ghost, as if he could be imposed upon. It was designed to deter others from the like presumptions. The doing of this by the ministry of Peter, who himself with a lie denied his Master, intimates that it was not the resentment of a wrong done to himself; for then he would have forgiven this affront, and endeavoured to bring this offender to repentance;

but it was the act of the Spirit of God in Peter: to him the indignity was done, and by him the punishment was inflicted.

2. He was buried immediately, for this was the manner of the Jews (v. 6): The young men wound up the dead body in grave-clothes, carried it out and buried it.

IV. The reckoning with Sapphira, the wife of Ananias. She came in about three hours after, for she knew not what had been done.

1. She was found guilty of sharing with her husband in his sin, by a question that Peter asked her (v. 8): Tell me whether you sold the land for so much? Saith she, "We had no more, but that was every farthing we received." Ananias and his wife agreed to tell the same story; they thought they might safely stand in the lie, and should gain credit to it. It is sad to see those relations who should quicken one another to that which is good harden one another in that which is evil.

2. Sentence was passed upon her, that she should partake in her husband's doom, v. 9.

(1) Her sin is opened: How is it that you have agreed together to tempt the Spirit of the Lord? Before he passes sentence he shows her the evil of her sin. They tempted the Spirit of the Lord. They saw that the apostles had the gift of tongues; but had they the gift of discerning spirits? Those that presume upon security and impunity in sin tempt the Spirit of God. They agreed together to do it. It is hard to say which is worse between yoke-fellows and other relations—a discord in good or concord in evil.

(2) Her doom is read: Behold, the feet of those who have buried thy husband are at the door, and they shall carry thee out.

3. The sentence executed itself. Then she fell down straightway at his feet. Some sinners God makes quick work with, while others he bears long with; for which difference, doubtless, there are good reasons; but he is not accountable to us for them. And many instances there are of sudden deaths which are not to be looked upon as the punishment of some gross sin, like this. We must not think that all who die suddenly are sinners above others; perhaps it is in favour to them, that they have a quick passage: however, it is forewarning to all to be always ready. But here it is plain that it was in judgment. Some put the question concerning the eternal state of Ananias and Sapphira, and incline to think that the destruction of the flesh was that the spirit might be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. But secret things belong not to us. It is said, She fell down at Peter's feet. The young men coming in found her dead. They carried her out and buried her by her husband. Some ask whether the apostles kept the money which they did bring. What they brought was not polluted to those to whom they brought it; but what they kept back was polluted to those that kept it back.

V. The impression that this made upon the people. Notice is taken of this in the midst of the story (v. 5): Great fear came upon all that heard these things. And again (v. 11), Great fear came upon all the church, and upon as many as heard these things. Those that had joined themselves to the church were thereby struck with an awe of God and of his judgments. It was not a damp or check to their holy joy, but it taught them to be serious in it, and to rejoice with trembling.

I. Here is a general account of the miracles which the apostles wrought (v. 12): By the hands of the apostles were many signs and wonders wrought among the people. God had come out of his place to punish, but now returns to his place, to his mercy-seat again. The miracles they wrought proved their divine mission. They were signs and wonders, such wonders as were confessedly signs of a divine presence and power.

II. We are here told what were the effects of these miracles.

1. The church was hereby kept together: They were all with one accord in Solomon's porch. They met in the temple, Solomon's porch. Those who permitted buyers and sellers could not for shame prohibit such preachers and healers there. They all met in public worship. They were there with one accord. The separation of hypocrites should make the sincere cleave so much the closer to each other.

2. It gained the apostles very great respect. Of the rest of their company durst no man join himself to them, as their equal or an associate with them. All the people magnified them. Though the chief priests did all they could to make them contemptible, this did not hinder the people from magnifying them. The apostles were far from magnifying themselves, and yet the people magnified them; for those that humble themselves shall be exalted, and those honoured that honour God only.

3. The church increased in number (v. 14): Believers were the more added to the Lord, even multitudes both of men and women. They were so far from being deterred by the example that was made of Ananias and Sapphira that they were rather invited by it into a society that kept such a strict discipline. Many have been brought to the Lord, and yet there is room for others to be added to him, added to the number of those that are united to him. Notice is taken of the conversion of women as well as men. As among those that followed Christ while he was upon earth, so among those that believed on him after he went to heaven, great notice was taken of the good women.

4. The apostles had abundance of patients, and gained abundance of reputation by the cure of them all, v. 15, 16. So many signs and wonders were wrought by the apostles that all manner of people put in for the benefit of them, both in city and country, and had it. In the city: They brought forth their sick into the streets. And they laid them on beds and couches that at least the shadow of Peter, passing by, might overshadow some of them, though it could not reach them all; and it had the desired effect, as the woman's touch of the hem of Christ's garment had; and in this that word of Christ was fulfilled, Greater works than these shall you do. And, if such miracles were wrought by Peter's shadow, we have reason to think they were so by the other apostles, as by the handkerchiefs from Paul's body (ch. xix. 12). In the country towns: Multitudes came to Jerusalem from the cities round about, bringing sick folks and those that were vexed with unclean spirits, and they were healed every one; distempered bodies and distempered minds were set to rights. Thus opportunity was given to the apostles, both to convince people's judgments of the heavenly origin of the doctrine they preached, and also to engage people's affections both to them and it.

Never did any good work go on with any hope of success, but it met with opposition. It would have been strange if the apostles had gone on thus teaching and healing and had had no check. In these verses we have the malice of hell and the grace of heaven struggling about them, the one to drive them off from this good work, the other to animate them in it.

I. The priests were enraged at them, and shut them up in prison, v. 17, 18. 1. Who their enemies and persecutors were. The high priest was the ringleader, Annas or Caiaphas. Those that were most forward to join with the high priest herein were the sect of the Sadducees, who had a particular enmity to the gospel of Christ, because it confirmed the resurrection of the dead, and the future state, which they denied. 2. How they were affected towards them, ill affected, and exasperated to the last degree. They rose up in a passion, being filled with indignation at the apostles for preaching the doctrine of Christ, and curing the sick,—at the people for hearing them, and bringing the sick to them to be cured. 3. How they proceeded against them (v. 18): They laid their hands on them, and put them in the common prison, among the worst of malefactors. (1) To put a restraint upon them. While they had them in prison they kept them from going on in their work, and this they reckoned a good point gained. (2) To put a terror upon them, and so to drive them off from their work. The last time they had them before them, they only threatened them (ch. iv. 21); but, now they imprisoned them, to make them afraid of them. (3) To put a disgrace upon them, and therefore they chose to clap them up in the common prison.

II. God sent his angel to release them out of prison. The powers of darkness fight against them, but the Father of lights fights for them. The Lord will never desert his witnesses, his advocates, but will certainly stand by them.

1. The apostles are discharged from their imprisonment (v. 19): The angel of the Lord by night opened the prison doors, and, in spite of the keepers that stood without before the doors, brought forth the prisoners (see v. 23). There is no prison so dark, so strong, but God can both visit his people in it, and fetch them out of it.

2. They are charged to go on with their work. The angel bade them, Go, stand, and speak in the temple to the people all the words of this life, v. 20. When they were miraculously set at liberty it was that they might go on with their work with so much the more boldness. Recoveries from sickness, releases out of trouble, are granted us, not that we may enjoy the comforts of our life, but that God may be honoured with the services of our life. Where they must preach: Speak in the temple. One would think it had been prudent to go on with it in a more private place. No; "Speak in the temple, for this is the place of concourse, this is your Father's house." It is not for the preachers of Christ's gospel to retire into corners, as long as they can have any opportunity of preaching in the great congregation. To whom they must preach: "Speak to the people, who are willing and desirous to be taught, and whose souls are as precious to Christ as the souls of the greatest." How they must preach: Go, stand, and speak, which intimates, not only that they must speak publicly, but that they must speak boldly and resolutely. What they must speak: All the words of this life. "Go, and preach the same to the world, that others may be comforted with the same comforts with which you yourselves are comforted of God. Of this life emphatically; this heavenly, divine life, in comparison with which the present earthly life does not deserve the name." The gospel is concerning matters of life and death, and ministers must preach it and people hear it accordingly. They must speak all the words of this life, and not conceal any. Christ's witnesses are sworn to speak the whole truth.

III. They went on with their work (v. 21): When they heard this they returned to Solomon's porch, v. 12. It was a great satisfaction to them to have these fresh orders. Now that the angel ordered them to go preach in the temple, their way was plain, and they ventured without any difficulty, entered into the temple, and feared not the face of man. If we may but be satisfied concerning our duty, our business is to keep close to this, and then we may cheerfully trust God with our safety. They set themselves immediately to execute them. They entered into the temple early in the morning, and taught them the gospel of the kingdom: and did not at all fear what man could do unto them. The whole treasure of the gospel is lodged in their hands; if they be silent now the springs are shut up, and the whole work falls to the ground and is made to cease. When God gives opportunity of doing good, though we be under the restraint and terror of human powers, we should venture far rather than let go such an opportunity.

IV. The high priest and his party went on with their prosecution, v. 21. They called the council together, a great and extraordinary council, for they summoned all the senate of the children of Israel.

1. How they were prepared to crush the gospel of Christ and the preachers of it, for they raised the whole posse. The last time they had the apostles in custody they convened them only before a committee of those that were of the kindred of the high priest, but now they called together all the eldership. Thus God ordered it, that the confusion of the enemies, and the apostles' testimony against them, might be more public, and that those might hear the gospel who would not hear it otherwise than from the bar.

2. How they were disappointed, and had their faces filled with shame. An officer is despatched immediately to fetch the prisoners to the bar. (1) The officers come and tell them that they are not to be found in the prison, v. 22, 23. They were gone, and the report which the officers make is, "The prison-door truly found we shut with all safety, the keepers standing without before the doors, but when we went in we found no man therein." Which way the angel fetched them we are not told; however it was, they were gone. The Lord knows, though we do not, how to deliver the godly out of temptation, and how to loose those that are in bonds for his name's sake, and he will do it, as here, when he has occasion for them (v. 24): When the high priest, and the captain of the temple, and the chief priests, heard these things, they were all at a plunge, and looked one upon another, doubting what this thing should be. They were at their wits' end, having never been so disappointed in all their lives of anything they were so sure of. Those often distress and embarrass themselves that think to distress and embarrass the cause of Christ. (2) Their doubt is, in part, determined; and yet their vexation is increased by another messenger, who brings them word that their prisoners are preaching in the temple (v. 25): "Behold, the men whom you put in prison are now standing in the temple, under your nose and in defiance of you, teaching the people." Now this confounded them more than anything. Common malefactors may have art enough to break prison; but those are uncommon ones that have courage enough to avow it when they have so done.

We are not told what it was that the apostles preached to the people; but what passed between them and the council we have here an account of; for in their sufferings there appeared more of a divine power and energy than even in their preaching.

I. The seizing of the apostles a second time. They brought them without violence. One would think they had reason to do so, in reverence to the temple, and for fear of the apostles, lest they should strike them, as they did Ananias. But all that restrained their violence was their fear of the people, who had such a veneration for the apostles that they would have stoned the officers if they had offered them any abuse. 2. Yet they brought them to those who were resolved to take violent courses with them (v. 27): They brought them, to set them before the council. Thus the powers that should have been a terror to evil works and workers became so to the good.

II. Their examination. The high priest told them what it was they had to lay to their charge, v. 28. 1. They had disobeyed the commands of authority (v.

28): "Did not we strictly charge and command you that you should not teach in this name? But you have disobeyed our commands." Did not we command you? Yes, they did; but did not Peter at the same time tell them that God's authority was superior to theirs, and his commands must take place of theirs? And they had forgotten this. 2. They had spread false doctrine among the people. "You have filled Jerusalem with your doctrine, and thereby have disturbed the public peace." 3. They had a malicious design against the government, as having made itself justly odious both to God and man: "You intend to bring this man's blood, the guilt of it before God, the shame of it before men, upon us." See here how those who with a great deal of presumption will do an evil thing yet cannot bear to hear of it afterwards. When they were in the heat of the persecution they could cry daringly enough, "His blood be upon us and upon our children." But now they take it as a great affront to have his blood laid at their door.

III. Their answer to the charge exhibited against them: Peter and the other apostles all spoke to the same purport; they spoke as one and the same Spirit gave them utterance.

1. They justified themselves in their disobedience (v. 29): We ought to obey God rather than men. God had commanded them to teach in the name of Christ, and therefore they ought to do it, though the chief priests forbade them. Those rulers have a great deal to answer for, who punish men for disobedience to them in that which is their duty to God.

2. They justified themselves in doing what they could to fill Jerusalem with the doctrine of Christ, and if they thereby bring his blood upon them they may thank themselves.

(1) The chief priests are told to their faces the indignities they did to this Jesus: "You slew him and hanged him on a tree." People's being unwilling to hear of their faults is no good reason why they should not be faithfully told of them. It is a common excuse made for not reproving sin that the times will not bear it. But those whose office it is to reprove must not be awed by this; the times must bear it, and shall bear it.

(2) They are told also what honours God put upon this Jesus, and then let them judge who was in the right, the persecutors of his doctrine or the preachers of it. He calls God the God of our fathers. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, is the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; see what honour he did him. [1] He raised him up. "You put him to death, but God has restored him to life, so that God and you are manifestly contesting about this Jesus; and which must we side with?" [2] He exalted him with his right hand. "You loaded him with disgrace, but God has crowned him with honour; and ought we not to honour him whom God honours? God has given him a name above every name." [3] "He has appointed him to be a prince and a saviour." There is no having Christ to be our Saviour, unless we be willing to take him for our prince. We cannot expect to be redeemed and healed by him, unless we give up ourselves to be ruled by him. Faith takes an entire Christ, that came, not to save us in our sins, but to save us from our sins. [4] He is appointed to give repentance to Israel and remission of sins. Therefore they must preach in his name to the people of Israel, for his favours were designed primarily and principally for them. Why should the rulers and elders of Israel oppose one who came with no less a blessing to Israel than repentance and pardon? But repentance and remission of sins are blessings they neither value nor see their need of. Repentance and remission go together; wherever repentance is wrought remission is without fail granted. On the other hand, no remission without repentance. It is Jesus Christ that gives both repentance and remission. Are we appointed to repent? Christ is appointed to give repentance. The new heart is his work, and the broken spirit a sacrifice of his providing; and, when he has given repentance, if he should not give remission he would forsake the work of his own hands. [5] All this is well attested, First, by the apostles themselves. "We are his witnesses, and if we should be silent, as you would have us, we should betray a trust." When a cause is trying, witnesses ought not to be silenced, for the issue of the cause depends on their testimony. Secondly, By the Spirit of God. The Holy Ghost is witness, a witness from heaven. For this end the Holy Ghost is given us, whose operations we cannot stifle. The giving of the Holy Ghost to obedient believers, not only to bring them to the obedience of faith, but to make them eminently useful therein, is a very strong proof of the truth of Christianity. Lastly, The giving of the Holy Ghost to those that obey Christ is a plain evidence that it is the will of God that Christ should be obeyed; "judge then whether we ought to obey you in opposition to him."

IV. The impression which the apostles' defence of themselves made upon the court. Surely such fair reasoning could not but clear the prisoners, and convert the judges. They raged against it, and were filled, 1. With indignation: They were cut to the heart, angry to see their own sin set in order before them; stark mad to find that the gospel of Christ had so much to say for itself. When a sermon was preached to the people to this purport, they were pricked to the heart, in remorse and godly sorrow, ch. ii. 37. These here were cut to the heart with rage and indignation. 2. With malice against the apostles themselves. Since they see they cannot stop their mouths any other way than by stopping their breath, they take counsel to slay them. While the apostles went on in the service of Christ, with a holy security and serenity of mind, their persecutors went on in their opposition to Christ, with a constant perplexity and perturbation of mind, and vexation to themselves.

V. The grave advice which Gamaliel gave upon this occasion. This Gamaliel is here said to be a Pharisee by his profession and sect, and by office a doctor of the law. Paul was brought up at his feet (ch. xxii. 3). He is here said to be in reputation among all the people. He was a moderate man, and not apt to go in with furious measures. Men of temper and charity are justly had in reputation, for checking the incendiaries that otherwise would set the world on fire.

1. The necessary caution he gives to the council: He commanded to put the apostles forth a little while. You men of Israel, saith he, take heed to yourselves, consider what you do, or intend to do, as touching these men, v. 25. He calls them men of Israel, to enforce this caution: "You are men, that should be governed by reason; you are men of Israel, that should be governed by revelation. Take heed to yourselves." The persecutors of God's people had best look to themselves, lest they fall into the pit which they dig.

2. The cases he cites. Two instances he gives of factious seditious men, whose attempts came to nothing of themselves; whence he infers that if these men were indeed such as they represented them their cause would sink with its own weight.

(1) There was one Theudas, boasting himself to be somebody. He observes here (v. 26) concerning him, how far he prevailed: "A number of men, about four hundred in all, joined themselves to him." How soon his pretensions were all dashed: "When he was slain, all, as many as obeyed him, were scattered. Now compare that case with this. You have slain Jesus, the ringleader of this faction. Now if he was an impostor and pretender, his death will be the death of his cause."

(2) The case was the same with Judas of Galilee, v. 37. [1] The attempt he made. It is said to be after this, which some read, besides this. It is not easy to determine particularly when these events happened. It is probable that they were cases which lately happened, and were fresh in memory. This Judas drew away much people after him. [2] Here is the defeat of his attempt, he also perished, and all, even as many as obeyed him, were dispersed.

3. His opinion upon the whole matter.

(1) That they should not persecute the apostles (v. 38): Now I say unto you, "Refrain from these men; let not our hand be upon them." It is uncertain whether he spoke this out of policy. The apostles did not attempt anything by outward force. Why should any outward force be used against them? Or, whether it was only the language of a mild quiet spirit. Or, whether God put this word into his mouth beyond his own intention. We are sure there was an overruling Providence in it, that the servants of Christ might not only come off, but come off honourably.

(2) That they should refer this matter to Providence: "Wait the issue. If it be of men, it will come to nought of itself; if of God, it will stand, in spite of all your powers and policies." That which is apparently wicked and immoral must be suppressed, but that which has a show of good, and it is doubtful whether it be of God or men, it is best to let it alone, and let it take its fate. Christ rules by the power of truth, not of the sword. [1] "If this counsel, and this work, be of men, it will come to nothing. If it be the counsel and work of foolish crack-brained men, they will run themselves out of breath. They will make themselves ridiculous. If it be the counsel and work of politic and designing men, let them alone awhile, and their knavery will be manifest to all men. Providence will never countenance it. It will come to nothing in a little time; there is no occasion to kill that which, if you give it a little time, will die of itself. The unnecessary use of power is an abuse of it." [2] "If it should prove that this counsel and this work is of God, then what do you think of persecuting them, of this attempt of yours (v. 33) to slay them? You must conclude it to be a fruitless attempt against them: If it be of God, you cannot overthrow it." It may be the comfort of all who are sincerely on God's side, that whatsoever is of God cannot be overthrown totally and finally, though it may be very vigorously opposed; it may be run upon, but cannot be run down. "A dangerous attempt to yourselves. Pray let it alone, lest haply you be found even to fight against God." Those that hate and abuse God's faithful people, that restrain and silence his faithful ministers, fight against God. Well, this was the advice of Gamaliel: we wish it were duly considered by those that persecute for conscience' sake.

VI. The determination of the council upon the whole matter, v. 40. Thus far they agreed with Gamaliel that they let fall the design of putting the apostles to death. Yet they could not forbear giving some vent to their rage. They beat them, scourged them as malefactors, and notice is taken (v. 41) of the ignominy of it. Thus they thought to make them ashamed of preaching, and the people ashamed of hearing them. They commanded them that they should not speak any more in the name of Jesus.

VII. The wonderful courage and constancy of the apostles. They departed from the council, and we do not find one word they said by way of reflection upon the court, but committed their cause to him to whom Gamaliel had referred it.

1. They bore their sufferings with an invincible cheerfulness (v. 41): When they went out, instead of being ashamed of Christ, they rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer shame for his name. They were men that had never done anything to make themselves vile, and therefore could not but have a sense of the shame they suffered, which was more grievous to them than the smart, as it usually is to ingenuous minds; but they considered that it was for the name of Christ that they were thus abused, and their sufferings should be made to contribute to the further advancement of his name. They reckoned it an honour that they were counted worthy to suffer shame, that they were honoured to be dishonoured for Christ. Reproach for Christ is true preferment. They rejoiced in it, remembering what their Master had said to them at their first setting out (Matt. v. 11, 12): When men shall revile you, and persecute you, rejoice and be exceedingly glad. They rejoiced that they suffered shame. If we suffer ill for doing well, provided we suffer it well, we ought to rejoice in that grace which enables us so to do.

2. They went on in their work with indefatigable diligence (v. 42): They were commanded not to preach, and yet they ceased not to teach and preach. When they preached—daily; every day, as duly as the day came. Where they preached—both publicly in the temple, and privately in every house. Though in the temple they were under the eye of their enemies, yet they did not confine themselves to their own houses, but ventured into the post of danger; and though they had the liberty of the temple, yet they made no difficulty of preaching in houses, in every house, even the poorest cottage. What was the subject matter of their preaching: They preached Jesus Christ. They did not preach themselves, but Christ. This was the preaching that gave most offence to the priests, but they would not alter their subject to please them. It ought to be the constant business of gospel ministers to preach Christ; Christ, and him crucified; Christ, and him glorified.

CHAP. VI

I. The discontent that was among the disciples about the distribution of the public charity, ver. 1. II. The election and ordination of seven men, who should take care of that matter, ver. 2–6. III. The increase of the church, ver. 7. IV. A particular account of Stephen. 1. His great activity for Christ, ver. 8. 2. The opposition he met with from the enemies of Christianity, ver. 9, 10. 3. The convening of him before the great sanhedrim, ver. 11–14. 4. God's owning him upon his trial, ver. 15.

I. An unhappy disagreement among some of the church members was prudently taken up in time (v. 1): When the number of the disciples was multiplied there arose a murmuring.

1. It does our hearts good to find that the number of the disciples is multiplied, as, no doubt, it vexed the priests and Sadducees to see it. The opposition that the preaching of the gospel met with contributed to the success of it. The preachers were beaten, threatened, and abused, and yet the people received their doctrine, invited thereto by their wonderful patience and cheerfulness under their trials.

2. Yet it casts a damp upon us to find that the multiplying of the disciples proves an occasion of discord. Now that they were multiplied they began to murmur. There arose a murmuring, not an open falling out, but a secret heart-burning.

(1) The complainants were the Grecians against the Hebrews—the Jews that were scattered in Greece, and other parts, many of whom being at Jerusalem at the feast embraced the faith of Christ. These complained against the Hebrews, the native Jews. Some of each of these became Christians, and their joint-embracing of the faith of Christ did not prevail to extinguish the little jealousies they had one of another before their conversion. But all are alike welcome to Christ, and should be, for his sake, dear to one another.

(2) The complaint of these Grecians was that their widows were neglected in the daily administration.

The first contention in the Christian church was about a money-matter. A great deal of money was gathered for the relief of the poor, but, as often happens in such cases, it was impossible to please everybody in the laying of it out. The apostles no doubt designed to do it with the utmost impartiality, and yet here they are complained to, and tacitly complained of, that the Grecian widows were neglected. Perhaps this complaint was groundless and unjust. Those who, upon any account, lie under disadvantages (as the Grecian Jews did, in comparison with those that were Hebrews of the Hebrews) are apt to be jealous that they are slighted when really they are not so; and it is the common fault of poor people that they are querulous and clamorous, and apt to find fault that more is not given them. There are envy and covetousness to be found among the poor as well as among the rich. We will suppose there might be some occasion for their complaint. As those that have the administration of public justice ought in a particular manner to protect widows from injury, so those that have the administration of public charity ought in a particular manner to provide for widows what is necessary. In the best-ordered church in the world there will be something amiss, some grievances, or at least some complaints; those are the best that have the least and the fewest.

II. The happy accommodating of this matter. The apostles had hitherto the directing of the matter. Some persons must be chosen to manage this matter who have more leisure to attend to it than the apostles had.

1. How the method was proposed by the apostles: They called the multitude of the disciples unto them. The twelve themselves would not determine anything without them. Those might be best able to advise who were more conversant in the affairs of this life than the apostles were.

(1) The apostles could by no means admit so great a diversion from their great work (v. 2): It is not reasonable that we should leave the word of God and serve tables. This was foreign to the business which the apostles were called to. They were to preach the word of God. They thought that was work enough for a whole man. If they serve tables, they must, in some measure, leave the word of God. They will no more be drawn from their preaching by the money laid at their feet than they will be driven from it by the stripes laid on their backs. Preaching the gospel is the best work that a minister can be employed in. He must not entangle himself in the affairs of this life, no, not in the outward business of the house of God.

(2) They therefore desire that seven men might be chosen whose business it should be to serve tables, v. 2. The business must be minded, must be better minded than it had been, and than the apostles could mind it; and therefore proper persons must be chosen, that everything might be done decently and in order, and no person nor thing neglected. The persons must be duly qualified. The people are to choose, and the apostles to ordain. Look out seven men. These must be of honest report, men free from scandal, that were looked upon by their neighbours as men of integrity, that might be trusted, well spoken of for everything that is virtuous. They must be full of the Holy Ghost. They must not only be honest men, but they must be men of ability and men of courage, hereby appearing to be full of the Holy Ghost. They must be full of wisdom. It was not enough that they were honest, good men, but they must be discreet, judicious men, that could not be imposed upon: full of the Holy Ghost, and wisdom, that is, of the Holy Ghost as a Spirit of wisdom. Those must be full of wisdom who are entrusted with public money, that it may be disposed of, not only with fidelity, but with frugality. The people must nominate the persons: "Look you out among yourselves seven men." They might be presumed to know better, or at least were fitter to enquire, what character men had, than the apostles. The apostles will ordain them to the service, will give them their charge, and give them their authority. Whom we may appoint over this business, to take care of it, and to see that there be neither waste nor want.

(3) The apostles engage to addict themselves wholly to their work as ministers, if they can but get fairly quit of this troublesome office (v. 4): We will give ourselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word. See here, [1] What are the two great gospel ordinances—the word, and prayer. By these two the kingdom of Christ must be advanced, and additions made to it. [2] What is the great business of gospel ministers—to give themselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word. They must be God's mouth to the people in the ministry of the word, and the people's mouth to God in prayer. In order to the conviction and conversion of sinners, and the edification and consolation of saints, we must not only offer up our prayers for them, but we must minister the word to them. Nor must we only minister the word to them, but we must pray for them. God's grace can do all without our preaching, but our preaching can do nothing without God's grace. Those ministers, without doubt, are the successors of the apostles, who give themselves continually to prayer, and to the ministry of the word.

2. How this proposal was agreed to by the disciples. It was not imposed, but proposed. The saying pleased the whole multitude, v. 5.

(1) They pitched upon the persons. The majority of votes fell upon the persons here named; and the rest both of the candidates and the electors acquiesced. The overseers of the poor were chosen by the suffrage of the people, in which yet a regard is to be had to the providence of God. We have a list of the persons chosen. We may conjecture, concerning these seven, [1] That they were such as had sold their estates, and brought the money into the common stock; those were fittest to be entrusted with the distribution of it who had been most generous in the contribution to it. [2] That these seven were all of the Grecian or Hellenist Jews, for they have all Greek names, and this would be most likely to silence the murmurings of the Grecians. Nicolas, it is plain, was one of them, for he was a proselyte of Antioch. The first named is Stephen, a man full of faith and of the Holy Ghost, full of fidelity, full of courage (so some), for he was full of the Holy Ghost, of his gifts and graces. He was an extraordinary man, and excelled in everything that was good: his name signifies a crown. Philip is put next, afterwards ordained to the office of an evangelist, a companion and assistant to the apostles, for so he is expressly called, ch. xxi. 8. And his preaching and baptizing (which we read of ch. viii. 12) were certainly not as a deacon, but as an evangelist. The last named is Nicolas, who, some say, afterwards degenerated (as the Judas among these seven) and was the founder of the sect of the Nicolaitans which we read of (Rev. ii. 6, 15), and which Christ there says, once and again, was a thing he hated. But some of the ancients clear him from this charge, and tell us that, though that vile impure sect denominated themselves from him, yet it was unjustly, and because he only insisted much upon it that those that had wives should be as though they had none, thence they wickedly inferred that those that had wives should have them in common, which therefore Tertullian, when he speaks of the community of goods, particularly excepts: Omnia indiscreta apud nos, præter uxores—All things are common among us, except our wives—Apol. cap. 39.

(2) The apostles appointed them to this work of serving tables for the present, v. 6. They prayed with them, and for them. All that are employed in the service of the church ought to be committed to the conduct of the divine grace by the prayers of the church. They laid their hands on them. Having by prayer implored a blessing upon them, they did by the laying on of hands assure them that the blessing was conferred in answer to the prayer; and this was giving them authority to execute that office.

III. The advancement of the church hereupon. When things were thus put into good order in the church then religion got ground, v. 7. The word of God increased. Now that the apostles resolved to stick more closely than ever to their preaching, it spread the gospel further. Ministers disentangling themselves from secular employments, and addicting themselves entirely to their work, will contribute very much, as a means, to the success of the gospel. Christians became numerous: The number of the disciples multiplied in Jerusalem greatly. When Christ was upon earth, his ministry had least success in Jerusalem; yet now that city affords most converts. God has his remnant even in the worst of places. A great company of the priests were obedient to the faith. Then is the word and grace of God greatly magnified when those are wrought upon by it that were least likely. It should seem, they came in a body; many of them agreed together, for the keeping up of one another's credit, and the strengthening of one another's hands, to join at once in giving up their names to Christ: a great crowd of priests were by the grace of God helped over their prejudices, and were obedient to the faith. They embraced the doctrine of the gospel; their understandings were captivated to the power of the truths of Christ. They evinced the sincerity of their believing the gospel of Christ by a cheerful compliance with all the rules and precepts of the gospel.

Stephen, no doubt, was diligent and faithful in the discharge of his office. Being called to that office, he did not think it below him to do the duty of it. And, being faithful in a little, he was entrusted with more. We find him here called out to very honourable services, and owned in them.

I. He proved the truth of the gospel, by working miracles in Christ's name, v. 8. He was full of faith and power. Those that are full of faith are full of power, because by faith the power of God is engaged for us. By faith we are emptied of self, and so are filled with Christ. Being so he did great wonders and miracles among the people, openly, and in the sight of all; for Christ's miracles feared not the strictest scrutiny.

II. He pleaded the cause of Christianity against those that opposed it (v. 9, 10); he served the interests of religion as a disputant, in the high places of the field, while others were serving them as vinedressers and husbandmen.

1. We are here told who were his opponents, v. 9. They were Jews, but Hellenist Jews. It was with difficulty that they retained the practice of it in the country where they lived, and not without great expense and toil that they kept up their attendance at Jerusalem, and this made them more active sticklers for Judaism than those were whose profession of their religion was cheap and easy. They were of the synagogue which is called the synagogue of the Libertines; the Romans called those Liberti, or Libertini, who, slaves by birth, were manumitted, or made freemen. Some think that these Libertines were such of the Jews as had obtained the Roman freedom, as Paul had (ch. 27, 28). There were others that belonged to the synagogue of the Cyrenians and Alexandrians, and others who were of Cilicia and Asia. The Jews that were born in other countries, and had concerns in them, had frequent occasion to reside in Jerusalem. Each nation had its synagogue, as in London there are French, and Dutch, and Danish churches. Now those that were in these synagogues, being confident of the goodness of their cause, and their own sufficiency to manage it, would undertake to run down Christianity by force of argument. It was a fair and rational way of dealing with it, and what religion is always ready to admit. But why did they dispute with Stephen? And why not with the apostles themselves? Some think because they despised the apostles as unlearned and ignorant men; but Stephen was bred a scholar, and they thought it their honour to meddle with their match. Others think it was because they stood in awe of the apostles. Perhaps, they having given a public challenge, Stephen was chosen by the disciples to be their champion. Stephen, who was only a deacon in the church, and a very sharp young man, of bright parts, was appointed to this service. It is probable that they disputed with Stephen because he was zealous to argue with them and convince them, and this was the service to which God had called them.

2. We are here told how he carried the point in this dispute (v. 10): They were not able to resist the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spoke. They could neither support their own arguments nor answer his. Though they were not convinced, yet they were confounded. It is not said, They were not able to resist him, but, They were not able to resist the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spoke. They thought they had only disputed with Stephen; but they were disputing with the Spirit of God in him, for whom they were an unequal match.

III. At length, he sealed it with his blood. When they could not answer his arguments as a disputant, they prosecuted him as a criminal, and suborned witnesses against him, to swear blasphemy upon him. They suborned men, that is, instructed them what to say, and then hired them to swear it.

1. How they incensed both the government and the mob against him (v. 12): They stirred up the people against him, that, if the sanhedrim should still think fit to let him alone, yet they might run him down by a popular tumult; they also found means to stir up the elders and scribes against him, that, if the people should countenance him, they might prevail by authority. Thus they doubted not but to gain their point, when they had two strings to their bow.

2. How they got him to the bar: They came upon him and caught him and brought him to the council. They came upon him in a body, and flew upon him as a lion upon his prey; so the word signifies.

3. How they were prepared with evidence ready to produce against him. They had heard him speak blasphemous words against Moses and against God (v. 11)—against this holy place and the law (v. 13); for they heard him say what Jesus would do to their place and their customs, v. 14. Those who swore it against him are called false witnesses, because though there was something of truth in their testimony, yet they put a wrong and malicious construction upon what he had said, and perverted it. The general charge exhibited against him—that he spoke blasphemous words; and, to aggravate the matter, "He ceases not to speak blasphemous words." It intimates likewise something of contumacy and contempt of admonition. "He has been warned against it, and yet ceases not to talk at this rate." Stephen's persecutors would be thought to have a deep concern upon them for the honour of God's name, and to do this in a jealousy for that. He is said to have spoken blasphemous words against Moses and against God. But did Stephen blaspheme Moses? By no means. Christ, and the preachers of his gospel, never said anything that looked like blaspheming Moses. Very unjustly therefore is Stephen indicted for blaspheming Moses. How this charge is supported and made out. All they can charge him with is that that he hath spoken blasphemous words against this holy place and the law. Thus does the charge dwindle when it comes to the evidence. He is charged with blaspheming this holy place. Christ was condemned as a blasphemer for words which were thought to reflect upon the temple, even when they by their wickedness had profaned it. He is charged with blaspheming the law. The charge dwindles again; for all they can accuse him of is that they had heard him say that this Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, and change the customs which Moses delivered to us. He could not be charged with having said anything to the disparagement either of the temple or of the law. He had said, Jesus of Nazareth shall destroy this place, destroy the temple, destroy Jerusalem. It is probable that he might say so; and what blasphemy was it against the holy place to say that it should not be perpetual. And is he a blasphemer, then, who tells them that Jesus of Nazareth will bring a just destruction upon their place and nation, and they may thank themselves? He had said, This Jesus shall change the customs which Moses delivered to us. Christ came, not to destroy, but to fulfil, the law; and, if he changed some customs it was to introduce and establish those that were much better.

IV. We are here told how God owned him (v. 15): All that sat in the council, looking steadfastly on him, saw his face as it had been the face of an angel. It is usual for judges to observe the countenance of the prisoner, which sometimes is an indication either of guilt or innocence. He looked as if he had never been better pleased in his life than he was now when he stood fair for the crown of martyrdom. Such an undisturbed serenity, such an undaunted courage, and such an unaccountable mixture of mildness and majesty, there was in his countenance, that everyone said he looked like an angel. There was a miraculous splendour and brightness upon his countenance, God designing thereby to put honour upon his faithful witness and confusion upon his persecutors and judges. All that sat in the council saw it, and an arrant shame it was that they could not but see by it that he was owned of God. Wisdom and holiness make a man's face to shine, and yet these will not secure men from the greatest indignities.

CHAP. VII

In this chapter we have the martyrdom of Stephen, the first martyr of the Christian church. And therefore his sufferings and death are more largely related than those of any other 1. His defence of himself before the council that it was no blasphemy against God to say that the temple should be destroyed and the customs of the ceremonial law changed. And, 1. He shows this by going over the history of the Old Testament. That holy place and that law were but figures of good things to come, and it was no disparagement at all to them to say that they must give place to better things, ver. 1–50. 2. He applies this to those that prosecuted him, and sat in judgment upon him, ver. 51–53. II. The putting of him to death by stoning him, and his patient, cheerful, pious submission to it, ver. 54–60.

Verses 1–16

I. The high priest calls upon him to answer for himself, v. 1. You hear what is sworn against you: Are these things so? Guilty or not guilty?

II. He begins his defence, and it is long.

1. In this discourse he appears to be a man ready and mighty in the scriptures. He was filled with the Holy Ghost, not so much to reveal to him new things, but to bring to his remembrance the scriptures of the Old Testament, and to teach him how to make use of them. Those that are full of the Holy Ghost will be full of the scripture, as Stephen was.

2. He quotes the scriptures according to the Septuagint translation, by which it appears he was one of the Hellenist Jews. His preface: Men, brethren, and fathers, hearken He gives them, though not flattering titles, yet civil and respectful ones. They are ready to look upon him as an apostate from the Jewish church, and an enemy to them. He addresses himself to them as men, brethren, and fathers, resolving to look on himself as one of them, though they would not so look on him. He craves their attention: Hearken. His entrance upon the discourse. It is all to the purpose, to show them that God, as he had a church in the world many ages before that holy place was founded and the ceremonial law given, so he would have when they should both have had their period.

[1] He begins with the call of Abraham, the father of the Old Testament church. His native country was an idolatrous country, it was Mesopotamia (v. 2), the land of the Chaldeans (v. 4); thence God brought him. He first brought him out of the land of the Chaldeans to Charran, or Haran, and thence five years after, when his father was dead, he removed him into the land of Canaan, wherein you now dwell. From this call of Abraham we may observe, 1. That in all our ways we must acknowledge God, and attend the directions of his providence. God removed him into this land wherein you now dwell, and he did but follow his Leader. 2. Those whom God takes into covenant with himself must sit loose to the world, and live above it and everything in it, even that in it which is most dear to them. God's chosen must follow him with an implicit faith and obedience But let us see what this is to Stephen's case. They had charged him as a blasphemer of God, therefore he shows that he is a son of Abraham, and values himself upon his being able to say, Our father Abraham, and that he is a faithful worshipper of the God of Abraham, whom therefore he here calls the God of glory. They were proud of their being circumcised; and therefore he shows that Abraham was taken under God's guidance, and into communion with him, before he was circumcised. They had a mighty jealousy for this holy place, which may be meant of the whole land of Canaan. "Now," says Stephen, "you need not be so proud of it; for," (1) "You came originally out of Ur of the Chaldees, and you were not the first planters of this country. Think of the meanness of your beginnings, and how you are entirely indebted to divine grace, and then you will see boasting to be for ever excluded." (2) "God appeared in his glory to Abraham a great way off in Mesopotamia, before he came near Canaan, so that you must not think God's visits are confined to this land."

[2] The unsettled state of Abraham and his seed for many ages after he was called out of Ur of the Chaldees. God did indeed promise that he would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him, v. 5. But, First, As yet he had no child, nor any by Sarah for many years after. Secondly, He himself was but a stranger and a sojourner in that land, and God gave him no inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on; but there he was as in a strange country. Thirdly, His posterity did not come to the possession of it for a long time: After four hundred years they shall come and serve me in this place, and not till then, v. 7. Fourthly, They must undergo a great deal of hardship before they shall be put into the possession of that land: they shall be brought into bondage, and ill treated in a strange land. And at the end of four hundred years that nation to whom they shall be in bondage will I judge, saith God. When Abraham had neither inheritance nor heir, yet he was told he should have both. God's promises, though they are slow, are sure. They will be fulfilled though perhaps not so soon as we expect.

Though the people of God may be in distress and trouble for a time, yet God will at length both rescue them and reckon with those that do oppress them.

But let us see how this serves Stephen's purpose. 1. The Jewish nation was very inconsiderable in its beginnings; as their common father Abraham was fetched out of obscurity in Ur of the Chaldees, so their tribes were fetched out of servitude in Egypt. He that brought them out of Egypt can bring them into it again, and yet be no loser, while he can out of stones raise up children unto Abraham. 2. The slow steps by which the promise made to Abraham advanced towards the performance plainly show that it had a spiritual meaning, and that the land principally intended to be conveyed by it was the better country, that is, the heavenly. It was therefore no blasphemy to say, Jesus shall destroy this place, when at the same time we say, "He shall lead us to the heavenly Canaan."

[3] The building up of the family of Abraham.

First, God engaged to be a God to Abraham and his seed; and, in token of this, appointed that he and his male seed should be circumcised. He gave him the covenant of circumcision, and accordingly, when Abraham had a son born, he circumcised him the eighth day (v. 8). And then they began to multiply: Isaac begat Jacob, and Jacob the twelve patriarchs.

Secondly, Joseph, the darling and blessing of his father's house, was abused by his brethren; they envied him because of his dreams, and sold him into Egypt.

Thirdly, God owned Joseph in his troubles, and was with him by the influence of his Spirit, both on his mind, giving him comfort, and on the minds of those he was concerned with, giving him favour in their eyes. And thus at length he delivered him out of his afflictions.

Fourthly, Jacob was compelled to go down into Egypt by a dearth (which was a great affliction), to that degree that our fathers found no sustenance in Canaan, v. 11. But, hearing that there was corn in Egypt (treasured up by the wisdom of his own son), he sent out our fathers first to fetch corn, v. 12. And the second time that they went, Joseph made himself known to them, and it was notified to Pharaoh that they were Joseph's kindred (v. 13), whereupon Joseph sent for his father Jacob to him into Egypt, with all his kindred and family, to the number of seventy-five souls, v. 14.

Fifthly, Jacob and his sons died in Egypt (v. 15), but were carried over to be buried in Canaan, v. 16.

Let us now see what this is to Stephen's purpose. 1. He still reminds them of the mean beginning of the Jewish nation. It was by a miracle of mercy that they were raised up out of nothing to what they were. If they answer not the intention of their being so raised, they can expect no other than to be destroyed. Here it is urged upon them as an aggravation of their contempt of the gospel of Christ. 2. He reminds them likewise of the wickedness of those that were the patriarchs in envying their brother Joseph, and selling him into Egypt; and the same spirit was still working in them towards Christ. 3. Their holy land, which they doted so much upon, their fathers were long kept out of the possession of, and therefore let them not think it strange if, after it has been so long polluted with sin, it be at length destroyed.

I. The wonderful increase of the people of Israel in Egypt; it was by a wonder of providence that in a little time they advanced from a family into a nation. It was when the time of the promise drew nigh—the time when they were to be formed into a people. The notion of providence is sometimes quickest when it comes nearest the centre. God knows how to redeem the time that seems to have been lost, and, when the year of the redeemed is at hand, can do a double work in a single day. It was in Egypt, where they were oppressed. Suffering times have often been growing times with the church.

II. The extreme hardships which they underwent there, v. 18, 19. Stephen observes three things: 1. Their base ingratitude: They were oppressed by another king that knew not Joseph. Those that injure good people are very ungrateful, for they are the blessings of the age and place they live in. 2. Their hellish craft and policy: They dealt subtly with our kindred. Come on, said they, let us deal wisely, thinking thereby to secure themselves. Those are in a great mistake who think they deal wisely for themselves when they deal deceitfully or unmercifully with their brethren. 3. Their barbarous and inhuman cruelty. They cast out their young children, to the end they might not live. What they were now doing against the Christian church in its infancy was as impious and would be as fruitless as that was which the Egyptians did against the Jewish church in its infancy. In spite of your malice Christ's disciples will increase and multiply.

III. The raising up of Moses to be their deliverer. Moses was born when the persecution of Israel was at the hottest: At that time, Moses was born (v. 20), and was himself in danger of falling a sacrifice to that bloody edict. God is preparing for his people's deliverance, when their way is darkest, and their distress deepest. He was exceedingly fair. He was sanctified from the womb, and this made him beautiful in God's eyes. He was wonderfully preserved in his infancy, first, by the care of his tender parents, who nourished him three months in their own house; and then by a favourable providence that threw him into the arms of Pharaoh's daughter, who took him up, and nourished him as her own son (v. 21); for those whom God designs to make special use of he will take special care of. He became a great scholar (v. 22): He was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. He became a prime minister of state in Egypt, being mighty in words and deeds. Though he had not a ready way of expressing himself, but stammered, yet he spoke admirably good sense, and everything he said commanded assent. Now, by all this, Stephen will make it appear that he had as high and honourable thoughts of Moses as they had.

IV. The attempts which Moses made to deliver Israel, which they spurned. This Stephen insists much upon, and it serves for a key to this story, a designed entrance upon the public service he was to be called out to (v. 23): When he was full forty years old it came into his heart (for God put it there) to visit his brethren the children of Israel, and to see which way he might do them any service. 1. As Israel's saviour. This he gave a specimen of in avenging an oppressed Israelite, and killing the Egyptian that abused him (v. 24). Seeing one of his brethren suffer wrong, he avenged him that was oppressed, and smote the Egyptian. He supposed that his brethren would have understood that God by his hand would deliver them. If they had but understood the signs of the times, they might have taken this for the dawning of the day of their deliverance; but they understood not. 2. As Israel's judge. This he gave a specimen of, the very next day, in offering to accommodate matters between two contending Hebrews (v. 26): He showed himself to them as they strove, and he would have set them at one again, saying, Sirs, you are brethren, why do you wrong one to another? For he observed that (as in most strifes) there was a fault on both sides; and therefore there must be a mutual remission and condescension. But the contending Israelite that was most in the wrong thrust him away (v. 27), would not bear the reproof, but was ready to fly in his face, with, Who made thee a ruler and a judge over us? Proud and litigious spirits are impatient of check and control. The wrong-doer was so enraged at the reproof given him that he upbraided Moses with the service he had done to their nation in killing the Egyptian: Wilt thou kill me as thou didst the Egyptian yesterday? (v. 28), charging that upon him as his crime, which was the hanging out of the flag of defiance to the Egyptians, and the banner of love and deliverance to Israel. Hereupon Moses fled into the land of Midian. He settled as a stranger in Midian, married, and had two sons, by Jethro's daughter, v. 29. How this serves Stephen's purpose. 1. They charged him with blaspheming Moses, in answer to which he retorts upon them the indignities which their fathers did to Moses, which they ought to be ashamed of, instead of picking quarrels with one that had as great a veneration for him as any of them had. 2. They persecuted him for disputing in defence of Christ and his gospel. They set up Moses and his law: "But," saith he, "you had best take heed," (1) "Lest you refuse and reject one whom God has raised up to be to you a prince and a Saviour. God will, by this Jesus, deliver you out of a worse slavery than that in Egypt; take heed then of thrusting him away." (2) "Lest you hereby fare as your fathers fared. You put away the gospel from you, and it will be sent to the Gentiles; you will not have Christ, and you shall not have him."

Stephen here proceeds in his story of Moses.

I. The vision which he saw of the glory of God at the bush (v. 30): When forty years had expired, now, at eighty years old, he enters upon that post of honour to which he was born. Where God appeared to him: In the wilderness of Mount Sinai, v. 30. And, when he appeared to him there, that was holy ground (v. 33), which Stephen takes notice of, as a check to those who prided themselves in the temple, as if there were no communion to be had with God but there. They deceive themselves if they think God is confined to places; he can bring his people into a wilderness, and there speak comfortably to them. How he appeared to him: In a flame of fire, and yet the bush was not consumed. How Moses was affected with this: (1) He wondered at the sight, v. 31. He had the curiosity at first to pry into it: I will turn aside now, and see this great sight; but the nearer he drew the more he was struck with amazement. (2) He trembled, and durst not behold, for he was soon aware that it was the angel of the Lord. This set him a trembling.

II. The declaration which he heard of the covenant of God (v. 32): The voice of the Lord came to him; I am the God of thy fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob; and therefore, 1. "I am the same that I was." The covenant God made with Abraham was, I will be to thee a God. "Now," saith God, "that covenant is still in full force; I am, as I was, the God of Abraham." All the favours, all the honours God put upon Israel, were founded upon this covenant with Abraham. 2. "I will be the same that I am." He will be a God, (1) To their souls, which are now separated from their bodies. Our Saviour by this proves the future state, Matt. xxii. 31, 32. Abraham is dead, and yet God is still his God, therefore Abraham is still alive. Now this is that life and immortality which are brought to light by the gospel. Those therefore who stood up in defence of the gospel were so far from blaspheming Moses that they did the greatest honour imaginable to Moses. (2) To their seed, God, in declaring himself thus the God of their fathers, intimated his kindness to their seed, that they should be beloved for the fathers' sakes. Now the preachers of the gospel preached up this covenant, the promise made of God unto the fathers, ch. xxvi. 6, 7. And shall they, under colour of supporting the holy place and the law, oppose the covenant which was made with Abraham, before the law was given, and long before the holy place was built? God will have our salvation to be by promise, and not by the law; the Jews therefore who persecuted the Christians, under pretence that they blasphemed the law, did themselves blaspheme the promise.

III. The commission which God gave him to deliver Israel out of Egypt. When God had declared himself the God of Abraham he proceeded, 1. To order Moses into a reverent posture: "Put off thy shoes from thy feet. Be not hasty and rash in thy approaches to God; tread softly." 2. To order Moses into a very eminent service. He is commissioned to demand leave from Pharaoh for Israel to go out of his land, v. 34. Observe, (1) The notice God took both of their sufferings and of their sense of their sufferings: I have seen, I have seen their affliction, and have heard their groaning. Their deliverance takes rise from his pity. (2) The determination he fixed to redeem them by the hand of Moses: I am come down to deliver them. Moses is the man that must be employed: Come, and I will send thee into Egypt: and, if God send him, he will give him success.

IV. His acting in pursuance of this commission. 1. God put honour upon him whom they put contempt upon (v. 35): This Moses whom they refused saying, Who made thee a ruler and a judge? did God send to be a ruler, and a deliverer, by the hand of the angel which appeared to him in the bush. Now, by this example, Stephen would intimate to the council that this Jesus whom they now refused saying, Who gave thee this authority? has God advanced to be a prince and a Saviour, as the apostles had told them awhile ago (ch. v. 30, 31), that the stone which the builders refused was become the headstone in the corner, ch. iv. 11. 2. God showed favour to them by him. God might justly have refused them his service, but it is all forgotten, v. 36. He brought them out after he had shown wonders and signs in the land of Egypt, in the Red Sea, and in the wilderness forty years. So far is he from blaspheming Moses that he admires him as a glorious instrument in the hand of God. But it does not at all derogate from his just honour to say that he was but an instrument, and that he is outshone by this Jesus, whom he encourages these Jews yet to close with. The people of Israel were delivered by Moses, though they had once refused him.

V. His prophecy of Christ and his grace, v. 37. Moses spoke of him (v. 37): This is that Moses who said unto the children of Israel, A prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren. This is spoken of as one of the greatest honours God put upon him, that by him he gave notice to the children of Israel of the great prophet that should come into the world. In asserting that Jesus should change the customs of the ceremonial law, he was so far from blaspheming Moses that really he did him the greatest honour imaginable. Christ told them himself, If they had believed Moses, they would have believed him, John v. 46. Moses told them that they should have a prophet raised up among them, one of their own nation, who should therefore have authority to change the customs that he had delivered, and to bring in a better hope, as the Mediator of a better testament. He charged them to hear that prophet. This will be the greatest honour you can do to Moses and to his law, who said, Hear you him.

VI. The eminent services which Moses continued to do to the people of Israel, after he had been instrumental to bring them out of Egypt, v. 38. It was the honour of Moses, 1. That he was in the church in the wilderness; he presided in all the affairs of it for forty years. Many a time it had been destroyed if Moses had not been in it to intercede for it. But Christ is the president and guide of a more excellent and glorious church, and is more in it, as the life and soul of it, than Moses could be in that. 2. That he was with the angel that spoke to him in the mount Sinai, and with our fathers. Moses was in the church in the wilderness, but it was with the angel that spoke to him in mount Sinai. That angel was guide to him, else he could not have been a guide to Israel Christ is himself that angel and therefore has an authority above Moses. 3. That he received the lively oracles to give unto them; not only the ten commandments, but the other instructions which the Lord spoke unto Moses. The words of God are oracles, certain and infallible, by them all controversies must be determined. They are lively oracles. The word that God speaks is spirit and life; not that the law of Moses could give life, but it showed the way to life. Moses received them from God, and delivered nothing but what he had first received from God. The lively oracles which he received from God he faithfully gave to the people. He that gave them those customs by his servant Moses might change the customs by his Son Jesus, who received more lively oracles to give unto us than Moses did.

VII. The contempt that was put upon him by the people. Those that charged Stephen with speaking against Moses tread in their ancestors' steps. They would not obey him, but thrust him from them, v. 39. In their hearts they turned back again into Egypt, and preferred their garlic and onions there before the manna they had under the guidance of Moses, or the milk and honey they hoped for in Canaan. Many that pretend to be going forward towards Canaan are, at the same time, in their hearts turning back to Egypt. Now, if the customs that Moses delivered to them could not prevail to change them, wonder not that Christ comes to change the customs. They made a golden calf, a great indignity to Moses: for it was upon this consideration that they made the calf, because "as for this Moses, who brought us out of the land of Egypt, we know not what is become of him." As if a calf were sufficient to supply the want of Moses, and as capable of going before them into the promised land. So they made a calf in those days, and offered sacrifices unto the idol, and rejoiced in the work of their own hands. By all this it appears that there was a great deal which the law could not do. It was therefore necessary that this law should be perfected by a better hand, and he was no blasphemer against Moses who said that Christ had done it.

I. Stephen upbraids them with the idolatry of their fathers, which God gave them up to. This was the saddest punishment of all for that sin, that God gave them up to a reprobate mind (v. 42): Then God turned, and gave them up to worship the host of heaven. For this he quotes a passage out of Amos v. 25. For it would be less invidious to tell them their own character and doom from an Old Testament prophet, who upbraids them,

1. For not sacrificing to their own God in the wilderness (v. 42): Have you offered to me slain beasts, and sacrifices, by the space of forty years in the wilderness? No: during all that time sacrifices to God were intermitted; they did not so much as keep the passover after the second year. This is also a check to their zeal for the customs that Moses delivered to them, and their fear of having them changed by this Jesus, that immediately after they were delivered these customs were for forty years together disused.

2. For sacrificing to other gods after they came to Canaan (v. 43): You took up the tabernacle of Moloch. Moloch was the idol of the children of Ammon, to which they barbarously offered their own children in sacrifice; yet this unnatural idolatry they arrived at, when God gave them up to worship the host of heaven. Yea, you took up the tabernacle of Moloch, you submitted even to that, and to the worship of the star of your god Remphan. Some think Saturn, for that planet is called Remphan in the Syriac. The Septuagint puts it for Chiun. They had images representing the star, like the silver shrines for Diana, here called the figures which they made to worship. A poor thing to make an idol of, and yet better than a golden calf! Now for this it is threatened, I will carry you away beyond Babylon. Let it not therefore seem strange to them to hear of the destruction of this place, for they had heard of it many a time from the prophets of the Old Testament.

II. He gives an answer particularly to the charge relating to the temple, that he spoke blasphemous words against that holy place, v. 44–50. He was accused for saying that Jesus would destroy this holy place: "And what if I did say so?" (saith Stephen) "the glory of the holy God may be preserved untouched, though this be laid in the dust"; for, 1. "It was not till our fathers came into the wilderness, that they had any fixed place of worship. He that was worshipped without a holy place in the first, and best, and purest ages of the Old Testament church, may and will be so when this holy place is destroyed." 2. The holy place was at first but a tabernacle, mean and movable, not designed to continue always. Why might not this holy place, be decently brought to its end, as well as that? 3. That tabernacle was a tabernacle of witness, or of testimony. This was the glory both of the tabernacle and temple, that they were erected for a testimony. 4. That tabernacle was framed according to the fashion which Moses saw in the mount. It had reference to good things to come. Therefore it was no diminution at all to its glory to say that this temple made with hands should be destroyed, in order to the building of another made without hands. 5. That tabernacle was pitched first in the wilderness; it was not a native of this land of yours, but was brought in by our fathers, into the possession of the Gentiles, whom God drove out before the face of our fathers. And why may not God set up his spiritual temple in those countries that were now the possession of the Gentiles? That tabernacle was brought in by those who came with Jesus, that is, Joshua. So the New-Testament Joshua should bring in the true tabernacle into the possession of the Gentiles. 6. That tabernacle continued even to the days of David, before there was any thought of building a temple, v. 45. David, having found favour before God, did indeed desire this further favour, to have leave to build God a constant settled tabernacle, or dwelling-place. Those who have found favour with God should show themselves forward to advance the interests of his kingdom among men. 7. God had his heart so little upon a temple that, when David desired to build one, he was forbidden to do it; God was in no haste for one. It was not he, but his son Solomon, some years after, that built him a house. 8. God often declared that temples made with hands were not his delight. Solomon acknowledged that God dwelleth not in temples made with hands. The whole world is his temple, in which he is everywhere present, and fills it with his glory; and what occasion has he for a temple? The one only true and living God needs no temple, for the heaven is his throne, in which he rests, and the earth is his footstool, over which he rules (v. 49, 50), and therefore, What house will you build me, what is the place of my rest? What need have I of a house, either to repose myself in or to show myself? Hath not my hand made all these things? And as the world is thus God's temple, wherein he is manifested, so it is God's temple in which he will be worshipped. As the earth is full of his glory, so the earth is, or shall be, full of his praise, and upon this account it is his temple. It was therefore no reflection at all upon this holy place, to say that Jesus should destroy this temple, and set up another, into which all nations should be admitted, ch. xv. 16, 17.

Stephen was going on in his discourse (as it should seem by the thread of it) to show that, as the temple, so the temple-service must come to an end. But he perceived they could not bear it. They will not so much as give him the hearing. He breaks off abruptly and by that spirit of wisdom, courage, and power, wherewith he was filled, he sharply rebuked his persecutors. If they will not admit the testimony of the gospel to them, it shall become a testimony against them.

I. They, like their fathers, were stubborn and wilful, and would not be brought upon by the various methods God took to reclaim and reform them. 1. They were stiff-necked (v. 51), and would not submit their necks to the sweet and easy yoke of God's government. They would not bow their heads, no, not to God himself, would not humble themselves before him. 2. They were uncircumcised in heart and ears. "In name and show you are circumcised Jews, but in heart and ears you are still uncircumcised heathens, and pay no more deference to the authority of your God than they do."

II. They were not only not influenced by the methods God took to reform them, but they were enraged and incensed against them: You do always resist the Holy Ghost. 1. They resisted the Holy Ghost speaking to them by the prophets. Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? Their fathers resisted the Holy Ghost in the prophets, and so did they in Christ's apostles and ministers. 2. They resisted the Holy Ghost striving with them by their own consciences. There is that in our sinful hearts that always resists the Holy Ghost, but in the hearts of God's elect, this resistance is overcome, and after a struggle the throne of Christ is set up in the soul. That grace therefore which effects this change might more fitly be called victorious grace than irresistible.

III. They, like their fathers, persecuted and slew those whom God sent unto them. 1. Their fathers had been the cruel and constant persecutors of the Old Testament prophets (v. 52): Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? More or less, one time or other, they had a blow at them all. That which aggravated the sin of persecuting the prophets was to show before the coming of the just One, to give notice of God's kind intentions to send the Messiah among them. Those that were the messengers of such glad tidings should have been courted and caressed, but, instead of this, they had the treatment of the worst of malefactors. 2. They had been the betrayers and murderers of the just One himself, as Peter had told them, ch. iii. 14, 15; v. 30. They had hired Judas to betray him, and had forced Pilate to condemn him; and therefore it is charged upon them that they were his betrayers and murderers. By slaying him, they showed they would have done if they had lived then; and thus brought upon themselves the guilt of the blood of all the prophets. To which of the prophets would those have shown any respect who had no regard to the Son of God himself?

IV. They, like their fathers, put contempt upon divine revelation. God had given, as to their fathers his law, so to them his gospel, in vain. 1. Their fathers received the law, and did not observe it, v. 53. God wrote to them the great things of his law, and yet they were counted by them as a strange or foreign thing. The law is said to be received by the disposition of angels, because angels were employed in the solemnity of giving the law, in the thunderings, lightnings, and the sound of the trumpet. But those that thus received the law yet kept it not, but by making the golden calf broke it immediately in a capital instance. 2. They received the gospel now, by the disposition not of angels, but of the Holy Ghost, and yet they did not embrace it. They were resolved not to comply with God either in his law or in his gospel.

We have here the death of the first martyr of the Christian church. Here is hell in its fire and darkness, and heaven in its light and brightness; and these serve as foils to set off each other. It is not here said that the votes of the council were taken upon his case, and that by the majority he was found guilty, and then condemned; but, it is likely, that it was not by the violence of the people, that he was put to death; for here is the usual ceremony of regular executions—he was cast out of the city, and the hands of the witnesses were first upon him.

I. See the strength of corruption in the persecutors of Stephen.

1. When they heard these things they were cut to the heart (v. 54), διεπρίοντο, the same word that is used in Heb. xi. 37, and translated they were sawn asunder. They were put to as much torture in their minds as ever the martyrs were put to in their bodies. They were not pricked to the heart with sorrow, as those were in ch. ii. 37, but cut to the heart with rage and fury, as they themselves were, ch. v. 33. Enmity to God is a heart-cutting thing; faith and love are heart-healing. They heard how he that looked like an angel before he began his discourse talked like an angel before he concluded it, and despairing to run down a cause so bravely pleaded, they yet resolved not to yield to it.

2. They gnashed upon him with their teeth. Great malice and rage against him. They grinned at him as dogs at those they are enraged at. Enmity at the saints turns men into brute beasts. Great vexation within themselves; they fretted to see in him such manifest tokens of a divine power. Gnashing with the teeth is often used to express the horror and torments of the damned. Those that have the malice of hell cannot but have with it some of the pains of hell.

3. They cried out with a loud voice (v. 57). When he said, I see heaven opened, they cried with a loud voice, that he might not be heard to speak. It is very common for a righteous cause to be attempted to be run down by noise and clamour; what is wanting in reason is made up in tumult.

4. They stopped their ears under pretence that they could not bear to hear his blasphemies. These stopped their ears when Stephen said, I now see the Son of man standing in glory. Their stopping their ears was a manifest specimen of their wilful obstinacy; they were resolved they would not hear. It was a fatal omen of that judicial hardness to which God would give them up. They stopped their ears, and then God, in a way of righteous judgment, stopped them.

5. They ran upon him with one accord, they all flew upon him, as beasts upon their prey. They ran upon him, one and all, hoping thereby to put him into confusion, envying him his composure and comfort in soul. They did all they could to ruffle him.

6. They cast him out of the city, and stoned him, to execute the law of Moses (Lev. xxiv. 16), He that blasphemeth the name of the Lord shall surely be put to death, all the congregation shall certainly stone him. They cast him out of the city; they treated him as the offscouring of all things. The witnesses against him were the leaders in the execution, according to the law. Thus they were to confirm their testimony. The witnesses took off their upper garments and they laid them down at a young man's feet, whose name was Saul. It is the first time we find mention of his name; we shall know it and love it better when we find it changed to Paul. This little instance of his agency in Stephen's death he afterwards reflected upon with regret (ch. xxii. 20): I kept the raiment of those that slew him.

II. See the strength of grace in Stephen. As his persecutors were full of Satan, so was he full of the Holy Ghost. When he was chosen to public service, he was described to be a man full of the Holy Ghost (ch. vi. 5), and now he is called out to martyrdom he has still the same character. Those that are full of the Holy Ghost are fit for anything, either to act for Christ or to suffer for him. When the followers of Christ are for his sake killed all the day long, and accounted as sheep for the slaughter, does this separate them from the love of Christ? Do they love him the less? No, by no means; and so it appears by this narrative.

1. Christ's gracious manifestation of himself to Stephen. When they were cut to the heart, and gnashed upon him with their teeth, then he had a view of the glory of Christ.

(1) He, being full of the Holy Ghost, looked up steadfastly into heaven, v. 55. Thus he looked above the power and fury of his persecutors, and did as it were despise them. They had their eyes fixed upon him, full of malice and cruelty; but he looked up to heaven, and never minded them. He looks up to heaven; thence only comes his help, and thitherward his way is still open. They cannot interrupt his intercourse with heaven. Thus he directed his sufferings to the glory of God, and did as it were appeal to heaven concerning them. Now that he was ready to be offered he looks up steadfastly to heaven, as one willing to offer himself. Thus he lifted up his soul with his eyes to God calling upon God for wisdom and grace to carry him through this trial. God has promised that he will be with his servants whom he calls out to suffer for him; but he will for this be sought unto. Thus he breathed after the heavenly country, to which he saw the fury of his persecutors would presently send him. It is good for dying saints to look up steadfastly to heaven: "And then, O death! where is thy sting?" Thus he made it to appear that he was full of the Holy Ghost. Those that are full of the Holy Ghost will look up steadfastly to heaven, for there their heart is. If we expect to hear from heaven, we must look up steadfastly to heaven.

(2) He saw the glory of God (v. 55); for he saw the heavens opened, v. 56. The heavens were opened, to give him a view of the happiness he was going to, that he might go cheerfully through death, so great a death. Would we by faith look up steadfastly, we might see the heavens opened by the mediation of Christ. We may also see the glory of God and the sight of this will carry us through all the terrors of sufferings and death.

(3) He saw Jesus standing on the right hand of God (v. 55), the Son of man, so it is, v. 56. When the Old Testament prophets saw the glory of God it was attended with angels. But here no mention is made of the angels. The glory of God shines brightest in the face of Jesus Christ. Here is a proof of the exaltation of Christ. He saw Jesus at the right hand of God. Whatever God's right hand gives to us, or receives from us, or does concerning us, it is by him; for he is his right hand. Stephen sees him standing there. He stands ready to receive him and crown him, and in the meantime to give him a prospect of the joy set before him. He sees Christ is for him, and then no matter who is against him. When our Lord Jesus was in his agony an angel appeared to him, but Stephen had Christ himself appearing to him. Nothing so comfortable nor so animating as to see Jesus at the right hand of God; by faith we may see him there.

(4) He told those about him what he saw (v. 56): Behold, I see the heavens opened. What he saw he declared, let them make what use they pleased of it. If some were exasperated by it, others perhaps might be wrought upon to consider this Jesus, and to believe in him.

2. Stephen's pious addresses to Jesus Christ. They stoned Stephen, calling upon God, v. 59. Though he called upon God yet they proceeded to stone him. Though they stoned him, yet he called upon God. It is the comfort of those who are unjustly hated and persecuted by men that they have a God to go to. Men stop their ears, as they did here (v. 57), but God does not. Stephen was now cast out of the city, but he was not cast out from his God. He was now taking his leave of the world, and therefore calls upon God. It is good to die praying. Two short prayers Stephen offered up to God in his dying moments.

(1) Here is a prayer for himself: Lord Jesus, receive my spirit. Thus Christ had himself resigned his spirit immediately into the hands of the Father. We are here taught to resign ours into the hands of Christ as Mediator. The soul is the man, and our great concern, living and dying, must be about our souls. "Lord," saith he, "let my spirit be safe; let it go well with my poor soul." Our Lord Jesus is God, to whom we are to seek, and in whom we comfort ourselves living and dying. Stephen here prays to Christ, and so must we. There is no venturing into another world but under his conduct, no living comforts in dying moments but what are fetched from him. Christ's receiving our spirits at death is the great thing we are to comfort ourselves with. And, if this has been our care while we live, it may be our comfort when we come to die.

(2) Here is a prayer for his persecutors, v. 60. The circumstances of this prayer are observable. He knelt down, which was an expression of his humility in prayer. He cried with a loud voice, which was an expression of his importunity. In his prayer for his enemies, because that is so much against the grain of corrupt nature, it was requisite he should give proofs of his being in earnest. The prayer itself: Lord, lay not this sin to their charge. Herein he followed the example of his dying Master, and set an example to all following sufferers in the cause of Christ. Prayer may preach. This did so to those who stoned Stephen. First, What they did was a sin, a great sin. Secondly, Notwithstanding their malice and fury against him, he was in charity with them. Let them take notice of this, and, when their thoughts were cool, surely they would not easily forgive themselves for putting him to death who could so easily forgive them. Thirdly, Though the sin was very heinous, yet they must not despair of the pardon of it upon their repentance. If they would lay it to their hearts, God would not lay it to their charge.

3. His expiring with this: When he had said this, he fell asleep. Death is but a sleep to good people. Stephen died as much in a hurry as ever any man did, and yet, when he died, he fell asleep. He fell asleep when he was praying for his persecutors; it is expressed as if he thought he could not die in peace till he had done this. If he thus sleep, he shall do well; he shall awake again in the morning of the resurrection.

CHAP. VIII

It was strange, but very true, that the disciples of Christ the more they were afflicted the more they multiplied. I. Here is the church suffering, ver. 1–3. II. Here is the church spreading. 1. The gospel brought to Samaria, preached there (ver. 4, 5), embraced there (ver. 6–8), even by Simon Magus (ver. 9–13); the gift of the Holy Ghost conferred upon some of the believing Samaritans (ver. 14–17); and the severe rebuke given by Peter to Simon Magus, ver. 18–25. 2. The gospel sent to Ethiopia, by the eunuch. He is returning home in his chariot from Jerusalem, ver. 26–28. Philip is sent to him, and in his chariot preaches Christ to him (ver. 29–35), baptizes him (ver. 36–38), and then leaves him, ver. 39, 40.

I. Something more concerning Stephen and his death; how people stood affected to it. 1. Stephen's death rejoiced in by one in particular, and that was Saul, who was afterwards called Paul; he was consenting to his death. We have reason to think that Paul ordered Luke to insert this, for shame to himself, and glory to free grace. 2. Stephen's death bewailed by others (v. 2)—devout men. Some of the church gathered up the poor crushed and broken remains, to which they gave a decent interment. They buried him solemnly, and made great lamentation over him. It is a bad symptom if, when such men are taken away, it is not laid to heart. Those devout men paid these their last respects to Stephen, to show that they were not ashamed of the cause for which he suffered, nor afraid of the wrath of those that were enemies to it. To show the great value and esteem they had for this faithful servant of Jesus Christ. They study to do honour to him upon whom God put honour.

II. An account of this persecution of the church, which begins upon the martyrdom of Stephen. One would have thought Stephen's dying prayers and dying comforts should have overcome them, and melted them into a better opinion, but it seems they did not. As if they hoped to be too hard for God himself, they resolve to follow their blow.

1. Against whom this persecution was raised: It was against the church in Jerusalem. Christ had particularly foretold that Jerusalem would soon be made too hot for his followers, for that city had been famous for killing the prophets and stoning those that were sent to it.

2. Who was an active man in it: none so zealous, so busy, as Saul, a young Pharisee, v. 3. As for Saul he made havoc of the church; he did all he could to lay it waste and ruin it. He aimed at no less than the cutting off of the gospel Israel. Saul was bred a scholar, a gentleman, and yet did not think it below him to be employed in the vilest work of that kind. He entered into every house. No man could be secure in his own house, though it was his castle. He haled both men and women, without any regard to the tenderness of the weaker sex. He committed them to prison, in order to their being tried and put to death.

3. What was the effect of this persecution: They were all scattered abroad (v. 1). They, remembering our Master's rule (when they persecute you in one city, flee to another), dispersed themselves throughout the regions of Judæa and of Samaria. Their work was pretty well done in Jerusalem, and now it was time to think of the necessities of other places. Though persecution may not drive us off from our work, yet it may send us to work elsewhere. The preachers were all scattered except the apostles. They tarried at Jerusalem, that they might be ready to go where their assistance was most needed by the other preachers that were sent to break the ice.

Christ had said, I am come to send fire on the earth; and they thought, by scattering those who were kindled with that fire, to have put it out, but instead of this they did but help to spread it.

I. Here is a general account of what was done by them all (v. 4): They went everywhere, preaching the word. They went everywhere, into the way of the Gentiles, and the cities of the Samaritans, which before they were forbidden to go into. They scattered into all parts, not to take their ease, but to find out work. They were now in a country where they were no strangers, for Christ and his disciples had conversed much in the regions of Judæa; so that they had a foundation laid there for them to build upon.

II. A particular account of what was done by Philip, not Philip the apostle, but Philip the deacon. Stephen was advanced to the degree of a martyr, Philip to the degree of an evangelist.

1. What wonderful success Philip had in his preaching.

(1) The place he chose was the city of Samaria, the metropolis of that country. Some think it was the same with Sychem or Sychar, that city of Samaria where Christ was, John iv. 5. The Jews would have no dealings with the Samaritans; but Christ sent his gospel to slay all enmities.

(2) The doctrine he preached was Christ: he preached Christ to them. The Samaritans had an expectation of the Messiah's coming, as appears by John iv. 25. Now Philip tells them that he is come, and that the Samaritans are welcome to him.

(3) The proofs he produced were miracles, v. 6. The miracles were undeniable; they heard and saw the miracles which he did. He was sent to break the power of Satan; and, in token of this, unclean spirits, being charged in the name of the Lord Jesus to remove, came out of many that were possessed with them, v. 7. Wherever the gospel gains the admission and submission it ought to have, evil spirits are dislodged. This was signified by the casting of these unclean spirits out of the bodies of people, who came out crying with a loud voice. They came out with great reluctancy, but were forced to acknowledge themselves overcome by a superior power. He was sent to heal, to cure a distempered world; in token of this, many that were taken with palsies, and that were lame, were healed. The grace of God in the gospel is designed for the healing of those that are spiritually lame and paralytic, and cannot help themselves.

(4) The acceptance which Philip's doctrine met with in Samaria (v. 6): The people with one accord gave heed to those things which Philip spoke, induced thereto by the miracles which served at first to gain attention, and so by degrees to gain assent. The common people gave heed to Philip, a multitude of them, not here and there one, but with one accord; they were all of a mind.

(5) The satisfaction they had in attending on Philip's preaching, and the success it had with many of them (v. 8): There was great joy in that city; for (v. 12) they believed Philip, and were baptized, both men and women. [1] Philip preached the things concerning the kingdom of God, and he preached the name of Jesus Christ, as king of that kingdom. [2] The people not only gave heed to what he said, but at length believed it, were fully convinced that it was of God and not of men. [3] When they believed they were baptized. Men only were capable of being admitted into the Jewish church, but, to show that in Jesus Christ there is neither male nor female, the initiating ordinance is such as women are capable of, for they are numbered with God's spiritual Israel. [4] This occasioned great joy. The bringing of the gospel to any place is just matter of joy, of great joy, to that place. The gospel of Christ does not make men melancholy, but fills them with joy; for it is glad tidings of great joy to all people, Luke ii. 10.

2. What there was at this city of Samaria that made the success of the gospel there more than ordinarily wonderful.

(1) Simon Magus had been busy there, and had gained a great interest among the people. To unlearn that which is bad proves many times a harder task than to learn that which is good. These Samaritans had of late been drawn to follow Simon, a conjurer (for so Magus signifies), who had strangely bewitched them.

[1] How strong the delusion of Satan. He had been for a long time, in this city, using sorceries. Simon assumed to himself that which was considerable: He gave out that he himself was some great one. He had no design to reform their lives, only to make them believe that he was some divine person. Pride, ambition, and an affectation of grandeur, have always been the cause of abundance of mischief both to the world and to the church. The people ascribed to him what he pleased. They all gave heed to him, from the least to the greatest. To him they had regard (v. 10, 11). They said of him, This man is the great power of God. See how ignorant inconsiderate people mistake that which is done by the power of Satan, as if it were done by the power of God. They were brought to it by his sorceries: He bewitched the people of Samaria (v. 9), bewitched them with sorceries (v. 11). By his magic arts he bewitched the minds of the people. Satan, by God's permission, filled their hearts to follow Simon. When they knew no better, they were influenced by his sorceries; but, when they were acquainted with Philip's real miracles, they saw plainly that the one was real and the other a sham. When they saw the difference between Simon and Philip, they quitted Simon.

[2] How strong the power of Divine grace is. By that grace working with the word those that had been led captive by Satan were brought into obedience to Christ. Let us not despair of the worst, when even those whom Simon Magus had bewitched were brought to believe.

(2) Here is another thing yet more wonderful (v. 13): Simon himself believed also. He was convinced that Philip preached a true doctrine, because he saw it confirmed by real miracles, of which he was the better able to judge because he was conscious to himself of the trick of his own pretended ones. The present conviction went so far that he was baptized. We have no reason to think that Philip did amiss in baptizing him. Prodigals, when they return, must be joyfully welcomed home, though we cannot be sure but that they will play the prodigal again. It is God's prerogative to know the heart. The church and its ministers must go by a judgment of charity. We must hope the best as long as we can. The present conviction lasted so long that he continued with Philip. He that had given out himself to be some great one is content to sit at the feet of a preacher of the gospel. Even bad men, very bad, may sometimes be in a good frame, very good. The present conviction was wrought and kept up by the miracles. Many wonder at the proofs of divine truths who never experience the power of them.

The twelve kept together at Jerusalem (v. 1), and thither these good tidings were brought them that Samaria had received the word of God (v. 14). The word of God was not only preached to them, but received by them. When they heard it, they sent unto them Peter and John. Two apostles were sent, the two most eminent, to Samaria, to encourage Philip and strengthen his hands. To carry on the good work that was begun.

I. How they advanced and improved those of them that were sincere. It is said (v. 16), The Holy Ghost was as yet fallen upon none of them, in those extraordinary powers which were conveyed by the descent of the Spirit, only they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and in this they had joy and satisfaction (v. 8). Those that are indeed given up to Christ, and have experienced the sanctifying influences of the Spirit of grace, have great reason to be thankful, and no reason to complain, though they have not those gifts that are for ornament, and would make them bright. But it is intended that they should go on to the perfection of the present dispensation. The apostles prayed for them, v. 15. The Spirit is given, not to ourselves only (Luke xi. 13), but to others also, in answer to prayer. We may take encouragement from this example in praying to God to give the renewing graces of the Holy Ghost to those whose spiritual welfare we are concerned for—for our children, for our friends, for our ministers. They laid their hands on them. Upon the use of this sign they received the Holy Ghost. The laying on of hands was anciently used in blessing. Thus the apostles blessed these new converts.

II. How they discovered and discarded Simon Magus.

1. The wicked proposal that Simon made, by which his hypocrisy was discovered (v. 18, 19): When he saw that through laying on of the apostles' hands the Holy Ghost was given, it gave him a notion of Christianity as no other than an exalted piece of sorcery. He was ambitious to have the honour of an apostle, but not at all solicitous to have the spirit of a Christian. He was more desirous to gain honour to himself than to do good to others. He put a great affront upon the apostles, as if they were mercenary men, would do anything for money. He put a great affront upon Christianity, as if the miracles were done by magic arts. He showed that he aimed at the rewards of divination. He showed that he had a very high conceit of himself. No less a place will serve him than to be entrusted with a power which Philip himself had not, but the apostles only.

2. The just rejection of his proposal, v. 20–23.

(1) Peter shows him his crime (v. 20): Thou hast thought that the gift of God may be purchased with money. He had overvalued the wealth of this world, as if it would purchase the pardon of sin, the gift of the Holy Ghost, and eternal life. He had undervalued the gift of the Holy Ghost. He thought the power of an apostle might as well be had for a good fee as the advice of a physician or a lawyer.

(2) He shows him his character, which is inferred from his crime. Peter tells him plainly, [1] That his heart was not right in the sight of God, v. 21. We are as our hearts are; if they be not right, we are wrong; and they are open in the sight of God, who knows them, judges them, and judges of us by them. Our great concern is to approve ourselves to him in our integrity, for otherwise we cheat ourselves into our own ruin. He does not aim at the glory of God nor the honour of Christ in it, but to make a hand of it for himself. [2] That he is in the gall of bitterness, and in the bond of iniquity: I perceive that thou art so, v. 23. This is plain dealing, and plain dealing is best when we are dealing about souls and eternity. I perceive it, saith Peter. The disguises of hypocrites many times are soon seen through; the nature of the wolf shows itself notwithstanding the cover of the sheep's clothing. Now the character here given of Simon is really the character of all wicked people. They are in the gall of bitterness. They are in the bond of iniquity—bound over to the judgment of God by the guilt of sin, and bound under the dominion of Satan by the power of sin.

(3) He reads him his doom in two things:

[1] He shall sink with his worldly wealth: Thy money perish with thee. Peter rejects his offer with the utmost disdain and indignation. "Away with thee and thy money too; we will have nothing to do with either." When we are tempted with money to do an evil thing, we should see what a perishing thing money is. He warns him of his danger of utter destruction if he continued in this mind: "Thy money will perish and thou wilt lose it. But this is not the worst of it: thou wilt perish with it, and it with thee."

[2] He shall come short of the spiritual blessings which he undervalued (v. 21): "Thou hast neither part nor lot in this matter; thou hast nothing to do with the gifts of the Holy Ghost, for thy heart is not right in the sight of God, if thou thinkest that Christianity is a trade to live by in this world."

(4) He gives him good counsel, notwithstanding, v. 22. Though he was angry with him, yet he did not abandon him.

[1] What it is that he advises him to. He must repent—must see his error and retract it. His repentance must be particular: "Repent of this, own thyself guilty in this." He must not extenuate it, by calling it a mistake, or misguided zeal, but must aggravate it by calling it wickedness. Those that have said and done amiss must, as far as they can, unsay it and undo it again by repentance. He must pray that God would give him repentance, and pardon upon repentance. Penitents must pray, which implies a desire towards God, and a confidence in Christ. Simon Magus shall not be courted into the apostles' communion upon any other terms than those upon which other sinners are admitted—repentance and prayer.

[2] What encouragement he gives him to do this: If perhaps the thought of thy heart may be forgiven thee. There may be a great deal of wickedness in the thought of the heart, which must be repented of, or we are undone. The thought of the heart, though ever so wicked, shall be forgiven, upon our repentance. When Peter here puts a perhaps upon it, the doubt is of the sincerity of his repentance, not of his pardon if his repentance be sincere.

[3] Simon's request to them to pray for him, v. 24. Pray you to the Lord for me, that none of the things which you have spoken come upon me. First, Something well that he was affected with the reproof given him. This being so, he begged the prayers of the apostles for him. Secondly, Something wanting. He begged of them to pray for him, but did not pray for himself. His concern is more that the judgments he had made himself liable to might be prevented than that his heart, by divine grace, be made right in the sight of God.

Lastly, Here is the return of the apostles to Jerusalem, when they had finished the business they came about. There, in the city of Samaria, they were preachers: They testified the word of the Lord, confirmed what the other ministers preached. In their road home they were itinerant preachers; as they passed through many villages of the Samaritans they preached the gospel. God has a regard to the inhabitants of his villages in Israel, and so should we.

We have here the story of the conversion of an Ethiopian eunuch to the faith of Christ.

I. Philip the evangelist is directed into the road where he would meet with this Ethiopian, v. 26. 1. Direction given him by an angel what course to steer: Arise, and go towards the south. Doubtless there is a special providence of God conversant about the removes and settlements of ministers. He will direct those who sincerely desire to follow him into that way in which he will own them. Philip must go southward, to the way that leads from Jerusalem to Gaza, through the desert of Judah. He would never have thought of going thither, into a desert; small probability of finding work there! Yet thither he is sent. Sometimes God opens a door of opportunity to his ministers in places very unlikely. 2. His obedience to this direction (v. 27): He arose and went, without objecting.

II. An account is given of this eunuch (v. 27). He was a foreigner, a man of Ethiopia. The Ethiopians were looked upon as the meanest of the nations, blackamoors, as if nature had stigmatized them; yet the gospel is sent to them, and divine grace looks upon them. He was a person of quality, a great man in his own country, a eunuch—lord chamberlain or steward of the household. He was of great authority, and bore a mighty sway under Candace queen of the Ethiopians. He had charge of all her treasure; so great a trust did she repose in him. Not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but some are. He was a proselyte for he came to Jerusalem to worship. Some think that there were remains of the knowledge of the true God in this country, ever since the queen of Sheba's time.

III. Philip and the eunuch are brought together, and now Philip shall know the meaning of his being sent into a desert.

1. Philip is ordered to fall into company with this traveller. He had been at Jerusalem, where the apostles were preaching the Christian faith. The grace of God pursues him, overtakes him in the desert, and there overcomes him. Philip has this order by the Spirit whispering it in his ear (v. 29): "Go near, and join thyself to this chariot." We should study to do good to those we light in company with upon the road. We should not be so shy of all strangers as some effect to be. Of those of whom we know nothing else we know this, that they have souls.

2. He finds him reading in his Bible, as he sat in his chariot (v. 28): He ran to him, and heard him read, v. 30. He not only relieved the tediousness of the journey, but redeemed time by reading the scriptures, the book of Esaias. It is the duty of every one of us to converse much with the holy scriptures. Persons of quality should abound more than others in the exercises of piety, because their example will influence many. It is wisdom for men of business to redeem time for holy duties; to fill up every minute with something that will turn to a good account. Those that are diligent in searching the scriptures are in a fair way to improve in knowledge.

3. He puts a fair question to him: Understandest thou what thou readest? What we read and hear of the word of God we should often ask ourselves whether we understand it or no. We cannot profit by the scriptures unless we do in some measure understand them.

4. The eunuch in a sense of his need of assistance, desires Philip's company (v. 31): "How can I understand, says he, except someone guide me?" He speaks as one that had very low thoughts of his own capacity. He takes the question kindly, How can I? Those that would learn must see their need to be taught. He speaks as one very desirous to be taught, to have someone to guide him. Though there are many things in the scriptures which are dark and hard to be understood, yet we must not therefore throw them by, but study them for the sake of those things that are easy. Knowledge and grace grow gradually. He invited Philip to come up and sit with him. In order to our right understanding of the scripture, it is requisite we should have someone to guide us; some good books, and some good men, but, above all, the Spirit of grace, to lead us into all truth.

IV. The portion of scripture which the eunuch recited, with some hints of Philip's discourse upon it.

1. The chapter he was reading was the fifty-third of Isaiah, two verses of which are here quoted (v. 32, 33). They are set down according to the Septuagint version, which in some things differs from the original Hebrew. The greatest variation from the Hebrew is that what in the original is, He was taken from prison and from judgment, is here read, In his humiliation his judgment was taken away. He appeared so mean and despicable in their eyes that they denied him common justice. They declared him innocent, and yet condemned him to die. He is down, and down with him. Thus in his humiliation his judgment was taken away. So that these verses foretold concerning the Messiah, (1) That he should die, should be led to the slaughter, as sheep that were offered in sacrifice. (2) That he should die wrongfully, should be hurried out of his life, and his judgment shall be taken away. (3) That he should die patiently. Like a lamb dumb before the shearer, nay, and before the butcher too, so he opened not his mouth. Never was there such an example of patience as our Lord Jesus. When he was accused, when he was abused, he was silent. (4) That yet he should live for ever, to ages which cannot be numbered; for so I understand those words, Who shall declare his generation? His life is taken only from the earth; in heaven he shall live to endless and innumerable ages.

2. The eunuch's question upon this is, Of whom speaketh the prophet this? v. 34. It is a material question he asks, and a very sensible one: "Does the prophet speak this of himself, in expectation of being used, being misused, as the other prophets were, or does he speak it of some other man?" He proposed this question, to draw on discourse with Philip. The way to receive good instructions is to ask good questions.

3. Philip takes this fair occasion given him to open to him the great mystery of the gospel concerning Jesus Christ, and him crucified. He began at this scripture, and preached unto him Jesus, v. 35. This is all the account given us of Philip's sermon. And here we have an instance of speaking of the things of God, and speaking of them to good purpose, not only as we sit in the house, but as we walk by the way.

V. The eunuch is baptized in the name of Christ, v. 36–38.

1. The modest proposal which the eunuch made of himself for baptism (v. 36): As they went on their way they came unto a certain water, the sight of which made the eunuch think of being baptized. Thus God, by hints of providence which seem casual, sometimes puts his people in mind of their duty, of which otherwise perhaps they would not have thought. The eunuch knew not how little a while Philip might be with him, and therefore, if Philip think fit, he will take the present convenience which offers itself of being baptized: "See, here is water; what doth hinder me to be baptized?" He does not demand baptism, does not say, "Here is water and here I am resolved I will be baptized." But he does desire it, and, unless Philip can show cause why not, he desires it now. In the solemn dedicating and devoting of ourselves to God, it is good to make haste, and not to delay; for the present time is the best time. The eunuch feared lest the good affections now working in him should cool and abate, and therefore was willing immediately to bind his soul unto the Lord.

2. The fair declaration which Philip made him (v. 37): "If thou believest with all thy heart, thou mayest." He must believe with all his heart, for with the heart man believeth, not with the head only, by an assent to gospel truth in the understanding; but with the heart, by a consent of the will to gospel terms. "If thou do indeed believe with all thy heart, thou art by that united to Christ, and thou mayest by baptism be joined to the church."

3. The confession of faith which the eunuch made. It is very short, but it is comprehensive and much to the purpose: I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God. He was before a worshipper of the true God, so that all he had to do now was to receive Christ Jesus the Lord. He believes that Jesus is the Christ, the true Messiah promised. That Christ is Jesus—a Saviour, the only Saviour of his people from their sins. That this Jesus Christ is the Son of God, that he has a divine nature, as the Son is of the same nature with the Father.

4. The baptizing of him hereupon. The eunuch commanded the chariot to stand still. It was the best waiting place he ever met with in any of his journeys. They went down both into the water. Going barefoot according to the custom, they went perhaps up to the ankles or mid-leg into the water, and Philip sprinkled water upon him. Though Philip had very lately been deceived in Simon Magus, yet he did not therefore scruple to baptize the eunuch upon his profession of faith immediately. If some hypocrites crowd into the church, who afterwards prove a grief and scandal to us, yet we must not therefore make the door of admission any straiter than Christ has made it; they shall answer for their apostasy, and not we.

VI. Philip and the eunuch are separated presently; and this is as surprising as the other parts of the story. As soon as they had come up out of the water the Spirit of the Lord caught away Philip (v. 39). The working of this miracle upon Philip was a confirmation of his doctrine, as much as the working of a miracle by him would have been. He was caught away, and the eunuch saw him no more, but, having lost his minister, returned to the use of his Bible again.

1. How the eunuch was disposed: He went on his way rejoicing. Business called him home, and he must hasten to it; for it was no way inconsistent with his Christianity, which is a religion which men may and ought to carry about with them into the affairs of this life. But he went on rejoicing. He was never better pleased in all his life. He rejoiced, (1) That he himself was joined to Christ. (2) That he had these good things to bring to his countrymen, and a prospect of bringing them also into fellowship with Christ.

2. How Philip was disposed of (v. 40): He was found at Azotus or Ashdod. But Philip, wherever he was, would not be idle. Passing through, he preached in all the cities, till he came to Cæsarea, and there he settled. At Cæsarea we find him in a house of his own, ch. xxi. 8. He that had been faithful in working for Christ as an itinerant at length gains a settlement.

CHAP. IX

I. The famous story of St. Paul's conversion. 1. How he was first awakened and wrought upon by an appearance of Christ himself to him, and what a condition he was in while he lay under the power of those convictions and terrors, ver. 1–9. 2. How he was baptized by Ananias, ver. 10–19. 3. How he immediately preached the faith of Christ, and proved what he preached, ver. 20–22. 4. How he was persecuted, ver. 23–25. 5. How he was admitted among the brethren at Jerusalem and was persecuted there, ver. 26–30. 6. The rest and quietness which the churches enjoyed for some time after this, ver. 31. II. The cure wrought by Peter on Æneas, ver. 32–35. III. The raising of Tabitha at the prayer of Peter, ver. 36–43.

We found mention made of Saul twice or thrice in the story of Stephen. His name in Hebrew was Saul—desired; his Roman name was Paul—little. He was born in Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, a free city of the Romans, and himself a freeman of that city. His father and mother were both native Jews, therefore he calls himself a Hebrew of the Hebrews; he was of the tribe of Benjamin. His education was in the schools of Tarsus first, which was a little Athens for learning. Thence he was sent to Jerusalem, to study divinity and the Jewish law. His tutor was Gamaliel. He had extraordinary natural parts. He had likewise a handicraft trade (being bred to tent-making), which was common with those among the Jews who were bred scholars.

I. How bad he was, how very bad, before his conversion; just before he was an inveterate enemy to Christianity. In other respects he was well enough, as touching the righteousness which is of the law, blameless, a man of no ill morals, but a persecutor of Christians. And so ill informed was his conscience that he thought that he did God service in it.

1. His general enmity and rage against the Christian religion (v. 1): He yet breathed out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord. The persons persecuted were the disciples of the Lord; under that character he hated and persecuted them. The matter of the persecution was threatenings and slaughter. There is persecution in threatenings, they terrify and break the spirit. His breathing out threatenings and slaughter intimates that it was natural to him. His very breath, like that of some venomous creatures, was pestilential. He breathed death to the Christians, wherever he came.

2. His particular design upon the Christians at Damascus. Saul cannot be easy if he knows a Christian is quiet; and therefore, hearing that the Christians in Damascus were so, he resolves to give them disturbance. He applies to the high priest for a commission (v. 1) to go to Damascus, v. 2. The high priest needed not to be stirred up to persecute the Christians, but it seems the young persecutor drove more furiously than the old one. The proselytes which the scribes and Pharisees make often prove seven times more the children of hell than themselves. Now the commission was to empower him to enquire among the synagogues at Damascus, whether there were any that inclined to favour this heresy, that believed in Christ; and if he found any such, whether men or women, to bring them up prisoners to Jerusalem. The Christians are here said to be those of this way. Perhaps the Christians sometimes called themselves so, from Christ the Way. The high priest and sanhedrim had a deference paid to their authority in matters of religion, by all their synagogues. Even the weaker sex, who might deserve excuse, or at least compassion, shall find neither with Saul. He was ordered to bring them all bound to Jerusalem as criminals. Thus was Saul employed when the grace of God wrought that great change in him. Let not us then despair of renewing grace for the conversion of the greatest sinners, nor let such despair of the pardoning mercy of God for the greatest sin; for Paul himself obtained mercy.

II. How suddenly and strangely a blessed change was wrought in him.

1. The place and time of it: As he journeyed, he came near to Damascus; and there Christ met with him.

(1) He was in the way, travelling upon his journey. The work of conversion is not tied to the church. Some are reclaimed in travelling upon the road alone. There the Spirit may set in with us, for that wind blows where it listeth.

(2) He was near Damascus, almost at his journey's end. He who was to be the apostle of the Gentiles was converted to the faith of Christ in a Gentile country.

(3) He was in a wicked way, pursuing his design against the Christians at Damascus. Sometimes the grace of God works upon sinners when they are at the worst, which is much for the glory both of God's pity and of his power.

(4) The cruel edict and decree drew near to be put in execution; and now it was happily prevented. [1] A great kindness to the poor saints at Damascus, who had notice of his coming, as appears by what Ananias said (v. 13, 14). Christ has many ways of delivering the godly out of temptation, and sometimes does it by a change wrought in their persecutors. [2] It was also a very great mercy to Saul himself. It is to be valued as a signal token of the divine favour if God prevent us from prosecuting and executing a sinful purpose.

2. The appearance of Christ to him in his glory. Here it is only said that there shone round about him a light from heaven; but it appears from what follows (v. 17) that the Lord Jesus was in this light. This light shone upon him suddenly. Christ's manifestations of himself to poor souls are many times sudden and very surprising, and he anticipates them with the blessings of his goodness. It was a light from heaven. It was a light above the brightness of the sun (ch. xxvi. 13), for it was visible at midday. It shone round about him, not in his face only, but on every side of him. The devil comes to the soul in darkness; by this he gets and keeps possession of it. But Christ comes to the soul in light, for he is himself the light of the world. The first thing in this new creation, as in that of the world, is light.

3. The arresting of Saul: He fell to the earth, v. 4. It appears (ch. xxvi. 14) that all that were with him fell to the earth as well as he, but the design was upon him. The effect of Christ's appearing to him, and of the light which shone round about him. Christ's manifestations of himself to poor souls are humbling; they lay them very low. A step towards this intended advancement. Those whom Christ designs for the greatest honours are commonly first laid low. Those whom God will employ are first struck with a sense of their unworthiness to be employed.

4. The arraigning of Saul. He heard a voice saying to him (and it was distinguishing, to him only, for though those that were with him heard a sound (v. 7) yet they knew not the words, ch. xxii. 9), Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?

(1) Saul not only saw a light from heaven, but heard a voice from heaven. God's manifestations of himself were never dumb shows, for he magnifies his word above all his name, and what was seen was always designed to make way for what was said. Saul heard a voice. Faith comes by hearing. The voice he heard was the voice of Christ. The word we hear is likely to profit us when we hear it as the voice of Christ; no voice but his can reach the heart.

(2) What he heard was very awakening.

[1] He was called by his name, and that doubled: Saul, Saul. His calling him by name brought the conviction home to his conscience, and put it past dispute to whom the voice spoke this. What God speaks in general is then likely to do us good when we insert our own names into the precepts and promises, as if God spoke to us by name. The doubling of it, Saul, Saul, intimates the tender concern that the blessed Jesus had for him, and for his recovery. He speaks as one in earnest. He speaks to him as to one in imminent danger, at the pit's brink, and just ready to drop in.

[2] The charge exhibited against him is, Why persecutest thou me? Before Saul was made a saint, he was made to see himself a sinner. Now he was made to see that evil in himself which he never saw before. A humbling conviction of sin is the first step towards a saving conversion from sin. He is convinced of one particular sin, which he had justified himself in. The sin he is convinced of is persecution: Why persecutest thou me? It is a very affectionate expostulation. 1. The person sinning: "It is thou; thou that hast good parts and accomplishments, hast the knowledge of the scriptures, which, if duly considered, would show thee the folly of it. It is worse in thee than in another." 2. The person sinned against: "It is I, who was not long since crucified for thee; must I afresh be crucified by thee?" 3. The kind and continuance of the sin. It was persecution, and he was at this time engaged in it. Those that are designing mischief are, in God's account, doing mischief. 4. The question put to him upon it: "Why dost thou do it?" (1) It is complaining language. Christ never complained so much of those who persecuted him in his own person as he did here of those who persecuted him in his followers. The sins of sinners are a very grievous burden to the Lord Jesus. (2) It is convincing language: "Why dost thou thus?" It is good for us often to ask ourselves why we do so and so, that we may discern what an unreasonable thing sin is. Why persecutest thou me? He thought he was persecuting only a company of poor, weak, silly people, little imagining that it was one in heaven that he was all this while insulting. Those who persecute the saints persecute Christ himself, and he takes what is done against them as done against himself.

5. Saul's question upon his indictment, and the reply to it, v. 5.

(1) He makes enquiry concerning Christ: Who art thou, Lord? He gives no direct answer to the charge preferred against him, being convicted by his own conscience. If God contend with us for our sins, we are not able to answer for one of a thousand. Convictions of sin, when they are set home with power upon the conscience, will silence all excuses and self-justifications. But he desires to know who is his judge. He who had been a blasphemer of Christ's name now speaks to him as his Lord. The question is proper: Who art thou? This implies his present unacquaintedness with Christ. He desired to be acquainted with him and therefore, Lord, who art thou? There is some hope of people when they begin to enquire after Jesus Christ.

(2) He has an answer immediately. Christ's gracious revelation of himself to him. I am Jesus whom thou persecutest. The name of Jesus was not unknown to him, and gladly would he bury it in oblivion. Little did he think to hear it from heaven. He said, I am Jesus, a Saviour; I am Jesus of Nazareth, so it is, ch. xxii. 8. Saul used to call him so when he blasphemed him. "I am that Jesus whom thou persecutest." There is nothing more effectual to awaken and humble the soul than to see sin to be against Christ. His gentle reproof of him: It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks, or goads. Those kick at the goad that stifle and smother the convictions of conscience. Those that revolt more and more when they are stricken by the word or rod of God, kick against the pricks.

6. His surrender of himself to the Lord Jesus at length, v. 6.

(1) The frame and temper he was in when Christ had been dealing with him. He trembled. Strong convictions, set home by the blessed Spirit, will make an awakened soul to tremble. He was astonished, as one brought into a new world, that knew not where he was.

(2) His address to Jesus Christ: Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? This may be taken, [1] As a serious request for Christ's teachings. "Thou hast discovered sin to me, discover to me the way to pardon and peace." A serious desire to be instructed by Christ in the way of salvation is an evidence of a good work begun in the soul. Or, [2] As a sincere resignation of himself to the direction and government of the Lord Jesus. This was the first word that grace spoke in Paul, and with this began a spiritual life. What wilt thou have me to do? The great change in conversion is wrought upon the will, and consists in the resignation of that to the will of Christ.

(3) The general direction Christ gave him: Arise, go into the city of Damascus, and it shall be told thee what thou must do. It is encouragement enough to have further instruction promised him, but, [1] He must not have it yet. Let him consider awhile what he had done in persecuting Christ, and be deeply humbled for that, and then he shall be told what he has further to do. [2] He must not have it in this way, by a voice from heaven, for it is plain that he cannot bear it. He shall be told therefore what he must do by a man like himself. Christ manifests himself to his people by degrees.

7. How far his fellow travellers were affected with this. They stood speechless, as men in confusion, and that was all, v. 7. We do not find that any of them were converted, though they saw the light, and were struck dumb by it. No external means will of themselves work a change in the soul, without the Spirit and grace of God. None of them said, Who art thou, Lord? or, What wilt thou have me to do? as Paul did. They heard a voice, but saw no man; they heard Paul speak, but saw not him to whom he spoke, nor heard distinctly what was said to him. Thus those who came hither to be the instruments of Paul's rage against the church serve for witnesses of the power of God over him.

8. What condition Saul was in after this, v. 8, 9. He arose from the earth, when Christ commanded him. When his eyes were opened he saw no man. It was not so much this glaring light, but it was a sight of Christ, that had this effect upon him. Thus a believing sight of the glory of God in the face of Christ dazzles the eyes to all things here below. They led him by the hand into Damascus. Thus he who thought to have led the disciples of Christ prisoners and captives to Jerusalem was himself led a prisoner and a captive to Christ into Damascus. He lay without sight, neither did eat nor drink for three days, v. 9. He was in the dark concerning his own spiritual state, and was so wounded in spirit for sin that he could relish neither meat nor drink.

A good work was begun in Saul, when he was brought to Christ's feet, in that word, Lord, what wilt thou have me to do? And never did Christ leave any that were brought to that. He that hath convinced will comfort.

I. Ananias is here ordered to go and look after him.

1. The person employed is Ananias, a certain disciple at Damascus, not lately driven thither from Jerusalem, but a native of Damascus; for it is said (ch. xxii. 12) that he had a good report of all the Jews who dwelt there, as a devout man according to the law.

2. The direction given him is to go and enquire at such a house for one Saul of Tarsus. Christ, in a vision, called to Ananias by name, v. 10. Without terror or confusion, he readily answers, "Behold I am here, Lord." Go then, saith Christ, into the street which is called Straight, and enquire in the house of Judas for one called Saul of Tarsus. Christ very well knows where to find out those that are his, in their distresses. They have a friend in heaven, that knows in what street, in what house, nay, and which is more, in what frame they are.

3. Two reasons are given him why he must go.

(1) Because he prays, and his coming to him must answer his prayer. This is a reason, [1] Why Ananias needed not to be afraid of him, as we find he was, v. 13, 14. There is no question, saith Christ, but he is a true convert, for behold he prayeth. Behold denotes the certainty of it. It denotes also the strangeness of it: "Behold, and wonder." But was it such a strange thing for Saul to pray? Was he not a Pharisee? Yes; but now he began to pray after another manner than he had done; then he said his prayers, now he prayed them. You may as soon find a living man without breath as a living Christian without prayer; if breathless, lifeless; and so, if prayerless, graceless. [2] Why Ananias must go to him with all speed. It is no time to linger, for behold he prayeth. He was under conviction of sin. Conviction should drive us to prayer. He was under a bodily affliction, blind and sick. Christ had promised him that it should be further told him what he should do (v. 6), and he prays that one may be sent to him to instruct him. What God has promised we must pray for.

(2) Because he hath seen in a vision such a man coming to him; and Ananias's coming to him must answer his dream, for it was of God (v. 12): He hath seen in a vision a man named Ananias coming in and putting his hand on him that he might receive his sight. Now this vision which Paul had may be considered: As an immediate answer to his prayer, and the keeping up of that communion with God which he had entered into by prayer. As designed to raise his expectations, and to make Ananias's coming more welcome to him. See what a great thing it is to bring a spiritual physician and his patient together: here were two visions in order to it.

II. Ananias objects against going to him.

1. Ananias pleads that this Saul was a notorious persecutor of the disciples of Christ, v. 13, 14: "Lord, I have heard by many of this man, how much evil he hath done to thy saints in Jerusalem. There was no man they were more afraid of. His errand to Damascus at this time is to persecute us Christians: Here he has authority from the chief priests to bind all that call on thy name." Now, why does Ananias object to this? Not, "Therefore I do not owe him so much service." No, Christ has taught us another lesson, to render good for evil, and pray for our persecutors. Will it be safe for Ananias to go to him? If he thus bring himself into trouble, he will be blamed for his indiscretion. Will it be to any purpose to go to him? Can such a hard heart ever be softened?

2. Christ overrules the objection (v. 15, 16). "Go thy way with all speed for he is a chosen vessel unto me; thou needest not fear him." He was a vessel in which the gospel-treasure should be lodged, an earthen vessel (2. Cor. iv. 7), but a chosen vessel. He is designed, (1) for eminent services: He is to bear my name before the Gentiles. Saul must be a standard-bearer. He must bear Christ's name before kings, king Agrippa and Cæsar himself; nay, he must bear it before the children of Israel. (2) For eminent sufferings (v. 16): I will show him how great things he must suffer for my name's sake. He that has been a persecutor shall be himself persecuted. Those that bear Christ's name must expect to bear the cross for his name; and those that do most for Christ are often called out to suffer most for him. It is only like telling a soldier of a bold and brave spirit, that he shall take the field, and enter upon action, shortly. It is no discouragement to him to be told how great things he must suffer for Christ's name's sake.

III. Ananias goes on Christ's errand to Saul. He had started an objection against going to him, but he dropped it, and did not insist upon it. When difficulties are removed, what have we to do but to go on with our work, and not hang upon an objection?

1. Ananias delivered his message to Saul, v. 17. (1) He put his hands on him. Saul came to lay violent hands upon the disciples at Damascus, but here a disciple lays a helping healing hand upon him. (2) He called him brother. His readiness to own him as a brother intimated to him God's readiness to own him as a son, though he had been a blasphemer of God and a persecutor of his children. (3) He produces his commission. "That same Jesus that appeared unto thee in the way as thou camest, has now sent me to thee." The hand that wounded heals. His light struck thee blind, but he hath sent me to thee that thou mightest receive thy sight. Corrosives shall be no more applied, but lenitives. (4) He assures him that he shall not only have his sight restored, but be filled with the Holy Ghost.

2. Ananias saw the good issue of his mission. (1) In Christ's favour to Saul. At the word of Ananias, Saul was discharged from his confinement by the restoring of his sight. Saul is delivered from the spirit of bondage by his receiving sight (v. 18), which was signified by the falling of scales from his eyes; the cure was sudden, to show that it was miraculous. This signified the recovering of him, [1] From the darkness of his unconverted state. Christ often told the Pharisees that they were blind, and could not make them sensible of it. Saul is saved from his Pharisaical blindness, by being made sensible of it. Converting grace opens the eyes of the soul. This was what Saul was sent among the Gentiles to do, and therefore must first experience it in himself. [2] From the darkness of his present terrors. Now the scales fell from his eyes, the cloud was scattered, and the Sun of righteousness rose upon his soul, with healing under his wings. (2) In Saul's subjection to Christ: He was baptized, and thereby submitted to the government of Christ, and cast himself upon the grace of Christ. Saul is now a disciple of Christ, not only ceases to oppose him, but devotes himself entirely to his service.

IV. The good work that was begun in Saul is carried on wonderfully.

1. He received his bodily strength, v. 19. He had continued three days fasting, which had made him very weak; but, when he had received meat, he was strengthened, v. 19. The Lord is for the body, and therefore care must be taken of it that it may be fit to serve the soul in God's service.

2. He associated with the disciples that were at Damascus. He had lately breathed out threatenings and slaughter against them, but now breathes love and affection to them. Those that take God for their God take his people for their people. Thus he made profession of his Christian faith, and openly declared himself a disciple of Christ.

3. He preached Christ in the synagogues, v. 20. He was so full of Christ himself, that the Spirit within him constrained him to preach him to others. Where he preached—in the synagogues of the Jews. There they used to preach against Christ and to punish his disciples. There he would face the enemies of Christ where they were most daring, and openly profess Christianity. What he preached: He preached Christ. When he began to be a preacher, he fixed this for his principle, which he stuck to ever after: nothing but Christ, and him crucified. He preached concerning Christ, that he is the Son of God, in whom he is well pleased, and with us in him. How people were affected with it (v. 21): All that heard him were amazed, and said, "Is not this he that destroyed those who called on this name in Jerusalem?" Did he not come hither to seize all the Christians he could find, and bring them bound to the chief priests? Who would have thought then that he would ever preach Christ as he does? This miracle upon the mind of such a man outshone the miracles upon men's bodies; and giving a man such another heart was more than giving men to speak with other tongues.

4. He confuted and confounded those that opposed the doctrine of Christ, v. 22. He increased in strength. He became more intimately acquainted with the gospel of Christ, and his pious affections grew more strong. He grew more daring and resolute in defence of the gospel: He increased the more for the reflections that were cast upon him (v. 21), in which his new friends upbraided him as having been a persecutor, and his old friends upbraided him as being now a turncoat. He ran down his antagonists, and confounded the Jews who dwelt in Damascus; he silenced them, and shamed them. He was instrumental in converting many to the faith of Christ, and building up the church at Damascus, which he went thither to make havoc of.

Luke here makes no mention of Paul's journey into Arabia, which he tells us himself was immediately after his conversion, Gal. i. 16, 17. As soon as God had revealed his Son in him, that he might preach him, he went not up to Jerusalem, but he went to Arabia. Thence he returned to Damascus, and there, three years after his conversion, this happened, which is here recorded.

I. He met with difficulties at Damascus, and had a narrow escape of being killed there. What his danger was (v. 23): The Jews took counsel to kill him. He had been such a remarkable deserter, and his being a Christian was a testimony against them. It is said (v. 24), The Jews watched the gates day and night to kill him. Now Christ showed Paul what great things he must suffer for his name (v. 16). Saul was no sooner a Christian than a preacher, no sooner a preacher than a sufferer. Where God gives great grace he commonly exercises it with great trials. How he was delivered. The design against him was discovered: Their lying in wait was known of Saul. The disciples contrived to help him away in the night; they let him down by the wall, in a basket, as he himself relates it (2 Cor. xi. 33).

II. He met with difficulties at Jerusalem the first time he went thither, v. 26. This is thought to be that journey to Jerusalem of which he himself speaks (Gal. i. 18): After three years I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter, and abode with him fifteen days. But I rather incline to think that this was a journey before that, because his coming in and going out, his preaching and disputing (v. 28, 29), seem to be more than would consist with his fifteen days' stay. However, it might possibly be the same.

1. How shy his friends were of him (v. 26): When he came to Jerusalem he assayed to join himself to the disciples. Wherever he came, he owned himself one of that despised persecuted people. But they looked strange upon him, shut the door against him. They were afraid of him. The Jews had abandoned and persecuted him, and the Christians would not receive and entertain him. (1) See what was the cause of their jealousy of him: They believed not that he was a disciple, but that he only pretended to be so, and came among them as a spy or an informer. The disciples of Christ had need to be cautious whom they admit into communion with them. There is need of the wisdom of the serpent, to keep the mean between the extremes of suspicion on the one hand and credulity on the other; yet methinks it is safer to err on the charitable side. (2) See how it was removed (v. 27): Barnabas took him to the apostles themselves, and he declared to them, what Christ had done for him: He had shown himself to him in the way and spoken to him. What he had since done for Christ: He had preached boldly at Damascus in the name of Jesus. How Barnabas came to know this we are not told. Being satisfied himself, he gave satisfaction to the apostles concerning him.

2. How sharp his enemies were upon him. (1) He was admitted into the communion of the disciples. It vexed the unbelieving Jews to see Saul a trophy of Christ's victory, to see him coming in, and going out, with the apostles (v. 28). (2) He appeared vigorous in the cause of Christ, and this was yet more provoking to them (v. 29): He spoke boldly in the name of the Lord Jesus. The Grecians, or Hellenist Jews, were most offended at him, because he had been one of them; and they drew him into a dispute, in which, no doubt, he was too hard for them. That same natural quickness and fervour of spirit which made him a furious bigoted persecutor of the faith, made him a most zealous courageous defender of the faith. (3) This brought him into peril of his life: The Grecians went about to slay him. But notice was given of this conspiracy too, and effectual care taken to secure this young champion (v. 30): When the brethren knew they brought him down to Cæsarea. He that flies may fight again. He that fled from Jerusalem might do service at Tarsus, the place of his nativity; and thither they desired him by all means to go. Yet it was also by direction from heaven that he left Jerusalem at this time, as he tells us himself (ch. xxii. 17, 18), that Christ now appeared to him, and ordered him to go quickly out of Jerusalem, for he must be sent to the Gentiles, v. 15.

III. The churches had now a comfortable gleam of liberty and peace (v. 31): Then had the churches rest. Then, when Saul was converted, those were quiet whom he used to molest. The churches had rest. After a storm comes a calm. This was a breathing-time allowed them, to prepare them for the next encounter. They made a good use of this lucid interval. They were edified, were built up in their most holy faith. They walked in the fear of the Lord. They so lived that all might say, Surely the fear of God reigns in those people. They walked in the comfort of the Holy Ghost—were not only faithful, but cheerful, in religion; they stuck to the ways of the Lord, and sang in those ways. They had recourse to the comfort of the Holy Ghost, and lived upon that, not only in days of trouble and affliction, but in days of rest and prosperity. When they walked in the fear of the Lord, then they walked in the comfort of the Holy Ghost. Those are most likely to walk cheerfully that walk circumspectly. God blessed it to them for their increase in number: They were multiplied. Sometimes the church multiplies the more for its being afflicted, yet if it were always so, the saints of the Most High would be worn out. At other times its rest contributes to its growth.

I. The visit Peter made to the churches that were newly planted, v. 32. 1. He passed through all quarters. As an apostle, he was not to be the resident pastor of any one church. He was, like his Master, always upon the remove, and went about doing good; but still his headquarters were at Jerusalem, for there we shall find him imprisoned, ch. xii. 4. He came to the saints at Lydda. The Christians are called saints, every sincere professor of the faith of Christ. These are the saints on the earth.

II. The cure Peter wrought on Æneas, v. 33. His case was very deplorable: He was sick of the palsy. The disease was extreme, for he kept his bed; it was inveterate, for he kept his bed eight years; and we may suppose that both he himself and all about him despaired of relief for him. Christ chose such patients as this, whose disease was incurable in a course of nature. When we were without strength, as this poor man, he sent his word to heal us. His cure was very admirable, v. 34. Peter interested Christ in his case: Æneas, Jesus Christ maketh thee whole. Peter declares it to be Christ's act and deed, and assures him of an immediate cure—not, "He will make thee," but, "He does make thee whole"; and a perfect cure —not, "He makes thee easy," but "He makes thee whole." He ordered him to bestir himself: "Arise and make thy bed." Let none say that because it is Christ that works all our works in us therefore we have no work, no duty, to do; for, though Jesus Christ makes thee whole, yet thou must arise and make use of the power he gives thee: "Arise, and make thy bed, to be to thee no longer a bed of sickness, but a bed of rest." Power went along with this word: he arose immediately.

III. The good influence this had upon many (v. 35): All that dwelt at Lydda and Saron saw him, and turned to the Lord. They all made enquiry into the truth of the miracle, and saw that it was a miraculous cure that was wrought upon him by the power of Christ. They all turned to the Lord, to the Lord Jesus. They turned themselves over to him to be ruled and taught and saved by him.

Here we have another miracle wrought by Peter—the raising of Tabitha to life.

I. The life, and death, and character of Tabitha, v. 36, 37. She lived at Joppa. Her name was Tabitha, a Hebrew name, the Greek for which is Dorcas, both signifying a doe. She was a disciple, eminent above many for works of charity. She showed her faith by her works, her good works. She was full of good works, as a tree that is full of fruit. Many are full of good words, who are empty and barren in good works; but Tabitha was a great doer, no great talker. She was remarkable for her alms-deeds which she did, not only her works of piety, but works of charity and beneficence, flowing from love to her neighbour. She is commended not only for the alms which she gave, but for the alms-deeds which she did. Those that have not estates wherewith to give in charity may yet be able to do in charity, working with their hands, or walking with their feet, for the benefit of the poor. And those who will not do a charitable deed, whatever they may pretend, if they were rich would not bestow a charitable gift. There is an emphasis upon her doing them, because what her hand found to do of this kind she did with all her might, and persevered in. This is the life and character of a certain disciple, and should be of all the disciples of Christ. She was removed in the midst of her usefulness (v. 37): In those days she fell sick, and died. Her friends and those about her washed the dead body, according to the custom. They laid her out in her grave-clothes in an upper chamber.

II. The request which her Christian friends sent to Peter to come to them with all speed, v. 38. The disciples at Joppa had heard that Peter was there, and that he had raised Æneas from a bed of languishing; and therefore they sent him two men, desiring him that he would not delay to come to them. Their friend was dead, and it was too late to send for a physician, but not too late to send for Peter.

III. The posture in which he found the survivors (v. 39): Peter arose and went with them. Let not faithful ministers grudge to be at everybody's beck, when the great apostle made himself the servant of all. He found the corpse laid in the upper chamber, and attended by widows.

1. Commending the deceased—a good work when it is done modestly and soberly, and without flattery. The commendation of Tabitha was like her own virtues, not in word, but in deed. The widows showed the coats and garments which she made while she was with them. It is much more honourable to clothe a company of decrepit widows with needful clothing, than to clothe a company of lazy footmen with rich liveries, who perhaps behind their backs will curse those that clothe them, for goodness is true greatness, and will pass better in the account shortly. Into what channel Tabitha turned much of her charity. She did, as it should seem with her own hands, make coats and garments for poor widows. And this is an excellent piece of charity, If thou seest the naked, that thou cover him (Isa. lviii. 7), and not think it enough to say, Be ye warmed, James ii. 15, 16. What a grateful sense the poor had of her kindness: They showed the coats. Those are horribly ungrateful indeed who have kindness shown them and will not make at least an acknowledgement of it, by showing the kindness that is done them. Those who receive alms are not obliged so industriously to conceal it, as those are who give alms. Their showing the coats and garments which Dorcas made tended to the praise not only of her charity, but of her industry.

2. They were here lamenting the loss of her: The widows stood by Peter, weeping. They need not weep for her; she rests from her labours and her works follow her, but they weep for themselves and for their children, who will soon find the want of such a good woman. They take notice of what good Dorcas did while she was with them; but now she is gone from them, and this is their grief. The widows wept before Peter, as an inducement to him to have compassion on them, and restore one to them that used to have compassion on them. When charitable people are sick, this piece of gratitude is owing them, to pray for their recovery, that those may be spared to live who can ill be spared to die.

IV. The manner in which she was raised to life. 1. Privately: but Peter put them all forth. Thus Peter declined everything that looked like vainglory and ostentation; they came to see, but he did not come to be seen. 2. By prayer. In his healing Æneas there was an implied prayer, but in this greater work he addressed himself to God by solemn prayer, with the submission of a servant, and therefore he knelt down and prayed. 3. By the word, a quickening word. When he had prayed, he turned to the body, and spoke in his Master's name: "Tabitha, arise." Power went along with this word, and she came to life, opened her eyes which death had closed. When she saw Peter, she sat up (v. 14), he gave her his hand and lifted her up. Thus he would as it were welcome her to life again, and give her the right hand of fellowship among the living, from whom she had been cut off. And, lastly, he called the saints and widows. and presented her alive to them (v. 41).

V. The good effect of this miracle. 1. Many were by it convinced of the truth of the gospel, and believed in the Lord, v. 42. The thing was known throughout all Joppa, and though some never minded it many were wrought upon by it. This was the design of miracles, to confirm a divine revelation. 2. Peter was hereby induced to continue some time in this city, v. 43. Finding that a door of opportunity was opened for him there, he tarried there many days, till he was sent for thence upon business to another place. He took up his lodgings with one Simon a tanner. Though Peter might seem to be buried in obscurity here in the house of a poor tanner by the seaside, yet hence God fetched him to a noble piece of service.

CHAP. X

It is a turn very new and remarkable which the story of this chapter gives to the Acts of the apostles. Now, "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles"; and to them the door of faith is here opened. The apostle Peter is the man that is first employed to admit uncircumcised Gentiles into the Christian church; and Cornelius, a Roman centurion is the first that with his family and friends is so admitted. I. How Cornelius was directed by a vision to send for Peter, ver. 1–8. II. How Peter was directed by a vision to go to Cornelius, though he was a Gentile, ver. 9–23. III. The happy interview between Peter and Cornelius at Cæsarea, ver. 24–33. IV. The sermon Peter preached in the house of Cornelius, ver. 34–43. V. The baptizing of Cornelius and his friends with the Holy Ghost first, and then with water, ver. 44–48.

It concerns us carefully to observe all the circumstances of the beginning of this great work, this part of the mystery of godliness—Christ preached to the Gentiles, and believed on in the world. The gospel was never yet designedly preached to the Gentiles, nor any of them baptized—Cornelius was the first.

I. An account given us of this Cornelius, who was the first-born of the Gentiles to Christ. We are here told that he was a great man and a good man—two characters that seldom meet. Where they do meet they put a lustre upon each other: goodness makes greatness truly valuable, and greatness makes goodness much more serviceable. 1. Cornelius was an officer of the army, v. 1. Here there was a band, or cohort, of the Roman army, which is here called the Italian band, because they were all native Romans, or Italians. Cornelius had a command in this part of the army. He was an officer of considerable rank and figure, a centurion. We read of one of that rank in our Saviour's time, of whom he gave a great commendation, Matt. viii. 10. When a Gentile must be pitched upon to receive the gospel first, it is a Gentile soldier, who is a man of more free thought; and he that truly is so, when the Christian doctrine is fairly set before him, cannot but receive it and bid it welcome. Let not soldiers and officers of the army plead that their employment may excuse them if they be not religious. It was a mortification to the Jews that not only the Gentiles were taken into the church, but that the first who was taken in was an officer of the Roman army. 2. He was a religious man. It is a very good character that is given of him, v. 2. He was possessed with a principle of regard to the true and living God. He was a devout man and one that feared God. Though he was a soldier, it was no diminution of the credit of his valour to tremble before God. He kept up religion in his family. He feared God with all his house. He took care that not himself only, but all his, should serve the Lord. Every good man will do what he can that those about him may be good too. He was a very charitable man: He gave much alms to the people. He was much in prayer: He prayed to God always. Wherever the fear of God rules in the heart, it will appear both in works of charity and of piety.

II. The orders given him from heaven to send for Peter.

1. How, and in what way, these orders were given him. He had a vision, in which an angel delivered them to him. It was about the ninth hour of the day. Because it was in the temple the time of offering the evening sacrifice, it was made by devout people an hour of prayer. Cornelius was now at prayer: so he tells us himself, v. 30. An angel of God came in to him. He saw him evidently with his bodily eyes, not in a dream presented to his imagination, but in a vision presented to his sight. He called him by his name, Cornelius, to intimate the particular notice God took of him. This put Cornelius for the present into some confusion (v. 4): When he looked on him he was afraid. Cornelius cries, "What is it, Lord? What is the matter?" This he speaks as one desirous to know the mind of God, and ready to comply with it.

2. What the message was.

(1) He is assured that God accepts him (v. 4): Thy prayers and thine alms are come up for a memorial before God. Prayers and alms must go together. We must follow our prayers with alms. We must give alms of such things as we have; and then, behold, all things are clean to us, Luke xi. 41. And we must follow our alms with our prayers that God would graciously accept them. Cornelius prayed, and gave alms, in sincerity, as unto God; and he is here told that they were come up for a memorial before God. Prayers and alms are our spiritual offerings, which God is pleased to have regard to.

(2) He is appointed to enquire after a further discovery of divine grace, v. 5, 6. He must send forthwith to Joppa, and enquire for one Simon Peter; he lodgeth at the house of one Simon a tanner; his house is by the sea side, when he comes he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do. Now here are two things very surprising: [1] Cornelius prays and gives alms in the fear of God, is religious himself and keeps up religion in his family, yet there is something further that he ought to do—he ought to embrace the Christian religion. Not, He may do it if he pleases. But, He must do it. He that believed the promise of the Messiah must now believe the performance of that promise. Neither our prayers nor our alms can come up for a memorial before God unless we believe in Jesus Christ. [2] Cornelius has now an angel from heaven talking to him, and yet he must not receive the gospel of Christ from this angel, but all that the angel has to say is, "Send for Peter, and he shall tell thee." And as it was an honour to the apostle that he must preach that which an angel might not, so it was a further honour that an angel was despatched to order him to be sent for. To bring a faithful minister and a willing people together is a work worthy of an angel.

III. His immediate obedience to these orders, v. 7, 8. He sent with all speed to Joppa, to fetch Peter to him. When he sent: As soon as ever the angel which spoke unto him had departed. He made haste, and delayed not, to do this commandment. In any affair wherein our souls are concerned it is good for us not to lose time. Whom he sent: Two of his household servants, and a devout soldier, that waited on him continually. A devout centurion had devout soldiers. A little devotion commonly goes a great way with soldiers, but there would be more of it in the soldiers if there were but more of it in the commanders. When this centurion had to choose some of his soldiers to attend his person, and to be always about him, he pitched upon such of them as were devout. What instructions he gave them (v. 8): He declared all these things unto them. He does not only tell them where to find Peter, but he tells them on what errand he was to come, that they might importune him.

Cornelius had received positive orders from heaven to send for Peter, but here is another difficulty that lies in the way of bringing them together—the question is whether Peter will come to Cornelius. It sticks at a point of conscience. He is a Gentile, he is not circumcised. Peter had not got over this stingy bigoted notion of his countrymen, and therefore will be shy of coming to Cornelius. Now, to remove this difficulty, he has a vision here, to prepare him to receive the message sent him by Cornelius. Christ ordered them to teach all nations; and yet even Peter himself could not understand it, till it was here revealed by vision.

I. The circumstances of this vision.

1. It was when the messengers were now nigh the city, v. 9. Peter knew nothing of their approach, and they knew nothing of his praying; but he that knew both him and them was preparing things for the interview. He is pleased often to bring things to the minds of his ministers, which they had not thought of, just then when they have occasion to use them.

2. It was when Peter went up upon the house-top to pray. Peter was much in prayer. He prayed about the sixth hour, not only morning and evening, but at noon. From morning to night we should think to be too long to be without meat; yet who thinks it is too long to be without prayer? He prayed upon the house-top. He had this vision immediately after he had prayed. The ascent of the heart to God in prayer is an excellent preparative to receive the discoveries of the divine grace.

3. It was when he became very hungry (v. 10); and now he would have eaten. Now this hunger was a proper inlet to the vision about meats, as Christ's hunger in the wilderness was to Satan's temptation to turn stones into bread.

II. The vision itself. He fell into a trance. He quite lost himself to this world, and so had his mind entirely free for converse with divine things. The more clear we get of the world, the more near we get to heaven. He saw heaven opened, that he might be sure that his authority to go to Cornelius was indeed from heaven. He saw a great sheet full of all manner of living creatures, which descended from heaven, and was let down to him to the earth. Here were not only beasts of the earth, but fowls of the air, laid at his feet. Here were no fishes of the sea, because there were none of them in particular unclean. Some make this sheet, thus filled, to represent the church of Christ. In this we find some of all countries, without any distinction of Greek or Jew. The net of the gospel encloses all, both bad and good, those that before were clean and unclean. Or it may be applied to the bounty of the divine Providence. How should it double our comfort in the creatures, and our obligations to serve God in the use of them, to see them thus let down to us out of heaven! He was ordered by a voice from heaven to make use of this plenty and variety which God had sent him (v. 13): "Rise, Peter, kill and eat." It might be difficult for Jews to dine and sup with a Gentile, because they would have that set before them which they were not allowed to eat. Now they might fare as they feared, and therefore might eat with them. He stuck to his principles, and would by no means hearken to the motion (v. 14): Not so, Lord. Though hunger will break through stone walls, God's laws should be to us a stronger fence than stone walls. Temptations to eat forbidden fruit must not be parleyed with, but peremptorily rejected. The reason he gives is, "For I have never eaten anything that is common or unclean; hitherto I have kept my integrity in this matter, and will still keep it." His conscience could witness for him that he had never gratified his appetite with any forbidden food. God, by a second voice from heaven, proclaimed the repeal of the law in this case (v. 15): What God hath cleansed, that call thou not common. He that made the law might alter it when he pleased. He has now taken off that restraint, has cleansed that which was before polluted to us. We ought to welcome it as a great mercy; not so much because hereby we gain the use of swine's flesh, hares, rabbits, and other pleasant and wholesome food for our bodies, but chiefly because conscience is hereby freed from a yoke in things of this nature. This was done thrice, v. 16, with the same call to him, and the same reason. The instructions given us in the things of God need to be often repeated. But at last the vessel was received up into heaven. Those who make this vessel to represent the church, including both Jews and Gentiles, make this very aptly to signify the admission of the believing Gentiles into the church, and into heaven too. They are such as God has cleansed.

III. The providence which explained this vision, v. 17, 18. He doubted within himself what this vision which he had seen should mean. He had no reason to doubt the truth of it, all his doubt was concerning the meaning of it. Christ reveals himself to his people by degrees, and leaves them to doubt awhile, to ruminate upon a thing, and debate it to and fro in their own minds, before he clears it up to them. Yet he was made to know presently, for the men who were sent from Cornelius were at the gate enquiring whether Peter lodged there; and by their errand it will appear what was the meaning of this vision. God knows what services are before us, and therefore how to prepare us; and we then better know the meaning of what he has taught us when we find what occasion we have to make use of it.

We have here the meeting between Peter and Cornelius. Though Paul was designed to be the apostle of the Gentiles, and Peter to be the apostle of the circumcision, yet it is ordered that Peter shall break the ice, and reap the first fruits of the Gentiles, that the believing Jews might be the better reconciled to their admission into the church, when they were first brought in by their own apostle.

I. Peter is directed by the Spirit to go along with Cornelius's messengers (v. 19, 20). Now the riddle is unriddled: While Peter thought on the vision; he was musing upon it, and then it was opened to him. Those that would be taught the things of God must think on those things. 1. Whence he had the direction. The Spirit said to him what he should do. It was not spoken to him by an angel, but spoken in him by the Spirit. 2. What the direction was. He is told that three men below want to speak with him (v. 19), and he must arise from his musings and go down to them, v. 20. Those that are searching into the meaning of the words of God, and the visions of the Almighty, should not be always poring, no, nor always praying, but should sometimes look about them. He is ordered to go along with the messengers to Cornelius, doubting nothing, not doubting whether he might go, no, nor whether he ought to go; for it was his duty. "Go with them, for I have sent them." When we see our call clear to any service, we should not suffer ourselves to be perplexed with doubts and scruples, or a fear of men's censure.

II. He receives both them and their message: He went down to them, v. 21. 1. He favourably receives their message. He asks what their business is: What is the cause wherefore you are come? and they tell him their errand (v. 22): "Cornelius, an officer of the Roman army, who fears God above many of good report among all the people of the Jews, was warned from God by an angel to send for thee to his house, and to hear words of thee." These words, Peter tells us more fully, are words whereby thou and all thy house shall be saved, ch. xi. 14. 2. He kindly entertained the messengers (v. 23): He called them in, and lodged them. What was getting ready for him (v. 10) they should be welcome to share in; he little thought what company he should have when he bespoke his dinner, but God foresaw it. Peter lodged them, though they were Gentiles, to show how readily he complied with the design of the vision in eating with Gentiles. Though they were two of them servants, and the other a common soldier, yet Peter thought it not below him to take them into his house.

III. He went with them to Cornelius. Peter was accompanied by certain brethren from Joppa, v. 23. Six of them went along with him, as we find, ch. xi. 12. This was one way in which the primitive Christians very much showed their respect to their ministers: they accompanied them in their journeys. It is a pity that those who have skill and will to do good to others by their discourse should want an opportunity for it by travelling alone. Cornelius had got some friends together of Cæsarea. Now when they came into the house of Cornelius Peter found, (1) That he was expected, and this was an encouragement to him. Cornelius waited for them, and such a guest was worth waiting for; nor can I blame him if he waited with some impatience. (2) That he was expected by many and this was a further encouragement to him. As Peter brought some with him to partake of the spiritual gift he had now to dispense, so Cornelius had called together, not only his own family, but kinsmen and near friends. We should not covet to eat our spiritual morsels alone. It ought to be both given and taken as a piece of kindness and respect to our kindred and friends to invite them to join with us in religious exercises, to go with us to hear a sermon.

IV. Here is the first interview between Peter and Cornelius. The profound respect and honour which Cornelius paid to Peter (v. 25): He met him as he was coming in, and he fell down at his feet and worshipped him. His worshipping a man was indeed culpable; but, considering his present ignorance, it was excusable. No wonder if, till he was better informed, he worshipped him, whom he was ordered to send for by an angel from heaven. Peter's modest refusal of this honour that was done him (v. 25): He took him up saying, "Stand up, I myself also am a man." The good angels of the churches cannot bear to have the least of that honour shown to them which is due to God only. Christ's faithful servants could better bear to be vilified than to be deified. Let him know that Peter is a man, that the treasure is in earthen vessels, that he may value the treasure for its own sake.

V. The account which Peter and Cornelius give to each other, and to the company, of the hand of Heaven in bringing them together: As he talked with him he went in, v. 27. When he came in, he found many that were come together, which added solemnity, as well as opportunity of doing good, to this service.

1. Peter declares the direction God gave to him to come to those Gentiles, v. 28, 29. They knew it had never been allowed by the Jews, but always looked upon as an unlawful thing for a man that is a Jew to keep company or come unto one of another nation, an uncircumcised Gentile. It was not made so by the law of God, but by the decree of their wise men. They did not forbid them to converse or traffic with Gentiles in the street or shop, or upon the exchange, but to eat with them. They might not come into the house of a Gentile. Thus scornfully did the Jews look upon the Gentiles, who were not behindhand with them in contempt. "But now," saith Peter, "God hath shown me that I should not call any man common or unclean." Peter, who had taught his new converts to save themselves from the untoward generation of wicked men (ch. ii. 40), is now himself taught to join himself with the towardly generation of devout Gentiles. He assures them of his readiness to do them all the good offices he could. Having now received permission, he was at their service: "Therefore came I unto you without gainsaying, as soon as I was sent for." He enquires wherein he might be serviceable to them: "I ask, therefore, for what intent you have sent for me?"

2. Cornelius declares the directions God gave to him to send for Peter.

(1) Cornelius gives an account of the angel's appearing to him, and ordering him to send for Peter. He tells how this vision found him employed (v. 30): Four days ago I was fasting until this hour. He was at the ninth hour praying in his house, not in the synagogue, but at home. At the ninth hour of the day, three of the clock in the afternoon, most people were travelling or trading, working in the fields, visiting their friends, taking their pleasure, or taking a nap after dinner; yet then Cornelius was at his devotions, which shows how much he made religion his business. He describes the messenger: There stood a man before me in bright clothing. He repeats the message that was sent to him (v. 31, 32), just as we had it, v. 4–6. Only here it is said, Thy prayer is heard. We are not told what his prayer was; but if this message was an answer to it, he prayed that God would make some further discoveries of himself, and of the way of salvation to him.

(2) He declares his own and his friends' readiness to receive the message Peter had to deliver (v. 33): Immediately therefore I sent to thee, and thou hast well done that thou hast come. Faithful ministers do well to come to people that are desirous to receive instruction from them; to come when they are sent for. "We are all here present before God. Therefore, because thou art come to us by such a warrant, on such an errand, we are present, and are ready to come at a call. We are all present." The whole of the man must be present; not the body here, and the heart, with the fool's eyes, in the ends of the earth. "We are present to hear all things that are commanded thee of God." Peter was there to preach all things that were commanded him of God. They were ready to hear, not whatever he pleased to say, but what he was commanded of God to say. "We are ready to hear all that thou art commissioned to preach, though it be ever so displeasing and ever so contrary to our former notions or present secular interests. We are ready to hear all, and therefore let nothing be kept back that is profitable for us."

We have here Peter's sermon. It is intimated that he expressed himself with a great deal of solemnity and gravity, but with freedom and copiousness, in that phrase, he opened his mouth, and spoke, v. 34. It was a new sermon.

I. Because they were Gentiles to whom he preached. He shows that they were interested in the gospel of Christ, and entitled to the benefit of it, upon an equal footing with the Jews. He therefore lays down this as an undoubted principle, that God is no respecter of persons. He doth not give judgment in favour of a man for the sake of any external advantage foreign to the merits of the cause. But in every nation he that fears God and works righteousness is accepted of him, v. 35. God never did, nor ever will, justify and save a wicked Jew that lived and died impenitent, whose privileges and professions, instead of screening him from the judgment of God, will but aggravate his guilt and condemnation. He never did, nor ever will, reject or refuse an honest Gentile, who like Cornelius, fears God, and worships him, and works righteousness, who lives up to the light he has. Whatever nation he is of, that shall be no prejudice to him. God judges of men by their hearts, not by their country or parentage; and, wherever he finds an upright man, he will be found an upright God. Fearing God, and working righteousness, must go together. But, where these are predominant, no doubt is to be made of acceptance with God. Those that have not the knowledge of him, and therefore cannot have an explicit regard to him, may yet receive grace from God for his sake, to fear God and to work righteousness; and wherever God gives grace to do so, as he did to Cornelius, he will, through Christ, accept the work of his own hands. This was always a truth, before Peter perceived it, that God respecteth no man's person. God will not ask in the great day what country men were of, but what they were. Yet now it was made more clear than it had been. Peter is here made to perceive it, by comparing the vision which he had with that which Cornelius had.

II. Because they were Gentiles inhabiting a place within the confines of the land of Israel, he refers them to what they themselves could not but know of our Lord Jesus: for these were things the report of which spread into every corner of the nation, v. 37.

1. They knew, in general, the word which God sent to the children of Israel: That word, I say, you know, v. 37. Though the Gentiles were not admitted to hear it, yet they could not but hear of it. We are often told in the gospels how the fame of Christ went into all parts of Canaan. That word of power and grace, you know. What the purport of this word was. God by it published the glad tidings of peace by Jesus Christ, so it should be read. It is God himself that proclaims peace, who justly might have proclaimed war. To whom it was sent—to the children of Israel, in the first place.

2. They knew the several matters of fact relating to this word of the gospel sent to Israel. They knew the baptism of repentance which John preached by way of introduction to it. They knew what an extraordinary man John was, and what a direct tendency his preaching had to prepare the way of the Lord. They knew that immediately after John's baptism the gospel of Christ, that word of peace, was published throughout all Judæa, and that it took its rise from Galilee. They knew that Jesus of Nazareth went about doing good. They knew what a benefactor he was to that nation; how he made it his business to do good to all. He was not idle, but still doing; went about from place to place, and wherever he came he was doing good. Hereby he showed that he was sent of God. They knew more particularly that he healed all that were oppressed of the devil. He was sent to destroy the works of the devil; for thus he obtained many a victory over him. They knew that the Jews put him to death; they slew him by hanging him on a tree. Whom they slew; they, to whom he had done and designed so much good. All this they knew; but lest they should think it was only a report, Peter, for himself and the rest of the apostles, attested it (v. 39): We are witnesses of all things which he did, both in the land of the Jews and in Jerusalem.

3. They might know, by all this, that he had a commission from heaven to preach and act as he did. This Jesus is Lord of all; not only as God over all blessed for evermore, but as Mediator, all power both in heaven and on earth is put into his hand, and all judgment committed to him. God anointed him with the Holy Ghost and with power, whence he was called Christ—the Messiah, the anointed One. He was full of power both in preaching and working miracles, which was the seal of a divine mission. God was with him, v. 38. God not only sent him, but was present with him all along. Those whom God anoints he will accompany; he will himself be with those to whom he has given his Spirit.

III. Because they had had no more certain information concerning this Jesus, Peter declares to them his resurrection from the dead, and the proofs of it. Probably they had heard at Cæsarea some talk of his having risen from the dead, soon silenced by that vile suggestion of the Jews, that his disciples came by night and stole him away. 1. The power by which he arose is incontestably divine (v. 40): Him God raised up the third day. He did not break prison, but had a legal discharge. God raised him up. 2. The proofs of his resurrection were incontestably clear; for God showed him openly. It was such a showing of him as amounted to a demonstration of the truth of his resurrection. He showed him not publicly indeed, but evidently; not to all the people. By resisting all the evidences he had given them of his divine mission, they had forfeited the favour of being eye-witnesses of this great proof of it. Those who immediately forged and promoted that lie of his being stolen away were justly given up to strong delusions to believe it. A sufficient number saw him to attest the truth of his resurrection. The resurrection of Christ was proved before sufficient witnesses. They were not so by chance, but they were chosen before of God to be witnesses of it. They had not a sudden and transient view of him, but a great deal of free conversation with him: They did eat and drink with him after he rose from the dead. This was not all; they saw him without any terror or consternation, he conversed with them so familiarly, that they did eat and drink with him.

IV. He concludes with an inference from all this, that therefore that which they all ought to do was to believe in this Jesus: he was sent to tell Cornelius what he must do, and it is this. One thing he lacked, he must believe in Christ.

1. Why he must believe in him. The Christian faith is built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, it is built upon the testimony given by them. By the apostles. Peter as foreman speaks for the rest, that God commanded them to preach to the people, and to testify concerning Christ. Their testimony is God's testimony; and they are his witnesses to the world. By the prophets of the Old Testament (v. 43): To him give all the prophets witness. Out of the mouth of these two clouds of witnesses, this word is established.

2. What they must believe concerning him. That we are all accountable to Christ as our Judge. This Jesus is ordained of God to be the Judge of the quick and dead, v. 42. He is empowered to prescribe the terms of salvation, that rule by which we must be judged. He hath assured us of this, in that he hath raised him from the dead (ch. xvii. 31), so that it is the great concern of everyone of us to make him our friend. That if we believe in him we shall all be justified by him as our righteousness, v. 43. The prophets did witness this, that through his name, whosoever believeth in him shall receive remission of sins. This is the great thing we need, without which we are undone. And the remission of sins lays a foundation for all other favours and blessings. If sin be pardoned, all is well, and shall end everlastingly well.

We have here the issue and effect of Peter's sermon. They were all brought home to Christ.

I. God's owning Peter's word, by conferring the Holy Ghost upon the hearers of it (v. 44): While Peter was yet speaking these words the Holy Ghost fell on all those who heard the word, even as he did on the apostles at first; so Peter saith, ch. xi. 15. When the Holy Ghost fell upon them—while Peter was preaching. Thus God bore witness to what he said, and accompanied it with a divine power. The Holy Ghost fell upon others after they were baptized, for their confirmation; but upon these Gentiles before they were baptized: to show that God is not tied to a method, nor confines himself to external signs. How it appeared that the Holy Ghost had fallen upon them (v. 46): They spoke with tongues. When they spoke with tongues, they magnified God, they spoke of Christ and the benefits of redemption, which Peter had been preaching. Whatever gift we are endued with, we ought to honour God with it, and particularly the gift of speaking, and all the improvements of it. What impression it made upon the believing Jews that were present (v. 45): Those of the circumcision who believed were astonished, because upon the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Ghost. Had they understood the scriptures of the Old Testament it would not have been such an astonishment to them.

II. Peter's owning God's work in baptizing those on whom the Holy Ghost fell. Though they had received the Holy Ghost, yet it was requisite they should be baptized; though God is not tied to instituted ordinances, we are. Though they were Gentiles, yet, having received the Holy Ghost, they might be admitted to baptism (v. 47): Can any man forbid water, that these should not be baptized, who have received the Holy Ghost as well as we? The argument is conclusive; can we deny the sign to those who have received the thing signified? It becomes us to follow God's indications, and to take those into communion with us whom he hath taken into communion with himself. Now it appears why the Spirit was given them before they were baptized—because otherwise Peter could not have persuaded himself to baptize them. Thus is there one unusual step of divine grace taken after another to bring the Gentiles into the church. How well is it for us that the grace of a good God is so much more extensive than the charity of some good men! Peter did not baptize them himself, but commanded them to be baptized, v. 48. The apostles received the commission to go and disciple all nations by baptism. But it was to prayer and the ministry of the word that they were to give themselves. The business of baptizing was therefore ordinarily devolved upon the inferior ministers; these acted by the orders of the apostles.

III. Their desire for further advantage by Peter's ministry: They prayed him to tarry certain days. They were not willing he should go away immediately, but earnestly begged he would stay for some time among them, that they might be further instructed by him. Those who have some acquaintance with Christ cannot but covet more. Even those that have received the Holy Ghost must see their need of the ministry of the word.

It being so great a surprise to the believing as well as the unbelieving Jews, it is worth while to enquire how it was received.

I. Intelligence was presently brought of it to the church in Jerusalem, and thereabouts. Before he himself had returned to Jerusalem the apostles and the brethren there and in Judæa heard that the Gentiles also had received the word of God, that the Gentiles also themselves, with whom it had hitherto been thought unlawful to hold common conversation, had received the word of God. The word of God was preached to them, which was a greater honour put upon them than they expected. Thus often are the prejudices of pride and bigotry held fast against the clearest discoveries of divine truth. It was entertained and submitted to by them, which was a better work wrought upon them than they expected. They looked upon them as not inclined to religion, and therefore were surprised to hear that they had received the word of the Lord. We are too apt to despair of doing good to those who yet, when they are tried, prove very tractable.

II. Offence was taken at it by the believing Jews (v. 2, 3): When Peter had himself come up to Jerusalem, those that were of the circumcision contended with him. He went in to men uncircumcised, and did eat with them; and thereby they think he has stained, if not forfeited, the honour of his apostleship. It is the bane and damage of the church, to monopolize it, and to exclude those from it that are not in everything as we are. Christ's ministers must not think it strange if they be censured, not only by their professed enemies, but by their professing friends. But, if we have proved our own work, we may have rejoicing in ourselves, as Peter had, whatever reflections we may have from our brethren. Those that are zealous and courageous in the service of Christ must expect to be censured by those who, under pretence of being cautious, are cold and indifferent. Those who are of catholic, generous, charitable principles, must expect to be censured by such as are conceited and strait-laced.

III. Peter gave such a full and fair account of the matter of fact as was sufficient both to justify him, and to satisfy them (v. 4): He rehearsed the matter from the beginning.

1. He takes it for granted that if they had rightly understood how the matter was they would not have contended with him. We should be moderate in our censures, because if we rightly understood that which we are so forward to run down perhaps we should see cause to run in with it.

2. He is very willing to stand right in their opinion. He is ready to give a reason of the hope that is in him concerning the Gentiles, and why he had receded from his former sentiments, which were the same with theirs.

(1) He was instructed by a vision no longer to keep up the distinctions which were made by the ceremonial law; he relates the vision (v. 5, 6), as we had it before, ch. x. 9, &c. The sheet which was there said to be let down to the earth he here says came even to him. We should thus see all God's discoveries of himself, coming even to us, applying them by faith to ourselves. When the sheet came to him he fastened his eyes upon it, and considered it, v. 6. If we would be led into the knowledge of divine things, we must fix our minds upon them, and consider them. He tells them what orders he had to eat of all sorts of meat without distinction, asking no questions for conscience' sake, v. 7. He pleads that he was as averse to the thoughts of conversing with Gentiles, as they could be, and therefore refused the liberty given him: Not so, Lord; for nothing common or unclean has at any time entered into my mouth, v. 8. But he was told that God had cleansed those persons and things which were before polluted; and therefore that he must no longer call them common (v. 9); so that he was not to be blamed for changing his thoughts, when God had changed the thing. And, that they might be sure he was not deceived in it, he tells them it was done three times (v. 10). And, further to confirm him that it was a divine vision, the things he saw did not vanish away into the air, but were drawn up again into heaven.

(2) He was particularly directed by the Spirit to go along with the messengers that Cornelius sent. He observes to them the time when the messengers came—immediately after he had that vision; yet, lest this should not be sufficient to clear his way, the Spirit bade him go with the men, nothing doubting (v. 11, 12). He must make no scruple of going along with them.

(3) He took some of his brethren along with him, who were of the circumcision, that they might be satisfied as well as he. He did not act separately, but with advice; not rashly, but upon due deliberation.

(4) Cornelius had a vision too (v. 13): He showed us how he had seen an angel in his house, that bade him send to Joppa for one Simon, whose surname is Peter. Peter is the more confirmed in the truth of his vision by Cornelius's, and Cornelius by Peter's. Here is something added in what the angel said to Cornelius; before it was, Send for Peter, and he shall speak to thee, he shall tell thee what thou oughtest to do (ch. x. 6, 32); but here it is, "He shall tell thee words whereby thou and thy house shall be saved" (v. 14). The words of the gospel are words whereby we may be eternally saved; not merely by hearing them, but by believing and obeying them. They open the way of salvation to us. Those that embrace the gospel of Christ will have salvation brought by it to their families: "Thou and all thy house shall be saved. Thy house shall be as welcome to the benefit of the salvation as thou thyself, even the meanest servant thou hast." Now salvation is brought to the Gentiles.

(5) That which put the matter past all dispute was the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Gentile hearers. The fact was plain and undeniable (v. 15): "As I began to speak the Holy Ghost fell on them as on us at the beginning." Thus God attested what was done, and declared his approbation of it. Peter was hereby put in mind of a saying of his Master's: John baptized with water; but you shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost, v. 16. The Holy Ghost was the gift of Christ, and the product and performance of that great promise which he left with them when he went to heaven. It was therefore without doubt from him that this gift came. As it was promised by his mouth, so it was performed by his hand. The gift of the Holy Ghost was a kind of baptism. Comparing that promise, so worded, with this gift just now conferred, he concluded that the question was determined by Christ himself (v. 17): "Forasmuch then as God gave them the like gift as he did to us—gave it to us as believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, and to them upon their believing in him—What was I, that I could withstand God? Could I refuse to baptize them with water, whom God had baptized with the Holy Ghost?" Those take too much upon them who contrive how to exclude from their communion those whom God has taken into communion with himself.

IV. This account which Peter gave of the matter satisfied them. Some people, when they have fastened a censure upon a person, will stick to it, though afterwards it appear ever so plainly to be unjust and groundless. It was not so here. When they heard this they held their peace and said no more against what Peter had done. They not only held their peace from quarrelling with Peter, but opened their mouths to glorify God. They were thankful that God had shown more mercy to the poor Gentiles than they were inclined to show them, saying, Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life! He hath granted them the grace of repentance, in having given them his Holy Spirit, who gives a sight of sin and sorrow for it, and then a sight of Christ and joy in him. Repentance, if it be true, is unto life. Those that by repentance die unto sin thenceforward live unto God; and then, and not till then, we begin to live indeed, and it shall be to eternal life. Repentance is God's gift; it is not only his free grace that accepts it, but his mighty grace that works it in us. Wherever God designs to give life he gives repentance. God has exalted his Son Jesus not only to give repentance to Israel, and the remission of sins (ch. v. 31), but to the Gentiles also.

We have here an account of the planting and watering of a church at Antioch, the chief city of Syria, reckoned afterwards the third most considerable city of the empire. It is suggested that Luke, the penman of this history, as well as Theophilus, to whom he dedicates it, was of Antioch, which may be the reason why he takes more particular notice of the success of the gospel at Antioch.

I. The first preachers of the gospel there were such as were dispersed from Jerusalem by persecution, that persecution which arose at the time of Stephen's death (v. 19): They travelled as far as Phenice preaching the word. Thus what was intended for the hurt of the church was made to work for its good. The enemies designed to scatter and lose them, Christ designed to scatter and use them.

1. Those that fled from persecution did not flee from their work. Those that persecuted the preachers of the gospel hoped thereby to prevent their carrying it to the Gentile world; but it proved that they did but hasten it the sooner. Those that were persecuted in one city fled to another; but they carried their religion along with them.

2. They pressed forward in their work. When they had preached successfully in Judæa, Samaria, and Galilee, they travelled into Phoenicia, into the island of Cyprus, and into Syria. Though the further they travelled the more they exposed themselves, yet they travelled on; further still, was their motto.

3. They preached the word to none but to the Jews only who were dispersed in all those parts. They did not yet understand that the Gentiles were to be fellow-heirs, but left the Gentiles either to turn Jews, or else remain as they were.

4. They particularly applied themselves to the Hellenist Jews, here called the Grecians. Many of the preachers were natives of Judæa and Jerusalem; but some of them were by birth of Cyprus and Cyrene, as Barnabas himself (ch. iv. 36), and Simon (Mark xv. 21). These, being themselves Grecian Jews, had a particular concern for those of their own denomination, and applied themselves closely to them at Antioch. To them they preached the Lord Jesus. This was the constant subject of their preaching; what else should the ministers of Christ preach, but Christ?

5. They had wonderful success in their preaching, v. 21. Their preaching was accompanied with a divine power. The hand of the Lord was with them, to bring that home to the hearts and consciences of men which they could but speak to the outward ear. These were not apostles, but ordinary ministers, yet they had the hand of the Lord with them, and did wonders. Abundance of good was done: A great number believed, and turned unto the Lord. They believed; they were convinced of the truth of the gospel. The effect of this was that they turned unto the Lord. They turned from a confidence in the righteousness of the law, to rely only upon the righteousness of Christ, the righteousness which is by faith. They turned to the Lord Jesus, and he became all in all with them. Whatever we profess or pretend, we do not really believe the gospel if we do not cordially embrace Christ offered to us in the gospel.

II. The good work thus begun at Antioch was carried on to great perfection; by the ministry of Barnabas and Saul.

1. The church at Jerusalem sent Barnabas thither.

(1) They heard the good news, that the gospel was received at Antioch, v. 22. Tidings of these things came to the ears of the church that was in Jerusalem.

(2) They despatched Barnabas to them. They sent him forth as an envoy from them. He must go as far as Antioch. It is probable that Barnabas had a particular genius for work of this kind, and, his talent lying this way, he was fittest to be employed in this work. God gives various gifts for various services.

(3) Barnabas was wonderfully pleased to find that the gospel got ground, and that some of his countrymen, men of Cyprus, were instrumental in it (v. 23): When he came, and had seen the grace of God, he was glad. He saw the grace of God among them. What we see which is good in any we must call God's grace in them. We must be glad to see the grace of God in others, and the more when we see it where we did not expect it.

(4) He did what he could to confirm those in the faith who were converted to the faith. He exhorted them. It is the same word with that by which the name of Barnabas is interpreted (ch. iv. 36)—a son of exhortation; his talent lay that way. Or, being a son of consolation (for so we render the word), he comforted or encouraged them with purpose of heart to cleave to the Lord. Barnabas was glad for what he saw of the grace of God among them, and therefore was the more earnest with them to persevere. To cleave to the Lord. Not to fall off from following him, not to flag and tire in following him. Not only to hold him fast, but to hold fast by him. To cleave to him with purpose of heart, with an intelligent, firm, and deliberate resolution.

(5) Herein he gave a proof of his good character (v. 24): He was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith. He was not only a righteous man, but a good man, a good-tempered man. Ministers that are so recommend themselves and their doctrine very much to the good opinion of those that are without. He was a good man, that is, a charitable man; so he had approved himself, when he sold an estate, and gave the money to the poor, ch. iv. 37. He was richly endued with the gifts and graces of the Spirit. The goodness of his natural disposition would not have qualified him for this service if he had not been full of the Holy Ghost. He was full of faith, full of the grace of faith, and full of the fruits of that faith that works by love.

(6) He was instrumental to do good, by bringing in those that were without, as well as by building up those that were within: Much people were added to the Lord.

2. Barnabas went to fetch Saul. Barnabas takes a journey to Tarsus to tell him what a door of opportunity was opened at Antioch, and to desire him to come and spend some time with him there, v. 25, 26. And here also it appears that Barnabas was a good sort of a man in two things: (1) That he would take so much pains to bring an active useful man out of obscurity. It was he that brought him out of the corner into which he was driven, into a more public station. It is a very good work to fetch a candle from under a bushel, and to set it in a candlestick. (2) That he would bring in Saul at Antioch, who, being a chief speaker (ch. xiv. 12), would be likely to eclipse him there, by outshining him. Barnabas brought Saul to Antioch, though it might be the lessening of himself.

3. We are here further told,

(1) What service was now done to the church at Antioch. Paul and Barnabas continued there a whole year, presiding in their religious assemblies, and preaching the gospel, v. 26. Teaching the people is one part of the work of ministers. They are not only to be the people's mouth to God in prayer and praise, but God's mouth to the people in opening the scriptures, and teaching the good knowledge of the Lord. It is a great encouragement to ministers when they have opportunity of teaching much people, of casting the net of the gospel where there is a large shoal of fish. Preaching is not only for the conversion of those that are without, but for the instruction and edification of those that are within.

(2) What honour was now put upon the church at Antioch: There the disciples were first called Christians. Two such great men as Paul and Barnabas continuing there so long, being exceedingly followed, Christian assemblies made a greater figure there than anywhere, which was the reason of their being called Christians first there. Hitherto those who gave up their names to Christ were called disciples, learners, scholars; but henceforward they were called Christians. [1] Thus the reproachful names which their enemies had hitherto branded them with would, perhaps, be superseded. They called them Nazarenes (ch. xxiv. 5), the men of that way, that by-way, which had no name; and thus they prejudiced people against them. To remove the prejudice, they gave themselves a name which their enemies could not but say was proper. [2] Thus those who before their conversion had been distinguished by the names of Jews and Gentiles might after their conversion be called by one and the same name. Let not one say, "I was a Jew"; nor the other, "I was a Gentile"; when both the one and the other must now say, "I am a Christian." [3] Thus they studied to do honour to their Master, and showed that they were not ashamed to own their relation to him. They took their denomination not from the name of his person, Jesus, but of his office, Christ—anointed, so putting their creed into their names, that Jesus is the Christ. Their enemies will turn this name to their reproach, and impute it to them as their crime, but they will glory in it. [4] Thus they now owned their dependence upon Christ. [5] Thus they laid upon themselves, and all that should ever profess that name, a strong and lasting obligation to follow the example of Christ, and to devote themselves entirely to the honour of Christ. Are we Christians? Then we ought to do nothing to the reproach of that worthy name by which we are called. And as we must look upon ourselves as Christians, and carry ourselves accordingly, so we must look upon others as Christians, and carry ourselves towards them accordingly. A Christian should be loved and respected for his sake whose name he bears, because he belongs to Christ.

When our Lord Jesus ascended on high he gave gifts unto men, not only apostles and evangelists, but prophets.

I. A visit which some of these prophets made to Antioch (v. 27): In these days came prophets from Jerusalem to Antioch. They came from Jerusalem. Jerusalem had been infamous for killing the prophets and abusing them, and therefore is now justly deprived of these prophets. They came to Antioch. Barnabas came to exhort them, and they, having received the exhortation well, now have prophets sent them to show them things to come.

II. A particular prediction of a famine approaching, delivered by one of these prophets, his name Agabus; we read of him again prophesying Paul's imprisonment, ch. xxi. 10, 11. Here he stood up and prophesied, v. 28. Whence he had his prophecy. He signified it by the Spirit, that there should be a famine. What the prophecy was: There should be great dearth throughout all the world, so that many of the poor should perish for want of bread. This should be not in one particular country, but through all the world, that is, all the Roman empire. Christ had foretold in general that there should be famines; but Agabus foretells one very remarkable famine now at hand. The accomplishment of it: It came to pass in the days of Claudius Cæsar; it began in the second year of his reign, and continued to the fourth, if not longer. Several of the Roman historians make mention of it, as does also Josephus.

III. The good use they made of this prediction. When they were told of a famine at hand, they did not hoard up corn for themselves; but, as became Christians, laid by for charity to relieve others.

1. What they determined—that every man, according to his ability, should send relief to the brethren that dwelt in Judæa, v. 29. The persons that were recommended to them as objects of charity were the brethren that dwelt in Judæa. Though we must, as we have opportunity, do good to all men, yet we must have a special regard to the household of faith. No poor must be neglected, but God's poor most particularly regarded. But the communion of saints is here extended further, and provision is made by the church at Antioch for the relief of the poor in Judæa, whom they call their brethren. Now we may suppose that the greatest part of those who turned Christians in that country were the poor. If there came a famine it would go very hard with them; and, if any of them should perish for want, it would be a great reproach to the Christian profession; and therefore this early care was taken, to send them a stock beforehand, lest, if it should be deferred till the famine came, it should be too late. The agreement there was among the disciples about it, that every man should contribute, according to his ability, to this good work. Merchants find their account in sending effects to countries that lie very remote; and so should we in giving alms to those afar off that need them, which therefore we should be forward to do when we are called to it. What may be said to be according to our ability we must judge for ourselves, but must be careful that we judge righteous judgment.

2. They did as they determined (v. 30). Which also they did. They not only talked of it, but they did it. Many a good motion of that kind is made and commended, but it is not prosecuted, and so comes to nothing. The collection was made, and was so considerable that they thought it worth while to send Barnabas and Saul to Jerusalem. They sent it to the elders of the churches in Judæa, to be by them distributed according to the necessity of the receivers, as it had been contributed according to the ability of the givers. It was sent by Barnabas and Saul. It is no disparagement, in an extraordinary case, for ministers of the gospel to be messengers of the church's charity.

CHAP. XII

I. The martyrdom of James the apostle, and the imprisonment of Peter by Herod Agrippa, ver. 1–4. II. The miraculous deliverance of Peter out of prison in answer to the prayers of the church for him, ver. 6–19. III. The cutting off of Herod in the height of his pride (ver. 20–23); and this was done while Barnabas and Saul were at Jerusalem; an account of their return to Antioch, ver. 24, 25.

Ever since the conversion of Paul, we have heard no more of the agency of the priests in persecuting the saints at Jerusalem. Here the storm arises from another point. The civil power acts by itself in the persecution. But Herod, though originally of an Edomite family, yet seems to have been a proselyte to the Jewish religion; for Josephus says he was zealous for the Mosaic rites, a bigot for the ceremonies. He was not only (as Herod Antipas was) tetrarch of Galilee, but had also the government of Judæa committed to him by Claudius the emperor, and resided most at Jerusalem, where he was at this time. Three things we are here told he did:

I. He stretched forth his hands to vex certain of the church, v. 1. Herod laid hands upon some of the church to afflict them, so some read it. See how he advances gradually. He began with some of the members of the church; played first at small game, but afterwards flew at the apostles themselves. He began with vexing them only, or afflicting them. Afterwards he proceeded to greater instances of cruelty.

II. He killed James the brother of John with the sword, v. 2. We are here to consider, 1. Who the martyr was: it was James the brother of John; so called to distinguish him from the other James the brother of Joses. This who was here crowned with martyrdom was one of the first three of Christ's disciples. He was one of those whom Christ called Boanerges—Sons of thunder; and perhaps by his powerful awakening preaching he had provoked Herod, as John Baptist did the other Herod. He was one of those sons of Zebedee whom Christ told that they should drink of the cup that he was to drink of, and be baptized with the baptism that he was to be baptized with, Matt. xx. 23. And now those words of Christ were made good in him. The apostle died a martyr, to show the rest of them what they must expect. 2. What kind of death he suffered: his head was cut off with a sword, a more disgraceful way of being beheaded than with an axe. It is strange that we have not a more full account of the martyrdom of this great apostle, as we had of Stephen. But even this short mention is sufficient to let us know that the first preachers of the gospel were so well assured of the truth of it that they sealed it with their blood.

III. He imprisoned Peter. When he had beheaded James, he proceeded further to take Peter also. Blood to the bloodthirsty does but make them more so, and the way of persecution, as of other sins, is downhill; when they are in they find they must on. Those that take one bold step in a sinful way give Satan advantage against them to tempt them to take another. It is therefore our wisdom to take heed of the beginnings of sin. He did this because he saw it pleased the Jews. The Jews made themselves guilty of the blood of James by showing themselves well pleased with it afterwards. Those will be reckoned with as persecutors who take pleasure in others' persecuting. Though he had no reason to fear displeasing them if he did not, yet he hoped to please them by doing it, and so make amends for displeasing them in something else. Those make themselves an easy prey to Satan who make it their business to please men. Then were the days of unleavened bread. It was at the feast of the passover. At the passover, when the Jews came from all parts to Jerusalem to keep the feast, they irritated one another against the Christians, and were then more violent than at other times. Here is an account of Peter's imprisonment (v. 4): When he had laid hands on him, he put him in prison. He was delivered to four quaternions of soldiers, that is, to sixteen, who were to be a guard upon him, four at a time. Thus they thought they had him fast. Herod's design was, after Easter, to bring him forth unto the people. He would make a spectacle of him. Herod will gratify them with the sight of Peter in bonds, of Peter upon the block, that they may feed their eyes with such a pleasing spectacle. And very ambitious surely he was to please the people who was willing thus to please them! He would do this after Easter—after the passover, certainly so it ought to be read, for it is the same word that is always so rendered. After the hurry of the feast was over, and the town was empty, he would entertain them with Peter's public trial and execution. And both Herod and the people long to have the feast over, that they may gratify themselves with this barbarous entertainment.

We have here an account of Peter's deliverance out of prison.

I. It was a signal answer to prayer (v. 5): Peter was kept in prison. But prayer was made without ceasing of the church unto God for him, for prayers and tears are the church's arms; therewith she fights, not only against her enemies, but for her friends. The delay of Peter's trial gave them time for prayer. James must be offered upon the sacrifice and service of their faith; but Peter must be continued to them, and therefore prayer for him is stirred up, and time is given them for it, by Herod's putting off the prosecution. They were very particular in their prayers for him, that it would please God to defeat Herod's purpose. The death of James alarmed them to a greater fervency in their prayer for Peter. Though the death and sufferings of Christ's ministers may be made greatly to serve the interests of Christ's kingdom, yet it is the duty and concern of the church earnestly to pray for their life, liberty, and tranquillity. Prayer was made without ceasing. It was an extended prayer. Times of public distress and danger should be praying times with the church; we must pray always, but then especially.

II. Let us observe when his deliverance came. 1. It was the very night before Herod designed to bring him forth. Herod resolves he shall die, and now God opened a door of escape for him. God's time to help is when things are brought to the last extremity. 2. It was when he was fast bound with two chains, between two soldiers; and, besides this, to make sure work, the keepers before the door kept the prison, that no one might so much as attempt to rescue him. Never could the art of man do more to secure a prisoner. When men will think to be too hard for God, God will make it appear that he is too hard for them. 3. It was when he was sleeping between the soldiers. Not terrified with his danger. There was but a step between him and death, and yet he could lay himself down in peace, and sleep—sleep in the midst of his enemies. Even in prison, between two soldiers, God gives him sleep. Not expecting his deliverance. He did not keep awake, and was perfectly surprised with his deliverance.

III. An angel was sent from heaven on purpose to rescue him.

1. The angel of the Lord came upon him; stood over him. He seemed as one abandoned by men, yet not forgotten of his God. Gates and guards kept all his friends from him, but could not keep the angels of God from him. Wherever the people of God are they have a way open heavenward, nor can anything intercept their intercourse with God.

2. A light shone in the prison. Though it is a dark place, and in the night, Peter shall see his way clear.

3. The angel awoke Peter, by giving him a blow on his side, a gentle touch, enough to rouse him out of his sleep. When good people slumber in a time of danger, let them expect to be smitten on the side by some sharp affliction; better be raised up so than left asleep. The language of this stroke was, Arise up quickly.

4. His chains fell off from his hands. They had handcuffed him, to make him sure, but God loosed his hands.

5. He was ordered to dress himself immediately, and follow the angel; and he did so, v. 8, 9. When Peter was awake he knew not what to do but as the angel directed him. He must gird himself. He must bind on his sandals, that he might be fit to walk. He must cast his garments about him, and follow the angel; and he might go with a great deal of courage and cheerfulness who had a messenger from heaven for his guide and guard. He went out, and followed him. Those who are delivered out of a spiritual imprisonment must follow their deliverer, as Israel did; they went out, not knowing whither they went, but whom they followed. When Peter went out after the angel, he knew not that it was true which was done by the angel, but thought he saw a vision. He thought the news was too good to be true.

6. He was led safely by the angel out of danger, v. 10. Guards were kept at one pass and at another, which they were to make their way through, and they did so without any opposition; nay, for aught that appears, without any discovery. The angel and Peter safely passed the first and second ward. But still there is an iron gate, after all, that will stop them. Up to that gate they march, and it opened to them. They did not so much as put a hand to it, but it opened of its own accord, by an invisible power. When God will work salvation for his people, no difficulties in their way are insuperable; but even gates of iron are made to open of their own accord. This iron gate led him into the city out of the castle or tower, so that, when they were through this, they were got into the street. This deliverance of Peter represents to us our redemption by Christ, which is often spoken of as the setting of prisoners free, not only the proclaiming of liberty to the captives, but the bringing of them out of the prison-house.

7. When this was done, the angel departed from him, and left him to himself. He was out of danger from his enemies, and needed no guard. He knew where he was, and how to find out his friends, and needed no guide. Miracles are not to be expected when ordinary means are to be used.

IV. Having seen how his deliverance was magnified, we are next to see how it was manifested.

1. How Peter came to himself, and so came himself to the knowledge of it, v. 11. So many strange and surprising things coming together upon a man just awoke out of sleep put him for the present into some confusion. At length Peter came to himself, and found that it was not a dream, but a real thing: "Now I know of a surety, now I know that it is truth, that the Lord Jesus hath sent his angel, and by him hath delivered me out of the hands of Herod, and so hath disappointed all the expectation of the people of the Jews." Peter, when he recollected himself, perceived of a truth what great things God had done for him, which at first he could not believe for joy. Thus souls who are delivered out of a spiritual bondage are not at first aware what God has wrought in them. Many have the truth of grace that want the evidence of it. But when the Comforter comes he will let them know of a surety what a blessed change is wrought in them.

2. How Peter came to his friends, and brought the knowledge of it to them.

(1) He considered the thing (v. 12), considered how imminent his danger was, how great his deliverance; and now what has he to do? God's providence leaves room for the use of our prudence; and, though he has undertaken to perform and perfect what he has begun, yet he expects we should consider the thing.

(2) He went directly to a friend's house; it was the house of Mary, a sister of Barnabas, and mother of John Mark. A church in the house makes it a little sanctuary.

(3) There he found many that were gathered together praying, at the dead time of the night, praying for Peter. [1] They continued in prayer, in token of their importunity. As long as we are kept waiting for a mercy we must continue praying for it. [2] It should seem that now when the affair came near to a crisis they were more fervent in prayer than before; and it was a good sign that God intended to deliver Peter when he thus stirred up a spirit of prayer for his deliverance. [3] They gathered together for prayer. They know what an encouragement Christ gave to joint-prayer. It was always the practice of God's praying people to unite their forces in prayer. [4] They were many that were got together for this work. No doubt but there were many private Christians that knew how to pray, and to pray pertinently, and to continue long in prayer. [5] Peter came to them when they were thus employed. It was as if God should say, "You are praying that Peter may be restored to you; now here he is."

(4) He knocked at the gate, and had much ado to get them to let him in (v. 13–16): Peter knocked at the door of the gate. [1] A damsel came to hearken; not to open the door till she knew who was there, and what their business was. It should seem, by her being named, that she was of note among the Christians, and more zealously affected to the better part than most of her age. [2] She knew Peter's voice. But, instead of letting him in immediately out of the cold, she opened not the gate for gladness. Thus sometimes, in a transport of affection to our friends, we do that which is unkind. [3] She ran in and told them that Peter was certainly at the gate. But, when she spoke of Peter's being there, they said, "Thou art mad; it is impossible, for he is in prison." Sometimes that which we most earnestly wish for we are most backward to believe, because we are afraid of imposing upon ourselves. However, she stood to it that it was he. Then said they, It is his angel, v. 15. "It is a messenger from him, that makes use of his name"; so some take it. When the damsel was confident it was Peter, because she knew his voice, they thought it was because he that stood at the door had called himself Peter. "It is one that comes with an errand from him, and thou didst mistake as if it had been he himself. It is his guardian angel." Some think that they supposed his angel to appear as a presage of his death approaching.

If so, they concluded this an ill omen, and that the language of the apparition was, "Let it suffice you, Peter must die." Others think they took this to be an angel from heaven, sent to bring them a grant to their prayers.

(5) At length they let him in (v. 16): He continued knocking, and at last they admitted him. The iron gate opened of itself. The door of his friend's house that was to welcome him does not open of its own accord, but must be knocked at, long knocked at. But, when they saw him, they were astonished, were filled with wonder and joy in him, as much as they were but just now with sorrow and fear concerning him.

(6) Peter gave them an account of his deliverance. When he came to the company they gathered about him to congratulate him on his deliverance; and herein they were so noisy that he could not make them hear him, but was forced to beckon to them with the hand to hold their peace, while he declared unto them how the Lord Jesus had brought him out of prison; and it is very likely he did not part with them till he and they had together solemnly given thanks to God for his enlargement. What is won by prayer must be worn with praise.

(7) Peter sent the account to others of his friends: Go, show these things to James, and to the brethren with him. He would have James and his company to know of his deliverance, not only that they might be delivered from their fears concerning Peter, but that they might return thanks to God with him and for him. Though Herod had slain one James with the sword, yet here was another James, and that in Jerusalem too, that stood up in his room to preside among the brethren there.

(8) Peter had nothing more to do for the present than to shift for his own safety. He departed, and went into another place. Even the Christian law of suffering for Christ has not repealed the natural law of self-preservation, as far as God gives an opportunity of providing for it.

V. Having seen the triumph of Peter's friends in his deliverance, let us next observe the confusion of his enemies thereupon. The guards were in the utmost consternation upon it (v. 18): As soon as it was day there was no small stir among the soldiers, what had become of Peter. They thought themselves as sure as could be of him but last night; yet now the bird is flown. Thus have the persecutors of the gospel of Christ been often filled with vexation to see its cause conquering. Houses were searched in vain for the rescued prisoner (v. 19): Herod sought for him, and found him not. Who can find whom God hath hidden? All believers have God for their hiding-place. The impotent world cannot reach them. The keepers were reckoned with; Herod examined the keepers, and he commanded that they should be put to death. Herod himself retired upon it: He went down from Judæa to Caesarea, and there abode. He was vexed to the heart, as a lion disappointed of his prey; and the more because he had so much raised the expectation of the people of the Jews concerning Peter. It made him ashamed to be robbed of this boasting, and to see himself disabled to make his words good. This is such a mortification to his proud spirit that he cannot bear to stay in Judæa, but away he goes to Cæsarea.

1. The death of Herod. God reckoned with him, not only for his putting James to death, but for his design to put Peter to death; for sinners will be called to an account for the mischief they have done and the mischief they would have done.

1. How the measure of his iniquity was filled up: it was pride that did it. The instance of it here is very remarkable, and shows how God resists the proud.

(1) The men of Tyre and Sidon had offended Herod. Some very small matter would serve such a man as Herod was for a provocation. He was highly displeased with this people.

(2) The offenders truckled. They submitted and were willing upon any terms to make peace with him. The reason why they were desirous to have the matter accommodated: Because their country was nourished by the king's country. Tyre and Sidon were trading cities, and were always supplied with corn from the land of Canaan. Now if Herod should make a law to prohibit the exportation of corn to Tyre and Sidon their country would be undone. And is it not then our wisdom to make our peace with God, and humble ourselves before him, who have a much more constant and necessary dependence upon him than one country can have upon another? The method they took to prevent a rupture: They made Blastus the king's chamberlain their friend. Blastus had Herod's ear, and has the art of mollifying his resentments; and a time is fixed for the ambassadors of Tyre and Sidon to come and make a public submission, to beg his majesty's pardon, and promise never again to offend. That which will thus feed his pride shall serve to cool his passion.

(3) Herod appeared in all the pomp and grandeur he had: He was arrayed in his royal apparel (v. 21), and sat upon his throne. Foolish people value men by their outward appearance; and no better are those who value themselves by the esteem of such as Herod did, who thought to make up the want of a royal heart with his royal apparel; and sat upon his throne.

(4) He made a speech to the men of Tyre and Sidon, a fine oration, and probably he kept them in suspense as to what their doom should be, till he made this oration to them, that the act of grace might come to them with the more pleasing surprise.

(5) The people applauded him. They gave a shout: It is the voice of a god, and not of a man, v. 22. It was not from any real impression made upon their minds, or any high or good thoughts they had indeed conceived of him; but they were resolved thus to curry favour with him, and strengthen the new-made peace between him and them. Thus great men are made an easy prey to flatterers if they lend an ear to them. This is a great injury to those who are thus flattered, as it makes them forget themselves, and so puffs them up with pride that they are in the utmost danger possible of falling into the condemnation of the devil.

(6) These undue praises he took to himself. This was his sin. His fault was that he said nothing, did not rebuke their flattery, nor give God the glory (v. 23); but was very willing that he should be thought a god and have divine honours paid him.

2. How his iniquity was punished: Immediately (v. 23) the angel of the Lord smote him because he gave not God the glory; and he was eaten of worms and gave up the ghost. Now he was reckoned with for vexing the church of Christ, killing James, imprisoning Peter, and all the other mischiefs he had done. It was no less than an angel that was the agent—the angel of the Lord—for those ministering spirits are the ministers either of divine justice or of divine mercy, as God is pleased to employ them. The angel smote him just at that instant when he was strutting at the applause of the people, and adoring his own shadow. The angel smote him, because he gave not the glory to God. It was no more than a worm that was the instrument of Herod's destruction: He was eaten of worms—he became worm-eaten, so it must be read; rotten he was, and he became like a piece of rotten wood. See here, What vile bodies those are which we carry about with us. We should not be proud of our bodies, we should not pamper our bodies, for this is but feeding the worms, and feeding them for the worms. See what weak and for them. 3. It was when he was sleeping between the soldiers. Not terrified with his danger. There was but a step between him and death, and yet he could lay himself down in peace, and sleep—sleep in the midst of his enemies. Even in prison, between two soldiers, God gives him sleep. Not expecting his deliverance. He did not keep awake, and was perfectly surprised with his deliverance.

III. An angel was sent from heaven on purpose to rescue him.

1. The angel of the Lord came upon him; stood over him. He seemed as one abandoned by men, yet not forgotten of his God. Gates and guards kept all his friends from him, but could not keep the angels of God from him. Wherever the people of God are they have a way open heavenward, nor can anything intercept their intercourse with God.

2. A light shone in the prison. Though it is a dark place, and in the night, Peter shall see his way clear.

3. The angel awoke Peter, by giving him a blow on his side, a gentle touch, enough to rouse him out of his sleep. When good people slumber in a time of danger, let them expect to be smitten on the side by some sharp affliction; better be raised up so than left asleep. The language of this stroke was, Arise up quickly.

4. His chains fell off from his hands. They had handcuffed him, to make him sure, but God loosed his hands.

5. He was ordered to dress himself immediately, and follow the angel; and he did so, v. 8, 9. When Peter was awake he knew not what to do but as the angel directed him. He must gird himself. He must bind on his sandals, that he might be fit to walk. He must cast his garments about him, and follow the angel; and he might go with a great deal of courage and cheerfulness who had a messenger from heaven for his guide and guard. He went out, and followed him. Those who are delivered out of a spiritual imprisonment must follow their deliverer, as Israel did; they went out, not knowing whither they went, but whom they followed. When Peter went out after the angel, he knew not that it was true which was done by the angel, but thought he saw a vision. He thought the news was too good to be true.

6. He was led safely by the angel out of danger, v. 10. Guards were kept at one pass and at another, which they were to make their way through, and they did so without any opposition; nay, for aught that appears, without any discovery. The angel and Peter safely passed the first and second ward. But still there is an iron gate, after all, that will stop them. Up to that gate they march, and it opened to them. They did not so much as put a hand to it, but it opened of its own accord, by an invisible power. When God will work salvation for his people, no difficulties in their way are insuperable; but even gates of iron are made to open of their own accord. This iron gate led him into the city out of the castle or tower, so that, when they were through this, they were got into the street. This deliverance of Peter represents to us our redemption by Christ, which is often spoken of as the setting of prisoners free, not only the proclaiming of liberty to the captives, but the bringing of them out of the prison-house.

7. When this was done, the angel departed from him, and left him to himself. He was out of danger from his enemies, and needed no guard. He knew where he was, and how to find out his friends, and needed no guide. Miracles are not to be expected when ordinary means are to be used.

IV. Having seen how his deliverance was magnified, we are next to see how it was manifested.

1. How Peter came to himself, and so came himself to the knowledge of it, v. 11. So many strange and surprising things coming together upon a man just awoke out of sleep put him for the present into some confusion. At length Peter came to himself, and found that it was not a dream, but a real thing: "Now I know of a surety, now I know that it is truth, that the Lord Jesus hath sent his angel, and by him hath delivered me out of the hands of Herod, and so hath disappointed all the expectation of the people of the Jews." Peter, when he recollected himself, perceived of a truth what great things God had done for him, which at first he could not believe for joy. Thus souls who are delivered out of a spiritual bondage are not at first aware what God has wrought in them. Many have the truth of grace that want the evidence of it. But when the Comforter comes he will let them know of a surety what a blessed change is wrought in them.

2. How Peter came to his friends, and brought the knowledge of it to them.

(1) He considered the thing (v. 12), considered how imminent his danger was, how great his deliverance; and now what has he to do? God's providence leaves room for the use of our prudence; and, though he has undertaken to perform and perfect what he has begun, yet he expects we should consider the thing.

(2) He went directly to a friend's house; it was the house of Mary, a sister of Barnabas, and mother of John Mark. A church in the house makes it a little sanctuary.

(3) There he found many that were gathered together praying, at the dead time of the night, praying for Peter. [1] They continued in prayer, in token of their importunity. (4) He knocked at the gate, and had much ado to get them to let him in (v. 13–16): Peter knocked at the door of the gate. [1] A damsel came to hearken; not to open the door till she knew who was there, and what their business was. It should seem, by her being named, that she was of note among the Christians, and more zealously affected to the better part than most of her age. [2] She knew Peter's voice. contemptible creatures God can make the instruments of his justice. See how God delights not only to bring down proud men, but to bring them down in such a way as is most mortifying. Herod is not only destroyed, but destroyed by worms, that the pride of his glory may be effectually stained.

II. The progress of the gospel after this. 1. The word of God grew and multiplied, v. 24. The courage and comfort of the martyrs, and God's owning them, did more to invite people to Christianity, than their sufferings did to deter them from it. After the death of Herod the word of God gained ground. 2. Barnabas and Saul returned to Antioch: When they had fulfilled their ministry they returned from Jerusalem. Though they had a great many friends there, yet at present their work lay at Antioch; and where our business is there we should be. Barnabas and Saul, when they went to Antioch, took with them John, whose surname was Mark, at whose mother's house they had that meeting for prayer which we read of, v. 12. She was sister to Barnabas. It is probable that Barnabas lodged there, and perhaps Paul with him, while they were at Jerusalem, and their intimacy in that family occasioned their taking a son of that family with them when they returned, to be trained up under them. Educating young men for the ministry, and entering them into it, is a very good work for elder ministers to take care of.

We have not yet met with anything concerning the spreading of the gospel to the Gentiles which bears any proportion to the largeness of that commission, "Go, and disciple all nations". The door was opened in the baptizing of Cornelius and his friends. But here in this chapter that work is revived. I. The solemn ordination of Barnabas and Saul to the great work of spreading the gospel among the nations about, ver. 1–3. II. Their preaching the gospel in Cyprus, and the opposition they met with there from Elymas the sorcerer, ver. 4–13. III. The heads of a sermon which Paul preached to the Jews at Antioch in Pisidia, ver. 14–41. IV. The preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles at their request, ver. 42–49. V. The trouble which the infidel Jews gave to the apostles (ver. 50–52).

Verses 1–3

We have here a divine commission to Barnabas and Saul to go and preach the gospel among the Gentiles.

I. Here is an account of the present state of the church at Antioch.

1. How well furnished it was with good ministers; there were there certain prophets and teachers (v. 1), men that were eminent for gifts, graces, and usefulness. Agabus seems to have been a prophet and not a teacher, and many were teachers who were not prophets. Antioch was a great city, and the Christians there were many; it was therefore requisite they should have many teachers. Barnabas is first named and Saul last, but afterwards the last became first. Three others are mentioned. Simeon, or Simon, who for distinction-sake was called Niger, Simon the Black; Lucius of Cyrene; Manaen, a person of some quality, as it should seem, for he was brought up with Herod the tetrarch, was his comrade and intimate, which gave him a fair prospect of preferment at court, and yet for Christ's sake he quitted all the hopes of it. It is better to be fellow-sufferer with a saint than fellow-persecutor with a tetrarch.

2. How well employed they were (v. 2): They ministered to the Lord, and fasted. Diligent faithful teachers do truly minister unto the Lord. Those that instruct Christians serve Christ. Ministering to the Lord, in one way or other, ought to be the stated business of churches and their teachers. Religious fasting is of use in our ministering to the Lord. Though it was not so much practised by the disciples of Christ, while the bridegroom was with them, yet, after the bridegroom was taken away, they abounded in it.

II. The orders given by the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost said: Separate me Barnabas and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. He does not specify the work, but refers to a former call of which they themselves knew the meaning. The matter was settled between them at Jerusalem before this, that as Peter, James, and John laid out themselves among those of the circumcision, so Paul and Barnabas should go to the heathen. The orders were, Separate me Barnabas and Saul. Christ by his Spirit has the nomination of his ministers. There are some whom the Holy Ghost has separated for the service of Christ, and concerning them directions are given to those who are competent judges: Separate them. Christ's ministers are separated to him and to the Holy Ghost: Separate them to me; they are to be employed in Christ's work and under the Spirit's guidance. All that are separated to Christ as his ministers are separated to work; Christ keeps no servants to be idle. They are separated to take pains, not to take state. The work of Christ's ministers is work which all Christ's ministers hitherto have been called to.

III. Their ordination, not to the ministry in general, but to a particular service in the ministry. Simeon, and Lucius, and Manaen, when they had fasted and prayed, laid their hands on Barnabas and Saul, and sent them away (v. 3). They prayed for them. When good men are going forth about good work, they ought to be solemnly and particularly prayed for. They joined fasting with their prayers, as they did in their other ministrations, v. 3. They laid their hands on them. They gave them their discharge from the present service, in the church of Antioch, acknowledging that they went off not only fairly and with consent, but honourably and with a good report. They implored a blessing upon them in their present undertaking, begged that God would be with them, and give them success. They did not envy Barnabas and Saul the honour to which they were preferred, but cheerfully committed it to them, and they sent them away with all expedition, out of a concern for those countries where they were to break up fallow ground.

I. A general account of the coming of Barnabas and Saul to the famous island of Cyprus. Barnabas was a native of that country (ch. iv. 36), and he was willing they should have the first fruits of his labours. Their being sent forth by the Holy Ghost was the great thing that encouraged them in this undertaking, v. 4. They came to Seleucia, thence crossed the sea to Cyprus, and the first city they came to was Salamis (v. 5); and, when they had sown good seed there, thence they went onward through the isle (v. 6) till they came to Paphos. They preached the word of God in the synagogues of the Jews; so far were they from excluding them that they gave them the preference. They did not act clandestinely, but laid their doctrine open to the censure of the rulers of their synagogues. They had John for their minister; not their servant in common things, but their assistant in the things of God. Such a one might be many ways of use to them, especially in a strange country.

II. A particular account of their encounter with Elymas the sorcerer.

1. There the deputy, a Gentile, Sergius Paulus by name, encouraged the apostles. He was governor of the country, under the Roman emperor. He had the character of a prudent man, that was ruled by reason, not passion, nor prejudice, which appeared by this, that he sent for them, and desired to hear the word of God. Those are wise people, however they may be ranked among the foolish of this world, who are inquisitive after the mind and will of God. If they have a message from God, let him know what it is, he is ready to receive it.

2. There Elymas, a Jew, a sorcerer, opposed them. This Elymas was a pretender to the gift of prophecy, a sorcerer, a false prophet—one that would be taken for a divine. His name was Bar-jesus—the son of Joshua; it signifies the son of salvation; but the Syriac calls him, Bar-shoma—the son of pride; the son of inflation. He was hanging on at court, was with the deputy of the country. He made it his business to withstand Barnabas and Saul. He sought to turn away the deputy from the faith (v. 8), to keep him from receiving the gospel. Satan is in a special manner busy with great men and men of power, to keep them from being religious; because he knows that their example, whether good or bad, will have an influence upon many.

Saul (who is here for the first time called Paul) fell upon him for this with a holy indignation. Saul, who is also called Paul, v. 9. Saul was his name as he was a Hebrew; Paul was his name as he was a citizen of Rome. Hitherto we have had him mostly conversant among the Jews, and therefore called by his Jewish name; but now, when he is sent forth among the Gentiles, he is called by his Roman name. He was filled with the Holy Ghost upon this occasion; filled with power to denounce the wrath of God against him. What Paul said did not come from any personal resentment, but from the strong impressions which the Holy Ghost made upon his spirit. He set his eyes upon him in opposition to his wicked impudence. He gave him his true character, v. 10. He describes him to be, First, An agent for hell. This Elymas, though called Bar-jesus—a son of Jesus—was really a child of the devil. In two things he resembled the devil. In craftiness. Elymas, though void of all wisdom, was full of all subtlety. In malice. He was full of all mischief—a spiteful ill-conditioned man. A fulness of subtlety and mischief together make a man indeed a child of the devil. Secondly, An adversary to heaven. If he be a child of the devil, it follows of course that he is an enemy to all righteousness. He charged upon him his present crime: "Wilt thou not cease to pervert the right ways of the Lord." The ways of the Lord are right; the only right ways to heaven and happiness. There are those who pervert these right ways, who not only wander out of these ways themselves, but mislead others, and suggest to them unjust prejudices against these ways, making them seem crooked ways. Those who pervert the right ways of the Lord are commonly so hardened in it that they will not cease to do it. He denounced the judgment of God upon him, in a present blindness (v. 11): "And now, behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thee; thou shalt be blind, not seeing the sun for a season." He shut his eyes, the eyes of his mind, against the light of the gospel, and therefore justly were the eyes of his body shut against the light of the sun; he sought to blind the deputy, and therefore is himself struck blind. Yet it was a moderate punishment. It was only for a season; if he will repent, and give glory to God, his sight shall be restored; nay, it should seem, though he do not, yet his sight shall be restored. This judgment was immediately executed: There fell on him a mist and a darkness. Let not him any more pretend to be a guide to the deputy's conscience who is himself struck blind. He went about seeking some to lead him by the hand; and where now is all his skill in sorcery.

3. Notwithstanding all the endeavours of Elymas to turn away the deputy from the faith, he was brought to believe, and this miracle contributed to it. The deputy was a very sensible man, and observes something which intimated its divine original. In Paul's preaching: he was astonished at the doctrine of the Lord. The doctrine of Christ has a great deal in it that is astonishing; and the more we know of it the more reason we shall see to wonder and stand amazed at it. In this miracle: When he saw what was done, he believed. It is not said that he was baptized, but it is probable that he was.

III. Their departure from the island of Cyprus. They quitted the country, and went to Perga. Those that went were Paul and his company. Then John Mark quitted them, and returned to Jerusalem, without the consent of Paul and Barnabas. It was his fault, and we shall hear of it again.

Perga in Pamphylia was a noted place, yet nothing at all is related of what Paul and Barnabas did there, only that thither they came (v. 13), and thence they departed, v. 14. The next place we find them in is another Antioch, in Pisidia, to distinguish it from that Antioch in Syria from which they were sent out. Abundance of Jews lived there, and to them the gospel was to be first preached; and Paul's sermon to them is what we have in these verses.

I. The appearance which Paul and Barnabas made in a religious assembly of the Jews at Antioch, v. 14. When they came to Antioch they applied to the Jews, which is a further proof of their good affection to them. They observed their time of worship, on the sabbath day, the Jewish sabbath. The first day of the week they observed among themselves as a Christian sabbath; but, if they will meet the Jews, it must be on the seventh-day sabbath. They met them in their place of worship, in the synagogue. Paul and Barnabas were strangers; but, wherever we come, we must enquire out God's faithful worshippers, and join with them. Though they were strangers, yet they were admitted into the synagogue, and to sit down there. Care should be taken in places of public worship that strangers be accommodated, even the poorest.

II. The invitation given them to preach. 1. The usual service of the synagogue was performed (v. 15): The law and the prophets were read, a portion of each, the lessons for the day. 2. When that was done, they were asked by the rulers of the synagogue to give them a sermon (v. 15): They sent a messenger to them: Men and brethren, if you have any word of exhortation for the people, say on. If they had not an affection to the gospel, yet they had at least the curiosity to hear Paul preach; and therefore begged the favour of him that he would speak a word of exhortation to the people. The bare reading of the scriptures in the public assemblies is not sufficient, but they should be expounded, and the people exhorted out of them. Those that preside, and have power, in public assemblies, should provide for a word of exhortation to the people. Sometimes a word of exhortation from a strange minister may be of great use to the people. These were more noble, more generous, than the rulers of the synagogues generally were.

III. The sermon Paul preached. He gladly embraced the opportunity given him to preach Christ to his countrymen the Jews. He stood up and beckoned with his hand. He waved his hand as an orator endeavouring to move affection, and to show himself in earnest. "Men of Israel, and you that fear God, give audience." Everything is touched in this sermon that might convince the judgment of the Jews, to prevail with them to receive and embrace Christ as the promised Messiah.

1. He owns them to be God's favourite people, whom he had taken into special relation to himself, and for whom he had done great things.

(1) The God of the whole earth was, in a particular manner, the God of this people Israel, a God in covenant with them.

(2) He had chosen their fathers to be his friends: Abraham was called the friend of God. He puts them in mind of this, to let them know that the reason why God favoured them, was because he would adhere to the choice he had made of their fathers.

(3) He had exalted that people, had advanced them into a people, and raised them from nothing, when they dwelt as strangers in the land of Egypt. They ought to remember this, and to infer hence that God was no debtor to them. But they were debtors to him, and obliged to receive such further discoveries as he should make of his will.

(4) He had with a high hand brought them out of Egypt, had delivered them at the expense of a great many miracles, both of mercy to them and judgment on their oppressors.

(5) He had suffered their manners forty years in the wilderness, v. 18. God made a great deal of provision for them for forty years in the wilderness: miracles were their daily bread. He exercised a great deal of patience with them. He bore with them, suffered his anger many a time to be turned away by the prayer and intercession of Moses. So many years as we have each of us lived in this world, we must own that God has thus been as a tender father to us, has been indulgent to us, a God of pardons. We have tried his patience, and yet not tired it.

(6) He had put them in possession of the land of Canaan (v. 19): When he had destroyed seven nations in the land of Canaan, he divided their land to them by lot.

(7) He had raised up men to deliver them out of the hands of those that oppressed them after their settlement in Canaan, v. 20, 21. He gave them judges. Though they were a provoking people, yet upon their petition a deliverer was raised up. He governed them by a prophet, Samuel. He afterwards at their request set a king over them (v. 21), Saul, the son of Cis. At last, he made David their king, v. 22. When God had removed Saul, he raised up unto them David to be their king, and made a covenant of royalty with him, and with his seed. He quotes the testimony God gave concerning him. That his choice was divine: I have found David. Finding implies seeking; as if God had ransacked all the families of Israel to find a man fit for his purpose, and this was he. That his character was divine: A man after my own heart, such a one as I would have, one on whom the image of God is stamped. That his conduct was under divine direction: He shall fulfil all my will. He shall desire and endeavour to do the will of God, and shall be enabled to do it. The changes of their government showed that it made nothing perfect, and therefore must give way to the spiritual kingdom of the Messiah, which was now in the setting up; and therefore they needed not conceive any jealousy at all of the preaching of the gospel.

2. He gives them a full account of our Lord Jesus, and shows that this Jesus is his promised Seed (v. 23): Of this man's seed, from that man after God's own heart, hath God, according to his promise, raised unto Israel a Saviour—Jesus, who carries salvation in his name.

(1) How welcome should the preaching of the gospel of Christ be to the Jews, and how should they embrace it, as well worthy of all acceptation, when it brought them the tidings of a Saviour, a Saviour to save them from their sins, their worst enemies. A Saviour of God's raising up. Raised up to be a Saviour unto Israel, to them in the first place; so far was the gospel from designing the rejection of Israel, that it designed the gathering of them. Raised up of the seed of David, that ancient royal family, which the people of Israel gloried so much in. Raised up according to his promise, the promise to David. Why then should they entertain it so coldly, now that it was brought to them?

(2) Concerning this Jesus, he tells them,

[1] That John the Baptist was his forerunner, that great man whom all acknowledged to be a prophet. Let them not say that the Messiah's coming was a surprise upon them, for they had sufficient warning by John, who preached before his coming, v. 24. He made way for his entrance, by preaching the baptism of repentance to all the people of Israel. He showed them their sins, called them to repentance, and to bring forth fruits meet for repentance. He gave notice of his approach (v. 25): As he fulfilled his course. "Now," saith he, "Whom think you that I am? You may be thinking that I am the Messiah, whom you expect; but you are mistaken, I am not he, but he is at the door; behold, there cometh one immediately after me, whose shoes of his feet I am not worthy to loose, and you may guess who that must be."

[2] That the rulers and people of the Jews, who should have welcomed him, were his persecutors and murderers. When the apostles preach Christ as the Saviour, they are so far from concealing his ignominious death, that they always preach Christ crucified, yea, and crucified by his own people, by those that dwelt in Jerusalem, and their rulers, v. 27. Their sin was that though they found no cause of death in him, yet they desired Pilate that he might be slain (v. 28). They compelled Pilate to crucify him, not only contrary to his inclination, but contrary to his conscience; they condemned him to so great a death, though they could not convict him of the least sin. Justly they might have been cut off from all benefit by the Messiah, who had thus abused him, and yet they were not; notwithstanding all this, the preaching of this gospel shall begin at Jerusalem. The reason of this was because they knew him not, v. 27. Christ owned this in extenuation of their crime: They know not what they do; and so did Peter: I wot that through ignorance you did this, ch. iii. 17. It was also because they knew not the voice of the prophets though they heard them read every sabbath day. They did not understand nor consider that it was foretold that the Messiah should suffer. Many that read the prophets do not know the voice of the prophets. They have the sound of the gospel in their ears, but not the sense of it in their heads. God overruled them, for the accomplishment of the prophecies of the Old Testament: Because they knew not the voice of the prophets, they fulfilled them in condemning him. It is possible that men may be fulfilling scripture prophecies, even when they are breaking scripture precepts. All that was foretold concerning the sufferings of the Messiah was fulfilled in Christ (v. 29): When they had fulfilled all the rest that was written of him, they fulfilled what was foretold concerning his being buried. They took him down from the tree, and laid him in a sepulchre. This is taken notice of here as that which made his resurrection the more illustrious. They laid him in a sepulchre, and thought they had him fast.

[3] That he rose again from the dead. This was the great truth that was to be preached; for it is the main pillar, by which the whole fabric of the gospel is supported.

First, He rose by consent (v. 30): God raised him from the dead. His enemies laid him in a sepulchre, with design he should always lay there; but God said, No.

Secondly, There was sufficient proof of his having risen (v. 31): He was seen many days. They came up with him from Galilee to Jerusalem, and they are his witnesses unto the people. They have attested the thing many a time, and are ready to attest it, though they were to die for the same. Paul says nothing of his own seeing him, because it was in a vision, which was more convincing to himself than it could be to others.

Thirdly, The resurrection of Christ was the performance of the promise. It was not only true news, but good news: "In declaring this, we declare unto you glad tidings (v. 32, 33), which should be in a particular manner acceptable to you Jews. The doctrine we preach, if you receive it aright, brings you the greatest satisfaction imaginable; for it is in the resurrection of Christ that the promise which was made to your fathers is fulfilled to you." The great promise of the Old Testament was that of the Messiah, in whom all the families of the earth should be blessed, and not the family of Abraham only. It was to be the common benefit of all families that he should be raised up to them. God hath raised up Jesus; raised him again (so we read it), meaning from the dead. This is the fulfilling of the promises made to the fathers, the promise of sending the Messiah. "This is he that should come, and in him you have all that God promised in the Messiah, though not all that you promised yourselves." Paul puts himself into the number of the Jews, to whom the promise was fulfilled: To us their children. And the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, which was the great thing that the Jews found themselves aggrieved at, was so far from infringing the promise made to them that the promise itself that all the families of the earth should be blessed in the Messiah, could not otherwise be accomplished.

Fourthly, The resurrection of Christ was the great proof of his being the Son of God, and confirms what was written in the second Psalm. Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. He was declared to be the Son of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead. When he was first raised up out of obscurity, God declared concerning him by a voice from heaven, This is my beloved Son (Matt. iii. 17), which has a plain reference to that in the second Psalm, Thou art my Son. Now all which was declared at Christ's baptism and again at his transfiguration, was undeniably proved by his resurrection. The decree which was so long before declared was then confirmed. "This day have I made it to appear that I have begotten thee."

Fifthly, His being raised the third day, so as not to see corruption, and to a heavenly life, so as no more to return to corruption, further confirms his being the Messiah promised. He rose to die no more. Lazarus came out of the grave with his grave-clothes on, because he was to use them again; but Christ, having no more occasion for them, left them behind. Now this makes them sure mercies indeed that he has risen to die no more. As, if Christ had died and had not risen again, so if he had risen to die again, we had come short of the sure mercies, or at least could not have been sure of them. He rose so soon after he was dead that his body did not see corruption. Now this was one of the sure mercies of David, for it was said to him, Neither wilt thou suffer thy Holy One to see corruption, v. 35. This promise could not have its accomplishment in David, but looked forward to Christ. It could not be accomplished in David himself (v. 36), for David, after he had served his own generation, by the will of God, fell asleep, and was laid to his fathers, and saw corruption. Here we have a short account of the life, death, and burial, of the patriarch David, and his continuance under the power of death. His life: He served his own generation, by the will of God. David was a useful good man; he did good in the world by the will of God. He served his own generation so as therein to serve God. He served the good of men, but did not serve the will of men. David was a great blessing to the age wherein he lived; he was the servant of his generation: many are the curse, and plague, and burden of their generation. Those that will do good in the world must make themselves servants of all. We were not born for ourselves, but are members of communities, to which we must study to be serviceable. Yet here is the difference between David and Christ, that David was to serve only his own generation, but Christ was to serve all generations, must ever live to reign for all ages, as long as the sun and moon endure. His death: He fell asleep. Death is a sleep, a quiet rest, to those who, while they lived, laboured in the service of God and their generation. He did not fall asleep till he had done the work for which God raised him up. God's witnesses never die till they have finished their testimony; and then the sleep of the labouring man will be sweet. His burial: He was laid to his fathers. His continuance in the grave: He saw corruption. We are sure he did not rise again. He saw corruption, and therefore that promise could not have its accomplishment in him. It was accomplished in the Lord Jesus (v. 37): He whom God raised again saw no corruption. Of him therefore the promise must be understood, and no other. Having given them this account of the Lord Jesus, he comes to make application of it. 1. In the midst of his discourse he had told his hearers that they were concerned in all this (v. 26): "To you is the word of this salvation sent. It is sent to you for a word of salvation; if it be not so, it is your own fault." He therefore speaks to them with tenderness and respect: You are men and brethren. Those to whom he does here bring the word of salvation are, (a) The native Jews, Hebrews of the Hebrews, as Paul himself was: Children of the stock of Abraham, to you is this word of salvation sent; nay, it is therefore sent to you, to save you from your sins. It is an advantage to be of a good stock; for, though salvation does not always follow the children of godly parents, yet the word of salvation does. (b) The proselytes: "Whosoever among you that feareth God, to you is the word of this salvation sent; you need the further discoveries and directions of revealed religion, and will bid them welcome, and therefore shall certainly be welcome to take the benefit of them." 2. In the close of his discourse he applies what he had said concerning Christ to his hearers. Now they would be ready to ask, What is all this to us? And he tells them plainly what it is to them. It will be their unspeakable advantage if they embrace Jesus Christ, and believe this word of salvation. "Be it known unto you therefore, men and brethren—we are warranted to proclaim it to you, and you are called to take notice of it." He did not stand up to preach before them, but to preach to them, and not without hopes of prevailing with them. They are brethren, spoken to, and dealt with, by men like themselves; of the same nation. It is proper for the preachers of the gospel to call their hearers brethren, with an affectionate concern for their welfare, and as being equally interested with them in the gospel they preach. Let all that hear the gospel of Christ know these two things: First, That it is an act of indemnity granted to the children of men. It is for and in consideration of the mediation of Christ that this act of grace is passed and proclaimed (v. 38): "Through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins. Your sins may be forgiven. The remission of sins is through this man. By his merit it was purchased, in his name it is offered. We preach to you the forgiveness of sins. That is the salvation we bring you." Secondly, That it does that for us which the law of Moses could not do. "Be it known to you that it is by Christ only that those who believe in him are justified from all things from which you could not be justified by the law of Moses" (v. 39); therefore they ought to entertain and embrace the gospel, and not to adhere to the law in opposition to it. The great concern of sinners is to be justified, and accepted as righteous in God's sight. Those who are truly justified are acquitted from all their guilt. It was impossible for a sinner to be justified by the law of Moses. By Jesus Christ we obtain a complete justification; for by him a complete atonement was made for sin. All that believe in Christ, and give up themselves to be ruled by him, are justified by him. It is at their utmost peril if they reject the gospel of Christ (v. 40, 41): "Beware therefore. Beware lest you not only come short of the blessings and benefits spoken of in the prophets, but fall under the doom spoken of in the prophets; lest that come upon you which is spoken of." The threatenings are warnings, designed to awaken us to beware lest it should come upon us. The apostle follows the Septuagint translation, which reads, Behold, you despisers (for, behold, you among the heathen). Beware lest it be said to you, Behold, you despisers. It is the ruin of many that they despise religion, they look upon it as a thing below them, and are not willing to stoop to it. "Take heed lest the judgment come upon you which was spoken of in the prophets: that you shall wonder and perish." Those that will not wonder and be saved shall wonder and perish. Those that enjoyed the privileges of the church will wonder when they find that their privileges do but make their condemnation the more intolerable. Let the unbelieving Jews expect that God will work a work in their days which you shall in no wise believe, though a man declare it unto you. This may be understood as a prediction, either, (1) Of their sin, that they should be incredulous, that that great work of God, the redemption of the world by Christ, though it should be in the most solemn manner declared unto them, yet they would in no wise believe it. Those that had the honour and advantage to have this work wrought in their days had not the grace to believe it. Or, (2) Of their destruction, a work which one would not have believed should have ever been done, considering how much they had been the favourites of Heaven. Thus is there a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity, especially to the despisers of Christ.

The design of this story being to vindicate the apostles, especially Paul, it is here observed that he proceeded therein with all the caution imaginable.

I. There were some of the Jews that were so incensed against the preaching of the gospel that they would not bear to hear it, but went out of the synagogue (v. 42). Now this bespoke: An open infidelity. They thus publicly avowed their contempt of Christ and of his doctrine, and they thus endeavoured to beget prejudices in the minds of others. An obstinate infidelity. They went out of the synagogue to show that they did not believe the gospel, they were resolved they would not. Justly therefore was the gospel taken from them, when they first took themselves from it. For it is certainly true that God never leaves any till they first leave him.

II. The Gentiles were as willing to hear the gospel as those Jews were to get out of the hearing of it: They besought that these words might be preached to them the next sabbath. They begged that forgiveness of sins through Christ might be preached to them. The Jews' leavings, nay, loathings, were their longings. This justifies Paul in his preaching to them, that he was invited to it. Who could refuse to break the bread of life to those who begged so hard for it, and to give that to the poor at the door which the children at the table threw under their feet? They had heard the doctrine of Christ, but did not understand it at the first hearing, and therefore they begged it might be preached to them again. What we have heard we should desire to hear again, that it may take deep root in us, and the nail that is driven may be clenched. It aggravates the bad disposition of the Jews that the Gentiles desired to hear that often which they were not willing to hear once.

III. There were many, both of Jews and proselytes, that were wrought upon by the preaching of the gospel. Many of the Jews and religious proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas. They submitted to the grace of God, and were admitted to the benefit and comfort of it. They followed Paul and Barnabas; they became their disciples, or rather the disciples of Christ. Those that join themselves to Christ will join themselves to his ministers, and follow them. And Paul and Barnabas bade those of the Jews welcome that were willing to come under their instructions. They were exhorted and encouraged to persevere herein: Paul and Barnabas, speaking to them, persuaded them to continue in the grace of God. And the grace of God shall not be wanting to those who thus continue in it.

IV. The next sabbath day (v. 44): Almost the whole city came together to hear the word of God. This brought a vast concourse of people to the synagogue on the sabbath day. Some came out of curiosity, others longing to see what the Jews would do, and many who had heard something of the word of God came to hear more, and to hear it, not as the word of men but as the word of God. Now this justified Paul in preaching to the Gentiles, that he met with the most encouraging auditors among them.

V. The Jews were enraged at this; and not only would not receive the gospel themselves, but were filled with indignation at those that crowded after it (v. 45): When the Jews saw the multitudes, this filled them with envy. They grudged the interest the apostles had in the people. This was the same spirit that worked in the Pharisees towards Christ; they were cut to the heart when they saw the whole world go after him. They opposed the doctrine the apostles preached: They spoke against those things that were spoken by Paul, finding some fault or other with everything he said, contradicting and blaspheming. They contradicted for contradiction-sake, and when they could find no colour of objection, they broke out into ill language against Christ and his gospel, blaspheming him and it. Commonly those who begin with contradicting end with blaspheming.

VI. The apostles hereupon solemnly declare themselves discharged from their obligation to the Jews, and at liberty to bring the word of salvation to the Gentiles. The Jews had the tender of the gospel, and did refuse it, and therefore ought not to say anything against the Gentiles having it. In declaring this, it is said (v. 46), Paul and Barnabas waxed bold. There is a time for the preachers of the gospel to show as much of the boldness of the lion as of the harmlessness of the dove. When the adversaries of Christ's cause begin to be daring, it is not for its advocates to be timid. The impudence of the enemies of the gospel, instead of frightening, should rather embolden its friends. They know in whom they had trusted to bear them out. Now Paul and Barnabas, having made the Jews a fair offer of gospel grace, here give them fair notice of their bringing it to the Gentiles. 1. They own that the Jews were entitled to the first offer: "It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you, to whom the promise was made, to whom Christ reckoned himself first sent." 2. They charge them with the refusal of it: You put it from you. If men put the gospel from them, God justly takes it from them. Herein they judge themselves unworthy of everlasting life. In one sense we must all judge ourselves unworthy of everlasting life, for there is nothing in us by which we can pretend to merit it, but here the meaning is, "You make it to appear, that you are not meet for eternal life. You do, in effect, pass this judgment upon yourselves, and out of your own mouth you shall be judged; you will not have it by Christ, by whom alone it is to be had, and so shall your doom be, you shall not have it at all." 3. Upon this they ground their preaching the gospel to the uncircumcised: "Lo, we turn to the Gentiles. If one will not, another will." 4. They justify themselves in this by a divine warrant (v. 47): "For so hath the Lord commanded us." This is according to what was foretold in the Old Testament. When the Messiah, in the prospect of the Jews' infidelity, was ready to say, I have laboured in vain, he was told, that though Israel were not gathered, yet he should be glorious. "For I have set thee to be a light of the Gentiles, that thou shouldst be for salvation unto the ends of the earth." He is set up to be a light; he enlightens the understanding, and so saves the soul. He is, and is to be, light and salvation to the Gentiles, to the end of the earth. All nations shall at length become his kingdom. This prophecy has had its accomplishment in part in the setting up of the kingdom of Christ in this island of ours.

VII. The Gentiles cheerfully embraced that which the Jews scornfully rejected, v. 48, 49. How the Gentiles welcomed this happy turn in their favour!

1. They took the comfort of it: When they heard this they were glad. It was good news to them. They were as welcome to the benefits of the Messiah's kingdom as the Jews themselves, and might share in their promise. When the Gentiles did but hear that the offers of grace should be made them they were glad. Many grieve under doubts whether they have an interest in Christ or no, when they should be rejoicing that they have an interest in him.

2. They gave God the praise of it: They glorified the word of the Lord, the gospel; the more they knew of it, the more they admired it. Oh! what a light, what a power, what a treasure, does this gospel bring along with it! Because now the knowledge of it was diffused, and not confined to the Jews only. It is the glory of the word of the Lord that the further it spreads the brighter it shines, which shows it to be not like the light of the candle, but like that of the sun when he goes forth in his strength. Because now the knowledge of it was brought to them. Those speak best of the honour of the word of the Lord that have themselves been subdued by its power, and comforted by its sweetness.

3. Many of them became sincerely obedient to the faith: As many as were ordained to eternal life believed. Those believed to whom God gave grace to believe. Those came to Christ whom the Father drew, and to whom the Spirit made the gospel call effectual. God gave this grace to believe to all those among them who were ordained to eternal life; or, as many as were disposed to eternal life, as many as had a concern about their eternal state, and aimed to make sure of eternal life, and it was the grace of God that wrought it in them.

4. When they believed they did what they could to spread the knowledge of Christ (v. 49): And the word of the Lord was published throughout all the region. Those new converts were themselves ready to communicate to others that which they were so full of themselves. Those that have become acquainted with Christ themselves will do what they can to bring others acquainted with him. Those in great and rich cities that have received the gospel should not think to engross it, but should do what they can to get it published in the country among the ordinary sort of people, who have souls to be saved as well as they.

VIII. Paul and Barnabas, having sown the seeds of a Christian church there, quitted the place, and went to do the like elsewhere. We read not anything of their working miracles here, to confirm their doctrine. Though God then did ordinarily make use of that method of conviction. Begetting faith by the immediate influence of his Spirit was itself the greatest miracle to those in whom it was wrought.

1. How the unbelieving Jews expelled the apostles out of that country. They raised persecution against Paul and Barnabas. Satan and his agents are most exasperated against the preachers of the gospel when they see them go on successfully. Thus it has been the common lot of the best men in the world to suffer ill for doing well. (1) What method the Jews took to give them trouble: They stirred up the devout and honourable women against them. It is sad when, under colour of devotion to God, they conceive an enmity to Christ, as those here mentioned. What! women persecutors! Can they forget the tenderness and compassion of their sex? What! honourable women! Can they thus stain their honour. But, which is strangest of all, devout women! Will they kill Christ's servants, and think therein they do God service? By these devout and honourable women they stirred up likewise the chief men of the city, the magistrates and the rulers, and set them against the apostles. (2) How far they carried it, so far that they expelled them out of their coasts; they banished them. It was not by fear, but downright violence, that they were driven out. This was a method God took to make those that were well disposed the more warmly affected towards the apostles; for it is natural to us to pity those that are persecuted, and to be the more ready to help them. The expelling of the apostles out of their coasts perhaps raised them more friends than conniving at them in their coasts would have done.

2. How the apostles abandoned and rejected the unbelieving Jews (v. 51): They shook off the dust of their feet against them. They declared that they would have no more to do with them. They expressed their detestation of their infidelity. As Jews and Gentiles, if they believe, are equally acceptable to God and good men; so, if they do not, they are equally abominable. Thus they set them at defiance, and expressed their contempt of them and their malice. Thus they left a testimony behind them that they had had a fair offer made them of the grace of the gospel. Thus Christ had ordered them to do, and for this reason, Matt. x. 14; Luke ix. 5. When they left them, they came to Iconium, not so much for safety, as for work.

3. What frame they left the new converts in at Antioch (v. 52): The disciples went on with their work. They were very cheerful. One would have expected that when Paul and Barnabas were expelled out of their coasts, the disciples would have been full of grief and full of fear. But no; they were filled with joy in Christ. All their fears were swallowed up in their believing joys. They were courageous, wonderfully animated with a holy resolution to cleave to Christ. The more we relish the comforts and encouragements we meet with in the power of godliness the better prepared we are to face the difficulties we meet with in the profession of godliness.

CHAP. XIV

A further account of the progress of the gospel by the ministry of Paul and Barnabas among the Gentiles. Here is, I. Their successful preaching of the gospel for some time at Iconium, and their being driven thence by the violence of their persecutors, ver. 1–7. II. Their healing a lame man at Lystra, ver. 8–18. III. The outrage of the people against Paul, the effect of which was that they stoned him, as they thought to death, ver. 19, 20. IV. The visit which Paul and Barnabas made to the churches which they had planted, ver. 21–23. V. They return to Antioch, and the report they made to the church of Antioch, of their expedition, ver. 24–28.

I. The preaching of the gospel in Iconium. As the blood of the martyrs has been the seed of the church, so the banishment of the confessors has helped to scatter that seed. They made the first offer of the gospel to the Jews in their synagogues. Though the Jews at Antioch had used them barbarously, yet they did not therefore decline preaching the gospel to the Jews at Iconium. Let not those of any denomination be condemned in the gross, nor some suffer for others' faults. The apostles concurred herein. They went both together into the synagogue to testify their unanimity and mutual affection.

II. The success of their preaching there: They so spoke that a great multitude, both of the Jews and also of the Greeks, that is the Gentiles, believed. The gospel was now preached to Jews and Gentiles together. In the close of the foregoing chapter it was preached first to the Jews, and then to the Gentiles, but here they are put together. The Jews have not so lost their preference as to be thrown behind, only the Gentiles are brought to stand upon even terms with them, and both together admitted into the church without distinction. There seems to have been something remarkable in the manner of the apostles' preaching there: They so spoke that a great multitude believed—so plainly, so convincingly, so warmly, so affectionately. What they spoke came from the heart and therefore was likely to reach to the heart. So boldly and courageously, that those who heard them could not but say that God was with them of a truth.

III. The opposition that their preaching met with there. Unbelieving Jews were the first spring of their trouble here, as elsewhere (v. 2): they stirred up the Gentiles. The influence which the gospel had upon many of the Gentiles, and their embracing it, as it provoked some of the Jews to a holy jealousy, so it provoked others of them to a wicked jealousy. Disaffected Gentiles, irritated by the unbelieving Jews, were the instruments of their trouble. The Jews, by false suggestions, made their minds evil affected against the brethren. They soured and embittered their spirits against both the converters and the converted. It is no wonder if those who are ill affected towards good people wish ill to them and contrive ill against them; it is all owing to ill will. They molested the minds of the Gentiles (so some of the critics take it); they were continually teasing them. The tools of persecutors have a dog's life, set on continually.

IV. Their continuance in their work there, and God's owning them in it, v. 3. We have here, 1. The apostles working for Christ. Because the minds of the Gentiles were evil affected against them, one would think that therefore they should have withdrawn. On the contrary, therefore they abode there a long time, speaking boldly in the Lord. The more they perceived the spite against the new converts, the more they were animated to go on in their work. They spoke boldly, and were not afraid of giving offence to the unbelieving Jews. But observe what animated them: They spoke boldly in the Lord, in his strength, not depending upon anything in themselves. 2. Christ working with the apostles, according to his promise, Lo, I am with you always. He failed not to give testimony to the word of his grace. The gospel is a word of grace, the assurance of God's goodwill to us. It is the word of Christ's grace, for it is in him alone that we find favour with God. Christ himself has attested this word of grace; he has assured us that it is the word of God. It is said particularly concerning the apostles here that the Lord confirmed their testimony, in granting signs and wonders to be done by their hands—in the miracles they wrought in the kingdom of nature—as well as in the greater miracles wrought on men's minds by the power of divine grace. The Lord was with them, while they were with him.

V. The division which this occasioned in the city (v. 4): The multitude of the city was divided. It seems, this business of the preaching of the gospel was so universally taken notice of that every person, even of the multitude of the city, was either for it or against it; none stood neuter. We may here see the meaning of Christ's prediction that he came not to send peace upon earth, but rather division, Luke xii. 51–53. If all would have given in unanimously into his measures, there would have been universal concord; but, disagreeing here, the breach was wide as the sea. It is better that part of the city go to heaven than all to hell. Let us not think it strange if the preaching of the gospel occasion division, it is better to be persecuted as dividers for swimming against the stream than yield ourselves to be carried down the stream that leads to destruction.

VI. The attempt made upon the apostles by their enemies. Their evil affection against them broke out at length into violent outrages, v. 5. Who the plotters were: Both the Gentiles and the Jews, with their rulers. The Gentiles and Jews were at enmity with one another, and yet united against Christians. If the church's enemies can thus unite for its destruction, shall not its friends unite for its preservation? What the plot was. Their design was to use the apostles despitefully, to expose them to disgrace, and then to stone them.

VII. The deliverance of the apostles, v. 6, 7. They got away, upon notice given them of the design against them, and they made an honourable retreat (for it was not an inglorious flight) to Lystra and Derbe. They found safety. God has shelters for his people in a storm. They found work, and this was what they went for. To these cities they went, and there, and in the region that lieth round about, they preached the gospel. In times of persecution ministers may see cause to quit the spot, when yet they do not quit the work.

I. A miraculous cure wrought by Paul at Lystra upon a cripple that had been lame from his birth. The deplorable case of the poor cripple (v. 8): He was impotent in his feet, disabled (so the word is). It was well known that he had been so from his mother's womb, and that he never had walked, nor could stand up. The expectation that was raised in him of a cure (v. 9): He heard Paul preach, and, it is likely, was much affected with what he heard. This Paul was aware of, by the spirit of discerning, perhaps the aspect of his countenance did in part witness for him: Paul perceived that he had faith to be healed. The cure wrought: Paul, perceiving that he had faith to be healed, brought the word and healed him. Paul spoke to him with a loud voice, that the people about might take notice, and have their expectations raised of the effect. It is said (v. 8) that he sat, not that he sat begging. But we may imagine how welcome Paul's word was to him, "Stand upright on thy feet; help thyself, and God shall help thee." He leaped and walked, and not only stood upright, but he walked to and fro before them all. Those that by the grace of God are cured of their spiritual lameness must show it by leaping with a holy exultation and walking in a holy conversation.

II. The impression which this cure made upon the people: they were amazed at it. The working of this one miracle was enough to make them in the eyes of this people truly great and honourable, though the multitude of Christ's miracles could not screen him from the utmost contempt among the Jews. The people take them for gods (v. 11): They lifted up their voices in the speech of Lycaonia, The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. This notion of the thing agreed well enough with the fabulous account they had of the visits which their gods made to this lower world; and proud enough they were to think that they should have a visit made to them. They carried this notion so far here that they pretended to tell which of their gods they were (v. 12): They called Barnabas Jupiter; for, if they will have him to be a god, it is as easy to make him the prince of their gods as not. And Paul they called Mercury, who was the messenger of the gods, for Paul was the chief speaker. The priest thereupon prepares to do sacrifice to them, v. 13. The temple of Jupiter was before the gate of their city, as its protector and guardian; and the priest, hearing the people cry out thus, thought it was time for him to do his duty. If Jupiter be among them himself, it concerns him to do him the utmost honours imaginable. When Christ appeared in the likeness of men, and did many, very many miracles, yet they were so far from doing sacrifice to him that they made him a sacrifice. But Paul and Barnabas, upon the working of one miracle, are immediately deified. They brought oxen, to be sacrificed to them, and garlands, with which to crown the sacrifices.

III. Paul and Barnabas protest against this, and with much ado prevent it. Many of the heathen emperors called themselves gods, and took a pride in having divine honours paid them: but Christ's ministers refused those honours when they were tendered. The holy indignation which Paul and Barnabas conceived at this: When they heard this, they rent their clothes. We do not find that they rent their clothes when the people vilified them, they could bear this without disturbance: but when they deified them, and spoke of worshipping them, they could not bear it. The pains they took to prevent it. They did not connive at it. Christ had put honour enough upon them in making them apostles, they needed not assume either the honour of princes or the honour of gods. Let us see how they prevented it. They ran in among the people as soon as they heard of it. They did not stand still, expecting honours to be done them, but plainly declined them by thrusting themselves into the crowd. They reasoned with them, crying out, "Sirs, why do you these things? Why do you go about to make gods of us?"

[1] "Our nature will not admit it: We also are men of like passions with you. You wrong God if you give that honour to us, or to any other man, which is to be given to God only. We are not only men, but sinful men and suffering men, and therefore will not be deified.

[2] "Our doctrine is directly against it. Must we be added to the number of your gods whose business it is to abolish the gods you have? We preach unto you that you should turn from these vanities unto the living God." When they preached to the Jews they had nothing to do but to preach the grace of God in Christ, and needed not to preach against idolatry; but, when they had to do with the Gentiles, they must rectify their mistakes in natural religion. See here what they preached to the Gentiles.

First, The gods which they and their fathers worshipped, and all the ceremonies of their worship of them, were vanities, idle things, unreasonable, unprofitable. Therefore turn from these vanities.

Secondly, The God to whom they would have them turn is the living God. They had hitherto worshipped dead images, that were utterly unable to help them, now they are persuaded to worship a living God, who has life in himself, and life for us, and lives for evermore.

Thirdly, This God is the creator of the world, the fountain of all being and power: "He made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all things therein. We call you to worship the God that made you and all the world; worship the true God."

Fourthly, The world owed it to his patience that he had not destroyed them long ere this for their idolatry (v. 16): In times past he suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. Your serving them was a trial of God's patience. Now that he has sent his gospel into the world, if you still continue in your idolatry, he will not bear with you as he has done. Now that God has sent a revelation into the world which is to be published to all nations the case is altered. Now you will no longer be excused in these vanities, but must turn from them. God's patience with us hitherto should lead us to repentance, and not encourage us to presume. Our having done ill while we were in ignorance will not bear us out in doing ill when we are better taught.

Fifthly, Even when they were not under the direction and correction of the word of God, yet they should have known, to do better by the works of God, v. 17. He left not himself without witness; besides the witness for God within them (the dictates of natural conscience), they had witnesses for God round about them—the bounty of common providence. Their having no scriptures did in part excuse them. This however did not wholly excuse them. There were other witnesses for God. God, having not left himself without witness, has not left us without a guide, and so has left us without excuse. The bounties of common providence witness to us that there is a God. The rain and fruitful seasons could not come by chance. All the powers of nature witness to us a sovereign power in the God of nature. It is not the heaven that gives us rain, but God that gives us rain from heaven. The benefits we have by these bounties witness to us that we ought to make our acknowledgments to the Creator. He left not himself without witness in that he did good. God seems to reckon the instances of his goodness to be more pregnant, cogent proofs of his title to our homage than the evidences of his greatness; for his goodness is his glory. Because the most sensible instance of the goodness of Providence is that of the daily provision made by it of meat and drink for us, the apostle chooses to insist upon that, and shows how God does us good, (1) In preparing it for us. He does us good in giving us rain from heaven,—rain for us to drink,—rain for our land to drink, for our meat, as well as drink we have from the rain; in giving us this, he gives us fruitful seasons. Of all the common operations of providence, the heathen chose to form their notion of the supreme God by that which bespeaks terror, and this was the thunder. But the apostle sets before us his beneficence, that we may have good thoughts of him—may love him and delight in him, as one that does good, in giving rain from heaven and fruitful seasons. (2) In giving us the comforts of it. It is he that fills our hearts with food and gladness. God is not only a benefactor, but a bountiful one. He fills our hearts with food, not merely for necessity, but plenty, dainty, and variety. The Gentiles that lived without God in the world, yet lived upon God. Those heathen had their hearts filled with food; but these things will not fill the soul, nor will those that know how to value their own souls be satisfied with them. We must all own that God fills our hearts with food and gladness; not only food, that we may live, but gladness, that we may live cheerfully. We must thank God, not only for our food, but for our gladness. And, if our hearts be filled with food and gladness, they ought to be filled with love and thankfulness.

Lastly, The success of this prohibition which the apostles gave to the people (v. 18): By these sayings, they restrained the people from doing sacrifice to them. They could scarcely restrain them from it. Paul and Barnabas had cured a cripple, and therefore the people deified them, which should make us very cautious that we do not give that honour to another, or take it to ourselves, which is due to God only.

I. How Paul was stoned and left for dead, v. 19, 20. They fell upon Paul rather than Barnabas, because Paul, being the chief speaker, galled and vexed them more than Barnabas did. How the people were incensed against Paul; there came certain Jews from Antioch, and they incensed the people against them. See how restless the rage of the Jews was against the gospel of Christ; they could not bear that it should have footing anywhere. To what degree they were incensed by these barbarous Jews: the mob rose and stoned Paul, and then drew him out of the city supposing he had been dead. As it is with great difficulty that men are restrained from evil on one side, so it is with great ease that they are persuaded to evil on the other side. See how fickle worldly people are. Those that but the other day would have treated the apostles as more than men now treat them as worse than brutes. Today Hosanna, tomorrow Crucify; today sacrificed to, tomorrow sacrificed. Popular breath turns like the wind. How he was delivered by the power of God: When he was drawn out of the city, the disciples stood round about him, v. 20. It seems there were some here at Lystra that became disciples, and even these new converts had courage to own Paul when he was thus run down. They stood round about him, as a guard to him, stood about him to see whether he were alive or dead; and all of a sudden he rose up. God's faithful servants, though they may be brought within a step of death, shall not die as long as he has work for them to do.

II. How they went on with their work. All the stones they threw at Paul could not beat him off from his work: They drew him out of the city (v. 19), but he came into the city again. However, their being persecuted here is a known indication to them to seek for opportunities of usefulness elsewhere, and therefore for the present they quit Lystra.

1. They went to break up and sow fresh ground at Derbe. Thither the next day Paul and Barnabas departed, there they preached the gospel, there they taught many, v. 21. Nothing is recorded that happened at Derbe.

2. They returned, and went over their work again; and, having stayed as long as they thought fit at Derbe, they came back to Lystra, to Iconium, and Antioch, v. 21.

(1) They confirmed the souls of the disciples, v. 22. Young converts are apt to waver, and a little thing shocks them. The apostles come and tell them that this is the true grace of God wherein they stand, that there is no danger like that of losing their part in Christ, no advantage like that of keeping their hold of him; that, whatever their trials may be, they shall have strength from Christ to pass through them; and, whatever their losses may be, they shall be abundantly recompensed. And this confirms the souls of the disciples. Those that are converted need to be confirmed; those that are planted need to be rooted. Ministers' work is to establish saints as well as to awaken sinners. True confirmation is confirmation of the soul. It is the grace of God and nothing less, that can effectually confirm the souls of the disciples.

(2) They exhorted them to continue in the faith; or, they encouraged them. They told them it was both their duty and interest to persevere. Those that are in the faith are concerned to continue in the faith. And it is requisite that they should often be exhorted to do so.

(3) That which they insisted most upon was that we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God. But is this the way to confirm the souls of the disciples, and to engage them to continue in the faith? One would think it would rather shock them, and make them weary. No, as the matter is fairly stated it will help to confirm them. It is true they will meet with tribulation. It is so appointed. They must undergo it, there is no remedy, all that will live godly in Christ Jesus should suffer persecution. All that will be Christ's disciples must take up their cross. When we gave up our names to Jesus Christ it was what we agreed to; when we sat down and counted the cost, if we reckoned aright, it was what we counted upon. It is the lot of the leaders in Christ's army, as well as of the soldiers. It is not only you, but we, that are subject to it. As Christ did not put the apostles upon any harder service than what he underwent before them, so neither did the apostles put the ordinary christians. It is true we must count upon much tribulation, but this is encouraging, that we shall get through it. We shall not only get through it, but get through it into the kingdom of God. It is true we must go by the cross, but it is as true that we shall go to the crown.

(4) They ordained them elders in every church. Now at this second visit they settled them in some order, under the guidance of a settled ministry. Every church had its governors or presidents. It is requisite that every particular church should have one or more such to preside in it. Those governors were then elders, to see to the observance and execution of the laws Christ has made. These elders were ordained. They, having devoted themselves, were solemnly set apart to the work of the ministry. These elders were ordained to them, to their service, for their good. Those that are in the faith have need to be build up in it, and have need of the elders' help therein.

(5) By prayer joined with fasting they commended them to the Lord on whom they believed. Even when persons are brought to believe, ministers' care concerning them is not over. There is still that lacking in their faith which needs to be perfected. The ministers that take most care of those that believe must after all commend them to the Lord. To his custody they must commit themselves, and their ministers must commit them. It is by prayer that they must be commended to the Lord. It is a great encouragement to us that we can say, "It is he in whom they believed; we commit to him those who have committed themselves to him." It is good to join fasting with prayer, in token of our humiliation for sin, and in order to add vigour to our prayers. When we are parting with our friends, the bare farewell is to commend them to the Lord, and to leave them with him.

3. They went on preaching the gospel in other places where they had been. From Antioch they passed through Pisidia, thence they came into the province of Pamphylia, the head-city of which was Perga, where they had been before (ch. xiii. 13), and came thither again to preach the word (v. 25). Thence they went down to Attalia, a city of Pamphylia. They stayed not long at a place, but wherever they came endeavoured to lay a foundation which might afterwards be built upon, and to sow the seeds which would in time produce a great increase.

III. How they at length came back to Antioch in Syria, whence they had been sent forth. From Attalia they came by sea to Antioch, v. 26.

1. Why they came thither: because thence they had been recommended to the grace of God. The brethren having recommended them to the grace of God, for the work which they fulfilled, they thought they owed them an account of it, that they might help them by their praises, as they had been helped by their prayers.

2. What account they gave them of their negotiation (v. 27): They gathered the church together. They gave them an account of two things: (1) Of the tokens they had had of the divine presence with them in their labours: They rehearsed all that God had done with them. They did not tell what they had done, but what God had done. For it is he that not only worketh in us both to will and to do, but then worketh with us to make what we do successful. God's grace can do anything without ministers' preaching; but ministers' preaching can do nothing without God's grace. (2) Of the fruit of their labours among the heathen. They told how God had opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles. There is no entering into the kingdom of Christ but by the door of faith. It is God that opens the door of faith. We have reason to be thankful that God has opened the door of faith to the Gentiles. Thus the gospel was spread, and it shone more and more, and none was able to shut this door which God had opened.

3. How they disposed of themselves for the present: There they abode a long time with the disciples (v. 28), not because they feared their enemies, but because they loved their friends.

CHAP. XV

In this chapter we find other work (not so pleasant) cut out for them. The Christians and ministers are engaged in controversy. When they should have been making war upon the devil's kingdom they have much ado to keep the peace in Christ's kingdom. I. A controversy raised at Antioch by the judaizing teachers, ver. 1, 2. II. A consultation held with the church at Jerusalem about this matter, ver. 3–5. III. An account of what passed in the synod that was convened upon this occasion, ver. 6. What Peter said, ver. 7–11. What Paul and Barnabas discoursed of, ver. 12. And, lastly, what James proposed for the settling of this matter, ver. 13–21. IV. The result of this debate, and the circular letter that was written to the Gentile converts, ver. 22–29. V. The delivering of this determination to the church at Antioch, ver. 30–35. VI. A second expedition designed by Paul and Barnabas to preach to the Gentiles, in which they quarrelled about their assistant, and separated upon it, ver. 36–41.

Verses 1–5

Even when things go on very smoothly and pleasantly it is folly to be secure; some uneasiness or other will arise, which is not foreseen. If ever there was a heaven upon earth, surely it was in the church at Antioch at this time. But here we have their peace disturbed, and differences arising.

I. A new doctrine started among them, obliging the Gentile converts to submit to circumcision and the ceremonial law, v. 1.

1. The persons that urged this were certain men who came down from Judæa. They came to Antioch, because that was the headquarters of those that preached to the Gentiles, and the rendezvous of the Gentile converts; and, if they could but make an interest there, this leaven would soon be diffused to all the churches of the Gentiles. Yet one thing they lack, they must be circumcised. Those that are ever so well taught have need to stand upon their guard that they be not untaught again, or ill taught.

2. The position they laid down was this, that except the Gentiles who turned Christians were circumcised after the manner of Moses, they could not be saved. Many of the Jews who embraced the faith of Christ, yet continued very zealous for the law, ch. xxi. 20. They knew it was from God and its authority was sacred, and had been bred up in the observance of it. Herein they were connived at, because the prejudices of education are not to be overcome all at once. But it did not suffice them that they were herein indulged themselves, they must have the Gentile converts brought under the same obligations. There is a strange proneness in us to make our own opinion and practice a rule and a law to everybody else, and to conclude that because we do well all do wrong that do not just as we do. Those Jews who believed that Christ was the Messiah could not get clear of the notions they had of the Messiah, that he should set up a temporal kingdom in favour of the Jewish nation; it was a disappointment to them that there was as yet nothing done towards this. But now that they hear the doctrine of Christ is received among the Gentiles, and his kingdom begins to be set up in the midst of them, they hope their point will be gained, the Jewish nation will be made as considerable as they can wish, though in another way. It is no wonder if those who have wrong notions of the kingdom of Christ take wrong measures for the advancement of it. It is observable what a mighty stress they laid upon it; they do not only say, "You ought to be circumcised after the manner of Moses. Except you be circumcised you cannot be saved. If you be not herein of our mind and way, you will never go to heaven, and therefore of course you must go to hell." Though otherwise good men and believers in Christ, yet they cannot be saved; salvation itself cannot save them. None are in Christ, but those that are within their pale.

II. The opposition which Paul and Barnabas gave to this schismatical notion (v 2): They had no small dissension and disputation with them. They would by no means yield to this doctrine. As faithful servants of Christ, they would not see his truths betrayed. They knew that Christ came to free us from the yoke of the ceremonial law, and therefore could not bear to hear of circumcising the Gentile converts, when their instructions were only to baptize them. As spiritual fathers to the Gentile converts, they would not see their liberties encroached upon. They had told the Gentiles that if they believed in Jesus Christ they should be saved. And therefore the apostles set themselves against it.

III. The expedient pitched upon for preventing the mischief of this dangerous notion. They determined that Paul and Barnabas, and some others of their number, should go to Jerusalem to the apostles and elders. They sent the case to Jerusalem: Because those who taught this doctrine came from Jerusalem, and pretended to have directions from the apostles there. It was therefore very proper to send to Jerusalem about it, to know if they had any such direction from the church there. And it was soon found to be all wrong. It was true that these went out from them (v. 24), but they never had any such orders from them. Because those who were taught this doctrine would be the better confirmed in their opposition to it, if they were sure that the apostles and elders at Jerusalem were against it. Because the apostles at Jerusalem were fittest to be consulted in a point not yet fully settled; their decision would be likely to end the controversy.

IV. Their journey to Jerusalem upon this errand, v. 3: They were brought on their way by the church. Thus the church showed their favour to those who stood up for them. They did good as they went along. They visited the churches by the way; they passed through Phenice and Samaria, and as they went declared the conversion of the Gentiles, which caused great joy to all the brethren. The progress of the gospel is and ought to be a matter of great joy. All the brethren in Christ's family rejoice when more are born into the family; for the family will be never the poorer for the multitude of its children. In Christ and heaven there is portion enough, and inheritance enough for them all.

V. Their hearty welcome at Jerusalem, v. 4. The good entertainment their friends gave them: They were received of the church, and of the apostles and elders. They received them with all possible expressions of love and friendship. The good entertainment they gave their friends: They declared all things that God had done with them, gave them an account of the success of their ministry among the Gentiles. As they went they had planted, as they came back they had watered; but in both they were ready to own it was God that gave the increase.

VI. The opposition they met with from the same party at Jerusalem, v. 5. There rose up certain of the sect of the Pharisees. They believed in Christ but thought it was needful to circumcise them. Those who have been most prejudiced against the gospel yet have been captivated by it. When Christ was here upon earth, few or none of the rulers and of the Pharisees believed on him; but now there are those of the sect of the Pharisees who believed, and many of them, we hope, in sincerity. It is very hard for men suddenly to get clear of their prejudices: those that had been Pharisees, even after they became Christians, retained some of the old leaven. All did not so, witness Paul, but some did.

We have here a council called on this occasion (v. 6): The apostles and presbyters came together, to consider of this matter. They did not give their judgment rashly, but considered of this matter. Though they were clear concerning it in their own minds, yet they would take time to consider of it, and to hear what might be said by the adverse party. Here is a direction to the pastors of the churches, when difficulties arise, to come together in solemn meetings. They may know one another's mind, and strengthen one another's hands.

I. Peter's speech. He was a faithful member of this assembly, and offered that which was very much to the purpose, and which would come better from him than from another, because he had himself been the first that preached the gospel to the Gentiles. There had been much disputing, pro and con, upon this question, and liberty of speech allowed, as ought to be in such cases. When both sides had been heard, Peter rose up.

1. He put them in mind of the commission he had some time ago to preach the gospel to the Gentiles. You know that from the beginning of the days of the gospel God made choice of one to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, and I was the person chosen, that the Gentiles by my mouth should hear the word, and believe, v. 7. Everybody rejoiced that God had granted to the Gentiles repentance unto life, and nobody said a word of circumcising them. See ch. xi. 18. Why should the Gentiles who hear the word of the gospel by Paul's mouth be compelled to submit to circumcision, any more than those that heard it by my mouth?

2. He puts them in mind how remarkably God owned him in preaching to the Gentiles (v. 8): God, who knows the hearts, bore them witness by giving them the Holy Ghost, even as he did unto us apostles." See ch. xi. 15–17. Those to whom God gives the Holy Ghost, he thereby bears witness to that they are his; sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise—marked for God. "God has put no difference between us and them (v. 9); they, though Gentiles, are as welcome to the grace of Christ and the throne of grace as we Jews are." We ought not to make any conditions of our brethren's acceptance with us but such as God has made the conditions of their acceptance with him. Now the Gentiles were fitted for communion with God, in having their hearts purified by faith, and therefore why should we think them unfit for communion with us, unless they will submit to the ceremonial purifying enjoined by the law to us? By faith the heart is purified. The faith of all the saints is alike precious, and has like precious effects and those that by it are united to Christ are so to look upon themselves as joined to one another as that all distinctions even that between Jew and Gentile, are swallowed up in it.

3. He sharply reproves those teachers who went about to bring the Gentiles under the obligation of the law of Moses, v. 10: "Now therefore, why tempt you God to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples, a yoke which neither our fathers nor we were able to bear?" Here he shows that, (1) They offered a very great affront to God. "By calling that in question which he has already settled by no less an indication than that of the gift of the Holy Ghost; you do, in effect ask, 'Did he know what he did? Or was he in earnest in it?' " Those tempt God who prescribe to him, and say that people cannot be saved but upon such and such terms, which God never appointed. (2) They offered a very great wrong to the disciples: Christ came to proclaim liberty to the captives, and they go about to enslave those whom he has made free. This yoke Christ came to ease us of. Now for these teachers to go about to lay that yoke upon the neck of the Gentiles from which he came to free even the Jews was the greatest injury imaginable to them.

4. Whereas the Jewish teachers had urged that circumcision was necessary to salvation, Peter shows that both Jews and Gentiles were to be saved purely through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in no other way (v. 11): We believe to be saved through that grace only. "We that are circumcised believe to salvation, and so do those that are uncircumcised. We must depend upon the grace of Christ for salvation as well as they. There is not one way of salvation for the Jews and another for the Gentiles. Why should we burden them with the law of Moses, as necessary to their salvation, when it is not that, but the gospel of Christ, that is necessary both to our salvation and theirs?"

II. An account of what Barnabas and Paul said. What miracles and wonders God had wrought among the Gentiles by them, v. 12. This they had given in to the church at Antioch (ch. xiv. 27), and now again to the synod; and it was very proper to be given in here. Paul and Barnabas undertake to show, by a plain relation of matters of fact, that God owned the preaching of the pure gospel to them without the law. 1. What account they gave; they declared what signs and wonders, God had wrought among the Gentiles by them, what confirmation he had given by miracles wrought in the kingdom of nature, and what success by miracles wrought in the kingdom of grace. What need had they of any other advocate when God himself pleaded their cause? 2. What attention was given to them: All the multitude kept silence, and gave audience to Paul and Barnabas; it should seem they took more notice of their narrative than they did of all the arguments that were offered. As in natural philosophy and medicine nothing is so satisfactory as experiments, so in the things of God the best explication of the word of grace is the accounts given of the operations of the Spirit of grace. Those that fear God will most readily hear those that can tell them what God has done for their souls, or by their means.

III. The speech which James made to the synod. After they had held their peace, then James stood up. The hearing of variety of ministers may be of use when one truth does not drive out, but clench, another.

1. He addresses himself respectfully to those present: "Men and brethren, hearken unto me. We are all brethren, and equally concerned that nothing be done to the dishonour of Christ and the uneasiness of Christians."

2. He refers to what Peter had said concerning the conversion of the Gentiles (v. 14): "Simeon hath declared how God at the first did visit the Gentiles, in Cornelius and his friends, who were the first fruits of the Gentiles." James observes here: That the grace of God was the origin of it; it was God that visited the Gentiles. The acquaintance began on his part; he not only visited and redeemed his people, but visited and redeemed those that were not a people. That the glory of God was the end of it: it was to take out of them a people for his name, who should glorify him, and in whom he would be glorified. As of old he took the Jews, so now the Gentiles.

3. He confirms this with a quotation out of the Old Testament. It was foretold in the Old Testament, and therefore it must be fulfilled, v. 15. To this agree the words of the prophets; most of the Old Testament prophets spoke more or less of the calling in of the Gentiles. It was the general expectation of the pious Jews that the Messiah should be a light to enlighten the Gentiles (Luke ii. 32): but James waives the more illustrious prophecies of this, and pitches upon one that seemed more obscure: It is written, Amos ix. 11, 12, where is foretold, (1) The setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah (v. 16): I will raise up the tabernacle of David, that is fallen. This tabernacle was ruined and fallen down; there had not been for many ages a king of the house of David. But God will return, and will build it again, raise it out of its ruins, a phœnix out of its ashes; and this was now lately fulfilled, when our Lord Jesus was raised out of that family. The church of Christ may be called the tabernacle of David. This may sometimes be brought very low, and may seem to be in ruins, but it shall be built again, its withering interests shall revive. (2) The bringing in of the Gentiles as the effect and consequence of this (v. 17): That the residue of men might seek after the Lord; not the Jews only, but the residue of men, such as had hitherto been left out of the pale of the visible church; they must now be brought to seek after the Lord. That the residue of men might seek (James here adds, after the Lord), and all the Gentiles upon whom my name is called. His name shall be declared among them, and they shall be brought both to know his name and to call upon it: they shall call themselves the people of God, and he shall call them so; and thus, by consent of both parties, his name is called upon them. This promise now begins to be fulfilled, for it is added, saith the Lord, who doeth all these things. He saith it who doeth it. Though with us saying and doing are two things they are not so with God. The uniting of Jews and Gentiles in one body, and all those things that were done in order to it, were, [1] What God did: whatever instruments were employed in it. [2] What God was well pleased with; for he is the God of the Gentiles, as well as the Jews.

4. He resolves it into the purpose and counsel of God (v. 18): Known unto God are all his works from the beginning of the world. He not only foretold the calling of the Gentiles by the prophets, but he foreordained it in his eternal counsels. Whatever God does, he did before design and determine to do. He not only does whatever he determined, which is more than we can do (our purposes are frequently broken off, and our measures broken), but he determined whatever he does. What we shall do in such or such a case we cannot tell till it comes to the setting to; but known unto God are all his works. We are poor short-sighted creatures; the wisest men can see but a little way before them, and not at all with any certainty; but this is our comfort, that there is an infallible certainty in the divine prescience: known unto God are all his works.

5. He gives his advice with reference to the Gentiles (v. 19): My sentence is: I give it as my opinion; not as having authority over the rest, but as being an adviser with them.

(1) That circumcision and the observance of the ceremonial law be by no means imposed upon the Gentile converts. I am clearly for using them with all possible tenderness, and putting no manner of discouragement upon them—not to give them any molestation nor disturbance. Great care must be taken not to discourage nor disquiet young converts with matters of doubtful disputation. Let the essentials of religion be first impressed deeply upon them, and these will satisfy them and make them easy.

(2) That yet it would be well that in some things, which gave most offence to the Jews, the Gentiles should comply with them. It will please the Jews (and, if a little thing will oblige them, better do so than cross them) if the Gentile converts abstain, [1] From pollutions of idols, and from fornication, which are two bad things, and always to be abstained from. Not but that the apostles were careful to warn against pollutions of idols, that they should have no manner of fellowship with idolaters in their idolatrous worships, and particularly not in the feasts they held upon their sacrifices. Fornication, and all manner of uncleanness. How large, how pressing, is Paul in his cautions against this sin! But the Jews suggested that these were things in which the Gentiles, even after conversion, allowed themselves, and the apostle of Gentiles connived at it. Now, to obviate this suggestion, James advises that they should be publicly warned to abstain from pollutions of idols and from fornication. [2] From things strangled, and from blood, which had been forbidden before the giving of the law of Moses.

6. He gives a reason for his advice—that great respect ought to be shown to the Jews, for they have been so long accustomed to the solemn injunctions of the ceremonial law that they must be borne with, if they cannot presently come off from them (v. 21): For Moses hath of old those that preach him in every city, being read in the synagogues every sabbath day. "Moses is continually preached to them, and they are called upon to remember the law of Moses." Even that word of God which is written to us should also be preached. "His writings are read in their synagogues, and on the sabbath day; so that from their childhood they have been trained up in a regard to the law of Moses. This has been done of old time; they have received from their fathers an honour for Moses. This has been done in every city, so that none of them can be ignorant what stress that law laid upon these things. They cannot be blamed if they are loth to part with them, and cannot of a sudden be persuaded to look upon those things as needless and indifferent. We must therefore give them time, they must be borne with awhile, and brought on gradually." Thus does this apostle show a spirit of moderation, contriving, as much as may be, to please both sides and provoke neither.

We have here the result of the consultation. The advice which James gave was universally approved. Letters were accordingly sent by messengers of their own to the Gentile converts, which would be a great confirmation to them against the false teachers.

I. The choice of the delegates that were to be sent with Paul and Barnabas on this errand.

1. They thought fit to send men of their own company to Antioch, with Paul and Barnabas, v. 22. This was agreed to by the apostles and elders, with the whole church. To show their respect to the church at Antioch, as a sister-church, as also that they were desirous further to know their state. To encourage Paul and Barnabas, and to make their journey home the more pleasant. To put a reputation upon the letters they carried, that more regard might be paid to the message, which was likely to meet with opposition from some. To keep up the communion of saints, and to show that, though they were many, yet they were one.

2. Those they sent were not inferior persons, who might serve to carry the letters, but they were chosen men, and chief men among the brethren. They are here named: Judas, who was called Barsabas, and Silas.

II. The drawing up of the letters to notify the sense of the synod in this matter.

1. A very obliging preamble to this decree, v. 23. That which intimates the humility of the apostles, that they join the elders and brethren in commission with them, whom they had advised with in this case. Herein they remembered the instructions their Master gave them (Matt. xxiii. 8). That which bespeaks their respect: they send greeting, and call them brethren of the Gentiles, thereby giving them the right hand of fellowship: "You are our brethren, though Gentiles." Now that the Gentiles are fellow-heirs and of the same body, they are to be encouraged, and called brethren.

2. A just and severe rebuke to the judaizing teachers (v. 24): "We have heard that certain who went out from us have troubled you with words. They went out from us indeed, but, as for their urging the law of Moses upon you, we gave them no such commandment." They did a great deal of wrong to the Gentile converts, in saying, You must be circumcised, and you must keep the law. It perplexed them: "They have troubled you with words. You depended upon those who told you, If you believe in the Lord Jesus Christ you shall be saved; and now you are startled by those that tell you you must keep the law of Moses or you cannot be saved. They trouble you with words —mere words—sound, but no substance." How has the church been troubled with words, by the pride of men that loved to hear themselves talk! It endangered them; they subverted their souls, put them into disorder, and pulled down that which had been built up.

3. An honourable testimony given of the messengers.

(1) Of Paul and Barnabas, whom these judaizing teachers had censured as having done their work by the halves, because they had brought the Gentile converts to Christianity only, and not to Judaism. "They are men that are dear to us; they are our beloved Barnabas and Paul." Sometimes it is good for those that are of eminence to express their esteem. They are men that have hazarded their lives for the name of our Lord Jesus Christ (v. 26). They have ventured their all for Christ, have engaged in the most dangerous services, as good soldiers of Christ. It is not likely that such faithful confessors should be unfaithful preachers.

(2) Of Judas and Silas: They are chosen men (v. 25), and they are men that have heard our debates, and will tell you the same things by mouth, v. 27. What is of use to us it is good to have both in writing and by word of mouth, that we may have the advantage both of reading and of hearing it.

4. Here is the direction given what to require from the Gentile converts.

(1) The matter of the injunction, which is according to the advice given by James. They should never eat anything that they knew had been offered in sacrifice to an idol, but look upon it as thereby polluted to them. This to us is an antiquated case. That they should not eat blood. That they should not eat anything that was strangled, or had not the blood let out. That they should be very strict in censuring those that were guilty of fornication. "These things are in a particular manner offensive to the Jews, and therefore do not disoblige them herein."

(2) The manner in which it is worded. They express themselves with something of authority: It seemed good to the Holy Ghost, and to us, that is, to us under the guidance of the Holy Ghost. They would not order anything because it seemed good to them, but that they knew it first seemed good to the Holy Ghost. They express themselves with abundance of tenderness and fatherly concern. First, They are afraid of burdening them: We will lay upon you no greater burden. They dreaded nothing so much as imposing too far upon them, so as to discourage them at their setting out. Secondly, They impose upon them no other than necessary things. Church-rulers should impose only necessary things, things which Christ has made our duty. They have not authority to make new laws, but only to see that the laws of Christ be duly executed. Thirdly, They enforce their order with a commendation of those that shall comply with it, rather than with the condemnation of those that shall transgress it. "From which if you keep yourselves you will do well." It is all sweetness and love and good humour. The difference of the style of the true apostles from that of the false is very observable. Those that were for imposing the ceremonial laws were positive and imperious: Except you keep it, you cannot be saved (v. 1). The apostles of Christ, who only recommend necessary things, are mild and gentle: "From which if you keep yourselves, you will do well. Fare ye well; we are hearty well-wishers to your honour and peace."

III. The delivering of the letters. When they were dismissed they then came to Antioch; they stayed no longer at Jerusalem than till their business was done, and then came back. As soon as they came to Antioch, they gathered the multitude together, and delivered the epistle to them (v. 30, 31), that they might all know what it was that was forbidden them. But this was not all; it was that they might know that no more than this was forbidden them. The people were wonderfully pleased (v. 31): They rejoiced for the consolation. That they were confirmed in their freedom from the yoke of the ceremonial law. That those who troubled their minds with an attempt to force circumcision upon them were hereby silenced. That the Gentiles were hereby encouraged to receive the gospel, and those that had received it to adhere to it. That the peace of the church was hereby restored. They got the strange ministers that came from Jerusalem to give them each a sermon, v. 32. Judas and Silas, being prophets also themselves, exhorted the brethren with many words, and confirmed them. Even those that had the constant preaching of Paul and Barnabas, yet were glad of the help of Judas and Silas; the diversity of the gifts of ministers is of use to the church. Observe what is the work of ministers with those that are in Christ. (1) To confirm them; to confirm their choice of Christ and their resolutions for Christ. (2) To exhort them to perseverance: to quicken them to that which is good, and direct them in it. They comforted the brethren (so it may be rendered), and this would contribute to the confirming of them; for the joy of the Lord will be our strength. One word would affect one, and another another; what they had to say might have been summed up in a few words, yet it was for the edification of the church that they used many words. The dismission of the Jerusalem ministers, v. 33. When they had spent some time among them they were let go in peace from the brethren at Antioch, to the apostles at Jerusalem. The continuance of Silas, together with Paul and Barnabas, at Antioch. Silas chose rather to abide still at Antioch, v. 34. We know not the reason that moved him to it. Paul and Barnabas, though their work lay chiefly among the Gentiles, yet continued for some time in Antioch. They continued there, not to take their pleasure, but teaching and preaching the word of God. It is probable there was a great resort of Gentiles thither from all parts, so that in preaching there they did in effect preach to many nations. And thus they were not only not idle at Antioch, but were serving their main intention. There were many others also there. The multitude of workmen in Christ's vineyard does not give us a writ of ease. There may be opportunity for us; the zeal and usefulness of others should excite us, not lay us asleep.

Here we have a private quarrel between two ministers, no less men than Paul and Barnabas, yet ending well.

I. Here is a good proposal Paul made to Barnabas to go and review their work among the Gentiles and renew it. Antioch was now a safe and quiet harbour for them; but Paul remembered that they only put in there to refit and refresh themselves, and therefore begins now to think of putting to sea again. Paul remembered that the work appointed him was afar off among the Gentiles, and therefore he is here meditating a second expedition among them; and this some days after, for his active spirit could not bear to be long out of work; no, nor his bold and daring spirit to be long out of danger. 1. To whom he makes this proposal—to Barnabas, his old friend and fellow-labourer. We have need one of another, and may be in many ways serviceable one to another; and therefore should be forward both to borrow and lend assistance. Every soldier has his comrade. 2. For whom the visit is designed: "Let us not begin new work, but let us take a view of the fields we have sown. Let us go again and visit our brethren in every city where we have preached the word of the Lord." He calls all the Christians brethren. He has a concern for them in every city. Wherever we have preached the word of the Lord, let us go and water the seed sown. Those that have preached the gospel should visit those to whom they have preached it. As we must look after our praying, and hear what answer God gives to that; so we must look after our preaching, and see what success that has. 3. What was intended in this visit: "Let us see how they do." He would visit them that he might acquaint himself with their case, as the physician visits his recovering patient, that he may prescribe what is proper for the perfecting of his cure, and the preventing of a relapse. Let us see how they do. (1) What spirit they are of, how they stand affected, and how they behave themselves. (2) What state they are in, that we may rejoice with them if they rejoice, and may weep with them if they weep, and may know the better how to pray for them.

II. The disagreement between Paul and Barnabas about an assistant. Barnabas would have his nephew John, whose surname was Mark, to go along with them, v. 37. He determined to take him, because he was his relation. We should suspect ourselves of partiality, and guard against it in preferring our relations. Paul opposed it (v. 38): He thought not good to take him with them who had departed from them, from Pamphylia (ch. xiii. 13), and went not with them to the work. He run his colours just as they were going to engage. It is probable that he promised very fair now that he would not do so again. But Paul thought it was not fit he should be thus honoured; at least, not till he had been longer tried. If a man deceive me once, it is his fault; but, if twice, it is my own, for trusting him.

III. The issue of this disagreement: they separated upon it. The contention was so sharp that they departed asunder one from the other. Neither would yield, and therefore there is no remedy but they must part. Now here is that which is just matter of lamentation, and yet very instructive. For we see, 1. That the best of men are but men, subject to like passions as we are, as these two good men had expressly owned concerning themselves (ch. xiv. 15), and now it appeared too true. I doubt there was (as usually there is in such contentions) a fault on both sides. They were certainly both in fault to be hot as to let the contention be sharp, as also each to stick resolutely to his opinion, and neither to yield. It is a pity that some friend did not interpose to prevent its coming to an open rupture. We must own it was their infirmity, not that we must make use of it to excuse our own intemperate heats and passions. No; but it must check our censures of others, and moderate them. Repentance teaches us to be severe in reflections upon ourselves; but charity teaches us to be candid in our reflections upon others. It is only Christ's example that is a copy without a blot. 2. That we are not to think it strange if there be differences among wise and good men. Even those that are united to one and the same Jesus, and sanctified by one and the same Spirit, have different opinions, different views. We shall never be all of a mind till we come to heaven. 3. That these differences often prevail so far as to occasion separations. Paul and Barnabas, who were not separated by the persecutions of the unbelieving Jews, nor the impositions of the believing Jews, were yet separated by an unhappy disagreement between themselves.

IV. The good that was brought out of this evil. It was strange that even the sufferings of the apostles (as Phil. i. 12), but much more strange that even the quarrels of the apostles, should tend to the furtherance of the gospel of Christ. God would not permit such things to be, if he knew not how to make them to serve his own purposes. 1. More places are hereby visited. Barnabas went one way; he sailed to Cyrpus (v. 39), where they began their work (ch. xiii. 4), and which was his own country, ch. iv. 36. Paul went another way into Cilicia, which was his own country, ch. xxi. 39. Each seems to be influenced by his affection to his native soil, as usual. Yet God served his own purposes by it. 2. More hands are hereby employed in the ministry of the gospel among the Gentiles. John Mark, who had been an unfaithful hand, is not rejected, and, for aught we know, proves a very useful and successful hand. Silas who was a new hand is brought in.

V. We may further observe, 1. That the church at Antioch seem to countenance Paul in what he did. Barnabas sailed with his nephew to Cyprus, and no notice was taken of him. But, when Paul departed, he was recommended by the brethren to the grace of God. They prayed publicly for Paul, and for the success of his ministry. They transferred the matter to the grace of God, leaving it to that grace both to work upon him and to work with him. Those are happy at all times who are enabled so to carry themselves as not to forfeit their interest in the love and prayers of good people. 2. That yet Paul afterwards seems to have had, upon further trial, a better opinion of John Mark than now he had; for he writes to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 11), Take Mark and bring him with thee, for he is profitable to me for the ministry. Even those whom we justly condemn we should condemn moderately, because we know not but afterwards we may see cause to think better of them, and we should so regulate our resentments that if it should prove so we may not afterwards be ashamed of them. Even those whom we have justly condemned, if afterwards they prove more faithful, we should cheerfully receive, forgive and forget, and, as there is occasion, give a good word to. 3. That Paul went on cheerfully in his work (v. 41): He went through Syria and Cilicia, confirming the churches. Ministers are well employed when they are made use of in confirming those that believe, as well as in converting those that believe not.

CHAP. XVI

It is some rebuke to Barnabas that after he left Paul we hear no more of him. But Paul's services for Christ after this are largely recorded. I. The beginning of his acquaintance with Timothy, ver. 1–3. II. The visit he made to the churches for their establishment, ver. 4, 5. III. His call to Macedonia, his coming to Philippi, ver. 6–13. IV. The conversion of Lydia there, ver. 14, 15. V. The casting of an evil spirit out of a damsel, ver. 16–18. VI. The accusing and abusing of Paul and Silas for it, their imprisonment, ver. 19–24. VII. The miraculous conversion of the jailer, ver. 25–34. VIII. The honourable discharge of Paul and Silas, ver. 35–40.

Paul was a spiritual father, and as such a one we have him here adopting Timothy: and in all he appears to have been a wise and tender father.

I. His taking Timothy into his acquaintance and under his tuition. And we are here accordingly told, 1. That he was a disciple, one that belonged to Christ. He took him to be brought up for Christ. 2. That his mother was a Jewess originally, but believed in Christ; her name was Eunice, his grandmother's name was Lois. Paul speaks of them both with great respect and commends them especially for their unfeigned faith (2 Tim. i. 5). 3. That his father was a Greek, a Gentile. Now because his father was a Greek he was not circumcised: his father being no Jew he was not obliged to circumcision, nor entitled to it, unless when he grew up he did himself desire it. Though his mother could not prevail to have him circumcised in his infancy, yet she educated him in the fear of God, that though he wanted the sign of the covenant he might not want the thing signified. 4. That he had gained a very good character among the Christians: he was well reported of by the brethren that were at Lystra and Iconium. He had a name for good things with good people. 5. That Paul would have him to go forth with him. Paul had a great love for him. 6. That Paul took him and circumcised him. This was strange. Had not Paul opposed those with all his might that were for imposing circumcision upon the Gentile converts? He had, and yet circumcised Timothy, not to oblige him to keep the ceremonial law, but only to render his ministry acceptable among the Jews that abounded in those quarters. Therefore, that they might not shun him as one unclean, because uncircumcised, he took him and circumcised him. He was against those who made circumcision necessary to salvation. Though he went not in this instance according to the letter of the decree, he went according to the spirit of it, which was a spirit of tenderness towards the Jews. Paul made no difficulty of taking Timothy to be his companion, though he was uncircumcised; but the Jews would not hear him if he were, and therefore Paul will humour them herein.

II. His confirming the churches which he had planted (v. 4, 5): He went through the cities where he had preached the word of the Lord. They delivered to them copies of the decrees of the Jerusalem synod. All the churches were concerned in that decree, and therefore it was requisite they should all have it well attested. This was of very good service to them. 1. The churches were hereby established in the faith, v. 5. They were confirmed particularly in their opinion against the imposing of the ceremonial law upon the Gentiles. When they saw the testimony, not only of the apostles and elders, but of the Holy Ghost, in them, against it, they were established. Testimonies to truth, though they may not prevail to convince those that oppose it, may be of very good use to establish those that are in doubt concerning it. And, besides, that spirit of tenderness which appeared in these letters plainly showed that the apostles and elders were herein under the guidance of him who is love itself. 2. They increased in number daily. The imposing of the yoke of the ceremonial law upon their converts was enough to frighten people from them. But, if they find there is no danger of being so enslaved, they are ready to embrace Christianity. And thus the church increased in numbers daily. And it is a joy to those who heartily wish well to the souls of men, to see such an increase.

I. Paul's travels up and down to do good. 1. He and Silas his colleague went throughout Phrygia and the region of Galatia. 2. They were forbidden at this time to preach the gospel in Asia (the country properly so called). At this time Christ would employ Paul in a piece of new work, which was to preach the gospel to a Roman colony at Philippi, for hitherto the Gentiles to whom he had preached were Greeks. The Romans were more particularly hated by the Jews than other Gentiles. It was the Holy Ghost that forbade them. The removals of ministers are in a particular manner under a divine guidance and direction. But these New Testament ministers are only forbidden to preach in one place, while they are directed to another where there is more need. 3. They would have gone into Bithynia, but were not permitted: the Spirit suffered them not, v. 7. They came to Mysia. Though their judgment and inclination were to go into Bithynia, yet they were overruled. We must now follow providence, and, if this suffer us not to do what we assay to do, we ought to acquiesce, and believe it for the best. The Spirit of Jesus suffered them not; so many ancient copies read it. The servants of the Lord Jesus ought to be always under the check and conduct of the Spirit of the Lord Jesus. 4. They passed by Mysia, or passed through it (so some), sowing good seed, we may suppose, as they went along; and they came down to Troas, the city of Troy. Here a church was planted; for here we find one in being, ch. xx. 6, 7. At Troas Luke fell in with Paul, and joined himself to his company; for henceforward, when he speaks of Paul's journeys, he puts himself into the number of his retinue, we went, v. 10.

II. Paul's particular call to Macedonia, that is, to Philippi, inhabited mostly by Romans, as appears, v. 21.

1. The vision Paul had, v. 9. An angel appeared to him, to intimate to him that it was the will of Christ he should go to Macedonia. Though he shall not go where he has a mind to go, he shall go where God has work for him to do. (1) The person Paul saw. There stood by him a man of Macedonia. Christ would have Paul directed to Macedonia, not as the apostles were at other times, by a messenger from heaven, to send him thither, but by a messenger thence to call him thither. Paul shall be called to Macedonia by a man of Macedonia, and by him speaking in the name of the rest. A man of Macedonia, not a magistrate of the country, much less a priest, but an ordinary inhabitant of that country, a plain man, that did not come to trifle with him, but in good earnest to importune his assistance. (2) The invitation given him. This honest Macedonian prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us; that is, "Come and preach the gospel to us. Thou hast helped many. O come and help us. It is thy business, and it is thy delight, to help poor souls; O come and help us. We have need of thy help, as much as any people, and therefore, O come, come with all speed among us. Do not only help us with thy prayers here; thou must come over and help us." People have great need of help for their souls, and it is their duty to look out for it and invite those among them that can help them.

2. The interpretation made of the vision (v. 10): They gathered assuredly from this that the Lord had called them to preach the gospel there. We may sometimes infer a call of God from a call of man. If a man of Macedonia says, Come and help us, Paul thence gathers assuredly that God says, Go and help them.

III. Paul's voyage to Macedonia hereupon: He was not disobedient to the heavenly vision, but followed this divine direction with more satisfaction than he would have followed any contrivance or inclination of his own. Thitherward he turned his thoughts. Immediately we endeavoured to go into Macedonia. Paul communicated it to his companions, and they all resolved for Macedonia. As Paul will follow Christ, so all his will follow him, or rather follow Christ with him. God's calls must be complied with immediately. Do it today, lest thy heart be hardened. They could not immediately go into Macedonia; but they immediately endeavoured to go. If we cannot be so quick as we would be in our performances, yet we may be in our endeavours. Thitherward he steered his course. They set sail from Troas. They came with a straight course, a prosperous voyage, to Samothracia; the next day they came to Neapolis; and at last they landed at Philippi. It is said (v. 12) to be The chief city of that part of Macedonia; or, as some read it, the first city. They began with the first city, because, if the gospel were received there, it would the more easily spread thence all the country over. It was a colony. The Romans not only had a garrison, but the inhabitants of the city were Romans.

IV. The cold entertainment which Paul and his companions met with at Philippi. One would have expected that having such a particular call from God thither they would have had a joyful welcome there. Where was the man of Macedonia that begged Paul to come thither with all speed? Why did not he stir up his countrymen, to go and meet him? It is a good while before any notice at all is taken of him: We were in that city abiding certain days. They had made all the haste they could thither, but, now that they are there, they are almost tempted to think they might as well have stayed where they were. Those eminent and useful men are not fit to live in this world that know not how to be slighted and overlooked. Let not ministers think it strange if they be first strongly invited to a place, and then looked shyly upon when they come. When they have an opportunity of preaching it is in an obscure place, v. 13. There was no synagogue of the Jews there. They found out a little meeting of good women. The place of this meeting is out of the city. It was a place where prayer was wont to be made. Those that worshipped the true God, and would not worship idols, met there to pray together. Each of them prayed apart every day, but, besides this, they came together on the sabbath day. Though they were but a few and discountenanced by the town, yet a solemn assembly the worshippers of God must have on the sabbath day. When we cannot do as we would we must do as we can; if we have not synagogues, we must be thankful for more private places, and resort to them. This place is said to be by a river side, which perhaps was chosen, as befriending contemplation. Thither Paul and Silas and Luke went, and sat down. They spoke unto the women who resorted thither, and led them on further to the knowledge of Christ.

V. The conversion of Lydia. In this story of the Acts, we have not only the conversion of places recorded, but of many particular persons; for such is the worth of souls that the reducing of one to God is a great matter. Nor have we only the conversions that were effected by miracle, as Paul's, but some that were brought about by the ordinary methods of grace, as Lydia's here.

1. Who this convert was. Four things are recorded of her:

(1) Her name, Lydia. It is an honour to her to have her name recorded here in the book of God. We cannot have our names recorded in the Bible, but, if God open our hearts, we shall find them written in the book of life.

(2) Her calling. She was a seller of purple. She had a calling, an honest calling, which the historian takes notice of to her praise. It was a mean calling. She was a seller of purple, not a wearer of purple, few such are called. Though she had a calling to mind, yet she was a worshipper of God. The business of our particular callings may be made to consist very well with the business of religion, and therefore it will not excuse us to say, We have shops to look after, and a trade to mind; for have we not also a God to serve and a soul to look after?

(3) The place she was of—of the city of Thyatira, which was a great way from Philippi. Providence brings Lydia to Philippi, to be under Paul's ministry, and there, where she met with it, she made a good use of it.

(4) Her religion before the Lord opened her heart. She worshipped God according to the knowledge she had; she was one of the devout women. Sometimes the grace of God wrought upon those who, before their conversion, were very wicked and vile, sometimes it fastened upon those who were of a good character. It is not enough to be worshippers of God, but we must be believers in Jesus Christ. To them Christ would be welcome; for those that know what it is to worship God see their need of Christ. She heard the apostles. Here, where prayer was made the word was preached. Can we expect God should hear our prayers if we will not hearken to his word? Those that worshipped God according to the light they had looked out for further light.

2. What the work was that was wrought upon her: Whose heart the Lord opened. The author of this work: it was the Lord. Conversion-work is God's work; it is he that works in us both to will and to do; not as if we had nothing to do, but of ourselves, without God's grace, we can do nothing. The salvation of those that are saved must be wholly ascribed to him. The seat of this work; it is in the heart that the change is made. Conversion-work is heart-work; it is a renewing of the heart. The nature of the work; she had not only her heart touched, but her heart opened. An unconverted soul is shut up, and fortified against Christ. Christ, in dealing with the soul, knocked at the door that is shut against him (Rev. iii. 20); and, when a sinner is effectually persuaded to embrace Christ, then the heart is opened for the King of glory to come in.

3. What were the effects of this work on the heart. She took great notice of the word of God. Her heart was so opened that she attended to the things that were spoken by Paul. She applied to herself (so some read it) the things that were spoken by Paul; and then only the word does us good, when we apply it to ourselves. She gave up her name to Jesus Christ. She was baptized, and with her her household also was baptized. She was very kind to the ministers, and very desirous to be further instructed by them: She besought us saying, "If you have judged me to be faithful to the Lord, come into my house, and abide there." Thus she desired an opportunity to testify her gratitude to those who had been the instruments of divine grace in this blessed change that was wrought upon her. When her heart was open to Christ, her house was open to his ministers for his sake. Nay, they are not only welcome to her house, but she is extremely pressing and importunate with them: She constrained us; which intimates that Paul was unwilling to go. But Lydia will have no nay. She desired an opportunity of receiving further instruction. In her own house she might not only hear them, but ask them questions; and she might have them to pray with her daily, and to bless her household.

Paul and his companions now begin to be taken notice of.

I. A damsel that had a spirit of divination caused them to be taken notice of.

1. The account that is given of this damsel: She was possessed with a spriit of divination as that damsel was by whom the oracles of Apollo at Delphos were delivered. In those times of ignorance and idolatry, the devil, thus led men captive at his will; and he could not have gained such adoration from them as he had, if he had not pretended to give oracles to them. This damsel brought her masters much gain by soothsaying; many came to consult this witch and none came but with the rewards of divination in their hands.

2. The testimony which this damsel gave to Paul and his companions: She met them in the street, as they were going to prayer, v. 16. They went thither publicly, everybody knew whither they were going. How subtle Satan is in taking the opportunity to give us diversion when we are going about any religious exercises, and to put us out of temper when we need to be most composed. When she met with them she followed them, crying, "These men are the servants of the most high God; they show unto us the way of salvation."

(1) This witness is true. [1] "They are the servants of the most high God; they attend on him, are employed by him as servants; they come to us on his errands, the message they bring is from him. The gods we Gentiles worship are inferior beings, therefore not gods, but these men belong to the most high God, who is over all men, over all gods. They are his servants, and therefore it is our duty to hearken to them and it is at our peril if we affront them." [2] "They show unto us the way of salvation." Even the heathen had some notion of the miserable deplorable state of mankind, and their need of salvation. "Now," saith she, "these are the men that show us what we have in vain sought for."

(2) How came this testimony from the mouth of one that had a spirit of divination? Is Satan divided against himself? We may take it either, [1] As extorted from this spirit of divination for the honour of the gospel by the power of God; as the devil was forced to say of Christ (Mark i. 24): I know thee who thou art, the Holy One of God. The truth is sometimes magnified by the confession of its adversaries, in which they are witnesses against themselves. Or, [2] As designed by the evil spirit to the dishonour of the gospel. Those that were most likely to receive the apostles' doctrine were such as were prejudiced against these spirits of divination, and therefore would, by this testimony, be prejudiced against the gospel; and, as for those who regarded these diviners, the devil thought himself sure of them.

II. She continued many days clamouring thus (v. 18); and, it should seem, Paul took no notice of her; but finding perhaps that it did them a prejudice, rather than any service, he soon silenced her, by casting the devil out of her. 1. He was grieved. It was a disturbance to him to hear a sacred truth so profaned. Perhaps they were spoken in an ironical bantering way, and then justly might Paul be grieved, as any good man's heart would be, to hear any good truth of God bawled out in the streets in a canting, jeering way. 2. He commanded the evil spirit to come out of her. He turned and said, I command thee in the name of Jesus Christ to come out of her; and by this he will show that these men are the servants of the living God. Her silence shall demonstrate it more than her speaking could do. Power went along with the word of Christ, before which Satan could not stand, but was forced to quit his hold. He came out the same hour.

III. The masters of the damsel that was dispossessed caused them to be taken notice of, by bringing them before the magistrates for doing it.

1. That which provoked them was, that her masters saw that the hope of their gain was gone, v. 19. See here what evil the love of money is the root of! The power of Christ and the great kindness done to her in delivering her out of Satan's hand, made no impression upon them when they apprehended that they should hereby lose money.

2. The course they took with him was to incense the higher powers against them: They caught them and dragged them into the market-place, where public justice was administered. They brought them to the rulers, their justices of peace. From them they hurried them to the magistrates, the governors of the city.

3. The charge they exhibited against them was that they were the troublers of the land, v. 20. They take it for granted that these men are Jews. The general charge against them is that they troubled the city, sowed discord, and disturbed the public peace. If they troubled the city, it was but like the angel's troubling the water of Bethesda's pool, in order to healing. The proof of this charge is their teaching customs not proper to be admitted by a Roman colony, v. 21. The Romans were always very jealous of innovations in religion. Right or wrong, they would adhere to that which they had received by tradition from their fathers. No foreign nor upstart deity must be allowed.

IV. The magistrates caused them to be taken notice of.

1. By countenancing the persecution they raised the mob upon them (v. 22): The multitude rose up together against them. It has been the artifice of Satan to make God's ministers and people odious, by representing them as dangerous men, who aimed at the destruction of the constitution and the changing of the customs.

2. They further represented them as the vilest malefactors: They rent off their clothes in order to their being scourged. This was one of those three times that Paul was beaten with rods, according to the Roman usage, which was not under the compassionate limitation of the number of stripes not to exceed forty, which was provided by the Jewish law. It is here said that they laid many stripes upon them (v. 23), without counting how many. One would think, this might have satiated their cruelty; if they must be whipped, surely they must be discharged. No, they are imprisoned. The judges made their commitment very strict: They charged the jailer to keep them safely, as if they were dangerous men, that either would venture to break prison themselves or were in confederacy with those that would attempt to rescue them. The jailer made their confinement very severe (v. 24): Having received such a charge he thrust them into the inner prison. When magistrates are cruel, it is no wonder that the officers under them are so too. He put them into the inner prison, the dungeon, into which none were usually put but condemned malefactors. As if this were not enough, he made their feet fast in the stocks. And they were not the first of God's messengers that had their feet in the stocks. Oh what hard usage have God's servants met with, as in the former days, so in the latter times!

We have here the designs of the persecutors of Paul and Silas baffled and broken.

I. The persecutors designed to dishearten and discourage the preachers of the gospel; but here we find them both hearty and heartened.

1. They were themselves hearty, wonderfully hearty. Let us consider what their case was. The many stripes they had laid upon them were very sore, and one might have expected to hear them complaining of them. Yet this was not all; they had reason to fear the axes next. In the meantime they were in the inner prison, their feet in the stocks, which hurt them; and yet, at midnight they prayed and sang praises to God. They prayed together, prayed to God to support them and comfort them in their afflictions—prayed that even their bonds and stripes might turn to the furtherance of the gospel,—prayed for their persecutors, that God would forgive them and turn their hearts. This was not at an hour of prayer, but at midnight; it was not in a house of prayer, but in a dungeon; yet it was seasonable to pray, and the prayer was acceptable. As in the dark, so out of the depths, we may cry unto God. No trouble, how grievous soever, should indispose us for prayer. They sang praises to God. We never want matter for praise, if we do not want a heart. And what should put the heart of a child of God out of tune for this duty if a dungeon and a pair of stocks will not do it? Nay, they not only praised God, but they sang praises to him. As our rule is that the afflicted should pray, and therefore, being in affliction, they prayed; so our rule is that the merry should sing psalms, and therefore, being merry in their affliction, they sang psalms. Notice is here taken of the circumstance that the prisoners heard them. If the prisoners did not hear them pray, yet they heard them sing praises. They sang so loud, that though they were in the dungeon, they were heard all the prison over. We should sing psalms with all our heart. Though they knew the prisoners would hear them, yet they sang aloud, as those that were not ashamed of their Master. Shall those that would sing psalms in their families plead, in excuse for their omission of the duty, that they are afraid their neighbours should hear them, when those that sing profane songs roar them out, and care not who hears them? The prisoners were made to hear the prison-songs of Paul and Silas, that they might be prepared for the miraculous favour shown to them all for the sake of Paul and Silas, when the prison-doors were thrown open.

2. God heartened them wonderfully by his signal appearances for them, v. 26. There was immediately a great earthquake: the very foundations of the prison were shaken. The Lord was in these earthquakes, to show his resentment of the indignities done to his servants. The prison doors were thrown open, and the prisoners' fetters were knocked off: Every man's bands were loosed. As afterwards God gave to Paul all those that were in the ship with him (ch. xxvii. 24), so now he gave him all those that were in the prison with him.

II. The persecutors designed to stop the progress of the gospel, but here we find converts made in the prison, the trophies of the gospel's victories erected there, and the jailer, their own servant, become a servant of Christ.

1. He is afraid he shall lose his life, and Paul makes him easy as to this care, v. 27, 28. (1) He awoke out of his sleep. It is probable that the shock of the earthquake woke him, and the prisoners' expressions of joy and amazement, when in the dark they found their bands loosed. This was enough to awaken the jailer, whose place required that he should not be hard to wake. (2) He saw the prison doors open, and supposed that the prisoners had fled; and then what would become of him? He knew the Roman law in that case. (3) In his fright he drew his sword, and was going to kill himself, to prevent a more terrible death, which he knew he was liable to for letting his prisoners escape. The philosophers generally allowed self-murder. This jailer thought there was no harm in anticipating his own death; but Christianity proves itself to be of God by this, that it keeps us to the law of our creation, obliges us to be just to our own lives, and teaches us cheerfully to resign them to our graces, but courageously to hold them out against our corruptions. (4) Paul stopped him (v. 28): He cried with a loud voice, saying, Do thyself no harm. All the cautions of the word of God against sin have this tendency, "Do thyself no harm. Hurt not thyself, and then none else can hurt thee; do not sin, for nothing else can hurt thee." The jailer needs not fear being called to an account for the escape of his prisoners, for they are all here. It was strange that some of them did not slip away, when the prison doors were opened, and they were loosed from their bands. God showed his power in binding their spirits, as much as in loosing their feet.

2. He is afraid he shall lose his soul, and Paul makes him easy as to this care too. One concern leads him to another, and a much greater. He begins to think whither death would have brought him, and what would have become of him on the other side death.

(1) Whatever was the cause, he was put into a great consternation. The Spirit of God, that was sent to convince, in order to his being a Comforter, struck a terror upon him. He called for a light, and sprang in and came trembling to Paul and Silas. This jailer, when he was thus made to tremble, could not apply to a more proper person than to Paul, for it had once been his own case; he had been once a persecutor of good men, had cast them into prison; and therefore he was able to speak the more feelingly to the jailer.

(2) In this consternation, he applied to Paul and Silas for relief. How reverent and respectful his address to them is: He called for a light; he fell down before them. It is probable that he had heard what the damsel said of them, that they were the servants of the living God, who showed to them the way of salvation. He fell down before them, to beg their pardon, for the indignities he had done them, and to beg their advice, what he should do. He gave them a title of respect, Sirs, lords, masters; just now it was, Rogues and villains, and he was their master; but now, Sirs, lords, and they are his masters. Converting grace changes people's language. How serious his enquiry is: What must I do to be saved? First, His salvation is now his great concern, and lies nearest his heart, which before was the furthest thing from his thoughts. Secondly, He does not enquire concerning others, what they must do; but concerning himself, "What must I do?" It is his own precious soul that he is in care about. Thirdly, He is convinced that something must be done, and done by him too, in order to his salvation; that it is not a thing that will do itself. He asks not, "What may be done for me?" but, "What shall I do?" Fourthly, He is willing to do anything: "Tell me what I must do, and I am here ready to do it. Sirs, put me into the right way, though narrow, and thorny, and uphill, yet I will walk in it." Those who are thoroughly convinced of sin, and truly concerned about their salvation will be glad to have Christ upon his own terms, Christ upon any terms. Fifthly, He is desirous to know what he should do, and asks those that were likely to tell him. Those that set their faces Zionward must ask the way thither. We cannot know it of ourselves, but God has made it known to us by his word, has appointed his ministers to assist us, and has promised to give his Holy Spirit to those that ask him, to be their guide in the way of salvation. Sixthly, He brought them out. He brings them out of the dungeon, in hopes they will bring him out of a much worse.

(3) They directed him what he must do, v. 31. Though they are cold, and sore, and sleepy, they do not adjourn this cause to a more convenient time and place. They strike while the iron is hot, take him now when he is in a good mind, lest the conviction should wear off. Now that God begins to work, it is time for them to set in as workers together with God. They are as glad to show him the way to heaven as the best friend they have. They gave him the same directions they did to others, Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. Here is the sum of the whole gospel, the covenant of grace in a few words: Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house. The happiness promised: "Thou shalt be saved; not only rescued from eternal ruin, but brought to eternal life and blessedness. Though a persecutor, yet thy heinous transgressions shall be all forgiven; and thy hard embittered heart shall be softened and sweetened by the grace of Christ." The condition required: Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ. We must approve the method God has taken of reconciling the world to himself by a Mediator; and accept of Christ as he is offered to us. This is the only way and a sure way to salvation. No other way of salvation than by Christ, and no danger of coming short if we take this way. It is the gospel that is to be preached to every creature, He that believes shall be saved. The extension of this to his family: Thou shalt be saved, and thy house. Be they ever so many, let them believe in Jesus Christ and they shall be saved.

(4) They proceeded to instruct him and his family in the doctrine of Christ (v. 32): They spoke unto him the word of the Lord. He was, for aught that appears, an utter stranger to Christ, and therefore it is requisite he should be told who this Jesus is, that he may believe in him. Christ's ministers should have the word of the Lord so ready to them, and so richly dwelling in them, as to be able to give instructions offhand to any that desire to hear and receive them. They spoke the word to all that were in his house. Masters of families should take care that all under their charge partake of the means of knowledge and grace, and that the word of the Lord be spoken to them; for the souls of the poorest servants are as precious as those of their masters, and are bought with the same price.

(5) The jailer and his family were immediately baptized. He was baptized, he and all his, straightway. The Spirit of grace worked such a strong faith in them, all on a sudden, as superseded further debate; and Paul and Silas knew by the Spirit that it was a work of God that was wrought in them.

(6) The jailer was hereupon very respectful to Paul and Silas. He took them the same hour of the night, would not let them lie a minute longer in the inner prison. He washed their stripes, to cool them, and abate the smart of them. He brought them into his house, bade them welcome. Now nothing was thought good enough for them, as before nothing bad enough. He set meat before them, and they were welcome to it. They had broken the bread of life to him and his family; and he, having reaped so plentifully of their spiritual things, thought it was but reasonable that they should reap of his carnal things. What have we houses and tables for but as we have opportunity to serve God and his people with them?

(7) The voice of rejoicing with that of salvation was heard in the jailer's house; never was such a truly merry night kept there before: He rejoiced, believing in God, with all his house. His believing in Christ is called believing in God, which intimates that Christ is God, and that the gospel has a direct tendency to bring us to God. His faith produced joy. Those that by faith have given up themselves to God in Christ as theirs have a great deal of reason to rejoice. Believing in Christ is rejoicing in Christ. He signified his joy to all about him. One cheerful Christian should make many.

I. Orders sent for the discharge of Paul and Silas, v. 35, 36. The magistrates that had so basely abused them the day before gave the orders as soon as it was day, more in haste to give them a discharge than they were to petition for one. The magistrates sent sergeants—those that had the rods, those that had been employed in beating them. The order was, Let those men go. The jailer brought them the news (v. 36): The magistrates have sent to let you go: Now therefore depart. Not that he was desirous to part with them as his guests, but as his prisoners; they shall still be welcome to his house, but he is glad they are at liberty from his stocks.

II. Paul's insisting upon the breach of privilege which the magistrates had been guilty of, v. 37. Paul said to the sergeants, "They have beaten us openly, uncondemned, being Romans, and have cast us into prison against all law and justice, and now do they thrust us out privily? Nay verily; but let them come themselves and fetch us out, and own that they have done us wrong."

1. Paul did not plead this before he was beaten lest he should seem to be afraid of suffering for the truth which he had preached. He had nobler things than this to comfort himself with in his affliction.

2. He did plead it afterwards, to put an honour upon the cause he suffered for, to let the world know that the preachers of the gospel merited better treatment. He did it likewise to mollify the magistrates towards the Christians at Philippi, and beget in the people a better opinion of the Christian religion.

(1) Paul lets them know how many ways they had run themselves into a premunire. They had beaten those that were Romans. Roman historians give instances of cities that had their charters taken from them for indignities done to Roman citizens. To tell them they had beaten those who were the messengers of Christ would have had no influence upon them; but to tell them they have abused Roman citizens will put them into a fright: so common is it for people to be more afraid of Cæsar's wrath than of Christ's. They had beaten them uncondemned; had not calmly examined what was said against them, much less enquired what they had to say for themselves. Christ's servants would not have been abused as they have been if they and their cause might but have had an impartial trial. It was an aggravation of this that they had done it openly. They had cast them into prison, without showing any cause of their commitment. They now thrust them out privily; they had not indeed the impudence to stand by what they had done, but yet had not the honesty to own themselves in a fault.

(2) He insists upon it that they should make them an acknowledgment of their error, and give them a public discharge, as they had done them a public disgrace: "Let them come themselves, and fetch us out, and give a testimony that we have done nothing worthy of stripes or of bonds." It was not a point of honour that Paul stood thus stiffly upon, but a point of justice, and not to himself so much as to his cause.

III. The reversing of the judgment given against Paul and Silas, v. 38, 39. The magistrates were frightened when they were told that Paul was a Roman. The proceedings of persecutors have often been illegal, even by the law of nations, and often inhuman, against the law of nature, but always sinful, and against God's law. They came and besought them not to take advantage of the law against them; they brought them out of the prison, owning that they were wrongfully put into it, and desired them that they would peaceably and quietly depart out of the city. Yet, if the repentance of these magistrates had been sincere, they would not have desired them to depart out of their city, but would have begged of them to continue in their city, to show them the way of salvation. But many are convinced that Christianity is not to be persecuted who yet are not convinced that it ought to be embraced. They are compelled to do honour to Christ and his servants, and yet do not go so far as to have benefit by Christ.

IV. The departure of Paul and Silas from Philippi, v. 40. They went out of the prison when they were legally discharged. They took leave of their friends: they went to the house of Lydia, saw the brethren, and they comforted them. Young converts should have a great deal said to them to comfort them, for the joy of the Lord will be very much their strength. They departed. Paul and Silas had an extraordinary call to Philippi; and yet, when they have come thither, they see little of the fruit of their labours, and are soon driven thence. Yet they did not come in vain. They laid the foundation of a church at Philippi, which became very eminent, and had people that were more generous to Paul than any other church, as appears by his epistle to the Philippians, ch. i. 1; iv. 15. Let not ministers be discouraged, though they see not the fruit of their labours presently; the seed sown seems to be lost under the clods, but it shall come up again in a plentiful harvest.

CHAP. XVII

We have here a further account of the travels of Paul. He was not like a candle upon a table, that gives light only to one room, but like the sun that goes its circuit to give light to many. We have him here, I. Preaching and persecuted at Thessalonica, ver. 1–9. II. Preaching at Berea, but was driven thence also by persecution, ver. 10–15. III Disputing at Athens (ver. 16–21), and the account he gave of natural religion, to lead them to the Christian religion (ver. 22–31), together with the success of this sermon, ver. 32–34.

Paul's two epistles to the Thessalonians give such a shining character of that church, that we cannot but be glad to meet with an account of the first founding of the church there.

I. Here is Paul's coming to Thessalonica. Paul went on with his work, notwithstanding the ill usage he had met with at Philippi. He takes notice of this in his first epistle to the church here (1 Thess. ii. 2). The opposition and persecution that he met with made him the more resolute. He could never have held out, and held on, as he did, if he had not been animated by a spirit of power from on high. 2. He did but pass through Amphipolis and Appollonia. We may suppose though he is said only to pass through these cities, yet that he stayed so long in them as to publish the gospel there, and to prepare the way for the entrance of other ministers among them.

II. His preaching to the Jews first, in their synagogue at Thessalonica. He found a synagogue of the Jews there (v. 1). By it he made his entry. It was always his manner to begin with the Jews, for if they received the gospel they would cheerfully embrace the new converts; if they refused it, they might thank themselves if the apostles carried it to those that would bid it welcome. He met them in their synagogue on the sabbath day, in their place and at their time of meeting. It is good being in the house of the Lord on his day. This was Christ's manner, and Paul's manner, and has been the manner of all the saints. He reasoned with them out of the scriptures. They agreed with him to receive the scriptures, so far they were of a mind. But they received the scripture, and therefore thought they had reason to reject Christ; Paul received the scripture, and therefore saw great reason to embrace Christ. It was therefore requisite that he should, by reasoning with them, convince them that his inferences from the scripture were right and theirs were wrong. The preaching of the gospel should be both scriptural preaching and rational; such Paul's was, for he reasoned out of the scriptures: we must reason out of them and upon them. Reason must not be set up in competition with the scripture, but it must be made use of in explaining and applying the scripture. He continued to do this three sabbath days successively. God waits for sinners' conversion; all the labourers come not into the vineyard at the first hour, nor are wrought upon so suddenly as the jailer. The drift and scope of his arguing was to prove that Jesus is the Christ; this was that which he opened and alleged, v. 3. He first explained his thesis, and opened the terms, and then alleged it, and laid it down. He opened it like one that knew it, and alleged it like one that believed it. It was necessary the Messiah should suffer, and die, and rise again, for the Old Testament prophecies concerning the Messiah made it necessary he should. Paul here alleges and makes it out undeniably, not only that it was possible he might be the Messiah, though he suffered, but that, being the Messiah, it was necessary he should suffer. He could not be made perfect but by sufferings; for, if he had not died, he could not have risen again from the dead. He must needs have suffered for us, because he could not otherwise purchase redemption for us; and he must needs have risen again because he could not otherwise apply the redemption to us. Jesus is the Messiah: "This Jesus whom I preach unto you is Christ, is the Christ, is he that should come. God has both by the scriptures and by miracles, borne witness to him." Gospel ministers should preach Jesus; he must be their principal subject. That which we are to preach concerning Jesus is that he is Christ.

III. The success of his preaching there, v. 4. Some of the Jews believed and they consorted with Paul and Silas. Those that believe in Jesus Christ come into communion with his faithful ministers, and associate with them. Many more of the devout Greeks, and of the chief women, embraced the gospel. These were the worshipping Gentiles; as in America they call those of the natives that are converted to the faith of Christ the praying Indians. Of these a great multitude believed. And not a few of the chief women of the city embraced Christianity. Particular notice is taken of this, for an example to the ladies, the chief women, to submit themselves to the commanding power of Christ's holy religion; for this intimates how acceptable it will be to God, and what great influence it may have upon many. No mention is here made of their preaching the gospel to the Gentile idolaters at Thessalonica, and yet it is certain that they did, for Paul writes to the Christians there as having turned to God from idols (1 Thess. i. 9), and that at the first entering in of the apostles among them.

IV. The trouble that was given to Paul and Silas at Thessalonica.

1. Who were the authors of their trouble: the Jews who believed not, who were moved with envy, v. 5. Some of the Jews believed the gospel and pitied and prayed for those that did not; while those that did not envied and hated those that did.

2. Who were the instruments of the trouble: the Jews made use of certain lewd persons of the baser sort. All wise and sober people looked upon them with respect, and none would appear against them but such as were the scum of the city. It is the honour of religion that those who hate it are generally the lewd fellows of the baser sort.

3. In what method they proceeded against them. (1) They set the city in an uproar. They began a riot, and then the mob was up presently. See how the devil carries on his designs; he sets cities in an uproar, sets souls in an uproar, and then fishes in troubled waters. (2) They assaulted the house of Jason, where the apostles lodged, to bring them out to the people, whom they had incensed against them. The proceedings here were altogether illegal. If men have offended, magistrates are appointed to enquire into the offence, and to judge of it; but to make the rabble judges and executioners too was to make truth fall in the street, to depose equity, and enthrone fury. (3) When they could not get the apostles into their hands they fall upon an honest citizen of their own, his name Jason, a converted Jew, and drew him out with some others of the brethren to the rulers of the city. (4) They accused them to the rulers, and represented them as dangerous persons. The crime charged upon Jason is receiving and harbouring the apostles (v. 7). Two very black characters are here given them: [1] That they were enemies to the public peace, and threw everything into disorder wherever they came: Those that have turned the world upside down are come hither also. In one sense it is true that wherever the gospel comes in its power to any place, to any soul, it works such a change there that it may be said to turn the world upside down. The love of the world is rooted out of the heart, and the way of the world contradicted in the life; so that the world is turned upside down there. They would have it thought that the preachers of the gospel were mischief makers wherever they came. Because they persuaded people to turn from idols to the living and true God, from malice and envy to love and peace, they are charged with turning the world upside down, when it was only the kingdom of the devil in the world that they thus overturned. Their enemies set the city in an uproar, and then laid the blame upon them. If Christ's faithful ministers be thus invidiously misrepresented, let them not think it strange; we are not better than Paul and Silas, who were thus abused. The accusers cry out, "They are come hither also; it is therefore time for us to bestir ourselves." [2] That they were enemies to the established government (v. 7): They all do contrary to the decrees of Cæsar, for they say: There is another king, one Jesus. It is true the Roman government was very jealous of any governor under their dominion taking upon him the title of king. His followers said indeed, Jesus is a king, but not an earthly king. There was nothing in the doctrine of Christ that tended to the dethroning of princes. The Jews knew this very well, and of all people it ill became the Jews to do it, who hated Cæsar and his government, and who expected a Messiah that should be a temporal prince, and overturn the thrones of kingdoms, and were therefore opposing our Lord Jesus because he did not appear under that character.

4. The great uneasiness which this gave to the city (v. 8): They troubled the people and the rulers of the city, when they heard these things. They had no ill opinion of the apostles or their doctrine, but if they be represented to them by the prosecutors as enemies to Cæsar, they will be obliged to suppress them. It troubled them to be brought under a necessity of disturbing good men.

5. The issue of this troublesome affair. The magistrates had no mind to prosecute the Christians. Care was taken to secure the apostles; they fled, and kept out of their hands; so that nothing was to be done but to discharge Jason and his friends upon bail, v. 9. So they took security of Jason and the other. Among the persecutors of Christianity, as there have been instances of the madness and rage of brutes, so there have been likewise of the prudence and temper of men; moderation has been a virtue.

I. Paul and Silas removing to Berea, and employed in preaching the gospel there, v. 10. They had proceeded so far at Thessalonica that the foundations of a church were laid, and therefore when the storm rose they withdrew. That command of Christ to his disciples, When they persecute you in one city flee to another, intends their flight to be not so much for their own safety ("flee to another, to hide there") as for the carrying on of their work ("flee to another, to preach there"). The devil was outshot in his own bow; he thought by persecuting the apostles to stop the progress of the gospel, but it was so overruled as to be made to further it. 1. The care that the brethren took of Paul and Silas. They immediately sent them away by night to Berea. They sent them away by night, under the covert of that, as if they had been evil doers. 2. The constancy of Paul and Silas in their work. Though they fled from Thessalonica, they did not flee from the service of Christ. When they came to Berea, they went into the synagogue of the Jews. They did not decline paying their respect to the Jews, either in revenge for the injuries they had received or for fear of what they might receive. If others will not do their duty to us, yet we ought to do ours to them.

II. The good character of the Jews in Berea (v. 11): These were more noble than those in Thessalonica. They were more noble, better bred.

1. They had a freer thought, were willing to hear reason, and admit the force of it, though it was contrary to their former sentiments. This was more noble.

2. They had a better temper. As they were ready to come into a unity with those that they were brought to concur with, so they continued in charity with those that they saw cause to differ from. This was more noble. They received the word with all readiness of mind; they were very willing to hear it, and did not shut their eyes against the light. They did not pick quarrels with the word, nor seek occasion against the preachers of it; but bade it welcome. This was true nobility. The Jews thought themselves well-born and that they could not be better born. But they are here told who among them were the most noble and the best-bred men—those that were most disposed to receive the gospel. These were the most noble, and, if I may so say, the most gentleman-like men. They searched the scriptures daily whether those things were so. Their readiness of mind to receive the word was not such as that they took things upon trust. Since Paul reasoned out of the scriptures, and referred them to the Old Testament for the proof of what he said, they had recourse to their Bibles, examined whether Paul's arguments were cogent, and determined accordingly. The doctrine of Christ does not fear a scrutiny. The New Testament is to be examined by the Old. The Jews received the Old Testament, and those that did so could not but see cause sufficient to receive the New, because in it they see all the prophecies and promises of the Old fully and exactly accomplished. Those that read and receive the scriptures must search them (John v. 39), must study them, that they may find out the whole truth contained in them, and may have an intimate acquaintance with the mind of God revealed in them. Searching the scriptures must be our daily work. Those are truly noble, and are in a fair way to be more and more so, that make the scriptures their oracle and touchstone. Those that rightly study the scriptures, and meditate therein day and night, have their minds filled with noble thoughts. These are more noble.

III. The good effect of the preaching of the gospel at Berea, v. 12. Of the Jews there were many that believed. At Thessalonica there were only some of them that believed (v. 4), but at Berea, where they heard with unprejudiced minds, many believed. God gives grace to those whom he first inclines to make a diligent use of the means of grace, and particularly to search the scriptures. Of the Greeks likewise, many believed, both of the honourable women and of men not a few, men of the first rank, as should seem by their being mentioned with the honourable women. The wives first embraced the gospel, and then they persuaded their husbands to embrace it.

IV. The persecution that was raised against Paul and Silas at Berea. The Jews at Thessalonica were the mischief-makers at Berea. They had notice that the word of God was preached at Berea. They came thither and they stirred up the people, and incensed them against the preachers of the gospel. See how restless Satan's agents are in their opposition to the gospel of Christ and the salvation of the souls of men. This occasioned Paul's removal to Athens. So long Paul stayed at Berea, and such success he had there, that there were brethren there, and sensible active men too, which appeared by the care they took of Paul, v. 14. They were aware of the coming of the persecuting Jews from Thessalonica, and, fearing what it would come to, they lost no time, but immediately sent Paul away, while they retained Silas and Timothy there still, who might be sufficient to carry on the work without exposing him. They sent Paul to go as it were to the sea. He went out from Berea in that road which went to the sea, but he went by land to Athens. Those that conducted Paul brought him to Athens. The Spirit of God directed him to that famous city—famous of old for its power and dominion—famous afterwards for learning. Those who wanted learning went thither to get it, because those that had learning went thither to show it. It was a great university. Paul is sent thither, and is not ashamed nor afraid to show his face among the philosophers there, and there to preach Christ crucified. He ordered Silas and Timothy to come to him to Athens, when he found there was a prospect of doing good there; or because, there being none there that he knew, he was solitary and melancholy without them.

A scholar that is in love with the learning of the ancients would think he should be very happy if he were where Paul now was, at Athens, but Paul, though bred a scholar, does not make this any of his business at Athens. He has other work to mind: his business is, in God's name, to turn them from the service of idols to the service of the true and living God in Christ.

I. Here is the impression which the superstition of the Athenians made upon Paul's spirit, v. 16. 1. The account here given of that city: it was wholly given to idolatry. This agrees with the account which the heathen writers give of it, that there were more idols in Athens than there were in all Greece besides. Whatever strange gods were recommended to them, they admitted them, and allowed them a temple and an altar. It is observable that there, where human learning most flourished, idolatry most abounded. The world by wisdom knew not God, 1 Cor. i. 21. The greatest pretenders to reason were the greatest slaves to idols: so necessary was it that there should be a divine revelation, and that centring in Christ. 2. The disturbance which the sight of this gave to Paul. His spirit was stirred within him. He was filled with concern for the glory of God, which he saw given to idols, and with compassion to the souls of men, which he saw thus enslaved to Satan.

II. The testimony that he bore against their idolatry, and his endeavours to bring them to the knowledge of the truth. He went to the synagogue of the Jews, who, though enemies to Christianity, were free from idolatry, and took the opportunity given him there of disputing for Christ, v. 17. He discoursed with the Jews, and put it to them what reason they could give why, since they expected the Messiah, they would not receive Jesus. There he met with the devout persons that had forsaken the idol temples, and he talked with these to lead them on to the Christian church, to which the Jews' synagogue was but as a porch. He entered into conversation with all that came in his way about matters of religion: In the market he disputed daily with those that met with him, that were heathen, and never came to the Jews' synagogue. The zealous advocates for the cause of Christ will be ready to plead it in all companies, as occasion offers.

III. The enquiries which some of the philosophers made.

1. Who they were that entered into discourse with him: He disputed with all that met him, in the places of concourse. Most took no notice of him, but there were some of the philosophers that thought him worth making remarks upon. (1) The Epicureans, who thought God altogether such a one as themselves. They would not own, either that God made the world or that he governs it. The Epicureans indulged themselves in all the pleasures of sense, and placed their happiness in them, in what Christ has taught us in the first place to deny ourselves. (2) The Stoics, who thought themselves altogether as good as God; they made their virtuous man to be no way inferior to God himself. To which Christianity is directly opposite, as it teaches us to come off from all confidence in ourselves, that Christ may be all in all.

2. What their different sentiments were of him (v. 18). (1) Some called him a babbler—this scatterer of words, that goes about, throwing here one idle word or story and there another; or, this picker up of seeds. The term is used for a little sort of bird, that is worth nothing at all, that picks up the seeds that lie uncovered, either in the field or by the wayside, and hops here and there for that purpose. Such a pitiful contemptible animal they took Paul to be, or supposed he went from place to place venting his notions to get money, a penny here and another there, as that bird picks up here and there a grain. They looked upon him as an idle fellow, and regarded him, as we say, no more than a ballad-singer. (2) Others called him a setter forth of strange gods. And, if he had strange gods to set forth, he could not bring them to a better market than to Athens. They thought he seemed to do so, because he preached unto them Jesus, and the resurrection. Though he did not call these gods, yet they thought he meant to make them so. "Jesus they took for a new god, and the resurrection, for a new goddess." As if believing in Jesus and looking for the resurrection, were the worshipping of new demons.

3. The proposal they made to give him a public hearing, v. 19, 20. They had heard some broken pieces of his doctrine, and are willing to have a more perfect knowledge of it. (1) They look upon it as strange and surprising. "It is a new doctrine. Thou bringest certain strange things to our ears which we never heard of before, and know not what to make of now." By this it should seem that, among all the learned books they had, they either had not, or heeded not, the books of Moses and the prophets. There was but one book in the world that was of divine inspiration, and that was the only book they were strangers to. (2) They desired to know more of it, only because it was new and strange: "May we know what this new doctrine is? We would gladly know what these things mean." It was fit they should know what this doctrine was before they embraced it; and they were so fair as not to condemn it till they had had some account of it. (3) The place they brought him to. It was to Areopagus, the same word that is translated (v. 22) Mars' Hill; it was the town-house, or guildhall of their city, where the magistrates met upon public business, and where learned men met to communicate their notions. The court of justice which sat here was famous for its equity. Hither they brought Paul to be tried, not as a criminal but as a candidate.

4. The general character of the people of that city (v. 21): All the Athenians spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing. They were inquisitive concerning Paul's doctrine, not because it was good, but because it was new. (1) They were all for conversation. It is true that good company is of great use to a man, and will polish one that has laid a good foundation in study; but that knowledge will be very flashy and superficial which is got by conversation only. (2) They affected novelty; they were for telling and hearing some new thing. They were for new schemes and new notions. They were given to change. (3) They meddled in other people's business and never minded their own. Tattlers are always busy bodies. (4) They spent their time in nothing else. Time is precious and it is hastening apace into eternity, but abundance of it is wasted in unprofitable converse. To set up for newsmongers, and to spend our time in nothing else, is to lose that which is very precious for the gain of that which is worth little.

We have here St. Paul's sermon at Athens. Divers sermons we have had, which the apostles preached to the Jews, or such Gentiles as were worshippers of the true God; and all they had to do with them was to open and allege that Jesus is the Christ; but here we have a sermon to heathens, that worshipped false gods, and to them the scope of their discourse was quite different from what it was to the other. In the former case their business was to lead their hearers by prophecies and miracles to the knowledge of the Redeemer, and faith in him; in the latter it was to lead them by the common works of providence to the knowledge of the Creator, and the worship of him.

I. He lays down this that he aimed to bring them to the knowledge of the only living and true God. He is here obliged to instruct them in the first principle of all religion, that there is a God, and that God, is but one. When he preached against the gods they worshipped he had no design to draw them to atheism, but to the service of the true Deity, by declaring that he does not seek to introduce any new gods, but to reduce them to the knowledge of one God.

1. He shows them that they had lost the knowledge of the true God that made them, in the worship of false gods that they had made. I perceive that in all things you are too superstitious. The crime he charges upon them is that they feared and worshipped demons, spirits that they supposed inhabited the images. "It is time for you to be told that there is but one God. You easily admit everything that comes under a show of religion, but it is that which corrupts it more and more; I bring you that which will reform it." They charged Paul with setting forth new demons: "Nay," says he, "you have demons enough already; I will not add to the number of them."

2. He shows them that they themselves had given a fair occasion for the declaring of this one true God to them, by setting up an altar, To the unknown God. It is sad to think that at Athens, a place which was supposed to have the monopoly of wisdom, the true God was an unknown God, the only God that was unknown. There, where we are sensible we are defective and come short, and just there, the gospel takes us up, and carries us on.

(1) Various conjectures the learned have concerning this altar dedicated to the unknown God. Some think the meaning is, To the God whose honour it is to be unknown, and that they intended the God of the Jews, whose name is ineffable, and whose nature is unsearchable. The heathen called the Jews' God the God without name. This God, says Paul, I now declare unto you. Others think the meaning is, To the God whom it is our unhappiness not to know, that they would think it their happiness to know him.

(2) Observe, how modestly Paul mentions this. He tells them that he observed it as he passed by, and saw their devotions. It was public, and he could not forbear seeing it. Observe how he takes occasion from this to bring in his discourse of the true God. He tells them that the God he preached to them was one that they did already worship. He was one whom they ignorantly worshipped. "Now," says he, "I come to take away that reproach, that you may worship him understandingly. And it cannot but be acceptable to have your blind devotion turned into a reasonable service, that you may not worship you know not what."

II. He confirms his doctrine of one living and true God, by his works of creation and providence: "The God whom I call you to the worship of, is the God that made the world." The Gentiles in general, and the Athenians particularly, in their devotions were governed, not by their philosophers, but by their poets, and their idle fictions. Now Paul here sets himself to give them right notions of the one only living and true God, and then to carry the matter further for the bringing them off from their idolatry. Observe what glorious things Paul here says of that God whom he served, and would have them to serve.

1. He is the God that made the world, and all things therein; the Father almighty, the Creator of heaven and earth. Paul here maintains that God by the operations of an infinite power, according to the contrivance of an infinite wisdom, made the world and all things therein, the origin of which was owing to an eternal mind.

2. He is therefore Lord of heaven and earth. If he created all, without doubt he has the disposing of all: and, where he gives being, he has an indisputable right to give law.

3. He is, in a particular manner, the Creator of men, of all men (v. 26): He made of one blood all nations of men. He made the first man, he makes every man. He has made the nations of men, not only all men in the nations, but as nations. He is their founder and disposed them into communities. He made them all of one blood, of one and the same nature, that hereby they might be engaged in mutual affection and assistance, as fellow-creatures and brethren. He hath made them to dwell on all the face of the earth. He made them not to live in one place, but to be dispersed over all the earth; one nation therefore ought not to look with contempt upon another, as the Greeks did, which proud conceit of themselves, the apostle here takes down.

4. He is the great benefactor of the whole creation (v. 25): He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things. He not only breathed into the first man the breath of life, but still breathes it into every man. He gave us these souls; he formed the spirit of man within him He gives to all the children of men their life and breath; for as the meanest of the children of men live upon him, so the greatest, the wisest philosophers and mightiest potentates, cannot live without him. He gives to all, not only to all the children of men, but to the inferior creatures, to all animals; they have their life and breath from him, and where he gives life and breath he gives all things needful for the support of life.

5. He is the sovereign disposer of all the affairs of the children of men (v. 26): He hath determined the times before appointed, and the bounds of their habitation. (1) The sovereignty of God's disposal concerning us: he hath determined every event; the disposals of Providence are incontestable and must not be disputed. (2) The wisdom of his disposals; he hath determined what was before appointed. The determinations of the Eternal Mind are not sudden resolves, but an eternal counsel. (3) The things about which his providence is conversant; these are time and place. [1] He has determined the times that are concerning us. Our times are in his hand. Whether they be prosperous times or calamitous times, it is he that has determined them. [2] He has also determined and appointed the bounds of our habitation. He that appointed the earth to be a habitation for the children of men has appointed to the children of men a distinction of habitations upon the earth. The particular habitations in which our lot is cast are of God's appointing, which is a reason why we should accommodate ourselves to the habitations we are in, and make the best of that which is.

6. He is not far from everyone of us, v. 27. He is everywhere present. He is an infinite Spirit, that is not far from any of us. He is nigh unto us, both to receive the homage we render him and to give the mercies we ask of him, wherever we are, though near no altar, image, or temple. Be we in a palace or in a cottage, in a crowd or in a corner, in a city or in a desert, in the depths of the sea or afar off upon the sea, this is certain, God is not far from everyone of us.

7. In him we live, and move, and have our being, v. 28. We have a necessary and constant dependence upon his providence, as the streams have upon the spring, and the beams upon the sun. (1) In him we live. It is not only owing to his patience that our forfeited lives are not cut off, but it is owing to his fatherly care, that our frail lives are prolonged. If he suspend the positive acts of his goodness, we die of ourselves. (2) In him we move. It is likewise by him that our souls move our bodies, as he is the first cause, so he is the first mover. (3) In him we have our being; not only from him we had it at first, but in him we have it still; we were and still are of such a noble rank of beings, capable of knowing and enjoying God; and are not thrust into the meanness of brutes, nor the misery of devils.

8. Upon the whole matter we are God's offspring. The apostle here quotes a saying of one of the Greek poets, Aratus, a native of Cilicia, Paul's countryman, who, speaking of the heathen Jupiter, that is, in the poetical dialect, the supreme God, says this of him, for we are also his offspring. By this it appears not only that Paul was himself a scholar, but that human learning is both ornamental and serviceable to a gospel minister, especially for the convincing of those that are without; for it enables him to beat them at their own weapons, and to cut off Goliath's head with his own sword. How can the adversaries of truth be beaten out of their strongholds by those that do not know them? Since in him we live, we ought to live to him; since in him we move, we ought to move towards him; and since in him we have our being, we ought to consecrate our being to him.

III. From all these great truths concerning God, he infers the absurdity of their idolatry. 1. God cannot be represented by an image. If we are the offspring of God, then certainly he who is the Father of our spirits is himself a Spirit, and we ought not to think the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device, v. 29. God honoured man in making his soul after his own likeness; but man dishonours God if he makes him after the likeness of his body. 2. He dwells not in temples made with hands, v. 24. A temple brings him never the nearer to us, nor keeps him ever the longer among us. A temple is convenient for us to come together in to worship God; but God needs not any place of rest or residence. 3. He is not worshipped with men's hands, as though he needed anything, v. 25. He that maintains all, cannot be benefited by any of our services, nor needs them. What need can God have of our services, or what benefit can he have by them, when he has all perfection in himself, and we have nothing that is good but what we have from him? 4. It concerns us all to enquire after God (v. 27): That they should seek the Lord. We have plain indications of God's presence among us, and his bounty to us, that we might be put upon enquiring, Where is God our Maker. Nothing, one would think, should be more powerful with us to convince us that there is a God, than the consideration of our own nature, especially the noble powers and faculties of our own souls. Yet so dark is this discovery, in comparison with that by divine revelation, that those who have no other could but haply feel after God and find him. It was very uncertain whether they could by this searching find out God; it is but a peradventure: if haply they might. If they did find out something of God, yet it was but some confused notions of him; they did but feel after him, as men in the dark, or blind men. It is true that by the knowledge of ourselves we may be led to the knowledge of God, but it is a very confused knowledge. We have therefore reason to be thankful that by the gospel of Christ we do not now feel after him, but with open face behold, as in a glass, the glory of God.

IV. He proceeds to call them all to repent of their idolatries, v. 30, 31. This is the practical part of Paul's sermon before the university; having declared God to them (v. 23), he properly presses upon them repentance towards God. Having shown them the absurdity of their worshipping other gods, he persuades them to return from it to the living and true God.

1. The conduct of God towards the Gentile world before the gospel came among them: The times of this ignorance God winked at. They were times of great ignorance. In the things of God they were grossly ignorant. Those are ignorant indeed who either know not God or worship him ignorantly; idolatry was owing to ignorance. These times of ignorance God winked at. Understand it as an act of divine patience and forbearance. He winked at these times, but gave them the gifts of his providence, ch. xiv. 16, 17. He was not quick and severe with them, but was long-suffering towards them, because they did it ignorantly.

2. The charge God gave to the Gentile world by the gospel: He now commandeth all men everywhere to repent—to change their mind and their way. It is to turn with sorrow and shame from every sin, and with cheerfulness and resolution to every duty. This is God's command. He interposes his own authority for our good, and has made that our duty which is our privilege. It is his command to all men, everywhere. All men have made work for repentance, and have cause enough to repent, and all men are invited to repent, and shall have the benefit of it. Now the way of remission is more opened than it had been, and the promise more fully confirmed; and therefore now he expects we should all repent.

3. The great reason to enforce this command. God commands us to repent, because he hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness (v. 31). (1) The God that made the world will judge it. The God that now governs the world will reward the faithful friends of his government and punish the rebels. (2) There is a day appointed for this general review of all that men have done in time, a day of decision, a day of recompence, a day that will put a final period to all the days of time. (3) The world will be judged in righteousness; for God is not unrighteous. (4) God will judge the world by that man whom he hath ordained, who can be no other than the Lord Jesus, to whom all judgment is committed.

(5) God's raising Christ from the dead is the great proof of his being appointed and ordained the Judge of quick and dead. God hath given assurance unto all men, sufficient ground for their faith to build upon, both that there is a judgment to come and that Christ will be their Judge. Let all his enemies be assured of it, and tremble before him; let all his friends be assured of it, and triumph in him. (6) The consideration of the judgment to come, and of the great hand Christ will have in that judgment, should engage us all to repent of our sins and turn from them to God.

We have here a short account of the issue of Paul's preaching at Athens.

I. Few were the better: the gospel had as little success at Athens as anywhere. Some ridiculed Paul and his preaching. They heard him patiently till he came to speak of the resurrection of the dead (v. 32), and then they mocked. If he speak of a resurrection of the dead, though it be of the resurrection of Christ himself, it is altogether incredible to them. They had deified their heroes after their death, but never thought of their being raised from the dead. How can this be? This great doctrine, which is the saints' joy, is their jest. We are not to think it strange if sacred truths are made the scorn of profane wits. Others were willing to take time to consider of it; they said, We will hear thee again of this matter. They would not at present comply with what Paul said, nor oppose it. Thus many lose the benefit of the practical doctrine of Christianity, by wading beyond their depth into controversy. Those that would not yield to the present convictions of the word thought to get clear of them by putting them off to another opportunity. Thus the devil cozens them of all their time, by cozening them of the present time. Paul thereupon left them for the present to consider of it (v. 33): He departed from amongst them.

II. Yet there were some that were wrought upon, v. 34. There were certain men that adhered to him, and believed. When he departed from amongst them, they would not part with him so. Two are particularly named; one was an eminent man, Dionysius the Areopagite, one of that high court that sat in Aeropagus, one of those before whom Paul was summoned to appear; his judge becomes his convert. The woman named Damaris. Though there was not so great a harvest gathered in at Athens, yet these few being wrought upon there, Paul had no reason to say he had laboured in vain.

CHAP. XVIII

I. Paul's coming to Corinth, his private converse with Aquila and Priscilla, and his public reasonings with the Jews, from whom, when they rejected him, he turned to the Gentiles, ver. 1–6. II. The great success of his ministry there, and the encouragement Christ gave him to continue his labours there, ver. 7–11. III. The molestations there from the Jews, which he got pretty well through by the coldness of Gallio, the Roman governor, ver. 12–17. IV. The progress Paul made through many countries, after he had continued long at Corinth, in which circuit he made a short visit to Jerusalem, ver. 18–23. V. An account of Apollos' usefulness in the church, ver. 24–28.

We do not find that Paul was much persecuted at Athens, nor that he was driven thence by any ill usage, but his reception being cold, and little prospect of doing good there, he departed from Athens, and thence he came to Corinth.

I. Paul working for his living, v. 2, 3. 1. Though he was bred a scholar, yet he was master of a handicraft trade. He was a tentmaker. It was the custom of the Jews to bring up their children to some trade, yea, though they gave them learning or estates. An honest trade, by which a man may get his bread, is not to be looked upon by any with contempt. Paul, having in his youth learned to make tents, did not by disuse lose the art. 2. Though he was entitled to a maintenance from the churches he had planted, yet he worked at his calling to get bread, which is more to his praise who did not ask for supplies than to theirs who did not supply him unasked. See how humble Paul was. See how industrious he was. He that had so much to do with his mind did not think it below him to work with his hands. See how careful Paul was to recommend his ministry. He therefore maintained himself with his own labour that he might not make the gospel of Christ burdensome, 2 Cor. xi. 7, &c. 3. Though we may suppose he was master of his trade, yet he did not disdain to work at journey-work: He wrought with Aquila and Priscilla, who were of that calling, so that he got no more than day-wages, a bare subsistence. 4. Though he was himself a great apostle, yet he chose to work with Aquila and Priscilla, because he found them to be very intelligent in the things of God (v. 26), and he owns that they had been his helpers in Christ Jesus, Rom. xvi. 3. Choose to work with those that are likely to be helpers in Christ Jesus. Concerning this Aquila he was a Jew, but born in Pontus, v. 2. He was lately come from Italy to Corinth. The reason of his leaving Italy was because by a late edict of the emperor Claudius Cæsar all Jews were banished from Rome. Aquila, though a Christian, was banished because he had been a Jew. If Jews persecute Christians, it is not strange if heathens persecute them both.

II. We have here Paul preaching to the Jews, both the native Jews and the Greeks.

1. He reasoned with them in the synagogue every sabbath. See in what way the apostles propagated the gospel, not by force and violence, but by fair arguing. Paul was a rational as well as a scriptural preacher.

2. He persuaded them. It denotes the urgency of his preaching. He followed his arguments with affectionate persuasions, not to refuse the offer of salvation made to them. The good effect of his preaching. He persuaded them, that is, he prevailed with them. Some of them were convinced by his reasonings, and yielded to Christ.

3. He was yet more earnest in this matter when his fellow-labourers came up with him (v. 5): When Silas and Timothy had come from Macedonia and were ready to assist him here, then Paul was more than before pressed in spirit, which made him more than ever pressing in his preaching. And being thus pressed, he testified to the Jews that Jesus is the Christ.

III. We have him here abandoning the unbelieving Jews, and turning from them to the Gentiles, v. 6.

1. Many of the Jews persisted in their contradiction to the gospel of Christ; they opposed themselves and blasphemed; they set themselves in battle array (so the word signifies) against the gospel. They could not argue against it, but what was wanting in reason they made up in ill language: they blasphemed.

2. Paul hereupon declared himself discharged from them, and left them to perish in their unbelief. He that was pressed in spirit to testify to them (v. 5), was pressed in spirit to testify against them (v. 6); he shook his raiment, shaking off the dust from it for a testimony against them. Thus he cleared himself from them, but threatened the judgments of God against them. He had done his part, and was clean from the blood of their souls; he had, like a faithful watchman, given them warning, so that if they perish in their unbelief their blood is not to be required at his hands. It is very comfortable to a minister to have the testimony of his conscience for him, that he has faithfully discharged his trust by warning sinners. They would certainly perish if they persisted in their unbelief, and the blame would lie wholly upon themselves: "Your blood be upon your own heads." If anything would frighten them at last into a compliance with the gospel, surely this would.

3. Having given them over, yet he does not give over his work. Henceforth I will go unto the Gentiles. The guests that were first invited will not come; guests must be had therefore from the highways and the hedges. Thus the fall of the Jews became the riches of the Gentiles.

I. Paul changed his quarters. He departed out of the synagogue, and he entered into a certain man's house, named Justus, v. 7. It should seem, he went to this man's house, not to lodge, for he continued with Aquila and Priscilla, but to preach. This honest man opened his doors to him. When Paul could not have liberty to preach in the synagogue, he preached in a house. The man was next door to a Jew; he was one that worshipped God; he was not an idolater, though he was a Gentile. 2. The house was next door to the synagogue, it joined close to it. I rather think it was done in charity, to show that he would come as near to them as he could, and was ready to return to them if they were but willing to receive his message.

II. Paul presently saw the good fruit of his labours, both among Jews and Gentiles. Crispus, a Jew, an eminent one, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord Jesus, with all his house, v. 8. This would leave the Jews inexcusable, that the ruler of their synagogue believed the gospel, and yet they opposed and blasphemed it. Not only he but his house, believed. Many of the Corinthians, who were Gentiles, hearing, believed, and were baptized. Some perhaps came to hear Paul under some convictions of conscience, but it is probable that the most came only for curiosity. But, hearing, they believed, and, believing, they were baptized, and so fixed for Christ.

III. Paul was encouraged by a vision to go on with his work at Corinth (v. 9): The Lord Jesus spoke to Paul in the night by a vision. 1. He renewed his commission and charge to preach the gospel: "Be not afraid of the Jews. Be not afraid of the magistrates of the city. It is the cause of heaven thou art pleading, do it boldly. Do not speak shyly and with caution, but plainly and fully and with courage. Speak out." 2. He assured him of his presence with him, which was sufficient to put life and spirit into him: "Be not afraid, for I am with thee, to bear thee out, and to deliver thee from all thy fears, to work with thee, and to confirm the word by signs following." Those that have Christ with them need not to fear, and ought not to shrink. 3. He gave him a warrant of protection: "No man shall set on thee to hurt thee." He does not promise that no man should set on him (for the next news we hear is that he is set upon, and brought to the judgment-seat, v. 12), but "No man shall set on thee to hurt thee. Whatever trouble they may give thee, there is no real evil in it." 4. He gave him a prospect of success: "For I have much people in this city. Therefore do thou go on vigorously and cheerfully in it; for there are many in this city that are to be effectually called by thy ministry." The Lord knows those that are his. "I have them, though they yet know me not, for the Father has given them to me, and of all that were given me I will lose none." In this city, though it be a very profane wicked city, full of impurity, and the more so for a temple of Venus there, yet in this heap, that seems to be all chaff, there is wheat; in this ore, that seems to be all dross, there is gold. Let us not despair concerning any place, when even in Corinth Christ had much people.

IV. Upon this encouragement he made a long stay there (v. 11): He continued at Corinth a year and six months, teaching the word of God among them. He stayed so long, 1. For the bringing in of those that were without. God works variously. The people Christ has at Corinth must be called in by degrees. Let Christ's ministers go on in their duty, though their work be not done all at once. 2. For the building up of those that were within. Those that are converted have still need to be taught the word of God. No sooner was the good seed sown in that field than the enemy came and sowed tares, the false apostles, of whom Paul in his epistles to the Corinthians complains so much. Soon after Paul came to Corinth, it is supposed, he wrote the first epistle to the Thessalonians, and the second epistle to the same church was written not long after. Ministers may be serving Christ by writing good letters, as well as by preaching good sermons.

We have here an account of some disturbance at Corinth, but no great harm done.

I. Paul is accused by the Jews before the Roman governor, v. 12, 13. The governor was Gallio, deputy of Achaia. This Gallio was elder brother to the famous Seneca, a man of great ingenuousness and great probity, and a man of wonderful good temper; he was called Sweet Gallio, and is said to have been universally beloved. How rudely Paul is apprehended, and brought before Gallio; The Jews made insurrection with one accord against Paul. They were the ringleaders. They were unanimous in it: they came upon him with one accord. They did it with violence and fury: They made an insurrection and hurried Paul away to the judgment-seat. How falsely Paul is accused before Gallio (v. 13): This fellow persuades men to worship God contrary to the law. They could not charge him with persuading men not to worship God at all, but only to worship God in a way contrary to the law. But the charge was unjust. The law relating to the temple-service those Jews at Corinth could not observe, and there was no part of their synagogue-worship which Paul contradicted. Thus when people are taught to worship God in Christ, and to worship him in the Spirit, they are ready to quarrel, as if they were taught to worship him contary to the law.

II. Gallio dismisses the cause, and will not take any cognizance of it, v. 14, 15. Paul was going about to make his defence, but the judge, being resolved not to pass any sentence upon this cause, would not give himself the trouble of examining it.

1. He shows himself very ready to do the part of a judge in any matter that it was proper for him to take cognizance of. He said to the Jews, "If it were a matter of wrong, or wicked lewdness, I should think myself bound to bear with you." It is the duty of magistrates to right the injured, and to animadvert upon the injurious; and if the complaint be not made with all the decorum that might be, yet they should hear it out.

2. He will by no means allow them to make a complaint to him of a thing that was not within his jurisdiction (v. 15): "If it be a question of words and names, and of your law, look you to it; I will be no judge of such matters." And therefore he drove them from the judgment-seat (v. 16). Here was something right in Gallio's conduct, and praiseworthy—that he would not pretend to judge of things he did not understand; that he left the Jews to themselves in matters relating to their own religion, would not himself be the tool of their malice. It was certainly wrong to speak so slightly of a law and religion which he might have known to be of God, and with which he ought to have acquainted himself. He speaks as if he boasted of his ignorance of the scriptures, as if it were below him to take notice of the law of God.

III. The abuse done to Sosthenes, and Gallio's unconcernedness in it, v. 17. The parties put a great contempt upon the court, when they took Sosthenes and beat him before the judgment-seat. Many conjectures there are concerning this matter, because it is uncertain who this Sosthenes was, and who the Greeks were that abused him. It seems most probable that Sosthenes was a Christian. It is certain that there was one Sosthenes that was a friend of Paul, and well known at Corinth; Paul calls him his brother, and joins him with himself in his first epistle to the church at Corinth (1 Cor. i. 1). He is said to be a ruler of the synagogue. As for the Greeks that abused him, it is very probable that they were those that joined with the Jews in opposing the gospel (v. 4, 6). They were so enraged against Paul that they beat Sosthenes; and so enraged against Gallio, that they beat him before the judgment-seat, whereby they tell him that they cared not for him, if he would not be their executioner, they would be their own judges. The court put no less a contempt upon the cause, and the persons too. But Gallio cared for none of these things. If by this he meant that he cared not for the affronts of bad men, it was commendable. But, if it be meant that he concerned not himself for the abuses done to good men, it carries his indifference too far. Gallio, as a judge, ought to have protected Sosthenes, and restrained and punished the Greeks that assaulted him. Those that see and hear of the sufferings of God's people, and have no sympathy with them, nor concern for them, it being all one to them whether the interests of religion sink or swim, are of the spirit of Gallio here, who, when a good man was abused before his face, cared for none of these things.

We have here Paul in motion, as we have had him at Corinth for sometime at rest, but in both busy, very busy.

I. Paul's departure from Corinth, v. 18. 1. He did not go away till sometime after the trouble he met with there; from other places he had departed when the storm arose, but not from Corinth, because there it had no sooner risen than it fell again. After this he tarried there yet a good while, v. 11. While he found he laboured not in vain, he continued labouring. 2. When he went, he took leave of the brethren, solemnly, and with much affection. 3. He took with him Priscilla and Aquila. They seemed disposed to remove, and not inclined to stay long at a place, a disposition which may arise from a good principle, and have good effects, and therefore ought not to be condemned in others, though it ought to be suspected in ourselves. 4. At Cenchrea, the port where those that went to sea from Corinth took ship, either Paul or Aquila (for the original does not determine which) had his head shaved, to discharge himself from the vow of a Nazarite: Having shorn his head at Cenchrea; for he had a vow. Those that lived in Judæa were, in such a case, bound to do it at the temple: but those who lived in other countries might do it in other places. I see no harm in admitting it concerning Paul, in compliance for a time with the Jews, to whom he became as a Jew (1 Cor. ix. 20), that he might win upon them.

II. Paul's calling at Ephesus, which was the metropolis of the Lesser Asia. 1. There he left Aquila and Priscilla. They might be serviceable to the interests of the gospel at Ephesus. Paul intended shortly to settle there for some time. Aquila and Priscilla might dispose the minds of many to give Paul, when he should come among them, a favourable reception. 2. There he preached to the Jews in their synagogue. He entered into the synagogue, not as a hearer, but as a preacher, for there he reasoned with the Jews. Though he had abandoned the Jews at Corinth, he did not, for their sakes, decline the synagogues of the Jews in other places, but still made the first offer of the gospel to them. We must not condemn a whole body or denomination of men, for the sake of some that conduct themselves ill. 3. The Jews at Ephesus courted his stay with them (v. 20): They desired him to tarry longer with them. These were more noble, and better bred, than those Jews at Corinth, and it was a sign that God had not quite cast away his people, but had a remnant among them. 4. Paul would not stay with them now: He consented not; but bade them farewell. He must by all means keep this feast at Jerusalem. Which of the feasts it was we are not told. 5. He intimated his purpose, after this journey, to come and spend some time at Ephesus. It is good to have opportunities in reserve, when one good work is over to have another to apply ourselves to: I will return again to you, but he inserts that necessary proviso, if God will. Our times are in God's hand; we purpose, but he disposes; and therefore we must make all our promises with submission to the will of God.

III. Paul's visit to Jerusalem; a short visit it was. He came by sea to the port that lay next to Jerusalem. He sailed from Ephesus (v. 21), and landed at Cæsarea, v. 22. He went up, and saluted the church, by which, I think, is plainly meant the church at Jerusalem. It was a very friendly visit that he made them, in pure kindness to testify his hearty goodwill to them. The increase of our new friends should not make us forget our old ones, but it should be a pleasure to good men, to revive former acquaintance. He took care to keep up a good correspondence with them, that they might both congratulate and wish well to one another's comfort and success. It was but a short visit. He went up, and saluted them, and made no stay among them. It was designed but for a transient interview. God's people are dispersed and scattered; yet it is good to see one another sometimes.

IV. His return through those countries where he had formerly preached the gospel. He went and spent some time in Antioch, whence he was first sent out to preach among the Gentiles, ch. xiii. 1. He went down to Antioch, to refresh himself with the sight of the ministers there; and a very good refreshment it is to a faithful minister to have for awhile the society of his brethren. Thence he went over the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, where he had preached the gospel, and planted churches. These country churches (for such they were, Gal. i. 2, and we read not of any city in Galatia where a church was) Paul visited in order as they lay, watering what he had been instrumental to plant, and strengthening all the disciples. Paul's countenancing them was encouraging them; but that was not all: he preached that to them which strengthened them. Disciples need to be strengthened. Ministers must do what they can to strengthen them by directing them to Christ, whose strength is perfected in their weakness.

The sacred history leaves Paul upon his travels, and goes here to meet Apollos at Ephesus.

I. Here is an account of his character.

1. He was a Jew, born at Alexandria in Egypt, but of Jewish parents.

2. He was a man well fitted for public service. He was an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures. He had a great command of language: He came to Ephesus, being mighty in the scriptures, having an excellent faculty of expounding scripture. He was not only ready in the scriptures, able to quote texts offhand, and tell you where to find them, but he was mighty in the scriptures. He understood the sense and meaning of them, he knew how to make use of them and to apply them, how to reason out of the scriptures, and to reason strongly.

3. He was instructed in the way of the Lord; that is, he had some acquaintance with the doctrine of Christ, had obtained some general notions of the gospel and the principles of Christianity. He was taught something of Christ and the way of salvation by him. Those that are to teach others must first be themselves taught the word of the Lord, not only to talk of it, but to walk in it. It is not enough to have our tongues tuned to the word of the Lord, but we must have our feet directed into the way of the Lord.

4. Yet he knew only the baptism of John. He knew the preparing of the way of the Lord, rather than the way of the Lord itself. He had himself been baptized only with the baptism of John, but was not baptized with the Holy Ghost.

II. We have here the employment and improvement of his gifts at Ephesus.

1. He there made a very good use of his gifts in public. He was willing to be employed (v. 25): Being fervent in the Spirit, he spoke and taught diligently the things of the Lord. Though he had not the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, he made use of the gifts he had. We have seen how Apollos was qualified with a good head and a good tongue: he was an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures. Let us now see what he had further to recommend him as a preacher; and his example is recommended to the imitation of all preachers. He was a lively affectionate preacher; he had a good heart; he was fervent in Spirit. He had in him a great deal of divine fire as well as divine light. This appeared both in his forwardness to preach when he was called to it, and in his fervency in his preaching. He preached as one in earnest, and that had his heart in his work. Many are fervent in spirit, but are weak in knowledge, and, on the other hand, many are eloquent enough, and mighty in the scriptures, but they have no life or fervency. Here was a complete man of God, full both of divine knowledge and of divine affections. He was an industrious laborious preacher. He spoke and taught diligently. He took pains in his preaching, and he did not offer that to God, or to the synagogue, that either cost nothing or cost him nothing. He taught diligently, accurately, exactly; everything he said was well-weighed. He was an evangelical preacher. Though he knew only the baptism of John, yet that was the beginning of the gospel of Christ, and to that he kept close; for he taught the things of the Lord Christ, the things that tended to make way for him. He was a courageous preacher: He began to speak boldly in the synagogue, as one who, having put confidence in God, did not fear the face of man. In the synagogue, where the Jews not only were present, but had power, there he preached the things of God.

2. He there made a good increase of his gifts. Aquila and Priscilla expounded to him the way of God more perfectly. Aquila and Priscilla heard him preach in the synagogue. They encouraged his ministry, by a diligent and constant attendance upon it. Thus young ministers, that are hopeful, should be countenanced by grown Christians. Finding him defective in his knowledge of Christianity, they took him to them and expounded to him the way of God more perfectly. They did not despise him themselves, or disparage him to others; did not call him a young raw preacher, not fit to come into a pulpit. They communicated what they knew to him, and gave him a clear, methodical account of those things which before he had but confused notions of. See an instance of truly Christian charity in Aquila and Priscilla. Aquila did not undertake to speak in the synagogue, because he had not such gifts for public work as Apollos had; but he furnished Apollos with matter, and then left him to clothe it with acceptable words. Instructing young Christians and young ministers privately in conversation is a piece of very good service. See an instance of great humility in Apollos. He was a very bright young man, of great parts and learning, and one mightily cried up and followed; and yet, finding that Aquila and Priscilla could speak intelligently and experimentally of the things of God, though they were but mechanics, he was glad to receive instructions from them, to be shown by them his defects and mistakes. Young scholars may gain a great deal by converse with old Christians, as young students in the law may by old practitioners. Apollos, though he was instructed in the way of the Lord, did not rest in the knowledge he had attained. Those that know much should covet to know more. Here is an instance of a good woman doing good with the knowledge God had given her in private converse.

III. Here is his preferment to the service of the church of Corinth. Paul had set the wheels a-going at Corinth. Many were stirred up by his preaching to receive the gospel, and they needed to be confirmed. Paul was gone and now there was a fair occasion in this vacancy for Apollos to set in, who was fitted rather to water than to plant. His call to this service. He himself inclined to do: He was disposed to pass into Achaia. Apollos thought there might be some work for him, and God disposed his mind that way. His friends encouraged him to go; they gave him letters of recommendation. Though those at Ephesus had a great loss of his labours, they did not grudge those in Achaia the benefit of them; but, on the contrary, used their interest in them to introduce him. His success in this service. Believers were greatly edified: He helped those much who had believed through grace. Those who believe in Christ, it is through grace that they believe; it is not of themselves, it is God's gift to them. Those who through grace do believe, yet still have need of help. Faithful ministers are capable of being in many ways helpful to those who through grace do believe, and it is their business to help them. Unbelievers were greatly mortified. Their objections were fully answered, their mouths were stopped, and their faces filled with shame (v. 28): He mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly. He did it earnestly, he took pains to do it. He did it effectually and to universal satisfaction. If the Jews were but convinced of this—that Jesus is Christ, even their own law would teach them to hear him. The business of ministers is to preach Christ. The way he took to convince them was by the scriptures; thence he fetched his arguments. Ministers must be able not only to preach the truth, but to prove it and defend it, and to convince gainsayers with meekness and yet with power.

CHAP. XIX

We left Paul in his circuit visiting the churches (ch. xviii. 23), but we have not forgotten, nor has he, the promise he made to his friends at Ephesus, to return to them. Now this chapter shows us his performance of that promise. I. How he laboured there, how he taught some weak believers that had gone no further than John's baptism (ver. 1–7), how he taught three months in the synagogue of the Jews (ver. 8), and how he taught the Gentiles a long time in a public school (ver. 9, 10), and how he confirmed his doctrine by miracles, ver. 11, 12. II. What was the fruit of his labour, particularly among the conjurors: some were confounded (ver. 13–17), but others were converted, ver. 18–20. III. What projects he had of further usefulness (ver. 21, 22), and what trouble at length he met with at Ephesus from the silversmiths, how a mob was raised by Demetrius to cry up Diana (ver. 23–34), and how it was suppressed and dispersed by the town-clerk, ver. 35–41.

Ephesus was a city of great note in Asia, famous for a temple built there to Diana, which was one of the wonders of the world: thither Paul came to preach the gospel while Apollos was at Corinth (v. 1); while

III. The abuse done to Sosthenes, and Gallio's unconcernedness in it, v. 17. The parties put a great contempt upon the court, when they took Sosthenes and beat him before the judgment-seat. Many conjectures there are concerning this matter, because it is uncertain who this Sosthenes was, and who the Greeks were that abused him. It seems most probable that Sosthenes was a Christian. It is certain that there was one Sosthenes that was a friend of Paul, and well known at Corinth; Paul calls him his brother, and joins him with himself in his first epistle to the church at Corinth (1 Cor. i. 1). He is said to be a ruler of the synagogue. As for the Greeks that abused him, it is very probable that they were those that joined with the Jews in opposing the gospel (v. 4, 6). They were so enraged against Paul that they beat Sosthenes; and so enraged against Gallio, that they beat him before the judgment-seat, whereby they tell him that they cared not for him, if he would not be their executioner, they would be their own judges. The court put no less a contempt upon the cause, and the persons too. But Gallio cared for none of these things. If by this he meant that he cared not for the affronts of bad men, it was commendable. But, if it be meant that he concerned not himself for the abuses done to good men, it carries his indifference too far. Gallio, as a judge, ought to have protected Sosthenes, and restrained and punished the Greeks that assaulted him. Those that see and hear of the sufferings of God's people, and have no sympathy with them, nor concern for them, it being all one to them whether the interests of religion sink or swim, are of the spirit of Gallio here, who, when a good man was abused before his face, cared for none of these things.

We have here Paul in motion, as we have had him at Corinth for sometime at rest, but in both busy, very busy.

I. Paul's departure from Corinth, v. 18. 1. He did not go away till sometime after the trouble he met with there; from other places he had departed when the storm arose, but not from Corinth, because there it had no sooner risen than it fell again. After this he tarried there yet a good while, v. 11. While he found he laboured not in vain, he continued labouring. 2. When he went, he took leave of the brethren, solemnly, and with much affection. 3. He took with him Priscilla and Aquila. They seemed disposed to remove, and not inclined to stay long at a place, a disposition which may arise from a good principle, and have good effects, and therefore ought not to be condemned in others, though it ought to be suspected in ourselves. 4. At Cenchrea, the port where those that went to sea from Corinth took ship, either Paul or Aquila (for the original does not determine which) had his head shaved, to discharge himself from the vow of a Nazarite: Having shorn his head at Cenchrea; for he had a vow. Those that lived in Judæa were, in such a case, bound to do it at the temple: but those who lived in other countries might do it in other places. I see no harm in admitting it concerning Paul, in compliance for a time with the Jews, to whom he became as a Jew (1 Cor. ix. 20), that he might win upon them.

II. Paul's calling at Ephesus, which was the metropolis of the Lesser Asia. 1. There he left Aquila and Priscilla. They might be serviceable to the interests of the gospel at Ephesus. Paul intended shortly to settle there for some time. Aquila and Priscilla might dispose the minds of many to give Paul, when he should come among them, a favourable reception. 2. There he preached to the Jews in their synagogue. He entered into the synagogue, not as a hearer, but as a preacher, for there he reasoned with the Jews. Though he had abandoned the Jews at Corinth, he did not, for their sakes, decline the synagogues of the Jews in other places, but still made the first offer of the gospel to them. We must not condemn a whole body or denomination of men, for the sake of some that conduct themselves ill. 3. The Jews at Ephesus courted his stay with them (v. 20): They desired him to tarry longer with them. These were more noble, and better bred, than those Jews at Corinth, and it was a sign that God had not quite cast away his people, but had a remnant among them. 4. Paul would not stay with them now: He consented not; but bade them farewell. He must by all means keep this feast at Jerusalem. Which of the feasts it was we are not told. 5. He intimated his purpose, after this journey, to come and spend some time at Ephesus. It is good to have opportunities in reserve, when one good work is over to have another to apply ourselves to: I will return again to you, but he inserts that necessary proviso, if God will. Our times are in God's hand; we purpose, but he disposes; and therefore we must make all our promises with submission to the will of God.

III. Paul's visit to Jerusalem; a short visit it was. He came by sea to the port that lay next to Jerusalem. He sailed from Ephesus (v. 21), and landed at Cæsarea, v. 22. He went up, and saluted the church, by which, I think, is plainly meant the church at Jerusalem. It was a very friendly visit that he made them, in pure kindness to testify his hearty goodwill to them. The increase of our new friends should not make us forget our old ones, but it should be a pleasure to good men, to revive former acquaintance. He took care to keep up a good correspondence with them, that they might both congratulate and wish well to one another's comfort and success. It was but a short visit. He went up, and saluted them, and made no stay among them. It was designed but for a transient interview. God's people are dispersed and scattered; yet it is good to see one another sometimes.

IV. His return through those countries where he had formerly preached the gospel. He went and spent some time in Antioch, whence he was first sent out to preach among the Gentiles, ch. xiii. 1. He went down to Antioch, to refresh himself with the sight of the ministers there; and a very good refreshment it is to a faithful minister to have for awhile the society of his brethren. Thence he went over the country of Galatia and Phrygia in order, where he had preached the gospel, and planted churches. These country churches (for such they were, Gal. i. 2, and we read not of any city in Galatia where a church was) Paul visited in order as they lay, watering what he had been instrumental to plant, and strengthening all the disciples. Paul's countenancing them was encouraging them; but that was not all: he preached that to them which strengthened them. Disciples need to be strengthened. Ministers must do what they can to strengthen them by directing them to Christ, whose strength is perfected in their weakness.

The sacred history leaves Paul upon his travels, and goes here to meet Apollos at Ephesus.

I. Here is an account of his character.

1. He was a Jew, born at Alexandria in Egypt, but of Jewish parents.

2. He was a man well fitted for public service. He was an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures. He had a great command of language: He came to Ephesus, being mighty in the scriptures, having an excellent faculty of expounding scripture. He was not only ready in the scriptures, able to quote texts offhand, and tell you where to find them, but he was mighty in the scriptures. He understood the sense and meaning of them, he knew how to make use of them and to apply them, how to reason out of the scriptures, and to reason strongly.

3. He was instructed in the way of the Lord; that is, he had some acquaintance with the doctrine of Christ, had obtained some general notions of the gospel and the principles of Christianity. He was taught something of Christ and the way of salvation by him. Those that are to teach others must first be themselves taught the word of the Lord, not only to talk of it, but to walk in it. It is not enough to have our tongues tuned to the word of the Lord, but we must have our feet directed into the way of the Lord.

4. Yet he knew only the baptism of John. He knew the preparing of the way of the Lord, rather than the way of the Lord itself. He had himself been baptized only with the baptism of John, but was not baptized with the Holy Ghost.

II. We have here the employment and improvement of his gifts at Ephesus.

1. He there made a very good use of his gifts in public. He was willing to be employed (v. 25): Being fervent in the Spirit, he spoke and taught diligently the things of the Lord. Though he had not the miraculous gifts of the Spirit, he made use of the gifts he had. We have seen how Apollos was qualified with a good head and a good tongue: he was an eloquent man, and mighty in the scriptures. Let us now see what he had further to recommend him as a preacher; and his example is recommended to the imitation of all preachers. He was a lively affectionate preacher; he had a good heart; he was fervent in Spirit. He had in him a great deal of divine fire as well as divine light. This appeared both in his forwardness to preach when he was called to it, and in his fervency in his preaching. He preached as one in earnest, and that had his heart in his work. Many are fervent in spirit, but are weak in knowledge, and, on the other hand, many are eloquent enough, and mighty in the scriptures, but they have no life or fervency. Here was a complete man of God, full both of divine knowledge and of divine affections. He was an industrious laborious preacher. He spoke and taught diligently. He took pains in his preaching, and he did not offer that to God, or to the synagogue, that either cost nothing or cost him nothing. He taught diligently, accurately, exactly; everything he said was well-weighed. He was an evangelical preacher. Though he knew only the baptism of John, yet that was the beginning of the gospel of Christ, and to that he kept close; for he taught the things of the Lord Christ, the things that tended to make way for him. He was a courageous preacher: He began to speak boldly in the synagogue, as one who, having put confidence in God, did not fear the face of man. In the synagogue, where the Jews not only were present, but had power, there he preached the things of God.

2. He there made a good increase of his gifts. Aquila and Priscilla expounded to him the way of God more perfectly. Aquila and Priscilla heard him preach in the synagogue. They encouraged his ministry, by a diligent and constant attendance upon it. Thus young ministers, that are hopeful, should be countenanced by grown Christians. Finding him defective in his knowledge of Christianity, they took him to them and expounded to him the way of God more perfectly. They did not despise him themselves, or disparage him to others; did not call him a young raw preacher, not fit to come into a pulpit. They communicated what they knew to him, and gave him a clear, methodical account of those things which before he had but confused notions of. See an instance of truly Christian charity in Aquila and Priscilla. Aquila did not undertake to speak in the synagogue, because he had not such gifts for public work as Apollos had; but he furnished Apollos with matter, and then left him to clothe it with acceptable words. Instructing young Christians and young ministers privately in conversation is a piece of very good service. See an instance of great humility in Apollos. He was a very bright young man, of great parts and learning, and one mightily cried up and followed; and yet, finding that Aquila and Priscilla could speak intelligently and experimentally of the things of God, though they were but mechanics, he was glad to receive instructions from them, to be shown by them his defects and mistakes. Young scholars may gain a great deal by converse with old Christians, as young students in the law may by old practitioners. Apollos, though he was instructed in the way of the Lord, did not rest in the knowledge he had attained. Those that know much should covet to know more. Here is an instance of a good woman doing good with the knowledge God had given her in private converse.

III. Here is his preferment to the service of the church of Corinth. Paul had set the wheels a-going at Corinth. Many were stirred up by his preaching to receive the gospel, and they needed to be confirmed. Paul was gone and now there was a fair occasion in this vacancy for Apollos to set in, who was fitted rather to water than to plant. His call to this service. He himself inclined to do: He was disposed to pass into Achaia. Apollos thought there might be some work for him, and God disposed his mind that way. His friends encouraged him to go; they gave him letters of recommendation. Though those at Ephesus had a great loss of his labours, they did not grudge those in Achaia the benefit of them; but, on the contrary, used their interest in them to introduce him. His success in this service. Believers were greatly edified: He helped those much who had believed through grace. Those who believe in Christ, it is through grace that they believe; it is not of themselves, it is God's gift to them. Those who through grace do believe, yet still have need of help. Faithful ministers are capable of being in many ways helpful to those who through grace do believe, and it is their business to help them. Unbelievers were greatly mortified. Their objections were fully answered, their mouths were stopped, and their faces filled with shame (v. 28): He mightily convinced the Jews, and that publicly. He did it earnestly, he took pains to do it. He did it effectually and to universal satisfaction. If the Jews were but convinced of this—that Jesus is Christ, even their own law would teach them to hear him. The business of ministers is to preach Christ. The way he took to convince them was by the scriptures; thence he fetched his arguments. Ministers must be able not only to preach the truth, but to prove it and defend it, and to convince gainsayers with meekness and yet with power.

CHAP. XIX

We left Paul in his circuit visiting the churches (ch. xvii. 23), but we have not forgotten, nor has he, the promise he made to his friends at Ephesus, to return to them. Now this chapter shows us his performance of that promise. I. How he laboured there, how he taught some weak believers that had gone no further than John's baptism (ver. 1–7), how he taught three months in the synagogue of the Jews (ver. 8), and how he taught the Gentiles a long time in a public school (ver. 9, 10), and how he confirmed his doctrine by miracles, ver. 11, 12. II. What was the fruit of his labour, particularly among the conjurors: some were confounded (ver. 13–17), but others were converted, ver. 18–20. III. What projects he had of further usefulness (ver. 21, 22), and what trouble at length he met with at Ephesus from the silversmiths, how a mob was raised by Demetrius to cry up Diana (ver. 23–34), and how it was suppressed and dispersed by the town-clerk, ver. 35–41.

Ephesus was a city of great note in Asia, famous for a temple built there to Diana, which was one of the wonders of the world: thither Paul came to preach the gospel while Apollos was at Corinth (v. 1); while he was watering there, Paul was planting here, and went on in the new work that was cut out for him at Ephesus with the more cheerfulness and satisfaction, because he knew that such an able minister as Apollos was now at Corinth, carrying on the good work there. Paul having gone through the country of Galatia and Phrygia, having passed through the upper coasts, came to Ephesus, where he had left Aquila and Priscilla, and there found them. He met with some disciples there, who professed faith in Christ as the true Messiah, but were as yet in the first and lowest form in the school of Christ, under his usher John the Baptist. They were in number about twelve (v. 7).

I. How Paul catechised them.

1. They did believe in the Son of God; but Paul enquires whether they had received the Holy Ghost,—whether they had been acquainted with, and had admitted, this revelation? This was not all; extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost were conferred upon the apostles and other disciples after Christ's ascension. Had they participated in these gifts? "Have you received the Holy Ghost since you believed? Have you had that seal of the truth of Christ's doctrine in yourselves?" There are graces of the Spirit given to all believers, which are as earnests to them. But many are deceived in this matter, thinking they have received the Holy Ghost when really they have not. As there are pretenders to the gifts of the Holy Ghost, so there are to his graces and comforts; we should therefore strictly examine ourselves, Have we received the Holy Ghost since we believed? The tree will be known by its fruits. Do we bring forth the fruits of the Spirit? Do we walk in the Spirit?

2. They owned their ignorance in this matter: Whether there be a Holy Ghost is more than we know. That there is a promise of the Holy Ghost we know from the scriptures and that this promise will be fulfilled in its season we doubt not. We have not so much as heard whether the Holy Ghost be indeed yet given. The gospel light, like that of the morning, shone more and more, gradually; not only clearer and clearer, but further and further.

3. Paul enquired how they came to be baptized, if they knew nothing of the Holy Ghost. Unto what then were you baptized? This is strange and unaccountable. What! baptized, and yet know nothing of the Holy Ghost? Ignorance of the Holy Ghost is as inconsistent with a sincere profession of Christianity as ignorance of Christ is. Let us often consider unto what we were baptized, that we may live up to our baptism.

4. They own that they were baptized unto John's baptism, that is, they were baptized in the name of John, by some disciple of his, that ignorantly kept up his name as the head of a party. As it is here expressed, unto John's baptism.

5. Paul explains to them the true intent and meaning of John's baptism, as principally referring to Jesus Christ. Those that have been left in ignorance, or led into error, by any infelicities of their education, should be compassionately instructed and better taught, as these disciples were by Paul. He owns that John's baptism was a very good thing, as far as it went: John verily baptized with the baptism of repentance. He shows them that John's baptism had a further reference. They should believe on him who should come after him, that is, on Christ Jesus,—that his baptism of repentance was designed only to prepare the way of the Lord, whom he directed them to: Behold the Lamb of God. He was only the harbinger,—Christ is the Prince. His baptism was the porch which you were to pass through, not the house you were to rest in.

6. When they were thus shown the error they thankfully accepted the discovery, and were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, v. 5. When they came to understand things better, they desired to be baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and were so. It does not therefore follow hence that there was not an agreement between John's baptism and Christ's, for those that were here baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus had never been so baptized before.

II. How Paul conferred the extraordinary gifts of the Holy Ghost upon them, v. 6. Paul solemnly prayed to God laying his hands on them. God granted the thing he prayed for: The Holy Ghost came upon them, and they spoke with tongues and prophesied. They had the Spirit of prophesy, that they might understand the mysteries of the kingdom of God themselves, and the gift of tongues, that they might preach them to every nation and language. Oh, what a wonderful change was here made on a sudden in these men! those that but just now had not so much as heard that there was any Holy Ghost are now themselves filled with the Holy Ghost.

Paul is here very busy at Ephesus.

I. He begins, as usual, in the Jews' synagogue.

1. Where he preached to them: in their synagogue (v. 8). Where there were no Christian assemblies yet formed, he frequented the Jewish assemblies. Paul went into the synagogue, because there he had them together, and had them, it might be hoped, in a good frame.

2. What he preached to them: The things concerning the kingdom of God among men, the great things which concerned God's dominion over all men and favour to them, and men's subjection to God and happiness in God. Or, more particularly, the things concerning the kingdom of the Messiah. He gave them a right notion of this kingdom, and showed them their mistakes about it.

3. How he preached to them. He preached argumentatively: he disputed; gave reasons, and answered objections, that they might not only believe, but might see cause to believe. He preached affectionately: he persuaded. Paul was a moving preacher, and was master of the art of persuasion. He preached undauntedly, and with a holy resolution: he spoke boldly.

4. How long he preached to them: For the space of three months, which was a competent time allowed them to consider of it.

5. What success his preaching had among them. There were some that were persuaded to believe in Christ. Many continued in their infidelity, and were confirmed in their prejudices against Christianity. Now that he settled among them, and his word came more closely to their consciences, they were soon weary of him. They had an invincible aversion to the gospel of Christ themselves: they were hardened, and believed not. They did their utmost to raise and keep up in others an aversion to the gospel. They spoke evil of that way before the multitude, to prejudice them against it. Though they could not show any manner of evil in it, yet they said all manner of evil concerning it.

II. When he had carried the matter as far as it would go in the synagogue of the Jews, he left the synagogue. They drove him from them by their railing at those things which he spoke concerning the kingdom of God: they hated to be reformed, hated to be instructed, and therefore he departed from them.

1. When Paul departed from the Jews he took the disciples with him, and separated them. Lest they should be infected with the poisonous tongues of those blasphemers, he separated those who believed, to be the foundation of a Christian church. When Paul departed there needed no more to separate the disciples; let him go where he will, they will follow him.

2. When Paul separated from the synagogue he disputed daily in the school of one Tyrannus. He had by this separation a double advantage. (1) That now his opportunities were more frequent. In the synagogue he could only preach every sabbath day (ch. xiii. 43), but now he disputed daily. (2) That now they were more open. To the synagogue of the Jews none might come but Jews or proselytes; Gentiles were excluded. In the school of Tyrannus, both Jews and Greeks attended his ministry, v. 10. Some think this school of Tyrannus was a divinity-school of the Jews, and such a one they commonly had in their great cities besides their synagogue; they called it Bethmidrash, the house of enquiry. But others think it was a philosophy-school of the Gentiles, belonging to one Tyrannus. Some convenient place it was, which Paul and the disciples had the use of, either for love or money.

3. Here he continued his labours for two years. These two years commence from the end of the three months which he spent in the synagogue (v. 8); therefore he might justly reckon it in all three years, as he does, ch. xx. 31.

4. The gospel hereby spread far and near (v. 10): All those that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus; not only all that dwelt in Ephesus, but all that dwelt in that large province called Asia, of which Ephesus was the head city. There was great resort to Ephesus from all parts of the country, which gave Paul an opportunity of sending the report of the gospel to all the towns and villages of that country. They all heard the word of the Lord Jesus. Some of all sects, some out of all parts both in city and country, embraced this gospel, and entertained it, and by them it was communicated to others.

III. God confirmed Paul's doctrine by miracles, v. 11, 12. Why did he not work miracles at Thessalonica, Berea, and Athens? Or, if he did, why are they not recorded? But here at Ephesus we have the proofs of this kind which he gave of his divine mission. They were special miracles. God exerted powers that were not according to the common course of nature. Or, they were not only (as all miracles are) out of the common road, but they were even uncommon miracles. God wrought something above the common road of miracles. It was not Paul that wrought them but it was God that wrought them by the hand of Paul. He was but the instrument.

3. He not only cured the sick that were brought to him, or to whom he was brought, but from his body were brought to the sick handkerchiefs or aprons. We read of one that was cured by the touch of Christ's garment when it was upon him, and he perceived that virtue went out of him; but here were people cured by Paul's garments when they were taken from him. Christ gave his apostles power against unclean spirits and against all manner of sickness (Matt. x. 1), those to whom Paul sent relief had it in both cases: for the diseases departed from them and the evil spirits went out of them.

We have here in these verses two remarkable instances of the conquest of Satan, not only in those that were violently possessed by him, but in those that were voluntarily devoted to him.

I. Here is the confusion of some of Satan's servants, some vagabond Jews, that were exorcists, who made use of Christ's name in their diabolical enchantments.

1. The general character of those who were guilty of this presumption. They were Jews, but vagabond Jews. They strolled about to tell people their fortunes, and pretended by spells and charms to cure diseases, and bring people to themselves that were melancholy or distracted. The superstitious Jews, to put a reputation upon these magic arts, wickedly attributed the invention of them to Solomon. And Christ seems to refer to this (Matt. xii. 27), By whom do your children cast them out?

2. A particular account of some at Ephesus that led this course of life. They were seven sons of one Sceva, a Jew, and chief of the priests, v. 14. Their father was a chief of the priests, head of one of the twenty-four courses of priests. One would think the temple would find both employment and encouragement enough for the sons of a chief priest.

3. The profaneness they were guilty of: They took upon them to call over evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus; not as those who had a veneration for Christ and a confidence in his name, as we read of some who cast out devils in Christ's name and yet did not follow with his disciples (Luke ix. 49), but as those who were willing to try all methods to carry on their wicked trade. They said, We adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preaches; not, "whom we believe in, or depend upon," but whom Paul preaches; as if they had said, "We will try what that name will do."

4. The confusion they were put to in their impious operations. The evil spirit gave them a sharp reply (v. 15): "Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are you? What power have you to command us in his name, or who gave you any such power? What have you to do to declare the power of Jesus, seeing you hate his instructions?" The man in whom the evil spirit was gave them a warm reception, leaped upon them, overcame them and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of the house, not only naked, but wounded. A warning to all those who name the name of Christ, but do not depart from iniquity. The same enemy that overcomes them with his temptations will overcome them with his terrors. If we resist the devil by a true and lively faith in Christ, he will flee from us; but if we think to resist him by the bare using of Christ's name, as a spell or charm, he will prevail against us.

5. The general notice that was taken of this (v. 17): This was known to all the Jews and Greeks also dwelling at Ephesus. It was the common talk of the town. Men were terrified: fear fell on them all. In this instance they saw the malice of the devil whom they served, and the power of Christ whom they opposed. God was glorified; the name of the Lord Jesus was the more magnified; for now it appeared to be a name above every name.

II. Here is the conversion of others of Satan's servants.

1. Those that had been guilty of wicked practices confessed them, v. 18. Many that had believed and were baptized, but had not then been so particular as they might have been in the confession of their sins, came to Paul, and confessed what evil lives they had led, and what a great deal of secret wickedness their own consciences charged them with. They showed their deeds, took shame to themselves and gave glory to God and warning to others. Where there is true contrition for sin there will be an ingenuous confession of sin to God and to man whom we have offended when the case requires it.

2. Those that had conversed with wicked books burnt them (v. 19): Many also of those who used curious arts, that traded in the study of magic and divination. These, having their consciences more awakened than ever, brought their books together, and burnt them before all men. Ephesus was notorious for the use of these curious arts. It was therefore much for the honour of Christ and his gospel to have such a noble testimony borne against those curious arts, in a place where they were so much in vogue. Thus they showed a holy indignation at the sins they had been guilty of. Those very things were now detestable to them, as much as ever they had been delectable. Thus they showed their resolution never to return to the use of those arts. Being steadfastly resolved never to make use of them, they burnt them. Thus they put away a temptation to return to them again. Those that truly repent of sin will keep themselves as far as possible from the occasions of it. Thus they prevented their doing mischief to others. It was the safest course to commit them all to the flames. Those that are recovered from sin themselves will do all they can to keep others from falling into it. Thus they showed a contempt of the wealth of this world; for the price of the books was cast up, and it was found to be fifty thousand pieces of silver. Probably they had cost them so much; yet, being the devil's books, they did not think this would justify them in being so wicked as to sell them again. Thus they publicly testified their joy for their conversion from these wicked practices. These converts joined together in making this bonfire, and made it before all men. They chose to do it together, by consent, and to do it at the high cross (as we say), that Christ and his grace in them might be the more magnified.

III. Here is a general account of the progress and success of the gospel (v. 20): So mightily grew the word of God, and prevailed. It is a blessed sight to see the word of God growing and prevailing mightily. To see it grow extensively, by the addition of many to the church. When still more and more are wrought upon by the gospel, then it grows; when those that had been most stiff in their opposition to it, are brought into obedience to it, then it may be said to grow mightily. To see it prevail extensively. When strong corruptions are mortified, evil customs of long standing broken off, and pleasant, gainful, fashionable sins are abandoned, then it prevails mightily; and Christ in it goes on conquering and to conquer.

I. Paul is here brought into some trouble at Ephesus, just when he is forecasting to go thence.

1. How he laid his purpose of going to other places, v. 21, 22. He was a man of vast designs for God, and was for making his influences as widely diffusive as might be. He designed a visit to the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, v. 21. There he had planted churches, and now is concerned to visit them. He purposed in the spirit, either in his own spirit, or by the direction of the Holy Spirit, who was his guide in all his motions. He purposed to go and see how the work of God went on in those places. Thence he designed to go to Jerusalem, to visit the brethren there, and thence he intended to go to Rome, to go and see Rome. It was an expression people commonly used, that they would go and see Rome, would look about them there, when that which he designed was to see the Christians there. The good people at Rome were the glory of the city which he longed for a sight of. He sent Timothy and Erastus into Macedonia, to give them notice of the visit he intended them. For the present he stayed in Asia.

2. How he was seconded in his purpose, and obliged to pursue it by the troubles which at length he met with at Ephesus. It was strange that he had been quiet there so long; yet it should seem he had met with trouble there not recorded in this story, for in his epistle he speaks of his having fought with beasts at Ephesus (1 Cor. xv. 32). And he speaks of the trouble which came to them in Asia, near Ephesus, when he despaired of life, 2 Cor. i, 8, 9.

II. But, in the trouble here related, he was worse frightened than hurt. In general, there arose no small stir about that way, v. 23. Let us view the particulars of it.

1. A great complaint against Paul for drawing people off from the worship of Diana, and so spoiling the trade of the silversmiths that worked for Diana's temple.

(1) The complainant is Demetrius, a silversmith. The most advantageous branch of his trade was making silver shrines for Diana, v. 24. Some think these were medals stamped with the effigies of Diana, others think they were representations of the temple, with the image of Diana in it in miniature, all of silver. Those that came from far to pay their devotions at the temple of Ephesus bought these little temples or shrines, to carry home with them. See how craftsmen, and crafty men too above the rank of silversmiths, make an advantage to themselves of people's superstition.

(2) The persons he appeals to are not the magistrates, but the mob; he called the craftsmen together, with the workmen of like occupation, and these he endeavoured to incense against Paul.

(3) His complaint and representation are very full. He lays it down for a principle that the making silver shrines for the worshippers of Diana was very necessary to be kept up (v. 25): "You know that by this craft we have our wealth." It is natural for men to be jealous for that by which they get their wealth; and many have set themselves against the gospel of Christ, because it calls men off from those crafts which are unlawful, how much wealth soever is to be obtained by them. He charges it upon Paul that he had dissuaded men from worshipping idols. He had asserted, Those are no gods which are made with hands, v. 26. Could any truth be more plain and self-evident than this, The workman made it, therefore it is not God? Yet this must be looked upon as an heretical and atheistical notion, and Paul as a criminal for maintaining it. The consequence of it was that not only at Ephesus, but almost throughout all Asia, he had persuaded and turned away much people from the worship of Diana. There are those who will stickle for that which is most grossly absurd and unreasonable, if it have but human laws, and worldly interest on its side. He reminds them of the danger which their trade was in of going to decay. "If this doctrine gains credit, we are all undone, and may even shut up shop; this our craft will be set at nought." He pretends a mighty zeal for Diana: Not only this our craft is in danger. All his care is lest the temple of the great goddess Diana should be despised, and her magnificence should be destroyed; and he would not see the diminution of the honour of that goddess, whom all Asia and the world worship. See what the worship of Diana had to plead for itself. It had pomp on its side; the magnificence of the temple was the thing that charmed them. It had numbers on its side; All Asia and the world worship it; and therefore it must needs be the right way of worship, let Paul say what he will to the contrary.

2. The popular resentment of this complaint. They showed, (1) A great displeasure against the gospel and the preachers of it. They were full of wrath (v. 28). The craftsmen went stark mad when they were told that their trade and their idol were both in danger. (2) A great jealousy for the honour of their goddess: They cried out, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians. Let Paul say ever so much to prove that those are no gods which are made with hands, we will abide by it that, Great is Diana of the Ephesians. We must and will stand up for the religion of our country." Much more should the servants of the true God do so. (3) A great disorder among themselves (v. 29): The whole city was full of confusion—the common and natural effect of an intemperate zeal for a false religion.

3. The proceedings of the mob under the power of these resentments.

(1) They laid hands on some of Paul's companions, and hurried them into the theatre (v. 29). Those whom they seized were Gaius and Aristarchus. Gaius was of Derbe, ch. xx. 4. Aristarchus is also there spoken of, and Col. iv. 10. They came with Paul from Macedonia, and this was their only crime, that they were Paul's companions.

(2) Paul, who had escaped being seized by them, when he perceived his friends in distress, for his sake would have entered in unto the people. It was an evidence of a generous spirit, and that he loved his neighbour as himself.

(3) He was persuaded from it by the kindness of his friends. The disciples suffered him not, for it better became him to offer it than it would have become them to suffer it. Others of his friends interposed, to prevent his throwing himself thus into the mouth of danger, v. 31. They were certain of the chief of Asia. Whether they were converts to the Christian faith, or whether they were only well-wishers to Paul, as an ingenuous good man, we are not told, only that they were Paul's friends. It is a friendly part to take more care of the lives and comforts of good men than they do themselves. Paul was overruled by his friends to obey the law of self-preservation, and has taught us to keep out of the way of danger as long as we can without going out of the way of duty. We may be called to lay down our lives, but not to throw away our lives.

(4) The mob was in a perfect confusion (v. 32): Some cried one thing and some another, the assembly was confused. The truth was the greater part knew not wherefore they had come together. Upon such occasions, the greatest part come only to enquire what the matter is: they follow the cry, follow the crowd, increase like a snowball, and where there are many there will be more.

(5) The Jews would have interested themselves in this tumult, but now at Ephesus they had not interest enough to raise the mob, and yet, when it was raised, they had ill will enough to set in with it (v. 33): They drew Alexander out of the multitude, called him out to speak on the behalf of the Jews against Paul and his companions: "You have heard what Demetrius and the silversmiths have to say against them, as enemies to their religion; give us leave now to tell you what we have to say against him as an enemy to our religion." The Jews put him forward to do this, and therefore what he designed to say is called his apologizing to the people, not for himself in particular, but for the Jews in general. Now they would have them know that they were as much Paul's enemies as they were. Alexander beckoned with the hand, desiring to be heard against Paul; for it had been strange if a persecution had been carried on against the Christians and there were not Jews at one end or the other of it: if they could not begin the mischief, they would help it forward. Some think this Alexander had been a Christian, but had apostatized to Judaism, and therefore was drawn out as a proper person to accuse Paul; and that he was that Alexander the coppersmith that did Paul so much evil (2 Tim. iv. 14), and whom he had delivered unto Satan, 1 Tim. i. 20.

(6) This occasioned the prosecutors to drop the prosecution of Paul's friends, and to turn it into acclamations in honour of their goddess (v. 34): When they knew that he was a Jew, and, as such, an enemy to the worship of Diana, they were resolved not to hear him, and therefore set the mob a shouting, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians; whoever runs her down, be he Jew or Christian, we are resolved to cry her up." This was all the cry for two hours together; and it was thought a sufficient confutation of Paul's doctrine, that those are not gods which are made with hands. Thus the most sacred truths are often run down with nothing else but noise and clamour and popular fury.

4. The suppressing and dispersing of these rioters, by the prudence and vigilence of the town clerk. With much ado he, at length, stilled the noise, so as to be heard, and then made a pacific speech to them.

(1) He humours them with an acknowledgment that Diana was the celebrated goddess of the Ephesians v. 35. They needed not to be so loud and strenuous in asserting a truth which nobody denied. Everyone knows that the city of the Ephesians is a worshipper of the great goddess Diana. The temple of Diana at Ephesus was a very rich and sumptuous structure, but the image of Diana in the temple was had in greater veneration than the temple, for they persuaded the people that it fell down from Jupiter, and therefore was none of the gods that were made with men's hands. Because this image of Diana had been set up time out of mind, and nobody could tell who made it, they made the people believe it fell down from Jupiter. "Now these things," says the town clerk very gravely, "cannot be spoken against; they have obtained such universal credit that you need not fear contradiction."

(2) He cautions them against all violent and tumultuous proceedings, which their religion did not need (v. 36): You ought to be quiet, and to do nothing rashly. A very good rule this is to be observed at all times, both in private and public affairs; not to be hasty and precipitate in our motions, but to be calm and composed, and always keep reason in the throne and passion under check. We ought to be quiet and to do nothing rashly; to do nothing in haste, which we may repent of at leisure.

(3) He wipes off the odium that had been cast upon Paul and his associates (v. 37): "You have brought hither these men. What can you prove upon them? They are not robbers of churches. They have offered no violence to Diana's temple or the treasures of it; nor are they blasphemers of your goddess. Why should you prosecute those with all this violence who do not inveigh with any bitterness against you? Since they are calm, why should you be hot?" It was the idol in the heart that they levelled all their force against, by reason and argument; if they can but get that down, the idol in the temple will fall of course. Those that preach against idolatrous churches have truth on their side, with meekness instructing, not with passion and foul language reproaching, those that oppose themselves; for God's truth needs not man's intemperate heat.

(4) He turns them over to the regular methods of the law. A great mercy it is to live in a country where provision is made for the keeping of the peace, and the administration of public justice, and herein we of this nation are as happy as any people. If the complaint be of a private injury, let them have recourse to the judges and courts of justice. If Demetrius and the company of the silversmiths find themselves aggrieved, let them bring their action, and the matter shall be fairly tried, and justice done: The law is open, and there are deputies, whose business it is to hear both sides, and in their determination all parties must acquiesce, and not be their own judges, nor appeal to the people. If the complaint be of a public grievance it must be redressed, not by a confused rabble, but by a convention of the states (v. 39): If you enquire anything concerning other matters it shall be determined in a lawful assembly called together in a regular way by those in authority. Private persons should not intermeddle in public matters, we have enough to do to mind our own business.

(5) He makes them sensible of the danger they have run themselves into by this riot (v. 40): "It is well if we be not called in question for this day's uproar, for there is no cause whereby we may give an account of this concourse. Let the matter go no further, for it has gone too far already." Most people stand in awe of men's judgment more than of the judgment of God. How well were it if we would thus still the tumult of our disorderly appetites and passions with the consideration of the account we must shortly give to the Judge of heaven and earth for all these disorders! We are concerned to manage ourselves as those that must give account.

(6) When he has thus shown them the absurdity of their riotous meeting, he advises them to separate with all speed (v. 41): he dismissed the assembly. See here how the overruling providence of God preserves the public peace, by an unaccountable power over the spirits of men. Thus the world is kept in some order, and men are restrained from being as the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the less. Considering what an ungovernable, untameable wild beast the mob is, when it is up, we shall see reason to acknowledge God's goodness that we are not always under the tyranny of it. See how many ways God has of protecting his people. Perhaps this town clerk was no friend at all to Paul, yet his human prudence is made to serve the divine purpose.

CHAP. XX

I. Paul's travels up and down about Macedonia, Greece, and Asia, and his coming at length to Troas, ver. 1–6. II. A particular account of his spending one Lord's day at Troas, and his raising Eutychus to life there, ver. 7–12. III. His progress in his way towards Jerusalem, ver. 13–16. IV. The farewell sermon at Ephesus, ver. 17–35. V. The very sorrowful parting between him and them, ver. 36–38.

I. Paul's departure from Ephesus. He had tarried there longer than he had done at any one place. Now it was time to think of removing, for he must preach in other cities also; but after this we never find him breaking up fresh ground again, for in the close of the next chapter we find him made a prisoner, and so continued, and so left, at the end of this book. Paul left Ephesus soon after the uproar had ceased, v. 1. His removal might somewhat appease the rage of his adversaries, and gain better quarter for the Christians there. Some think that before he now left Ephesus he wrote the first epistle to the Corinthians, and that his fighting with beasts at Ephesus, which he mentions in that epistle, was a figurative description of this uproar. He did not leave them abruptly, but took leave of them solemnly: He called unto him the disciples, and embraced them, took leave of them (saith the Syriac) with the kiss of love. Loving friends know not how well they love one another till they come to part, and then it appears how near they lay to one another's hearts.

II. His visitation of the Greek churches, which he had planted, and which appear to have laid very near his heart. He went first to Macedonia (v. 1), according to his purpose before the uproar (ch. xix. 21); there he visited the churches of Philippi and Thessalonica, and gave them much exhortation, v. 2. He had a great deal to say to them, and did not stint himself in time. He stayed three months in Greece (v. 2, 3), that is, in Achaia, for thither also he purposed to go, to Corinth, and thereabouts (ch. xix. 21).

III. The altering of his measures. Paul was about to sail into Syria, to Antioch, but he changed his mind, and resolved to return to Macedonia, the same way he came. The reason was because the Jews, expecting he would steer that course as usual, had waylaid him, designing to be the death of him.

IV. His companions in his travels when he went into Asia; they are here named, v. 4. Sopater of Berea, it is likely, is the same with Sosipater, who is mentioned Rom. xvi. 21. Timothy is reckoned among them, for though Paul, when he departed from Ephesus (v. 1), left Timothy there, yet he soon followed him, and accompanied him, with others here named. Now, one would think, this was no good husbandry, to have all these worthy men accompanying Paul, but so it was ordered, 1. That they might assist him in instructing such as by his preaching were awakened and startled; wherever Paul came, the waters were stirred, and then there was need of many hands to help the cripples in. 2. That they might be trained up by him, and fitted for future service.

V. His coming to Troas. They went before, and stayed for him at Troas (v. 5). We should not think it hard to stay awhile for good company in a journey. Paul made the best of his way thither. Luke was now in company with him; for he says, We sailed from Philippi (v. 6), and the first time we find him in his company was here at Troas, ch. xvi. 11. The days of unleavened bread are mentioned only to describe the time. He came to them to Troas, by sea, in five days, and when he was there stayed but seven days. There is no remedy, but a great deal of time will unavoidably be lost in travelling to and fro, by those who go about doing good, yet it shall not be put upon the score of lost time. Paul thought it worth while to bestow five days in going to Troas, though it was but for an opportunity of seven days' stay there.

We have here an account of what passed at Troas the last of the seven days that Paul stayed there.

I. There was a solemn religious assembly of the Christians that were there. 1. The disciples came together, v. 7. Though they read, and meditated, and prayed, and sung psalms, apart, and thereby kept up their communion with God, yet that was not enough; they must come together to worship God in concert, and so keep up their communion with one another. There ought to be stated times for the disciples of Christ to come together; though they cannot all come together in one place, yet as many as can. 2. They came together upon the first day of the week, which they called the Lord's day (Rev. i. 10). This is here said to be the day when it was their practice to come together in all the churches. The first day of the week is to be religiously observed by all the disciples of Christ; and it is a sign between Christ and them. 3. They were gathered together in an upper chamber (v. 8); they had no capacious stately chapel, but met in a private house, in a garret. As they were few, and did not need, so they were poor, and could not build, a large meeting-place; yet they came together, in that despicable inconvenient place. It will be no excuse for our absenting ourselves from religious assemblies that the place of them is not so decent nor so commodious as we would have it to be. 4. They came together to break bread, that is, to celebrate the ordinance of the Lord's supper. In the breaking of the bread, not only the breaking of Christ's body for us, to be a sacrifice for our sins, is commemorated, but the breaking of Christ's body to us, to be food and a feast for our souls, is signified. It was the custom of many churches to receive the Lord's supper every Lord's day, in concert, in a solemn assembly, to testify their joint concurrence in the same faith and worship.

II. In this assembly Paul gave them a sermon, a long sermon, a farewell sermon, v. 7. 1. He preached to them. The preaching of the gospel ought to accompany the sacraments. 2. It was a farewell sermon, he being ready to depart on the morrow. When he was gone, they might have the same gospel preached, but not as he preached it; and therefore they must make the best use of him that they could while they had him. 3. It was a very long sermon: He continued his speech until midnight; for he had a great deal to say, and knew not that ever he should have another opportunity of preaching to them.

There may be occasion for ministers to preach, not only in season, but out of season. We know some that would have reproached Paul for this as a long-winded preacher, that tired his hearers; but they were willing to hear: he saw them so, and therefore continued his speech. We wish we had the heads of this long sermon, but we may suppose it was for substance the same with his epistles. The meeting being continued till midnight, there were candles set up, many lights (v. 8). This might prevent the reproach of their enemies, who said they met in the night for works of darkness.

III. A young man in the congregation, that slept at sermon, was killed by a fall out of the window, but raised to life again; his name signifies one that had good fortune, and he answered his name.

1. The infirmity with which he was overtaken. He presumptuously sat in the window, unglazed perhaps, and so exposed himself; whereas, if he could have been content to sit on the floor, he had been safe. He slept, nay, he fell into a deep sleep when Paul was preaching, which was a sign he did not duly attend to the things that Paul spoke of. The particular notice taken of his sleeping makes us willing to hope none of the rest slept, though it was sleeping time and after supper.

2. The calamity with which he was seized herein: He fell down from the third loft, and was taken up dead. Some think that the hand of Satan was in it, and that he designed it for a disturbance to this assembly and a reproach to Paul. Others think that God designed it for a warning to all people to take heed of sleeping when they are hearing the word preached. We must look upon it as a bad sign of our low esteem of the word of God. We must do what we can to prevent our being sleepy, get our hearts affected with the word we hear to such a degree as may drive sleep far enough.

3. The miraculous mercy shown him in his recovery to life again, v. 10. It proved an occasion of that which was a great confirmation to his preaching. Paul fell on the dead body, and embraced it, thereby expressing a great compassion to, and an affectionate concern for, this young man. Such tender spirits as Paul had are much affected with sad accidents of this kind, and are far from judging and censuring those that fall under them. As a sign it represented the descent of that divine power upon the dead body, for the putting of life into it again, which at the same time he inwardly, earnestly, and in faith prayed for. He assured them that he had returned to life. Various speculations this ill accident had occasioned in the congregation, but Paul puts an end to them all: "Trouble not yourselves, for his life is in him." He returned to his work immediately after this interruption (v. 11): He came up again to the meeting, they broke bread together in a love-feast, and they talked a long while, even till break of day. Paul did not now go on in a continued discourse, as before, but he and his friends fell into a free conversation. They knew not when they should have Paul's company again, and therefore made the best use they could of it when they had it, and reckoned a night's sleep well lost for that purpose. Before they parted they brought the young man alive into the congregation, and they were not a little comforted, v. 12. It was matter of great rejoicing among them, not only to the relations of the young man, but to the whole society.

Paul is hastening towards Jerusalem. He had called at Troas, and now he makes a sort of coasting voyage, no doubt endeavouring to make every place he came to the better for him.

I. He sent his companions by sea to Assos, but he himself was minded to go afoot, v. 13. He would foot it to Assos: and, if the land-way which Paul took was the shorter way, yet it is taken notice of by the ancients as a rough way. That way Paul would take, 1. That he might call on his friends by the way. Or, 2. That he might be alone, and might have the greater freedom of converse with God and his own heart in solitude. Or, 3. That he might inure himself to hardship, and not seem to indulge his ease. We should use ourselves to deny ourselves.

II. At Assos he went on board with his friends. There they took him in.

III. He made the best of his way to Jerusalem. His ship passed by Chios (v. 15), touched at Samos, they tarried awhile at Trogyllium, the seaport next to Samos, and the next day they came to Miletus, the seaport that lay next to Ephesus; for (v. 16) he had determined not to go to Ephesus at this time, for he hasted, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem on the day of pentecost. He had been at Jerusalem about four or five years ago (ch. xviii. 21, 22), and now he was going thither again to pay his continued respects to that church. He aimed to be there by the feast of pentecost because it was a time of concourse, and the feast of pentecost had been particularly made famous among the Christians by the pouring out of the Spirit. Men of business must fit themselves to set time (with submission to Providence) and strive to keep it, not suffering ourselves to be diverted from it. It is a pleasure to us to be with our friends; it diverts us, nothing more; but we must not by it be diverted from our work. When Paul has a call to Jerusalem, he will not loiter away the time in Asia, though he had more and kinder friends there.

Verses 17–35

When he came to Miletus, he went ashore, and tarried there so long as to send for the elders of Ephesus to come to him thither; for if he had gone up to Ephesus, he could never have got away from them. These Paul sent for, that he might instruct and encourage them to go on in the work to which they had laid their hands.

It is a very pathetic and practical discourse with which Paul here takes leave of these elders, and has in it much of the excellent spirit of this good man.

I. He appeals to them concerning both his life and doctrine, all the time he had been in and about Ephesus (v. 18): "You know after what manner I have been with you." They all knew him to be a man of a serious, gracious, heavenly spirit, that he was no designing self-seeking man. He could not have been carried on with so much evenness and constancy in his services and sufferings, but by the power of divine grace. The temper of his mind, and the tenor both of his preaching and conversation, were such as plainly proved that God was with him of a truth.—He likewise makes this reference to his own conduct as an instruction to them to follow his example: "You know after what manner I have been with you; in like manner be you with those that are committed to your charge when I am gone."

1. His spirit and conversation were excellent and exemplary. (1) He had conducted himself well all along, from the very first day that he came into Asia. He appeared from the first day they knew him to be a man that aimed not only to do well, but to do good. He was a man that was consistent with himself. Take him where you would he was the same at all seasons, he did not turn with the wind nor change with the weather, but as uniform like a die, which, throw it which way you will, lights on a square side. (2) He had made it his business to serve the Lord. He never served himself, nor made himself a servant of men, nor was he a time-server. (3) He had done his work with all humility of mind. He never took state upon him, nor kept people at a distance, but conversed as freely and familiarly with the meanest, for their good, as if he had stood upon a level with them. He was willing to stoop to any service. (4) He had always been very tender, affectionate, and compassionate, among them; he had served the Lord with many tears. Paul was herein like his Master; often in tears. In his preaching, what he had told him before he told them again, even weeping, Phil. iii. 18. So near did they lie to his heart that he wept with those that wept, which was very endearing. (5) He had struggled with many difficulties among them. He went on in his work in the face of much opposition, many temptations, trials of his patience and courage. These befell him by the lying in wait of the Jews, who still were plotting some mischief or other against him. Those are the faithful servants of the Lord that continue to serve him in the midst of troubles and perils, that care not what enemies they make, so that they can but approve themselves to their Master, and make him their friend.

2. His preaching was likewise such as it should be, v. 20, 21. (1) He was a plain preacher: delivered his message so as to be understood. This is intimated in two words, I have shown you, and have taught you. He did not amuse them with nice speculations, nor lose them in the clouds of lofty notions and expressions; but he showed them the plain truths of the gospel, and taught them as children are taught. (2) He was a powerful preacher, which is intimated in his testifying to them; he preached as one upon oath. He preached the gospel, not as a hawker proclaims news in the street (it is all one to him whether it be true or false), but as a conscientious witness gives in his evidence at the bar. (3) He was a profitable preacher. He studied that which was profitable unto them, which had a tendency to make them wise and good, wiser and better, to reform their hearts and lives. He preached such things as brought with them divine light, and heat, and power to their souls. It is not enough not to preach that which is hurtful, but we must preach that which is profitable. Paul aimed to please only in order to profit. (4) He was a painstaking preacher; he preached publicly, and from house to house. He was neither afraid nor ashamed to preach the gospel publicly, nor did he grudge to bestow his pains privately, among a few, when there was occasion for it. Ministers should in their private visits, and as they go from house to house, discourse of those things which they have taught publicly. And, especially, they should help persons to apply the truth to themselves and their own case. (5) He was a faithful preacher. He preached everything that he thought might be profitable, and kept back nothing. He declined not preaching whatever he thought might be profitable, though it was not fashionable, nor to some acceptable. He did not keep back reproofs, when they were necessary, for fear of offending; nor did he keep back the preaching of the cross, though he knew it was to the Jews a stumbling-block and to the Greeks foolishness. (6) He was a catholic preacher. He testified both to the Jews and also to the Greeks. Though he was born and bred a Jew, and was trained up in their prejudices against the Gentiles, yet he did not therefore confine himself to the Jews and avoid the Gentiles; but preached as readily to them as to the Jews. And, on the other hand, though he was called to be the apostle of the Gentiles, and the Jews had an implacable enmity against him upon that score, yet he did not therefore abandon them as reprobates. Ministers must preach the gospel with impartiality; for they are ministers of Christ for the universal church. (7) He was a truly Christian evangelical preacher. He did not preach philosophical notions, nor did he preach politics, but he preached faith and repentance. These he urged upon all occasions. [1] Repentance towards God. He preached repentance as God's great command (ch. xvii. 30), that men should repent, and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance (so he explains it, ch. xxvi. 20); and he preached it as Christ's gift, in order to the remission of sins (ch. v. 31). [2] Faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ. We must by repentance look towards God as our end; and by faith towards Christ as our way to God. Our repentance towards God is not sufficient, we must have a true faith in Christ as our Redeemer and Saviour. For there is no coming to God, as penitent prodigals to a Father, but in the strength of Jesus Christ as Mediator.

II. He declares his expectation of sufferings and afflictions in his present journey to Jerusalem, v. 22–24. Now, behold, I go bound in the spirit to Jerusalem, which may be understood either, (1) Of the certain foresight he had of trouble before him. He was in full expectation of trouble, and made it his daily business to prepare for it. Or, (2) Of the strong impulse he was under to go this journey: "I go bound in the spirit, that is, firmly resolved to proceed, and not from any humour or design of my own. I go led by the Spirit, and bound to follow him wherever he leads me." He does not know particularly the things that shall befall him at Jerusalem. God had not thought fit to reveal them to him. It is good to be kept in the dark concerning future events, that we may be always waiting on God and waiting for him. We know not the things that shall befall us nor what a day, or a night, or an hour, may bring forth; and therefore must refer ourselves to God, let him do with us as seemeth good in his eyes. Yet he does know in general that there is a storm before him; for the prophets in every city he passed through told him, by the Holy Ghost, that bonds and afflictions awaited him. He fixes a brave and heroic resolution to go on with his work. It was a melancholy peal that was rung in his ears in every city, that bonds and afflictions did abide him; yet by the grace of God he was enabled to go on with his work. Let us take it from his own mouth here (v. 24): "None of these things move me." Paul is here an example,

(1) Of holy courage and resolution. He made nothing of them: None of these things move me; I make no account of them. He did not lay these things to heart, Christ and heaven lay there. They did not drive him off from his work; he did not tack about, and go back again, when he saw the storm rise, but went on resolutely. They did not deprive him of his comfort. In the midst of troubles he was as one unconcerned. Those that have their conversation in heaven can look down, not only upon the common troubles of this earth but upon the threatening rage and malice of hell itself, and say that none of these things moved them, as knowing that none of these things can hurt them.

(2) Of a holy contempt of life: Neither count I my life dear to myself. Life is sweet, and is naturally dear to us. All that a man has will he give for his life. Yet to an eye of faith it is comparatively despicable; it is not so dear but it can be cheerfully parted with for Christ.

(3) Of a holy concern to go through with the work of life, which should be much more our care than to secure either the outward comforts of it or the countenance of it. Two things this great and good man is in care about, and if he gain them it is no matter to him what becomes of life: [1] That he may be found faithful to the trust reposed in him, that he may finish the ministry which he has received of the Lord Jesus, may do the work, which he was sent into the world about, or, rather, which he was sent into the church about. And may not do his work by halves. The apostleship was a ministry both to Christ and to the souls of men; and those that were called to it considered more the ministry of it than the dignity or dominion of it. This ministry was received from the Lord Jesus. He entrusted them with it, and from him they received their charge; for him they do their work, in his name, in his strength. The work of this ministry was to testify the gospel of the grace of God. It is a proof of God's goodwill to us, and a means of his good work in us; it shows him gracious towards us, and tends to make us gracious, and so is the gospel of the grace of God. Paul desired not to live a day longer than he might be instrumental to spread the knowledge of this gospel. [2] That he may finish well. He cares not when the period of his life comes, nor how, so that he may but finish his course with joy. He looks upon his life as a course, a race, so the word is. This intimates that we have our labours appointed us, and our limits appointed us, for we were not sent into the world to be here always, but to pass through the world, nay, to run through it, and it is soon run through. He counts upon the finishing of his course, and speaks of it as sure and near. Dying is the end of our race, when we come off either with honour or shame. He is full of care to finish it well. He thinks nothing too much to do, nor too hard to suffer, so that he may but finish well, finish with joy. We must look upon it as the business of our life to provide for a joyful death, that we may not only die safely, but die comfortably.

III. Counting upon it that this was the last time they should see him, he appeals to their consciences concerning his integrity.

1. He tells them that he was now taking his last leave of them (v. 25): I know that you all, among whom I have been conversant preaching the kingdom of God, shall never see my face again. Paul here speaks it with assurance, that these Ephesians should see his face no more; and we cannot think that he who spoke so doubtfully of that which he was not sure of (not knowing the things that shall befall me there, v. 22) would speak this with so much confidence unless he had had a special warrant from the Spirit to say it. He would never have said thus solemnly, Now, behold, I know it, if he had not known it for certain. We ought often to think of it, that those who now are preaching to us the kingdom of God will shortly be removed and we shall see their faces no more. Yet a little while is their light with us; it concerns us therefore to improve it while we have it, that when we shall see their faces no more on earth, yet we may hope to look them in the face with comfort in the great day.

2. He appeals to them concerning the faithful discharge of his ministry among then (v. 26). (1) He challenges them to prove him unfaithful: I am pure from the blood of all men, the blood of souls. "You cannot say but I have given warning, and therefore no man's blood can be laid at my door." If a minister has approved himself faithful, he may have this rejoicing in himself, I am pure from the blood of all men. (2) He therefore leaves the blood of those that perish upon their own heads, because they had fair warning given them, but they would not take it. (3) He charges these ministers to look to it that they took care and pains, as he had done. I take you to record this day. As sometimes the heaven and earth are appealed to, so here this day shall be a witness, this parting day.

3. He proves his own fidelity with this (v. 27): For I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God. He had preached to them nothing but the counsel of God, and had not added any inventions of his own; "it was pure gospel, and nothing else." The gospel is the counsel of God. This counsel of God it is the business of ministers to declare as it is revealed, and not otherwise. He had preached to them the whole counsel of God. As he had preached to them the gospel pure, so he had preached it to them entire. He had not wilfully nor designedly avoided the declaring of any part of the counsel of God. He had not declined preaching upon the most difficult parts of the gospel, nor declined preaching upon the most plain and easy parts of it; he had not shunned preaching those doctrines which he knew would be provoking to the watchful enemies of Christianity, or displeasing to the careless professors of it. And thus it was that he kept himself pure from the blood of all men.

IV. He charges them as ministers to be diligent and faithful in their work.

1. He commits the care of the church at Ephesus to them, who, though doubtless they were so numerous that they could not all meet in one place, are yet called here one flock, because they not only agreed in one faith, but in many instances they kept up communion one with another. To these elders or presbyters the apostle here commits the government of this church, and tells them that not he, but the Holy Ghost, had made them overseers—bishops of the flock. "You that are presbyters are bishops of the Holy Ghost's making." Now that they begin to be fledged they must learn to fly themselves, and to act without him, for the Holy Ghost had made them overseers. The Holy Ghost in them qualified them for, and enriched them to, this great undertaking, the Holy Ghost fell upon them, ch. xix. 6. The Holy Ghost also directed those that called, and ordained, them to this work in answer to prayer.

2. He commanded them to mind the work to which they were called. Dignity calls for duty; if the Holy Ghost has made them overseers of the flock, they must be true to their trust. (1) They must take heed to themselves in the first place, must walk circumspectly. "You have many eyes upon you, some to take example by you, others to pick quarrels with you, and therefore you ought to take heed to yourselves." Those are not likely to be skilful or faithful keepers of the vineyards of others that do not keep their own. (2) "Take heed to the flock." Ministers must not only take heed to their own souls, but must have a constant regard to the souls of those who are under their charge. "Take heed to all the flock, that none of them wander from the fold or be seized by the beasts of prey; that none of them be missing." (3) They must feed the church of God, must lead the sheep of Christ into the green pastures, must lay meat before them, must feed them with wholesome doctrine, and must see that nothing is wanting that is necessary in order to their being nourished up to eternal life. There is need of pastors, not only to gather the church of God, but to feed it by building up those that are within. (4) They must watch (v. 31), as shepherds keep watch over their flocks by night; watch against everything that will be hurtful to the flock, and watch for everything that will be advantageous to it.

3. He gives them several good reasons why they should mind the business of their ministry.

(1) Let them consider the interest of their Master, and his concern for the flock, v. 28. It is the church which he has purchased with his own blood. "It is his own; you are but his servants to take care of it for him. Your carelessness and treachery are so much the worse if you neglect your work, for you wrong God. And, if it be the church of God, he expects you should show your love to him by feeding his sheep and lambs." He has purchased it. Therefore it ought to be dear to us, for it was dear to him, because it cost him dear, and we cannot better show it than by feeding his sheep and his lambs. This church of God is what he has purchased with his own blood. In consideration of this, therefore, feed the church of God, because it is purchased at so dear a rate. Did Christ lay down his life to purchase it, and shall his ministers be wanting in any care and pains to feed it?

(2) Let them consider the danger that the flock was in of being made a prey to its adversaries, v. 29, 30. "You are concerned to take heed both to yourselves and to it." Here are reasons for both. [1] Take heed to the flock, for wolves are abroad, that seek to devour (v. 29): I know this, that after my departure grievous wolves shall enter in among you. Some understand it of persecutors. They thought, because, while Paul was with them, the rage of the Jews was most against him, that, when he had gone out of the country, they would be quiet: "No," says he, "after my departure you will find the persecuting spirit still working." Ministers must take a more than ordinary care of the flock in times of persecution. It is rather to be understood of seducers and false teachers. Probably Paul has an eye to those of the circumcision, who preached up the ceremonial law; these he calls grievous wolves. While Paul was at Ephesus, they kept away, for they durst not face him; but, when he was gone, then they entered in among them. [2] Take heed to yourselves, for some shepherds will apostatise (v. 30): "Also of your ownselves, shall men arise speaking perverse things. They will pervert some sayings of the gospel to make them patronize their errors. But it is to draw away disciples after them, to make a party for themselves." Some read it, to draw away disciples after them—those that are already disciples of Christ draw them from him to follow them. But, though there were some such seducers in the church of Ephesus, yet it should seem by Paul's Epistle to that church that that church was not so much infested with false teachers as some other churches were; but its peace and purity were preserved by the blessing of God on the pains and vigilance of these presbyters.

(3) Let them consider the great pains that Paul had taken in planting this church (v. 31): "Remember that for the space of three years I ceased not to warn everyone night and day with tears." Paul, like a faithful watchman, had warned them, and by the warnings he gave men, he prevailed with them to embrace Christianity. He warned everyone; besides the public warnings he gave in his preaching, he applied himself to particular persons according as he saw their case called for it. He was constant in giving warning; he warned night and day; his time was filled up with his work. He was indefatigable in it; he ceased not to warn. He warned those that were righteous not to turn from their righteousness, as he had warned them when they were wicked to turn from their wickedness. He spoke to them about their souls with a great deal of affection and concern: he warned them with tears. As he had served the Lord, so he had served them, with many tears, v. 19. Thus free had he been of his pains; and why then should they be sparing of their pains in carrying it on?

V. He recommends them to divine direction and influence (v. 32): "And now, brethren, I commend you to God." Paul directs them to look up to God with an eye of faith, and beseeches God to look down on them with an eye of favour.

1. See here to whom he commends them. He commends them to God, begs of God to provide for them, and encourages them to cast all their care upon him: "Whatever you want, go to God. Let this be your comfort, that you have a God to go to, a God all sufficient." From whomsoever we are separated, still we have God nigh unto us. He commends them to the word of his grace, by which some understand Christ: he is the word (John i. 1). He is here called the word of God's grace, because from his fulness we receive grace for grace. Paul commends them not only to God and to his providence, but to Christ and his grace. It comes to much the same thing, if by the word of his grace we understand the gospel of Christ. "You will find much relief by acting faith on the providence of God, but much more by acting faith on the promises of the gospel." He commends them to the word of God's grace, not only as the foundation of their hope and the fountain of their joy, but as the rule of their walking: "I commend you to God, as your Master, and to the word of his grace. Observe the precepts of this word, and then live upon the promises of it."

2. See here what he commends them to the word of God's grace for. They had received the gospel of the grace of God, and were entrusted to preach it. Now he recommends them to that, for their edification: "It is able to build you up. Though you are already furnished with good gifts, there is that in it with which you need to be better acquainted and more affected." Ministers must aim at their own edification as well as at the edification of others. The most advanced Christians, while they are in this world, are capable of growing. For their glorification: It is able to give you an inheritance among all those who are sanctified. The word of God's grace gives it, not only as it gives the knowledge of it, but as it gives the promise of it, the promise of a God that cannot lie; and by the word, the Spirit of grace is given (ch. x. 44), to be the seal of the promise. Heaven is an inheritance which gives an indefeasible right to all the heirs. This inheritance is secured to all those, and those only, that are sanctified; for as those cannot be welcome guests to the holy God that are unsanctified, so really heaven would be no heaven to them; but to all that are sanctified, that are born again, it is as sure as almighty power and eternal truth can make it. We cannot expect to be among the glorified hereafter unless we be among the sanctified here.

VI. He recommends himself to them as an example of indifference to this world. He had recommended them to God for spiritual blessings, which are the best blessings; but what shall they do for food for their families. "As to these," Paul says, "do as I did."

1. He never aimed at worldly wealth (v. 33): "I have coveted no man's silver, or gold, or apparel." There were many in Ephesus who were rich, and made a very good appearance. Paul was not ambitious to live like them. We may take it in this sense: I never coveted to have so much silver and gold at command as I see others have. I neither condemn them nor envy them. I can live comfortably and usefully without living great. He knew how to want and how to be abased. He was not greedy to receive from them, silver, or gold, or apparel; so far from being always craving that he was not so much as coveting. "Whose kindness have I coveted, or asked? Or to whom have I been burdensome?"

2. He had worked for his living, and taken a great deal of pains to get bread (v. 34): "Yea, you yourselves know that these hands of mine have ministered to my necessities, and to those that were with me." Paul was sometimes reduced to necessities, and the want of the common supports of life. What an unthinking, unkind, and ungrateful world is this, that could let such a man as Paul be poor in it! He desired no more than to have his necessities supplied. When he was to earn his bread, he did it by a manual occupation. Paul had a head and a tongue that he might have got money by, but they were these hands, saith he, that ministered to my necessities. Paul puts these presbyters (and others in them) in mind of this, that they may not think it strange if they be thus neglected. The less encouragement they have from men, the more they shall have from God. He worked not only for himself, but for the support of those also that were with him. This was hard indeed. It had better become them to have worked for him. But so it is;

those that are willing to take the labouring oar will find those about them willing they should have it.

3. Even then, when he worked for the supply of his own necessities, yet he spared something out of what he got for the relief of others; for this he here obliges them to do (v. 35): "I have shown you all things, that so labouring you ought to support the weak." Understand it of their helping to support the sick, and the poor, and those that could not labour, because it agrees with Paul's exhortation (Eph. iv. 28): Let him labour, working with his hands, that he may have to give to him that needeth. We must labour in an honest employment, not only that we may be able to live, but that we may be able to give. This might seem a hard saying, and therefore Paul backs it with a saying of our Master's. An excellent saying it is, and has something of a paradox in it: It is more blessed to give than to receive. It is more blessed to give to others than to receive from others; not only more blessed to be rich, and so on the giving hand, than to be poor, and so on the receiving hand (everyone will own this); but more blessed to do good with what we have, be it much or little, than to increase it and make it more. The sentiment of the children of this world is contrary to this; they are afraid of giving. They are in hope of getting. Clear gain is with them the most blessed thing that can be; but Christ tells us, It is more blessed to give than to receive. It makes us more like to God, who gives to all, and receives from none; and to the Lord Jesus, who went about doing good. It is more blessed to give our pains than to receive pay for it. It is more pleasant to do good to the grateful, but it is more honourable to do good to the ungrateful, for then we have God to be our paymaster.

After the parting sermon that Paul preached to the elders of Ephesus we have here the parting prayer and tears.

I. They parted with prayer (v. 36): And, when he had thus spoken, he kneeled down, and prayed with them all. It was a joint prayer. He not only prayed for them, but prayed with them, prayed with them all. Public prayers are so far from being intended to supersede our own secret prayers, that they are designed to quicken and encourage them. It was a humble reverent prayer. This was expressed by the posture they used: He kneeled down, and prayed with them, which is significant both of adoration and of petition, especially petition for the forgiveness of sin. It was a prayer after sermon. He had committed the care of the church at Ephesus to those elders, and now he prays that God would enable them faithfully to discharge this great trust reposed in them. He prayed for the flock that the great Shepherd of the sheep would take care of them all, and keep them from being a prey to the grievous wolves. Thus he taught these ministers to pray for those they preached to. It was a parting prayer. It is good for friends, when they part, to part with prayer, that by praying together just at parting they may be enabled to pray the more feelingly one for another when they are separated. Paul here followed the example of Christ, who, when he took leave of his disciples, after he had preached to them, prayed with them all, John xvii. 1.

II. They parted with tears, and most affectionate embraces, v. 37, 38. They all wept sorely. He that was so often in tears while he was with them (v. 19, 31), no doubt shed many at parting. But the notice is taken of their tears: They all wept sorely; there was not a dry eye among them. These were tears of love and mutual endearment. They fell upon Paul's neck, and kissed him. Those that are most living are commonly best beloved. Paul, who was a most affectionate friend himself, had friends that were very affectionate to him. That which cut them to the heart thus was that word which Paul spoke, that he was certain they should see his face no more. When they are told that they shall see his face no more in this world, that it is a final farewell they are now giving and taking, this makes it a great mourning. When our friends are separated from us by death, this is the consideration with which we raise up our mourning, that we shall see their faces no more; but we complain not of this as those that have no hope. Though we shall see their faces no more in this world, we hope to see them again in a better world, and to be there together for ever and with the Lord.

III. They accompanied him unto the ship that they might have a little more of his company and conversation, and see the last of him. Loth to part bids oft farewell. But this was a comfort to both sides, that the presence of Christ both went with him and stayed with them.

CHAP. XXI

Now we are to attend him to Jerusalem, and there into lasting bonds. It is a thousand pities that such a workman should be laid aside; yet so it is, and we must not only acquiesce, but we must believe that Paul in the prison is as truly glorifying God as Paul in the pulpit was. I. A journal of Paul's voyage from Ephesus to Cæsarea, ver. 1–7. II. The struggles he had with his friends at Cæsarea, who mightily opposed his going up to Jerusalem, ver. 8–14. III. Paul's journey from Cæsarea to Jerusalem, ver 15–17. IV. His compliance with the persuasions of the brethren there to go and purify himself with an offering in the temple, that it might appear he was no such enemy to the Moasic rites and ceremonies as he was reported to be, ver 18–26. V. The turning of this very thing against him by the Jews, ver. 27–30. VI. The narrow escape he had of being pulled to pieces by the rabble, and the taking of him into custody by the chief captain, who permitted him to speak for himself to the people, ver. 31–40.

I. How much ado Paul had to get clear from Ephesus, intimated in the first words of the chapter, after we had gotten from them. Paul was loth to leave them, and they were loth to part with him, but so it must be.

II. What a prosperous voyage they had thence. They came with a straight course to Coos—the next day to Rhodes,—thence to Patara, a famous port, the metropolis of Lycia (v. 1); here they very happily found a ship sailing over into Phenicia, the very course they were steering, v. 2. Providence must be acknowledged when things happen thus opportunely. This ship that was bound for Phenicia (that is, Tyre) they took the convenience of, went on board, and set sail. In this voyage they discovered Cyprus, the island that Barnabas was of, and which he took care of, and therefore Paul did not visit it, but we left it on the left hand (v. 3), sailed upon the coast of Syria, and at length landed at Tyre, for there the ship was to unlade her burden.

III. The halt that Paul made at Tyre.

1. At Tyre he found disciples. Wherever Paul came, he enquired what disciples were there, and associated with them; for we know what is the usage with birds of a feather. When Christ was upon earth, though he went sometimes into the coast of Tyre, yet he never went thither to preach the gospel there. But, after the enlarging of the gospel commission, Christ was preached at Tyre, and had disciples there.

2. Paul, finding those disciples at Tyre, tarried there seven days. He stayed seven days at Troas (ch. xx. 6), and here so many days at Tyre, that he might be sure to spend one Lord's day with them.

3. The disciples at Tyre were endowed with such gifts that they could by the Spirit foretell the troubles Paul would meet with at Jerusalem; for the Holy Ghost witnessed it in every city, ch. xx. 23. God saw fit to have it much prophesied of before, that people's faith, instead of being offended, might be confirmed. Foreseeing his troubles, out of love to him, they begged of him that he would not go up to Jerusalem. Therefore they said to him, by the Spirit, that he should not go up. It was not at all their fault to think so, but it was their mistake, for his trial would be for the glory of God and the furtherance of the gospel, and he knew it.

4. The disciples of Tyre, though they were none of Paul's converts, yet showed a very great respect to Paul. Though they had had but seven days' acquaintance with him, they all came together, with their wives and children, solemnly to take leave of him. We should pay respect, not only to our own ministers, but we must, as there is occasion, testify our love and respect to all the faithful ministers of Christ. It is good to train up children in a respect to good people and good ministers. No doubt, gracious notice was taken of the children of the disciples at Tyre, that honoured an apostle, as Christ accepted the hosannas of the little children. We should be good husbands of our opportunities, and make the utmost we can of them for the good of our souls. They brought Paul on his way, that they might have so much the more of his company and his prayers.

5. They parted with prayer, as Paul and the Ephesian elders had done, ch. xx. 36. We kneeled down on the shore and prayed. As he was much in prayer so he was mighty in prayer. Those that are going to sea should commit themselves to God by prayer, and put themselves under his protection, as those that hope, even when they leave the terra firma, to find firm footing for their faith in the providence of God. They kneeled down on the shore, though we may suppose it either stony or dirty, and there prayed. Where he lifted up his prayer, he bowed his knees. Mr. George Herbert says, Kneeling never spoiled silk stockings.

6. They parted at last (v. 6): When we had taken our leave one of another, we took ship, and they returned home again. Paul left his blessing behind him with those that returned home, and those that stayed sent their prayers after those that went to sea.

IV. Their arrival at Ptolemais (v. 7): We came to Ptolemais. Paul begged leave to go ashore there, to salute the brethren. He would not pass by them without paying his respects to them, and he abode with them one day; better a short stay than no visit.

We have here Paul and his company arrived at length at Cæsarea, it being the place where the gospel was first preached to the Gentiles, and the Holy Ghost fell upon them, ch. x. 1, 44.

I. Who it was that entertained Paul and his company at Cæsarea. He seldom had occasion to go to a public house, but, wherever he came, some friend or other took him in, and bade him welcome. "We that were of Paul's company went where he went, and came to Cæsarea." Those that travel together through this world will separate at death, and then it will appear who are of Paul's company and who are not.

1. They were entertained by Philip the evangelist, whom we left at Cæsarea many years ago, after he had baptized the eunuch (ch. viii. 40), and there we now find him again. He was originally a deacon, (ch. vi. 5). He was now and had long been an evangelist. He had a house at Cæsarea and he bade him and them very welcome to it: We entered into the house of Philip the evangelist, and we abode with him.

2. This Philip had four maiden daughters, who did prophesy, v. 9. It intimates that they prophesied of Paul's troubles at Jerusalem, or perhaps they prophesied for his comfort and encouragement.

II. A plain and full prediction of the sufferings of Paul, by a noted prophet, v. 10, 11. 1. Paul and his company tarried many days at Cæsarea. What cause Paul saw to tarry so long there we cannot tell; but we are sure he did not stay either there or anywhere else to be idle. 2. Agabus the prophet came to Cæsarea from Judæa; this was he of whom we read before, who came from Jerusalem to Antioch, to foretell a general famine, ch. xi. 27, 28. See how God dispenseth his gifts variously. To Paul was given the word of wisdom and knowledge, by the Spirit, and the gifts of healing; Agabus, and to Philip's daughters, was given prophecy, by the same Spirit—the foretelling of things to come. So that that which was the most eminent gift of the Spirit under the Old Testament, the foretelling of things to come, was under the New Testament quite outshone by other gifts. It should seem as if Agabus came on purpose to Cæsarea, to meet Paul with this prophetic intelligence. 3. He foretold Paul's bonds at Jerusalem: By a sign, as the prophets of old did. Agabus took Paul's girdle, and with it bound first his own hands, and then his own feet. That which we see usually makes a greater impression upon us than that which we only hear of. By an explication of the sign: Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and, shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles. Paul had this express warning given him of his troubles, that he might prepare for them.

III. The great importunity which his friends used with him to dissuade him from going to Jerusalem, v. 12. "Not only those of that place, but we that were of Paul's company, besought him with tears that he would not go up to Jerusalem." Here appeared a commendable affection to Paul. Good men that are very active sometimes need to be dissuaded from overworking themselves, and good men that are very bold need to be dissuaded from exposing themselves too far. Yet there was a mixture of infirmity, especially in those of Paul's company, who knew he undertook this journey by divine direction. But we see in them the infirmity incident to us all; when we see trouble at a distance, we can make light of it; but when it comes near we begin to shrink, and draw back.

IV. The holy bravery with which Paul persisted in his resolution, v. 13.

1. He reproves them for dissuading him. Here is a quarrel of love on both sides. They love him dearly, and therefore oppose his resolution; he loves them dearly, and therefore chides them for opposing it: What mean you to weep and to break my heart? Their weeping about him broke his heart. It was a temptation to him, it began to weaken his resolution. "I know I am appointed to suffering, and you ought to encourage me. You, with your tears, break my heart, and discourage me. Has not our Master told us to take up our cross? And would you have me to avoid mine?" It was a trouble to him that they should so earnestly press him to that in which he could not gratify them without wronging his conscience. As he was much in tears himself, so he had a compassionate regard to the tears of his friends. But now it breaks his heart, when he is under a necessity of denying the request of his weeping friends. It was an unkind kindness thus to torment him with their dissuasions. When our friends are called out to sufferings, we shall show our love rather by comforting them than by sorrowing for them. But observe, These Christians at Cæsarea, if they could have foreseen the particulars of that event, would have been better reconciled to it for their own sakes; for, when Paul was made a prisoner at Jerusalem, he was presently sent to Cæsarea (ch. xxiii. 33), and there he continued at least two years (ch. xxiv. 27), and he was a prisoner at large, as appears (ch. xxiv. 23). The church at Cæsarea had much more of Paul's company and help when he was imprisoned than they could have had if he had been at liberty. That which we oppose, as thinking it to operate much against us, may be overruled by the providence of God to work for us.

2. He repeats his resolution to go forward, notwithstanding: "What mean you to weep thus? I am ready to suffer whatever is appointed for me. I am willing to suffer, and therefore why are you unwilling that I should suffer? For my part, I am ready." "I was told at first what great things I must suffer," ch. ix. 16. "I am prepared for it. I can bid it welcome. I can, through grace, not only bear it, but rejoice in it." (1) See how far his resolution extends: I tell you, I am ready not only to be bound, but to die at Jerusalem. It is our wisdom to think of the worst that may befall us, and to prepare accordingly. (2) See what it is that makes him willing to suffer and die: it is for the name of the Lord Jesus. All that a man has will he give for his life; but life itself will Paul give for the service and honour of the name of Christ.

V. The patient acquiescence of his friends in his resolution, v. 14. 1. They submitted to the wisdom of a good man. "When he would not be persuaded, we ceased our importunity. Paul knows best his own mind, and what he has to do, and it becomes us to leave it to himself. No doubt, Paul has a good reason for his resolution, and God has gracious ends to serve in confirming him in it." It is good manners not to over-press those in their own affairs that will not be persuaded. 2. They submitted to the will of a good God: We ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done. They did not resolve his resolution into his stubbornness, but into his willingness to suffer, and God's will that he should. This may refer, (1) To Paul's present firmness; he is inflexible, and in this they see the will of the Lord done. (2) To his approaching sufferings: "If there be no remedy the will of the Lord Jesus be done. We leave it to God, we leave it to Christ, and therefore we do, not as we will, but as he will." God is wise, and knows how to make all work for good, and therefore "welcome his holy will." Not only, "The will of the Lord must be done, and there is no remedy"; but, "Let the will of the Lord be done, for his will is his wisdom." When a trouble is come, this must allay our griefs, that the will of the Lord is done; when we see it coming, this must silence our fears, that the will of the Lord shall be done.

I. Paul's journey to Jerusalem from Cæsarea, and the company that went along with him. They took up their carriages, their bag and baggage, like travellers or soldiers, and were their own porters. If they could have persuaded Paul to go some other way, they would gladly have gone along with him; but if he will go to Jerusalem, they do not say, "Let him go by himself then"; but, "Let us go and die with him." Thus Paul's boldness emboldened them. Certain of the disciples of Cæsarea went along with them. The less while that Paul is likely to enjoy his liberty the more industrious they are to improve every opportunity of conversation with him. They brought with them an honest old gentleman that had a house of his own at Jerusalem, in which he would gladly entertain Paul and his company, one Mnason of Cyprus (v. 16), with whom we should lodge. Such a great concourse of people there was to the feast that it was a hard matter to get lodgings; the public houses would be taken up by those of the better sort, and it was looked upon as a scandalous thing for those that had private houses to let their rooms out at those times. Every one then would choose his friends to be his guests, and Mnason took Paul and his company to be his lodgers. He shall be welcome to him, whatever comes of it. This Mnason is called an old disciple—a disciple from the beginning. He had been long a Christian, and was now in years. It is an honourable thing to be an old disciple of Jesus Christ, to have been enabled by the grace of God to continue long in a course of duty, steadfast in the faith. And with these old disciples one would choose to lodge; for the multitude of their years will teach wisdom.

II. Paul's welcome at Jerusalem. 1. Many of the brethren there received him gladly, v. 17. The word here used concerning the welcome they gave to the apostles is used concerning the welcome of the apostles' doctrine, ch. ii. 41. They gladly received his word. We think if we had Paul among us we should gladly receive him; but it is a question whether we should or no if, having his doctrine, we do not gladly receive that. 2. They paid a visit to James and the elders of the church (v. 18): "The day following, Paul went in unto James, and took us with him." It should seem that James was now the only apostle that was resident at Jerusalem. They forecasted to have an apostle at Jerusalem because there was a great resort thither from all parts. James was now upon the spot, and all the elders were present. He saluted them. The proper signification of salutation is, wishing salvation to you. And such mutual salutations very well become Christians, in token of their love to each other and joint regard to God.

III. The account they had from him of his ministry among the Gentiles, and their satisfaction in it. He gave them a narrative of the success of the gospel in those countries where he had been employed: He declared particularly what things God had wrought among the Gentiles by his ministry, v. 19. Not what things he had wrought, but what God had wrought by his ministry. It was not I, but the grace of God which was with me. He declared it particularly, that the grace of God might appear the more illustrious in the circumstances of his success. Hence they took occasion to give praise to God (v. 20): When they heard it, they glorified the Lord. Paul ascribed it all to God, and to God they gave the praise of it. They gave glory to the grace of God, which was extended to the Gentiles. They did not envy him, nor were they jealous of his growing reputation, but, on the contrary, glorified the Lord. If God be praised, Paul is pleased.

IV. The request of James and the elders to Paul, or their advice rather, that he would gratify the believing Jews by showing some compliance with the ceremonial law, and appearing publicly in the temple to offer sacrifice. The ceremonial law, though it was by no means to be imposed upon the Gentile converts, yet it was not become unlawful as yet to those that had been bred up in the observance of it. It was dead, but not buried; dead, but not yet deadly.

1. They desired him to take notice of the great numbers there were of the Jewish converts: Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of the Jews there are who believe. They called him brother. Though they were conformists and he a nonconformist, yet they were brethren, and owned the relation. The number of the names at first was but one hundred and twenty, yet now many thousands. Let none therefore despise the day of small things; for, though the beginning be small, God can make the latter end greatly to increase. And this account of the success of the gospel among the Jews was, no doubt, as grateful to Paul as the account which he gave them of the conversion of the Gentiles was to them; for his heart's desire and prayer to God for the Jews was that they might be saved.

2. They informed him of a prevailing infirmity these believing Jews laboured under: They are all zealous of the law. They believe in Christ as the true Messiah, but they know the law of Moses was of God, they have found spiritual benefit in the institutions of it, and therefore they can by no means think of parting with it. This was a great weakness to be so fond of the shadows when the substance was come. But see, The power of education and long usage, and especially of a ceremonial law. The charitable allowance that must be made in consideration of these. Their being zealous of the law was capable of a good construction, which charity would put upon it; and it was capable of a good excuse.

3. They gave him to understand that these Jews were ill-affected to him, v. 21. Paul himself could not get the good word of all that belonged to Christ's family: "They are informed of thee that thou not only dost not teach the Gentiles to observe the law, but dost teach all the Jews who are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, not to circumcise their children nor to walk after the customs of our nation." It was true that Paul preached the abrogation of the law of Moses, taught them that it was impossible to be justified by it. But it was false that he taught them to forsake Moses; for the religion he preached tended not to destroy the law, but to fulfil it. But even the believing Jews, having got this notion of Paul, that he was an enemy to Moses, were much exasperated against him. The elders here present, loved and honoured him, and called him brother, but the people could hardly be induced to entertain a favourable thought of him; for it is certain the least judicious are the most censorious, the weak-headed are the hot-headed.

4. They therefore desired Paul that he would by some public act make it to appear that the charge against him was false, and that he did not teach people to break the customs of the Jewish church, for he himself retained the use of them.

(1) They conclude that something of this kind must be done: "What is it therefore? What must be done? The multitude will hear that thou art come to town. When they hear thou art come, they must needs come together, expecting to hear thee." Now something must be done to satisfy them that Paul does not teach the people to forsake Moses, and they think it necessary, For Paul's sake, that his reputation should be cleared. For the people's sake, that they may not continue prejudiced against so good a man. For their own sake, that since they knew it was their duty to own Paul their doing it might not be turned to their reproach.

(2) They produce a fair opportunity which Paul might take to clear himself: "Do this that we say unto thee. We have four men, Jews who believe, and they have a vow on them, a vow of Nazariteship for a certain time; their time has now expired (v. 23), and they are to offer their offerings according to the law, when they shave the head of their separation, a he-lamb for a burnt-offering, a ewe-lamb for a sin-offering, and a ram for a peace-offering. Now Paul having so far of late complied with the law as to take upon him the vow of a Nazarite, and to signify the expiration of it by shaving his head at Cenchrea (ch. xviii. 18), they desire him but to go a little further, and to join with these four in offering the sacrifices of a Nazarite: "Purify thyself with them according to the law; and be at charges with them, in buying sacrifices for this solemn occasion, and to join with them in the sacrifice." This, they think, will effectually stop the mouth of calumny, and everyone will be convinced that Paul did not teach the Jews to forsake Moses, but that he himself kept the law.

5. They enter a protestation that this shall be no infringement at all of the decree lately made in favour of the Gentile converts (v. 25): "As touching the Gentiles who believe, we have written and concluded that they observe no such things; but only that they keep themselves from things offered to idols, and from blood, and from things strangled, and from fornication." They knew how jealous Paul was for the preservation of the liberty of the converted Gentiles, and therefore expressly covenant to abide by that. Thus far is their proposal.

V. Here is Paul's compliance with it. Though he would not be persuaded not to go to Jerusalem, yet, when he was there, he was presuaded to do as they there did, v. 26. Then Paul took the men, and the very next day, purifying himself with them, and not with multitude nor tumult, as he himself pleads (ch. xxiv. 18), he entered into the temple, to signify the accomplishment of the days of purification to the priests. Now it has been questioned whether James and the elders did well to give Paul this advice, and whether he did well to take it. Some have blamed this occasional conformity of Paul's, as indulging the Jews too much in their adherence to the ceremonial law, and a discouragement of those who stood fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free. Had it not been better to take pains with their people to convince them of their error, and to show them that they were made free from the law? To urge him to encourage them in it by his example seems to have more in it of fleshly wisdom than of the grace of God. Others think the advice was prudent and good. It was Paul's avowed principle, To the Jews became I as a Jew, that I might gain the Jews, 1 Cor. ix. 20. He had circumcised Timothy to please the Jews. Those that are weak in the faith are to be borne with, when those that undermine the faith must be opposed. It is true, this compliance of Paul's sped ill to him, yet this is not a sufficient ground to go upon in condemning it: Paul might do well, and yet suffer for it. Integrity and uprightness will be more likely to preserve us than sneaking compliances. And when we consider what a great trouble it must needs be to James and the presbyters, that they had by their advice brought Paul into trouble, it should be a warning to us not to press men to oblige us by doing anything contrary to their own mind.

We have here Paul brought into a captivity which we are not likely to see the end of. When we see the beginning of a trouble, we know not either how long it will last or how it will issue.

I. We have here Paul seized.

1. He was seized in the temple, when he was there attending the days of his purifying, and the solemn services of those days, v. 27. It was not till the seven days were almost ended that he was taken notice of. In the temple, where he should have been protected, as in a sanctuary, he was most violently set upon by those who did what they could to have his blood mingled with his sacrifices. The temple did they themselves thus profane.

2. The informers against him were the Jews of Asia, not those of Jerusalem—the Jews of the dispersion, who were most exasperated against him. Those who seldom came up to worship at the temple in Jerusalem themselves, yet appeared most zealous for the temple, as if thereby they would atone for their habitual neglect of it.

3. The method they took was to raise the mob. They stirred up all the people. Those are fittest to be employed against Christ and Christianity that are governed least by reason and most by passion.

4. The arguments wherewith they exasperated the people against him were popular, but very false and unjust. They cried out, "Men of Israel, help." The enemies of Christianity, since they could never prove it to be an ill thing, have been always very industrious to put it into an ill name, and so run it down by outrage and outcry. What is wanting in right is made up in noise.

5. They charge upon him both bad doctrine and bad practice.

(1) They charge upon him bad doctrine. Though not here at Jerusalem, yet in other places, nay in all places, he teaches all men, everywhere; as if, because he was an itinerant, he was a ubiquitary: "He spread to the utmost of his power certain damnable and heretical positions." [1] Against the people of the Jews. He had taught that Jews and Gentiles stand on the same level before God, and neither circumcision avails anything nor uncircumcision; nay, he had taught against the unbelieving Jews that they were rejected (and therefore had separated from them and their synagogues). Those commonly seem most jealous for the church's name that belong to it in name only. [2] Against the law. His teaching men to believe the gospel as the end of the law, and the perfection of it, was interpreted as preaching against the law. [3] Against this place, the temple. Because he taught men to pray everywhere, he was reproached as an enemy to the temple. Paul had himself been active in persecuting Stephen, and putting him to death for words spoken against this holy place, and now the same thing is laid to his charge. He that was then made use of as the tool is now set up as the butt of Jewish rage and malice.

(2) They charge upon him bad practices. They charge it upon him that he had himself polluted it. He has brought Gentiles also into the temple, into the inner court of the temple, which none that were uncircumcised were admitted to come into. Paul was himself a Jew, and had right to enter into the court of the Jews. And they, seeing some with him there that joined with him in his devotions, concluded that Trophimus an Ephesian, who was a Gentile, was one of them. Did they see him there? Truly no. They had seen him with him in the city, and therefore they supposed that Paul had brought him with him into the temple, which was utterly false. Innocency is no fence against calumny and false accusation. Evil men dig up mischief, and go far to seek proofs of their false accusations, as they did here. By such unjust and groundless suggestions have wicked men thought to justify themselves in the most barbarous outrages. Paul thought to recommend himself to their good opinion by going into the temple, and thence they take an occasion to accuse him. If he had kept further off them, he had not been so maligned by them.

II. We have Paul in danger of being pulled in pieces by the rabble. The execution shall be of a piece with the prosecution, all unjust and irregular. Therefore, as those who neither feared God nor regarded man, they resolved to knock him on the head immediately.

1. All the city was in an uproar, v. 30. The people heard a hue-and-cry from the temple, and were up in arms. All the city was moved, when they were called to from the temple, Men of Israel, help. Just such a zeal the Jews here show for God's temple as the Ephesians did for Diana's temple, when Paul was informed against as an enemy to that (ch. xix. 29): The whole city was full of confusion.

2. They drew Paul out of the temple, and shut the doors. In dragging him furiously out of the temple they showed a real detestation of him as one not fit to be looked upon as a member of the Jewish nation. They pretended a veneration for the temple. They condemned Paul for drawing people from the temple, and yet, when he himself was very devoutly worshipping in the temple, they drew him out of it. The officers of the temple shut the doors. Lest the crowd should by the running in of more to them be thrust back into the temple, and some outrage should be committed, to the profanation of that holy place.

3. They went about to kill him (v. 31), for they fell a beating him (v. 32), resolving to beat him to death. Now was Paul, like a lamb, thrown into a den of lions. No doubt, he was still of the same mind as when he said, I am ready not only to be bound, but to die at Jerusalem.

III. We have here Paul rescued out of the hands of his Jewish enemies by a Roman enemy. Tidings were brought of the tumult to the chief captain of the band. Somebody that was concerned not for Paul, but for the public peace and safety, gave this information to the colonel, who had always a jealous and watchful eye upon these tumultuous Jews, and he is the man that must be instrumental to save Paul's life, when never a friend he had was capable of doing him any service. The tribune, or chief captain, got his forces together with all possible expedition, and went to suppress the mob: He took soldiers and centurions, and ran down to them. He had them near at hand, and he ran down unto the multitude; for at such times delays are dangerous. The very sight of the Roman general frightened them from beating Paul. They were deterred from that by the the power of the Romans from which they ought to have been restrained by the justice of God. God often makes those to be a protection to his people who yet have no affection for his people. The shepherd makes use even of his dogs for the defence of his sheep. The governor takes him into custody. He rescued him, not out of a concern for him, but out of a concern for justice, because he ought not to be put to death without trial. He therefore takes Paul out of the hands of the mob into the hands of the law (v. 33): He took him, and commanded him to be bound with two chains, for he demanded who he was, and what he had done. This violent taking of him out of the hands of the multitude, they laid to the charge of the chief captain as his crime (ch. xxiv. 7): The chief captain Lysias came with great violence, and took him out of our hands.

IV. The provision which the chief captain made to bring Paul to speak for himself. One had almost as good enter into a struggle with the winds and the waves, as with such a mob; and yet Paul made a shift to get liberty of speech among them.

1. There was no knowing the sense of the people; for when the chief captain enquired concerning Paul some cried one thing, and some another, so that it was impossible for the chief captain to know their mind, when really they knew not either one another's mind or their own. Those that will hearken to the clamours of the multitude will know nothing for a certainty.

2. There was no quelling the rage and fury of the people; for when the chief captain commanded that Paul should be carried into the castle, the tower of Antonia, where the Roman soldiers kept garrison, near the temple, the soldiers themselves had much ado to get him safely thither, the people were so violent (v. 35): When he came upon the stairs, leading up to the castle, the soldiers were forced to take him up in their arms, and carry him, to keep him from the people, who would have pulled him limb from limb if they could. When they could not reach him with their cruel hands, They followed, crying, Away with him, v. 36. Take him out of the land of the living (so the ancients expound it), chase him out of the world.

3. Paul at length begged leave of the chief captain to speak to him (v. 37): As he was to be led into the castle, he said unto the chief captain, "May I speak unto thee?" What a humble modest question was this! Paul knew how to speak to the greatest of men, yet he humbly begs leave to speak to this commander.

4. The chief captain tells him what notion he had of him: Canst thou speak Greek? Art not thou that Egyptian who made an uproar? It seems, there had lately been an insurrection somewhere in that country, headed by an Egyptian. The captain here says that he led out into the wilderness four thousand men that were murderers. It happened in the thirteenth year of Claudius, about three years ago. The ringleader of this rebellion had made his escape, and the chief captain concluded that Paul could not be a criminal of less figure than this Egyptian. See how good men are exposed to ill will by mistake.

5. Paul rectifies his mistake concerning him, by informing him particularly what he was. I am a man who is a Jew; I am of Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city. Whether he means Tarsus or Rome is not certain; they were neither of them mean cities, and he was a freeman of both. Though the chief captain had put him under such an invidious suspicion, he did not render railing for railing, but mildly denied the charge, and owned what he was.

6. He humbly desired a permission to speak to the people. He sues for it as a favour, which he will be thankful for: I beseech thee, suffer me to speak to the people. The chief captain rescued him with no other design than to give him a fair hearing. He desires he may have leave immediately to defend himself; for it needed no more than to be set in a true light.

7. He obtained leave to plead his own cause, for he needed not to have counsel assigned him, when the Spirit of the Father was ready to dictate to him, Matt. x. 20. The chief captain gave him license (v. 40). He had that justice done him by the chief captain which he could not obtain from his countrymen the Jews. This licence being obtained the people were attentive to hear: Paul stood on the stairs. A sorry pulpit it was, and yet better than none. There he beckoned with the hand unto the people, made signs to them to be quiet, and so far he gained his point that there was made a profound silence. When the cause of Christ and his gospel is to be pleaded, there ought to be a great silence, that we may give the more earnest heed, and all little enough. Paul addressed himself to speak: he spoke unto them in the Hebrew tongue, that is, in their own vulgar tongue, to which he hereby owned not only an abiding relation, but an abiding respect.

CHAP. XXII

In the close of the foregoing chapter we had Paul bound, yet he had his tongue set at liberty; and so intent he is upon using that liberty of speech to the honour of Christ, that he forgets the bonds he is in, but speaks of the great things Christ had done for him with as much ease as if nothing had been done to ruffle him. I. His address to the people, and their attention to it, ver. 1, 2. II. The account he gives of himself. 1. What a bigoted Jew he had been, ver. 3–5. 2. How he was miraculously converted, ver. 6–11. 3. How he was confirmed and baptized by the ministry of Ananias, ver. 12–16. 4. How he was afterwards called to be the apostle of the Gentiles, ver. 17–21. III. The interruption given him upon this by the rabble, and the violent passion they flew into upon it, ver. 22, 23. IV. Paul's second rescue out of the hands of the rabble, and the further course which the chief captain took to find out the true reason of this mighty clamour against Paul, ver. 24, 25. V. Paul's pleading his privilege as a Roman citizen, ver. 26–29. VI. The chief captain's removing the cause into the high priest's court, ver. 30.

I. With what an admirable composure he addresses himself to speak. There appears no fright, but his mind is sedate and composed. There appears no passion. He breaks out into no angry expressions.

II. What respectful titles he gives even to those who thus abused him: "Men, brethren, and fathers (v. 1). To you, O men, I call; men, that should hear reason, and be ruled by it; men, from whom one may expect humanity. You, brethren of the common people; you, fathers of the priests." Thus he lets them know that he was one of them. Though we must not give flattering titles to any, yet we ought to give titles of due respect to all; and those we would do good to we should endeavour not to provoke. Though he was rescued out of their hands, and was taken under the protection of the chief captain, yet he does not fall foul upon them. Hear you my defence; a just and reasonable request, for every man that is accused has a right to answer for himself.

III. The language he spoke in, which recommended what he said to the auditory: He spoke in the Hebrew tongue, that is, the vulgar language of the Jews, which, at this time, was not the pure Old Testament Hebrew, but the Syriac, a dialect of the Hebrew. It showed his continued respect to his countrymen, the Jews. By this it appears he is a Jew. What he said was the more generally understood. To speak in that language was indeed to appeal to the people. When they heard that he spoke in the Hebrew tongue, they kept the more silence. The chief captain was surprised to hear him speak Greek (ch. xxi. 37), the Jews were surprised to hear him speak Hebrew, and both therefore think the better of him. Many wise and good men are therefore slighted only because they are not known.

Paul here gives an account of himself not only to satisfy the chief captain that he was not that Egyptian he took him to be, but the Jews also that he was not that enemy to their law and temple they took him to be.

I. What his extraction and education were. 1. He was one of their own nation. "I am verily a man who is a Jew. I am a sincere friend to your nation, for I am one of it." 2. He was born in a creditable reputable place, in Tarsus, a city of Cilicia, and was by his birth a freeman of that city. This was, indeed, but a small matter to make any boast of, and yet it was needful to be mentioned at this time to those who insolently trampled upon him. 3. He had a learned and liberal education. He was brought up in Jerusalem, the principal seat of the Jewish learning, and at the feet of Gamaliel, and therefore he could not be ignorant of their law, nor be thought to slight it because he did not know it. 4. He was in his early days a very forward and eminent professor of the Jews' religion. (1) He was an intelligent professor of their religion. He minded his business at Gamaliel's feet, and was there taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers. What departures he had made from the law were not owing to any confused or mistaken notions of it, for he understood it to a nicety. Paul had as great a value for antiquity, and tradition, as any of them had; and there was never a Jew of them all that understood his religion better than Paul did, or could better give an account of it. (2) He was an active professor of their religion: I was zealous towards God, as you all are this day. Many that are very well skilled in the theory of religion are willing to leave the practice of it to others, but Paul was as much a zealot as a rabbi. Here he compliments his hearers that they all were this day zealous towards God; he bears them record (Rom. x. 2) that they have a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge. Though this did by no means justify their rage, yet it enabled those that prayed, Father, forgive them, to plead, as Christ did, For they know not what they do.

II. What a fiery furious persecutor he had been in the beginning of his time, v. 4, 5. He mentions this to make it the more plainly to appear that the change which was wrought upon him, when he was converted to the Christian faith, was purely the effect of a divine power. Immediately before that sudden change was wrought in him he had the utmost antipathy imaginable to Christianity. He may have a further view in it to invite and encourage those people to repent, for he himself had been a blasphemer, and a persecutor, and yet obtained mercy. Let us view Paul's picture of himself when he was a persecutor. 1. He hated Christianity with a mortal enmity: I persecuted this way unto the death. He breathed out slaughter against them, ch. ix. 1. When they were put to death, he gave his voice against them, ch. xxvi. 10. He persecuted it to the death, that is, he could have been willing himself to die in his opposition to Christianity, so some understand it. He would contentedly have lost his life in defence of the laws and traditions of the fathers. 2. He did all he could to frighten people from this way, and out of it, by binding and delivering into prison both men and women. Now that he himself was bound, he lays a particular stress upon this part of his charge against himself, that he had bound the Christians, and carried them to prison; he likewise reflects with a special regret that he had imprisoned not only the men, but the women. 3. He was employed by the great sanhedrim, the high priest, and all the estate of the elders, in suppressing this new sect, v. 5. When they heard that many of the Jews at Damascus had embraced the Christian faith, they resolved to proceed against them, and could not think of a fitter person to be employed in that business than Paul. They therefore sent him, and letters by him, to the Jews at Damascus, here called the brethren, ordering them to be assisting to Paul in seizing those among them that had turned Christians, and bringing them up prisoners to Jerusalem, to be punished, and that they might either be compelled to retract, or be put to death for a terror to others. "Such a son," says Paul, "I was at first, just such as you now are. I know the heart of a persecutor, and therefore pity you, and pray that you may know the heart of a convert, as God soon made me to do."

III. In what manner he was converted. It was not from any natural or external causes. It was the Lord's doing, and the circumstances of the doing of it were enough to justify him in the change; and none can condemn him for it, without reflecting upon that divine energy. He relates the story of his conversion here very particularly, as we had it before (ch. ix), aiming to show that it was purely the act of God. 1. He was as fully bent upon persecuting the Christians just before Christ arrested him as ever. He made his journey, and was come nigh to Damascus (v. 6), and had no other thought than to execute the cruel design he was sent upon. 2. It was a light from heaven that first startled him, a great light, which shone suddenly round about him, and the Jews knew that God is light, and that such a light as this shining at noon, must be from God. It shone upon him in the open road, at high noon, and so strongly that it struck him to the ground (v. 7), and all that were with him, ch. xxvi. 14. 3. It was a voice from heaven that first begat in him awful thoughts of Jesus Christ. The voice called to him by name, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? And when he asked, Who art thou, Lord? it was answered, I am Jesus of Nazareth, whom thou persecutest, v. 8. 4. Lest it should be objected, "How came this light and voice to work such a change upon him, and not upon those that journeyed with him?" he observes that his fellow travellers saw indeed the light, and were afraid; but, though the light made them afraid, they heard not the voice of him that spoke to Paul. Now faith comes by hearing, and therefore that change was wrought upon him that heard the words, and heard them directed to himself, which was not wrought upon those who only saw the light. 5. He assures them that when he was thus startled he referred himself entirely to a divine guidance: "What shall I do, Lord? Let the same voice from heaven that has stopped me in the wrong way guide me into the right way," v. 10. And immediately he had directions to go to Damascus, and there it shall be told thee all things which are appointed for thee to do. The extraordinary ways of divine revelation, by visions, and voices, and the appearance of angels, were designed only to introduce and establish the ordinary method by the scriptures and a standing ministry. The voice here tells not Paul what he shall do, but bids him go to Damascus, and there it shall be told him. 6. As a demonstration of the greatness of that light which fastened upon him, he tells them of the immediate effect it had upon his eyesight (v. 11): I could not see for the glory of that light. It struck him blind for the present. Condemned sinners are struck blind by the power of darkness, and it is a lasting blindness, but convinced sinners are struck blind, as Paul here was, not by darkness, but by light: but it is in order to their being enlightened. Those that were with Paul were not blinded, as he was. They, having their sight, led Paul by the hand into the city. Paul, being a Pharisee, was proud of his spiritual eyesight. The Pharisees said, Are we blind also? John ix. 40. Paul was thus struck with bodily blindness to make him sensible of his spiritual blindness.

IV. How he was confirmed in the change he had made, and further directed what he should do, by Ananias.

1. The character here given of Ananias. He was not a man that was any way prejudiced against the Jewish nation or religion, but was himself a devout man according to the law; and thence advanced further to the faith of Christ. He had a good report of all the Jews that dwelt at Damascus. This was the first Christian that Paul had any friendly communication with.

2. The cure immediately wrought by him upon Paul's eyes. He came to him (v. 13); and, to assure him that he came to him from Christ, he stood by him, and said, Brother Saul, receive thy sight. Power went along with this word, and the same hour he recovered his sight, and looked up upon him, ready to receive from him the instructions sent by him.

3. The declaration which Ananias makes to him of the favour which the Lord Jesus designed him above any other.

(1) In the present manifestation of himself to him (v. 14): The God of our fathers has chosen thee. This powerful call is the result of a particular choice; his calling God the God of our fathers intimates that Ananias was himself a Jew by birth. This God of our fathers has chosen thee that thou shouldst know his will. Those whom God hath chosen he hath chosen to know his will, and to do it. That thou shouldst see that Just One, and shouldst hear the voice of his mouth, and so shouldst know his will immediately from himself. It was a distinguishing favour, that he should see Christ here upon earth after his ascension into heaven. Stephen saw him standing at the right hand of God, but Paul saw him standing at his right hand. Stephen saw him, but we do not find that he heard the voice of his mouth, as Paul did. Christ is here called that Just One; for he is Jesus Christ the righteous, and suffered wrongfully. Those whom God has chosen to know his will must have an eye to Christ, and must see him, and hear the voice of his mouth.

(2) In the after-manifestation of himself by him to others (v. 15): "Thou shalt be his witness unto all men, Gentiles as well as Jews, of that thou hast seen and heard." Paul so particularly relating the manner of his conversion here and ch. xxvi, we think that he frequently related the same narrative in his preaching for the conversion of others; he told them what God had done for his soul, to encourage them to hope that he would do something for their souls.

4. The counsel he gave him to join himself to the Lord Jesus by baptism (v. 16): Arise, and be baptized. He had in his circumcision been given up to God, but he must now by baptism be given up to God in Christ. (1) The great gospel privilege which by baptism we have sealed to us is the remission of sins: Be baptized and wash away thy sins; that is, "Receive the comfort of the pardon of thy sins in and through Jesus Christ, and receive power against sin," for our being washed includes our being both justified and sanctified. (2) The great gospel duty which by our baptism we are bound to is to call on the name of the Lord, the Lord Jesus; to acknowledge him to be our Lord and our God, and to apply to him accordingly. We must wash away our sins, calling on the name of the Lord; that is, we must seek for the pardon of our sins in Christ's name. (3) We must do this quickly. Why tarriest thou? Our covenanting with God in Christ is needful work, that must not be deferred. Why should not that be done at the present time that must be done some time, or we are undone?

V. How he was commissioned to go and preach the gospel to the Gentiles. This was the great thing for which they were so angry at him, and therefore it was requisite he should for this produce a divine warrant. This commission he did not receive presently upon his conversion, for this was at Jerusalem. 1. He received his orders to do it when he was at prayer, begging of God to appoint him his work and to show him the course he should steer. He was at prayer in the temple, which was to be called a house of prayer for all people; not only in which all people should pray, but in which all people should be prayed for. Paul's praying in the temple was an evidence that he had a veneration for the temple. It would be a great satisfaction to Paul afterwards, in the execution of this commission, to reflect upon it that he received it when he was at prayer. 2. He received it in a vision. He fell into a trance (v. 17). In this trance he saw Jesus Christ (v. 18): I saw him saying unto me. 3. Before Christ gave him a commission to go to the Gentiles, he told him it was to no purpose for him to think of doing any good at Jerusalem; so that they must not blame him, but themselves, if he be sent to the Gentiles. "Make haste," says he, "and get thee quickly out of Jerusalem"; thou wilt find they will not receive thy testimony concerning me. As God knows before who will receive the gospel, so he knows who will reject it. 4. Paul renewed his petition because they knew what he had been before his conversion, and therefore must ascribe so great a change in him to the power of almighty grace. Thus he reasoned, both with himself and with the Lord, and thought he reasoned justly (v. 19, 20): "Lord," says he, "they know that I was as bitter an enemy as any of them to such as believed on thee, that I imprisoned them and beat them in every synagogue. Particularly in Stephen's case; they know that when he was stoned I was standing by, consenting to his death, and kept the clothes of those that stoned him. If I appear among them, preaching the doctrine that Stephen preached and suffered for, they will no doubt receive my testimony." "No," says Christ to him, "they will not; but will be more exasperated against thee as a deserter." 5. Paul's petition for a warrant to preach the gospel at Jerusalem is overruled (v. 21): Depart, for I will send thee far hence, unto the Gentiles. God often gives gracious answers to the prayers of his people, not in the thing itself that they pray for but, in something better. It is God that appoints his labourers both their day and their place, and it is fit they should acquiesce in his appointment, though it may cross their own inclinations. Paul hankers after Jerusalem: to be a preacher there was the summit of his ambition; but Christ designs him greater preferment. So often does Providence contrive better for us than we for ourselves. Paul shall not go to preach among the Gentiles without a commission: I will send thee. And, if Christ send him, his Spirit will go along with him, and give him to see the fruit of his labours. He was sent to places at a distance. Surely they would see that they had no reason to be angry with Paul for preaching among the Gentiles, for he was compelled to it, by an overruling command from heaven.

Paul was going on with his account of himself. But, whatever he designs to say, they resolve he shall say no more to them: They gave him audience to this word. Hitherto they had heard him with patience and some attention. But when he speaks of being sent to the Gentiles they cannot bear it. Upon the mention of this, they have no manner of patience, but forget all rules of decency and equity.

Now here we are told how furious the people were against Paul, for mentioning the Gentiles as taken into the cognizance of divine grace.

I. They interrupted him that nobody might hear a word he said. Galled consciences kick at the least touch; and those who are resolved not to be ruled by reason commonly resolve not to hear it if they can help it.

II. They clamoured against him as one that was unworthy of life. They cried out with a confused noise, "Away with such a fellow as this from the earth, it is not fit that he should live." Thus the men that have been the greatest blessings of their age have been represented not only as the burdens of the earth, but the plague of their generation. The ungodly Jews here say of Paul that it was not fit he should live; and therefore he must be removed, that the world may be eased of the burden of him.

III. They went stark mad against Paul, and against the chief captain (v. 23); as men whose reason was quite lost in passion, they cried out and howled; they cast off their clothes. They thus showed how ready they were to stone him; those that stoned Stephen threw off their clothes, v. 20. Or, they rent their clothes, as if he had spoken blasphemy; and threw dust into the air, in detestation of it. All they intended was to make the chief captain sensible how much they were enraged and exasperated at Paul.

IV. The chief captain took care for his safety, by ordering him to be brought into the castle, v. 24. A prison sometimes has been a protection to good men from popular rage. Paul's hour was not yet come, and therefore God raised up one that took care of him.

V. He ordered him the torture. He ordered that he should be examined by scourging, that he might know wherefore they cried so against him. Herein he did not proceed fairly; he should have singled out some of the complainants, and should have examined them, what they had to lay to the charge of a man that could give so good an account of himself. It was proper to ask them, but not at all proper to ask Paul, wherefore they cried so against him. No man is bound to accuse himself, though he be guilty, much less ought he to be compelled to accuse himself when he is innocent. Is this a fair or just occasion to scourge Paul, that a rude tumultuous mob cry out against him, but cannot tell why or wherefore?

VI. Paul pleaded his privilege as a Roman citizen, by which he was exempted from all trials and punishments of this nature (v. 25): As they bound him with thongs he made no outcry against the injustice of their proceedings against an innocent man, but let them understand the illegality of their proceedings against him as a citizen of Rome. He said to the centurion that stood by, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man that is a Roman, and uncondemned?" The manner of his speaking plainly intimates what a holy security and serenity of mind this good man enjoyed, not disturbed either with anger or fear in the midst of all those indignities that were done him, and the danger he was in.

VII. The chief captain was surprised at this, and put into a fright. He had taken Paul to be a vagabond Egyptian. How many men of great worth and merit are despised because they are not known! The chief captain had centurions, under-officers, attending him, ch. xxi. 32. One of these reports this matter to the chief captain (v. 26): Take heed what thou doest, for this man is a Roman. They all knew what a value was put upon this privilege of the Roman citizens. The chief captain would be satisfied of the truth of this from his own mouth (v. 27): "Tell me, art thou a Roman? Art thou entitled to the privileges of a Roman citizen?" "Yes," says Paul, "I am." The chief captain compares notes with him upon this matter, and it appears that the privilege Paul had as a Roman citizen was more honourable than the colonel's; for the colonel owns that his was purchased: "I am a freeman of Rome; but with a great sum obtained I this freedom." Says Paul, "I was free-born." He pleads it for his own preservation, for which end not only we may but we ought to use all lawful means. This put an immediate stop to Paul's trouble. Those that were appointed to examine him by scourging departed from him (v. 29). The colonel himself was afraid when he heard he was a Roman, because he had bound him in order to his being beaten. Thus many are restrained from evil practices by the fear of man who would not be restrained from them by the fear of God. See here the benefit of human laws and magistracy, and what reason we have to be thankful to God for them. By the general support of equity and fair dealing between man and man, they have served to check the rage of wicked men. Therefore this service we owe to all in authority, to pray for them, because this benefit we have reason to expect from them. The governor, the next day, brought Paul before the sanhedrim, v. 30. He first loosed him from his bands, and then summoned the chief priests and all their council to come together to take cognizance of Paul's case, for he found it to be a matter of religion. This Roman, who was a military man, kept Paul in custody, and appealed from the rabble to the general assembly. We may hope that hereby he intended Paul's safety, as thinking the chief priests and elders would do him justice, and clear him; for their court governed by rules of equity. That which he is here said to aim at is the gratifying of his own curiosity: He would have known the certainty wherefore he was accused of the Jews.

CHAP. XXIII

The close of the foregoing chapter left Paul in the high priest's court, and, if his enemies act there against him with less noise, yet it is with more subtlety. I. Paul's protestation of his own integrity, and of a civil respect to the high priest, however, he had upon a sudden spoken warmly to him, and justly, ver. 1–5. II. Paul's prudent contrivance to get himself clear of them, by setting the Pharisees and Sadducees at variance one with another, ver. 6–9. III. The governor's seasonable interposal, ver. 10. IV. Christ's more comfortable appearing to him, ver. 11. V. A bloody conspiracy of some desperate Jews to kill Paul, ver. 12–15. VI. The discovery of this conspiracy to Paul, and by him to the chief captain, ver. 16–22. VII. The chief captain's care of Paul's safety; he sent him away from Jerusalem to Cæsarea, and there he safely arrived, ver. 23–35.

Verses 1–5

Perhaps he thought if he were brought before the sanhedrim at Jerusalem he should be able to deal with them to some good purpose, and yet we do not find that he works at all upon them.

I. Paul's protestation of his own integrity. Paul appeared here,

1. With a good courage. He was not at all put out of countenance upon his being brought before such an august assembly, but he earnestly beheld the council. When Stephen was brought before them, they thought to have faced him down, but could not, such was his holy confidence. Now that Paul was brought before them he thought to have faced them down, but could not, such was their wicked impudence.

2. With a good conscience. He said, "Men and brethren, I have lived in all good conscience before God unto this day." He had always been a man inclined to religion; always put a difference between moral good and evil. He was no designing man, who cared not what he did, so he could but compass his own ends. Even when he persecuted the church of God, he thought he ought to do it. Though his conscience was misinformed, yet he acted according to the dictates of it. He seems rather to speak of the time since his conversion, since he fell under their displeasure. "Even to this day, I have lived in all good conscience before God." He had aimed at nothing but to please God and do his duty. See here the character of an honest man. He sets God before him, and lives as in his sight. He makes conscience of what he says and does, though he may be under some mistakes. He is universally conscientious; and those that are not so are not at all truly conscientious. He continues so, and perseveres in it: "I have lived so until this day." Whatever changes pass over him, he is still the same, strictly conscientious.

II. The outrage of which Ananias the high priest was guilty: he commanded those that stood by to smite him on the mouth (v. 2). The high priest was highly offended at Paul. His protestation of his integrity was provocation enough to one who was resolved to run him down. When he could charge him with no crime, he thought it was crime enough that he asserted his own innocency. In his rage he ordered him to be smitten, and to be smitten, on the mouth as having offended with his lips, and in token of his enjoining him silence. If therefore we see such indignities done to good men, nay, if they be done to us for well doing and well saying, we must not think it strange: Christ will give those the kisses of his mouth (Song. i, 2) who for his sake receive blows on the mouth.

III. The denunciation of the wrath of God against the high priest; God shall smite thee, thou whited wall, v. 3. Paul did not speak this in any sinful heat or passion, but in a holy zeal against the high priest's abuse of his power, not at all with a spirit of revenge. He gives him his due character: Thou whited wall; that is, thou hypocrite—a mud-wall, trash and dirt and rubbish underneath, but plastered over, or whitewashed. Those that daubed with untempered mortar failed not to daub themselves over with something that made them look not only clean, but gay. He reads him his just doom: "God shall smite thee, shall bring upon thee his sore judgments, especially spiritual judgments." He assigns a good reason for that doom: "For sittest thou pretending to judge me after the law, and yet commandest me to be smitten before any crime is proved upon me, which is contrary to the law?" It is against all law, human and divine, natural and positive, to hinder a man from making his defence, and to condemn him unheard. It is inexcusable in a high priest that is appointed to judge according to the law.

IV. The offence which was taken at this bold word of Paul's (v. 4): Those that stood by said, Revilest thou God's high priest? See here then, What a hard game Paul had to play, when his enemies were abusive to him, and his friends were ready to find fault with his management. These were disgusted at Paul for giving him his due.

V. The excuse that Paul made for what he had said, because he found it was a stumbling-block. Though he had taken the liberty to tell the high priest his fault, yet, when he found it gave offence, he cried, I have done wrong. He wished he had not done it. He excuses it with this, that he did not consider when he said it to whom he spoke (v. 5): I wist not, brethren, that he was the high priest. "I did not just then think of the dignity of his place, or else I would have spoken more respectfully to him." But, says he, I did not consider it. But the Jews acknowledged that prophets might use a liberty in speaking of rulers which others might not. He takes care that what he had said should not be drawn into a precedent, to the weakening of the obligation of that law in the least: For it is written, Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people. It is for the public good that the honour of magistracy should be supported, and not suffer for the miscarriages of those who are entrusted with it. Not as if great men may not hear of their faults, and public grievances be complained of by proper persons, but there must be a particular tenderness for the honour of those in authority because the law of God requires a particular reverence to be paid to them, as God's vicegerents.

And now he finds that he who has delivered does and will deliver. He that delivered him from the tumult of the people here delivers him from that of the elders.

1. His own prudence and ingenuity contribute much to his escape. Paul's greatest honour, and that upon which he most valued himself, was that he was a Christian, and an apostle of Christ; and yet he had sometimes occasion to make use of his other honours. His being a citizen of Rome saved him from his being scourged by the chief captain, and here his being a Pharisee saved him from being condemned by the sanhedrim. It will consist very well with our willingness to suffer for Christ to use all lawful methods, both to prevent suffering and to extricate ourselves out of it. The honest policy Paul used here for his own preservation was to divide his judges, and, by incensing one part of them more against him, to engage the contrary part for him.

1. The great council was made up of Sadducees and Pharisees, and Paul perceived it (v. 6): One part were Sadducees and the other Pharisees. Now these differed very much from one another, and yet they ordinarily agreed well enough to do the business of the council together. The Pharisees were bigots, zealous for the ceremonies, but at the same time they were very orthodox in the faith of the Jewish church concerning the world of spirits, the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come. The Sadducees were deists—no friends to the scripture, or divine revelation. The books of Moses they admitted as containing a good history and a good law, but had little regard to the other books of the Old Testament. They deny the resurrection; not only the return of the body to life, but a future state of rewards and punishments. They denied the existence of angels and spirits, and allowed of no being but matter. They thought that God himself was corporeal. When they read of angels in the Old Testament, they supposed that they were impressions on the fancies of those they were sent to, and no real existences—that they were this, or that, or anything rather than what they were. And, as for the souls of men, they denied their existence in a state of separation from the body, and any difference between the soul of a man and of a beast. These, no doubt, pretended to be free-thinkers, but really thought as meanly as possible. It is strange how men of such wicked principles could have a place in the great sanhedrim; but many of them were of quality and estate, and they complied with the public establishment, and so got in and kept in. But how degenerate was the character of the Jewish church, when such profane men as these were among their rulers!

2. In this matter of difference between the Pharisees and Sadducees Paul openly declared himself to be on the Pharisees' side against the Sadducees (v. 6): He cried out, "I am a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee. I hope for the resurrection of the dead, and this is it for which I am now called in question." Paul owns himself a Pharisee, so far as the Pharisees were in the right. Though as Pharisaism was opposed to Christianity he set himself against it, yet, as it was opposed to Sadducism, he adhered to it. We must never think the worse of any truth of God, for its being held by men otherwise corrupt. He might truly say that being persecuted, as a Christian, this was the thing he was called in question for. He might truly say he was called in question for the hope of the resurrection of the dead, as he afterwards pleaded, ch. xxiv. 15, and ch. xxvi. 6, 7.

3. This occasioned a division in the council. There arose a dissension between the Pharisees and the Sadducees (v. 7), for this word of Paul's made the Sadducees more warm and the Pharisees more cool in the prosecution of him; so that the multitude was divided. All the cry had been against Paul, but now there arose a great cry against one another, v. 9. Everything was done with clamour and noise; and in such a tumultuous manner were the great principles of their religion stickled for. Gainsayers may be convinced by fair reasoning, but never by a great cry.

4. The Pharisees hereupon (would one think it?) took Paul's part (v. 9): They strove, saying, We find no evil in this man. He had given a good account of himself, and had now declared himself orthodox in the great principles of religion, and therefore they cannot see that he has done anything worthy of death or of bonds. Nay, they go further, "If a spirit or an angel hath spoken to him we ought not to oppose him, lest we be found fighting against God"; as Gamaliel, who was himself a Pharisee, had argued, ch. v. 39. We may observe, to the honour of the gospel, that it was witnessed to even by its adversaries, and confessions, not only of its innocency, but of its excellency, were extorted sometimes by the power of truth even from those that persecuted it. Pilate found no fault in Christ though he put him to death; and the Pharisees here supposed it possible that Paul might have a commission sent him from heaven by an angel to do what he did; and yet it should seem, they after this joined with the high priest in prosecuting him, ch. xxiv. 1. They sinned against the knowledge which they not only had, but sometimes owned. We will hope that some of them at least did henceforward conceive a better opinion of Paul than they had had, and were favourable to him. And then it must be observed to their honour that their zeal for the traditions of the elders was so far swallowed up in a zeal for the fundamental doctrines of religion, that if he will heartily join with them against the Sadducees, and adhere to the hope of the resurrection of the dead, they will charitably hope that he walks according to the light God has given him, and are so far from persecuting him that they are ready to patronize and protect him.

II. The chief captain's care and conduct stand him in more stead; for when he has thrown this bone of contention between the Pharisees and Sadducees he is never the nearer, but is in danger of being pulled in pieces by them. The chief captain is forced to come with his soldiers and rescue him, as he had done, ch. xxi. 32, and ch. xxii. 24. Paul's danger. Between his friends and his enemies he had like to have been pulled to pieces, the one hugging him to death, the other crushing him to death. His deliverance: The chief captain ordered his soldiers to go down and to take him by force from among them, and to bring him into the castle.

III. Divine consolations stood him in most stead of all. The chief captain had rescued him out of the hands of cruel men, but still he had him in custody. The castle was indeed a protection to him, but withal it was a confinement; and, as it was now his preservation from so great a death, it might be his reservation for a greater. Perhaps, in the night following, Paul was full of thoughts and cares what should become of him, and how his present troubles might be turned to answer some good purpose. Then did the Lord Jesus make him a kind visit (v. 11): The Lord stood by him, came to his bedside. Whoever is against us, we need not fear if the Lord stand by us. Christ bids him have a good heart upon it: "Be of good cheer, Paul; be not discouraged." It is the will of Christ that his servants who are faithful should be always cheerful. Christ, by his word, satisfies him that God approved of his conduct. It is a strange argument which he makes use of to encourage him: As thou hast testified of me in Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome. One would think this was but cold comfort, and yet this was designed to encourage him. He had been serving Christ as a witness for him in what he had hitherto endured. He was still going on with his work. He had not yet finished his testimony, but was only reserved for further service. Nothing disheartened Paul so much as the thought of being taken off from doing service to Christ and good to souls: Fear not, says Christ, I have not done with thee. Paul seems to have had a particular fancy to go to Rome, to preach the gospel there. Being a citizen of Rome, he longed for a journey thither, and had designed it (ch. xix. 21): After I have been at Jerusalem, I must also see Rome. Now he was ready to conclude that this had broken his measures, and he should never see Rome; but even in that Christ tells him he should be gratified.

Verses 12–35

We have here the story of a plot against the life of Paul.

I. How this plot was laid. They found they could gain nothing by popular tumult, or legal process, and therefore have recourse to the barbarous method of assassination.

1. Who they were that formed this conspiracy. They were certain Jews, v. 12. And they were more than forty that were in the design, v. 13.

2. When the conspiracy was formed: When it was day. In the night Christ appeared to Paul to protect him, and, when it was day, here were forty men appearing against him to destroy him; they were not up so soon but Christ was up before them.

3. What the conspiracy was. These men banded together; they engaged to stand by one another, and everyone, to his power, to be aiding and assisting to murder Paul. What a monstrous idea must these men have formed of Paul, before they could be capable of forming such a monstrous design against him! What laws of truth and justice so sacred, so strong, which malice and bigotry will not break through!

4. How firm they made it: They bound themselves under an anathema, imprecating the heaviest curses upon themselves if they did not kill Paul, and so quickly that they would not eat nor drink till they had done it. What a complication of wickedness is here! To design to kill an innocent man that had done them no harm, was going in the way of Cain; yet, as if this had been a small matter, they bound themselves to it. To incline to do evil, and intend to do it, is bad; but to engage to do it is much worse. This is entering into covenant with the devil; it is leaving no room for repentance. They bound one another to it, and did all they could, not only to secure the damnation of their own souls, but of theirs whom they drew into the association. They showed a great contempt of the providence of God to do such a thing within so short a time. When we say, Tomorrow we will do this or that, we must add, If the Lord will. But with what face could they insert a proviso for the permission of God's providence when what they were about was directly against the prohibitions of God's word? What a woeful dilemma did they throw themselves upon! God certainly meets them with his curse if they do go on in it, and they desire he would if they do not! Such language of hell those speak that wish God to damn them, and the devil to take them, if they do not do so and so. They showed a most eager desire to compass this matter.

5. What method they took to bring it about. There is no getting near Paul in the castle. Therefore the chief priests and elders must desire the governor of the castle to let Paul come to them, to be further examined, and then, in his passage from the castle to the council, they would put an end to all disputes about Paul by killing him, v. 14, 15. They come to the principal members of the great sanhedrim. They are so confident of their approbation of this villainy, that they are not ashamed to own to them that they have bound themselves under a great curse, that they will eat nothing till they have killed Paul. They design to breakfast the next morning upon his blood. They doubt not but the chief priests will lend them a helping hand, and be their tools, pretending to the chief captain that they would enquire something more perfectly concerning him. What an ill opinion had they of their priests, when they could apply to them on such an errand as this! The priests and elders consented to it without boggling at it in the least. Instead of reproving them, they bolstered them up in it, because it was against Paul whom they hated.

II. How the plot was discovered. Providence so ordered it that it was brought to light, and brought to nought.

1. How it was discovered to Paul, v. 16. There was a youth that was related to Paul, his sister's son; and somehow or other he heard of their lying in wait, and he went into the castle, and he told Paul what he heard. God has many ways of bringing to light the hidden works of darkness.

2. How it was discovered to the chief captain. Paul had got a good interest in the officers that attended, by his peaceable deportment. He could call one of the centurions to him and he was ready to come at his call (v. 17); and he desired that he would introduce this young man to the chief captain, to give in an information. The centurion very readily gratified him, v. 18. He went himself to recommend his errand to the chief captain: "Paul the prisoner (this was his title now) called me to him, and prayed me to bring this young man to thee; he has something to say to thee." It is true charity to poor prisoners to act for them as well as to give to them. "I was sick and in prison, and you went on an errand for me," will pass as well in the account as, "I was sick and in prison, and you came unto me." Those that have acquaintance and interest should be ready to use them for the assistance of those that are in distress. This centurion helped to save Paul's life by this piece of civility. Those that cannot give a good gift to God's prisoners may yet speak a good word for them. The chief captain received the information with a great deal of tenderness, v. 19. He took the young man by the hand to encourage him, that he might not be put out of countenance, but might be assured of a favourable audience. The notice that is taken of this circumstance should encourage great men to make themselves easy of access. This familiarity to which this Roman tribune admitted Paul's nephew is here upon record to his honour. Let no man think he disparages himself by his humility or charity. He went with him aside privately and asked him, "What is it that thou hast to tell me?" The young man delivered his errand to the chief captain very readily (v. 20, 21): "The Jews have agreed to desire thee that thou wouldst bring down Paul tomorrow into the council; but do not thou yield unto them, for there lie in wait for him of them more than forty men, who have sworn to be the death of him, and now are they ready looking for a promise from thee." The captain dismissed the young man with a charge of secrecy: See that thou tell no man that thou hast shown these things unto me, v. 22. Those that cannot keep counsel are not fit to be employed in business.

III. How the plot was defeated: The chief captain, finding how restless they were in their designs to do him a mischief, and how near he was to become himself accessory to it, resolved to send him away with all speed out of their reach. He seemed afraid lest, if he should detain Paul in his castle here, they would find some way or other to compass their end. Whatever came of it, he would protect Paul, because he did not deserve such treatment. What a melancholy observation is it, that the Jewish chief priests, when they knew of this assassination-plot, should countenance it, while a Roman chief captain, purely from a natural sense of justice and humanity, sets himself to baffle it.

1. He orders a considerable detachment of the Roman forces under his command to go to Cæsarea with all expedition, and to bring Paul thither to Felix the governor. I see not but the chief captain might have set Paul at liberty, and given him leave to shift for his own safety. He himself owns that nothing was laid to his charge worthy of bonds (v. 29), and he ought to have had the same tenderness for his liberty that he had for his life; but he feared that this would have incensed the Jews too much against him. Two centurions are employed in this business, v. 23, 24. They must get ready two hundred soldiers to go to Cæsarea; and with these seventy horse, and two hundred spearmen besides. (1) The chief captain designed hereby to expose the Jews, as a headstrong tumultuous people, that needed to be awed by such a train as this. He thought less would not serve to defeat their attempt. (2) God designed hereby to encourage Paul. Yet Paul did not desire such a guard because he trusted in God's all-sufficiency; it was owing, however, to the governor's own care. But he was also made considerable; thus his bonds in Christ were made manifest all the country over (Phil. i. 13); and so great a preacher made so great a prisoner. When his enemies hate him, and I doubt his friends neglect him, then does a Roman tribune carefully provide, [1] For his ease: Let them provide beasts, that they set Paul on. Had his Jewish persecutors ordered his removal to Cæsarea, they would have made him run on foot, or dragged him thither in a cart. But the chief captain treats him like a gentleman, and orders him a good horse to ride upon. [2] For his security. They have a strict charge given them to bring him safely to Felix the governor, who was supreme in all civil affairs among the Jews, as this chief captain was in military affairs. The Roman historians speak much of this Felix, as a man of mean extraction, but that raised himself by his shifts to be governor of Judæa. To the judgment of such a man as this is poor Paul turned over; and yet better so than in the hands of Ananias the high priest!

2. The chief captain orders that he be taken away at the third hour of the night, three hours after sunset, that they might have the cool of the night to march in.

3. He writes a letter to Felix the governor of this province, by which he leaves the whole matter with Felix. This letter is here inserted verbatim, v. 25.

(1) The compliments he passes upon the governor, v. 26. He is the most excellent governor Felix, this title being given him of course. He sends him greeting.

(2) The just and fair account which he gives him of Paul's case: [1] He was one that the Jews had a pique against: They had taken him, and would have killed him; and perhaps Felix did not think much the worse of him for that, v. 27. [2] He had protected him because he was a Roman: "When they were about to kill him, I came with an army and rescued him"; which action for a citizen of Rome would recommend him to the Roman governor. [3] He could not understand the merits of his cause. He took the proper method to know: he brought him forth into their council (v. 28), to be examined there, but he found that he was accused of questions of their law (v. 29), about the hope of the resurrection of the dead, v. 6. The Romans allowed the nations they conquered the exercise of their own religion, and never offered to impose theirs upon them; yet, as conservators of the public peace, they would not suffer them, under colour of their religion, to abuse their neighbours. [4] Thus far he understood, that there was nothing laid to his charge worthy of death or of bonds.

(3) His referring Paul's case to Felix (v. 30): "When it was told me that the Jews laid wait for the man, to kill him, I sent straightway to thee, and let his accusers go after him, and say before thee what they have against him, for, being bred a soldier, I will never pretend to be a judge, and so farewell."

4. Paul was accordingly conducted to Cæsarea; the soldiers got him safely out of Jerusalem by night, and left the conspirators to consider whether they should eat and drink or no. If they would not repent of the wickedness of their oath they were now at leisure to repent to the rashness of it. If any of them did starve themselves to death, they fell unpitied. Paul was conducted to Antipatris, which was about the midway to Cæsarea, v. 31. Thence the two hundred foot-soldiers, and the two hundred spearmen returned to their quarters in the castle. There needed not so strong a guard, but the horsemen might serve to bring him to Cæsarea, and would do it with more expedition.

5. He was delivered into the hands of Felix, v. 33. The officers presented the letter, and Paul with it, to Felix. Paul had never affected acquaintance or society with great men, yet Providence overrules his sufferings so as by them to give him an opportunity of witnessing to Christ before great men. The governor enquired of what province the prisoner originally was, and was told that he was a native of Cilicia, v. 34. He promises him a speedy trial (v. 35): "I will hear thee when thine accusers have come." He ordered him into custody, that he should be kept a prisoner in Herod's judgment-hall.

CHAP. XXIV

We left Paul a prisoner at Cæsarea. His arraignment and trial before Felix the governor. I. The appearing of the prosecutors against him, ver. 1, 2. II. The opening of the indictment against him by Tertullus, ver. 2–8. III. The corroborating of the charge by the testimony of the witnesses, ver. 9. IV. The prisoner's defence, in which, with all due deference to the governor (ver. 10), he denies the charge (ver. 11–13), owns the truth, and makes an unexceptionable profession of his faith (ver. 14–16), and gives a more particular account of what had passed from their first seizing him, ver. 17–21. V. The adjourning of the cause, ver. 22, 23. VI. The private conversation that was between the prisoner and the judge, ver. 24–26. VII. The lengthening out of Paul's imprisonment for two years, till another governor came (ver. 27).

We must suppose that Lysias, the chief captain, gave notice to the chief priests that they must follow him to Cæsarea, and there they would find a judge ready to hear them.

I. We have here the cause followed against Paul. Here is no time lost, for they are ready for a hearing after five days. He says here (v. 11) that it was but twelve days since he came up to Jerusalem, and he had spent seven in his purifying in the temple. Those who had been his judges do themselves appear here as his prosecutors. Ananias himself the high priest, now stands to inform against him. One would wonder, That he should thus disparage himself, and forget the dignity of his place. That he should thus discover himself and his enmity against Paul! Ananias is not ashamed to own himself a sworn enemy to Paul. The elders attended him, to signify their concurrence with him. The pains that evil men take in an evil matter, and their unwearied industry, should shame us out of our coldness, and our indifference in that which is good.

II. We have here the cause pleaded against Paul. The prosecutors brought with them a certain orator named Tertullus, a Roman, and therefore fittest to be employed in a cause before the Roman governor, and most likely to gain favour. The high priest, and elders, though they had their own hearts spiteful enough, did not think their own tongues sharp enough. Paul is set to the bar before Felix the governor: He was called forth, v. 2. Tertullus's business is, on the behalf of the prosecutors, to open the information against him. His speech is made up of flattery and falsehood; it calls evil good, and good evil.

1. One of the worst of men is here applauded as one of the best of benefactors, only because he was the judge. Felix is represented by the historians of his own nation, as well as by Josephus the Jew, as a very bad man, who allowed himself in all manner of wickedness, was a great oppressor, very cruel, and very covetous. And yet Tertullus here, in the name of the high priest and elders, compliments him, and extols him to the sky, as if he were so good a magistrate as never was the like. To engage him to gratify their malice against Paul they magnify him as the greatest blessing to their church and nation that ever came among them.

(1) They are very ready to own it (v. 2): "By thee we enjoy great quietness and very worthy deeds are done to the whole nation of the Jews, by thy providence." To give him his due, he had been instrumental to suppress the insurrection of that Egyptian of whom the chief captain spoke (ch. xxi. 38). The unhappiness of great men is to have their services magnified beyond measure, and never to be faithfully told of their faults. Hereby they are hardened and encouraged in evil. The policy of bad men, by flattering princes in what they do amiss is to draw them in to do worse.

(2) They promise to retain a grateful sense of it (v. 3): "We accept it always, and in all places, most noble Felix, with all thankfulness." And, if it had been true that he was such a governor, it had been just that they should thus accept his good offices with all thankfulness. The benefits which we enjoy by government, especially by the administration of wise and good governors, are what we ought to be thankful for both to God and man.

(3) They therefore expect his favour in this cause, v. 4. They pretend a great care not to intrench upon his time: We will not be further tedious to thee; I pray thee that thou wouldest hear us of thy clemency a few words. They were so conscious to themselves that it would soon appear to have more malice than matter in it that they found it necessary thus to insinuate themselves into his favour. Everybody knew that the high priest and the elders hated Felix; and yet, to gain their ends against Paul, they show him all this respect. Princes cannot always judge of the affections of their people by their applauses; flattery is one thing, and true loyalty is another.

2. One of the best of men is here accused as one of the worst of malefactors. After a flourish of flattery he comes to his business. This part of his discourse is as nauseous for its raillery as the former part is for its flattery. As I cannot but be sorry that a man of wit and sense should have such a saleable tongue (as one calls it), so I cannot but be angry at those dignified men that put such words into his mouth. Two things Tertullus here complains of to Felix.

(1) The peace of the nation was disturbed by Paul. They could not have baited Christ's disciples if they had not first dressed them up in the skins of wild beasts. Innocence, nay excellence and usefulness, are no fence against calumny, no, nor against the impressions of calumny upon the minds both of magistrates and multitudes. Be the representation ever so unjust, when it is enforced, as here it was, with gravity, with assurance, something will stick. They do not say, "We suspect him to be a dangerous man," but, as if the thing were past dispute, "We have found him to be so", as if he were a traitor and rebel already convicted. Paul was a useful man, and a great blessing to his country, and yet he is here called a pestilent fellow (v. 5): "We have found him the plague of the nation, a walking pestilence." They would have it thought that he had done more mischief in his time than a plague could do,—that the mischief he did was spreading and infectious,—that it was of as fatal consequence as the plague is,—that it was as much to be dreaded and guarded against as a plague is. Paul was a peace-maker; he lived peaceably and quietly himself, and taught others to do so too, and yet is here represented as a mover of sedition among all the Jews throughout all the world. The Jews were disaffected to the Roman government. This Felix knew. Now they would fain make him believe that this Paul was the man that made them so. They moved sedition in all places where he came, and then cast the blame unjustly upon him. Paul was a man of catholic charity, who made himself the servant of all for their good; and yet he is here charged as being a ringleader of the sect of the Nazarenes. Now it was true that Paul was an active leading man in propagating Christianity. But, First, It was utterly false that this was a sect. True Christianity establishes that which is of common concern to all mankind, publishes goodwill to men, and therefore cannot be thought to take its rise from such narrow opinions as sects owe their origin to. True Christianity has a direct tendency to the uniting of the children of men, and, as far as it obtains its just influence upon the minds of men, will make them peaceable and loving, and therefore is far from being a sect. True Christianity aims at no worldly benefit or advantage, and therefore must by no means be called a sect. Those that espouse a sect aim at wealth and honour; but the professors of Christianity expose themselves thereby to the loss of all that is dear to them in this world. Secondly, It is invidiously called the sect of the Nazarenes, by which Christ was represented as of Nazareth, whence no good thing was expected to arise; whereas he was of Bethlehem, where the Messiah was to be born. Thirdly, It was false that Paul was the author or standard-bearer of this sect; for he did not draw people to himself, but to Christ. Paul had a veneration for the temple, and had lately himself with reverence attended the temple-service; and yet it is here charged upon him that he went about to profane the temple, v. 6.

(2) The course of justice against Paul was obstructed by the chief captain. They pleaded that they took him, and would have judged him according to their law. This was false; they did not go about to judge him according to their law, but went about to beat him to death or to pull him to pieces, to throw him into the hands of ruffians that lay in wait to destroy him. It is easy for men, when they know what they should have done, to say, this they would have done, when they meant something else. They reflected upon the chief captain. The chief captain Lysias came upon us and with great violence took him out of our hands, v. 7. See how persecutors are enraged at their disappointments, which they ought to be thankful for. These cruel men justify themselves, and reckon him their enemy who kept them from shedding blood with their own hands. They referred the matter to Felix and his judgment, the chief captain having obliged them to it (v. 8): "He commanded his accusers to come to thee, that thou mightest hear the charge. He has left it to thee to examine him, and try what thou canst get out of him."

III. The assent of the Jews to this charge (v. 9): They confirmed it, saying that those things were so. Some think this expresses the proof of their charge by witnesses upon oath. It rather seems to intimate the approbation which the high priest and the elders gave to what Tertullus said. Those that have not the wit and parts to do mischief with that some others have, yet make themselves guilty of the mischiefs others do, by assenting to that which others do. Many that have not learning enough to plead for Baal yet have wickedness enough to vote for Baal.

We have here Paul's defence of himself, and there appears in it an accomplishment of Christ's promise to his followers that when they were before governors and kings, for his sake, it should be given them in that same hour what they should speak. Though Tertullus had said a great many provoking things, yet Paul did not interrupt him, but let him go on to the end of his speech. And when he had done he waited for a permission from the judge to speak in his turn, and had it. The governor beckoned to him to speak, v. 10. He made no reflections at all upon Tertullus, and levelled his defence against those that employed him.

I. He addressed himself very respectfully to the governor. Here are no such flattering compliments as Tertullus soothed him up with, but a profession that he answered for himself cheerfully before him, looking upon him as one that would be fair and impartial. It was likewise the language of one that was conscious to himself of his own integrity. He did not stand trembling at the bar; he was very cheerful when he had one to be his judge that was not a party, but an indifferent person. Nay, when he considers who his judge is, I the more cheerfully answer for myself, because I know thou hast been many years a judge to this nation; and this was very true. He could say of his own knowledge that there had not formerly been any complaints against Paul. He never had Paul brought before him till now; and therefore he was not so dangerous a criminal as he was represented to be. He was well acquainted with the Jewish nation. He knew what furious zealots they were against all that did not comply with them, and therefore would make allowances for that. Though he did not know him, he knew his prosecutors, and by this might guess what manner of man he was.

II. He denies the facts that he was charged with, upon which their character of him was grounded. Moving sedition, and profaning the temple, were the crimes for which he stood indicted, crimes which they knew the Roman governors were not accustomed to enquire into. But Paul desires that though he would not enquire into the crimes he would protect one that was unjustly charged with them. Now he would have him to understand.

1. That he came up to Jerusalem on purpose to worship God in peace and holiness. He came to keep up his communion with the Jews, not to put any affront upon them.

2. That it was but twelve days since he came up to Jerusalem, and he had been six days a prisoner; and it could not be supposed that in so short a time he could do the mischief they charged upon him.

3. That he had demeaned himself at Jerusalem very quietly and peaceably. If it had been true that he was a mover of sedition among all the Jews, surely he would have been industrious to make a party at Jerusalem: but he did not do so. He was in the temple, attending the public service there. He was in the synagogues where the law was read and opened. He went about in the city among his relations and friends. They could not charge him with offering anything either against the faith or against the peace of the Jewish church. (1) He had nothing in him of a contradicting spirit, as the movers of sedition have. They never found him disputing with any man. He was ready, if asked, to give a reason of his own hope, and to give instruction to others; but he never picked a quarrel with any man about his religion. (2) He had nothing in him of a turbulent spirit: "They never found me raising up the people." He behaved as became a Christian with love and quietness, and due subjection to lawful authority. Nor did he ever mention or think of such a thing as taking up arms for the propagating of the gospel.

4. That as to what they had charged him with, of moving sedition in other countries, he was wholly innocent, and they could not make good the charge (v. 13): Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me. He maintains his own innocency. He was no enemy to the public peace. He bemoans his own calamity, that he was accused of those things which could not be proved against him. And it has often been the lot of very worthy good men to be thus injured, to have things laid to their charge which they abhor the thought of. He shows the iniquity of his prosecutors, who said that which they knew they could not prove, and thereby did him wrong, and did the judge wrong too, in imposing upon him. He appeals to the equity of his judge. The judge must give sentence according to that which is not only alleged but proved.

III. He gives a fair and just account of himself, which does intimate what was the true reason of their prosecuting him.

1. He acknowledged himself to be one whom they looked upon as a heretic. The chief captain had observed, and the governor now cannot but observe, an uncommon violence and fury in his prosecutors. Guessing at the crime by the cry, he must needs have been a very bad man. Now Paul here unriddles the matter: In the way which they call heresy—or a sect, so worship I the God of my fathers. It is no new thing for the right way of worshipping God to be called heresy. Let us therefore never be driven off from any good way by its being put into an ill name.

2. He vindicates himself from this imputation. They call Paul a heretic, but he is not so.

(1) He worships the God of his fathers, and therefore is right in the object of his worship. He worships the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the God who took them into covenant with himself. Paul adheres to that covenant, and sets up no other in opposition to it. I worship the same God that all my fathers worshipped. His religion gloried in its antiquity, and in an uninterrupted succession of its professors. It is very comfortable in our worshipping God to have an eye to him as the God of our fathers. He approved himself theirs, and therefore, if we serve him as they did, he will be ours.

(2) He believed all things which are written in the law and the prophets, and therefore is right in the rule of his worship. He received the scriptures entire, and he receives them pure. He sets not up any other rule of faith or practice but the scriptures. Divine revelation, as it is in the scripture, is that which he resolves to live and die by, and therefore he is not a heretic.

(3) He has his eye upon a future state, and therefore is right in the end of his worship. Those that turn aside to heresy have a regard to this world, but Paul aims to make heaven of his religion, and neither more nor less (v. 15): "I have hope towards God; my hope is towards God and not towards the world. I depend upon God and upon his power, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, of all, both the just and unjust." There shall be a resurrection of the dead, of all men from the beginning to the end of time. We have not only another life to live when our present life is at an end, but there is to be another world. It shall be a resurrection both of the just and of the unjust, of those that did well, and to them our Saviour has told us that it will be a resurrection of life; and of those that did evil, he has said to them it will be a resurrection of condemnation. This implies that it will be a resurrection to a final judgment. The just shall rise by virtue of their union with Christ as their head; the unjust shall rise by virtue of Christ's dominion over them as their Judge. God is to be depended upon for the resurrection of the dead: I have hope towards God that there shall be a resurrection; it shall be effected by the almighty power of God. The resurrection of the dead is a fundamental article of our creed, as it was also of that of the Jewish church. It is what they themselves also allow, but it is more clearly revealed by the gospel. In all our religion we ought to serve God with a confidence in him that there will be a resurrection of the dead, expecting our recompence in that.

(4) His conversation is of a piece with his devotion (v. 16): And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offence towards God and towards men. This protestation of Paul's is to the same purport with that which he made before the high priest (ch. xxiii. 1): I have lived in all good conscience. [1] What was Paul's aim and desire: To have a conscience void of offence. Either, First, "A conscience not offending; not informing me wrong, nor in anything misleading me." Or, Secondly, A conscience, not offended. "This is what I am ambitious of, to keep upon good terms with my own conscience. I am as careful not to offend my conscience as I am not to offend a friend with whom I daily converse." [2] What was his care and endeavour, in pursuance of this: "I exercise myself. I make it my constant business" (those that did so were called ascetics, from the word here used), "that I may keep peace with my own conscience." [3] The extent of this care: First, To all times: To have always a conscience void of offence. Paul was conscious to himself that he had not yet attained perfection, and the evil that he would not do yet he did. Sins of infirmity are uneasy to conscience, but they do not wound it as presumptuous sins do; and, though offence may be given to conscience, yet care must be taken that it be not an abiding offence. This however we must always exercise ourselves in. Secondly, To all things: Both towards God, and towards man. His conscientious care extended itself to the whole of his duty, and he was afraid of breaking the law of love either to God or his neighbour. We must be very cautious that we do not think, or speak, or do anything amiss, either against God or man. [4] The inducement to it: Herein, for this cause; so it may be read. "Because I look for the resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come, therefore I thus exercise myself."

IV. Having made confession of his faith, he gives a plain account of his case, and of the wrong done him by his persecutors. He challenges them to prove him guilty.

1. In the temple. Here they fell furiously upon him as an enemy to their nation and the temple, ch. xxi. 28. (1) It was very hard to accuse him as an enemy to their nation, when he came to bring alms to his nation, for the relief of the poor at Jerusalem. He had no malice to that people and was ready to do them all good offices. (2) It was very hard to accuse him of having profaned the temple when he brought offerings and was himself at charges therein (ch. xxi. 24), and was found purifying himself in the temple, according to the law (v. 18), neither with multitude nor with tumult. They were Jews from Asia, his enemies; they had no pretence to make a tumult and raise a multitude against him, for he had neither for him. He challenges them to prove it (v. 19): "Those Jews of Asia ought to have been here before thee, that they might have been examined, whether they had aught against me."

2. In the council. "Let these same that are here say whether they have found any evil doing in me when I stood before the council (v. 20). When I was there all I said was, Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day (v. 21), which gave no offence to anyone but the Sadducees. I stuck to that which is the faith of the whole Jewish church, excepting those whom they themselves call heretics."

I. Felix adjourned the cause (v. 22): He had a more perfect knowledge of that way than the high priest and the elders thought he had. He had got a notion of Christianity, that it was not such an evil thing as it was represented. Therefore he put off the prosecutors with an excuse: "When the chief captain shall come down I will know the uttermost of your matter, I shall know the truth. Either Paul deserves to be punished for raising the tumult, or you do for doing it yourselves. I will hear what he says, and determine accordingly between you." It was a disappointment to the high priest and the elders that Paul was not condemned, or remitted to their judgment. But thus sometimes God restrains the wrath of his people's enemies by the agency, not of their friends, but of such as are strangers to them. It was an injury to Paul that he was not released. But he was a judge that neither feared God nor regarded man, and what good could be expected from him?

II. He detained the prisoner in custody. Felix thought a man of such a public character as Paul was had many friends, and he might have an opportunity of obliging them, or making a hand of them. He continued him a prisoner, commanded a centurion to keep him, v. 23. Yet he took care he should be a prisoner at large, his keeper must let him have liberty, make his confinement as easy to him as possible. The high priest and the elders grudged him his life, but Felix generously allowed him a sort of liberty. He also gave orders that none of his friends should be hindered from coming to him; and a man's prison is as it were his own house if he has but his friends about him.

III. He had frequent conversation with him afterwards in private, v. 24, 25.

1. With what design Felix sent for Paul. He had a mind to have some talk with him concerning the faith in Christ. Felix had a mind to talk with Paul more freely than he could in open court concerning the faith of Christ; and this only to satisfy his curiosity, or rather the curiosity of his wife Drusilla, who was a Jewess, daughter of Herod Agrippa. Being educated in the Jewish religion, she was more inquisitive concerning the Christian religion. But it was no great matter what religion she was of; for, whatever it was, she was a reproach and scandal to it—a Jewess, but an adulteress; and was noted for an impudent woman. Many are fond of new notions and speculations in religion who yet hate to come under the power and influence of religion.

2. What the account was which Paul gave him of the Christian religion. He expected to be amused with a mystical divinity, but he is alarmed with a practical divinity. Paul, being asked concerning the Christ, reasoned concerning righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. He discoursed with clearness and warmth of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come. Faith in Christ is designed to enforce upon the children of men the great laws of justice and temperance. Justice and temperance were celebrated virtues among the heathen moralists; if the doctrine Paul preaches will but free him from an obligation to these, he will readily embrace it. "It is so far from doing so that it strengthens the obligations of those sacred laws." Paul reasoned of righteousness and temperance, to convince Felix of his unrighteousness and intemperance, that, seeing the odiousness of them, he might enquire concerning the faith of Christ, with a resolution to embrace it. By the doctrine of Christ is discovered to us the judgment to come. Men have their day now, Felix hath his; but God's day is coming. From this account of the heads of Paul's discourse we may gather, [1] Paul in his preaching had no respect to persons, for the word of God has not. [2] Paul in his preaching aimed at the consciences of men and led them to a sight of their sins. [3] Paul preferred the serving of Christ, and the saving of souls, before his own safety. [4] Paul was willing to run hazards, in his work, even where there was little probability of doing good. Felix and Drusilla were such hardened sinners that it was not at all likely they should be brought to repentance by Paul's preaching, and yet Paul deals with them as one that did not despair of them. Let the watchman give fair warning, and then they have delivered their own souls, though they should not prevail to deliver the souls they watch for.

3. What impressions Paul's discourse made upon this great but wicked man: Felix trembled, being put into a fright. Paul never trembled before him, but he was made to tremble before Paul. We do not find that Drusilla trembled, though she was equally guilty. See here, The power of the word of God. It is searching, it is startling, it can strike a terror into the heart of the most proud and daring sinner. The workings of natural conscience; when it is startled and awakened, it fills the soul with horror and amazement. A prospect of the judgment to come is enough to make the stoutest heart to tremble.

4. How Felix struggled to get clear of these impressions. He did by them as he did by Paul's prosecutors (v. 25), he deferred them; he said, Go thy way for this time, when I have a convenient season I will call for thee. He trembled and that was all. Many are startled by the word of God who are not effectually changed by it. Many are in fear of the consequences of sin, and yet continue in love and league with sin. He did not fight against his convictions. He artfully shifted off his convictions by putting off the prosecution of them to another time. Like a sorry debtor, he begs a day; Paul has spent himself, and has tired him and his lady, and therefore, "Go thy way for this time, when I have a convenient season I will call for thee." Many lose all the benefit of their convictions for want of striking while the iron is hot. By dropping his convictions now, he lost them for ever, and himself with them. In the affairs of our souls, delays are dangerous. The matter is adjourned to some more convenient season, and then convictions cool and wear off. Felix put off this matter to a more convenient season, but we do not find that this more convenient season ever came. The present season is, without doubt, the most convenient season.

IV. He detained him a prisoner, and left him so, when two years after he was removed from the government, v. 26, 27. He was convinced in his conscience that Paul had done nothing worthy of death or of bonds, and yet had not the honesty to release him. Here we are told what principles he was governed by herein. 1. The love of money. He would not release Paul because he hoped that at length his friends would make a purse to purchase his liberty. He cannot find in his heart to do his duty as a judge, unless he can get money by it: He hoped that money would have been given him of Paul. In hopes of this, he detains him a prisoner, and sends for him the oftener, and communes with him. He sends for him to feel his pulse, and gives him an opportunity to ask what he would take to release him. And now we see what became of his promise both to Paul and to himself, that he would hear more of Christ at some other convenient season. All his business now is to get money by Paul. Paul was but a poor man, but Felix knew there were those who wished well to him who were able to assist him. Though Paul is to be commended that he would not offer money to Felix, yet I know not whether his friends are to be commended in not doing it for him. I ought not to bribe a man to do an unjust thing, but, if he will not do me justice without a fee, it is but doing myself justice to give it to him; and, if they might do it, it was a shame they did not do it. The Christians here at Cæsarea had parted with their tears to prevent his going to the prison (ch. xxi. 13), and could they not find in their hearts to part with their money to help him out? However, this will not excuse Felix. The judge that will not do right without a bribe will no doubt do wrong for a bribe. 2. Men-pleasing. Felix was recalled from his government about two years after this, and Porcius Festus was put in his place. He left Paul bound, and the reason here given is because he was willing to do the Jews a pleasure. He would continue him a prisoner rather than offend them; and he did it in hope thereby to atone for the many offences he had done against them. Thus those who do some base things are tempted to do more to screen themselves. But, when he had done it, it seems he did not gain his point. The Jews, notwithstanding this, accused him to the emperor. Those that aim to please God by doing good will have what they aim at; but so will not those that seek to please men by doing evil.

CHAP. XXV

We have here much the same management of Paul's case: cognizance is here taken of it, I. By Festus the governor, ver. 1–3. The hearing of it is appointed to be, not at Jerusalem, as the Jews desired, but at Cæsarea, ver. 4–6. The Jews appear against Paul (ver. 7), but he stands upon his own innocency (ver. 8); and to avoid the removing of the cause at Jerusalem, he at length appeals to Cæsar, ver. 9–12. II. By king Agrippa (ver. 13–21), and Agrippa desires he might have the hearing of it himself, ver. 22. Paul brought to the bar (ver. 23), and Festus opens the cause (ver. 24–27).

We commonly say, "New lords, new laws, new customs"; but here was a new governor, and yet Paul had the same treatment from him. Festus, like Felix, does not release him.

I. The pressing application which the high priest and other Jews used with the governor to abandon Paul. See how speedy they were in their applications to Festus. As soon as ever he had come into the province, within three days he went up to Jerusalem. The priests were upon him to proceed against Paul. He stayed three days at Cæsarea, where Paul was a prisoner. As soon as ever he comes up to Jerusalem the priests are in all haste with him against Paul. See how spiteful they were in their application. They informed the governor against Paul (v. 2) before he was brought upon a fair trial, that so they might make him a party who was to be the judge. But this artifice, though base enough, they could not confide in. They form another project much more base, and that is to assassinate Paul before he came upon his trial. See how specious the pretence was. Now that the governor was himself at Jerusalem they desired he would send for Paul thither, and try him there. He was charged with having profaned the temple at Jerusalem, and it is usual for criminals to be tried in the court where the fact was committed; but that which they designed was to way-lay him and to murder him upon the road. They desired favour against Paul. The business of prosecutors is to demand justice against one that they suppose to be a criminal. To desire favour against a prisoner, and from the judge, too, who ought to be of counsel for them, is a very impudent thing. The favour ought to be for the prisoner, but here they desire it against him.

II. The governor's resolution that Paul shall take his trial at Cæsarea, v. 4, 5. He gave orders that Paul should be kept at Cæsarea. Whatever was his reason for refusing it, God made use of it as a means of preserving Paul out of the hands of his enemies. God does not bring it to light, yet he finds another way to bring it to nought, by inclining the heart of the governor, not to remove Paul to Jerusalem. God is not tied to one method, in working out salvation for his people. Yet he will do them the justice to hear what they have to say against Paul, if they will go down to Cæsarea: "Let those among you who are able go down with me, and accuse this man. Let them go and give in their evidence." Festus will not take it for granted that there is wickedness in him, till it is proved upon him. If he be guilty, it lies upon them to prove him so.

III. Paul's trial before Festus. Festus stayed at Jerusalem about ten days, and then went down to Cæsarea. Since they are so eager in the prosecution, he is willing this cause should be first called; he will despatch it the next day. 1. The court set, and the prisoner called to the bar. Festus sat in the judgment-seat, and he commanded Paul to be brought, v. 6. 2. The prosecutors exhibiting their charges against the prisoner (v. 7): The Jews stood round about, which intimates that they were many. They stood round about, if possible, to frighten the judge into a compliance with their malicious design, or, at least, to frighten the prisoner; but in vain: he had too just and strong an assurance to be frightened by them. When they stood round about him, they brought many and grievous accusations against Paul, so it should be read. They represented him to the court as black and odious as their wit and malice could contrive; but when they came to the evidence, there they failed: they could not prove what they alleged against him, for it was all false. It is no new thing for the most excellent ones of the earth to have all manner of evil said against them falsely, even before the judgment-seat. 3. The prisoner's insisting upon his own vindication, v. 8. He insisted upon his general plea, Not guilty: Neither against the law of the Jews, nor against the temple, nor yet against Cæsar, have I offended anything at all. He had not violated the law of the Jews. He established the law. Preaching Christ, the end of the law, was no offence against the law. He had not profaned the temple. He had not offended against Cæsar, nor his government. By this it appears that they had charged him with some instances of disaffection to the present higher powers, which obliged him to purge himself as to that matter.

IV. Paul's appeal to the emperor. This gave the cause a new turn. God puts it into his heart to do it, for the bringing about of that which he had said to him, that he must bear witness to Christ at Rome.

1. The proposal which Festus made to Paul to go and take his trial at Jerusalem, v. 9. Festus was willing to do the Jews a pleasure, inclined to gratify the prosecutors rather than the prisoner, and asked him whether he would be willing to go up to Jerusalem and clear himself there. He would not offer to turn him over to the high priest and the sanhedrim, but, Wilt thou go thither, and be judged of these things before me? The president might have ordered him thither, but he would not do it without his own consent.

2. Paul's refusal to consent to it, and his reasons for it. (1) As a citizen of Rome, it was most proper for him to be tried in that which was properly his court, which sat at Cæsarea: I stand at Cæsar's judgment-seat, where I ought to be judged. The court being held in Cæsar's name, and by his authority and commission, before one that was delegated by him, it might well be said to be his judgment seat. Paul's owning that he ought to be judged at Cæsar's judgment seat plainly proves that Christ's ministers are not exempted from the jurisdiction of the civil powers, and, if they be guilty, of a real crime, to submit to their censure; if innocent, yet to submit to their enquiry. (2) As a member of the Jewish nation, he had done nothing to make himself obnoxious to them: To the Jews have I done no wrong, as thou very well knowest. It very well becomes those that are innocent to plead their innocency, and to insist upon it. (3) He was willing to abide by the rules of the law, and to let that take its course, v. 11. If he be guilty of any capital crime that deserves death, he will neither flee from justice nor fight with it: "I refuse not to die." If he be innocent, as he protests he is, "If there be none of these things whereof these accuse me, no man may deliver me unto them, no, not the governor himself; for it is his business as much to protect the innocent as to punish the guilty"; and he claims his protection.

3. His appealing to court. Since he is continually in danger of the Jews, and one attempt made after another to get him into their hands, since he cannot have justice done him in any other way: "I appeal unto Cæsar. Rather than be delivered to the Jews let me be delivered to Nero." It is a hard case that a son of Abraham must be forced to appeal to a Nero, from those who call themselves the seed of Abraham, and shall be safer in Rome than in Jerusalem.

V. The judgment given upon the whole matter. His enemies hoped the cause would be ended in his death; his friends hoped it would be ended in his deliverance; they are both disappointed, the thing is left as it was. It is an instance of the slow steps which Providence sometimes takes, by which we are often made ashamed both of our hopes and of our fears, and are kept still waiting on God. The president takes advice upon the matter: He conferred with the council—not with the council of the Jews, but with his own counsellors. He determines to send him to Rome. A Roman citizen might appeal at any time to a superior court, even to the supreme. Hast thou appealed unto Cæsar? Unto Cæsar thou shalt go. In our judgment before God those that by justifying themselves appeal to the law, to the law they shall go, and it will condemn them; but those that by repentance and faith appeal to the gospel, to the gospel they shall go, and it will save them.

We have here the preparation that was made for another hearing of Paul before king Agrippa, only to gratify his curiosity.

I. The friendly visit which king Agrippa made to Festus, now upon his coming into the government in that province (v. 13): After certain days, king Agrippa came to Cæsarea.

1. Who the visitants were. (1) King Agrippa, the son of that Herod (surnamed Agrippa) who killed James the apostle, and was himself eaten of worms; and great grandson of Herod the Great, under whom Christ was born. (2) Bernice came with him. She was his own sister, the widow of his uncle Herod, after whose death she lived with this brother of hers; after she was a second time married to Polemon, king of Cilicia, she got to be divorced from him, and returned to her brother king Agrippa. Tacitus and Suetonius speak of a criminal intimacy afterwards between her and Titus Vespasian. Drusilla, the wife of Felix, was another sister. Such lewd people were the great people generally in those times!

2. What the design of this visit was: they came to salute Festus, to compliment him upon his accession to the government. But it is probable they came as much to divert themselves as to show respect to him, and to share in the entertainments of his court.

II. The account which Festus gave to king Agrippa of Paul and his case.

1. To entertain him. It would be particularly acceptable to Agrippa, not only because he was a judge, and there were some points of law and practice in it well worth his notice, but much more as he was a Jew, and there were some points of religion in it much more deserving his cognizance.

2. To have his advice. Festus was but newly come to be a judge, and therefore was willing to have the counsel of those that were older and more experienced. The particular account he gives to king Agrippa concerning Paul, v. 14–21.

(1) He found him a prisoner when he came into the government of this province: There is a certain man left in bonds by Felix; and therefore, if there were anything amiss in the first taking of him into custody, Festus is not to answer for that.

(2) The Jewish sanhedrim were extremely set against him: "The chief priests and the elders informed me against him as a dangerous man, and desired he might therefore be condemned to die."

(3) He had insisted upon the Roman law in favour of the prisoner, and would not condemn him unheard (v. 16): "It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die before the accused has the accusers face to face." Hear the other side had become a proverb among them. We must not give men bad characters, nor condemn their words and actions, till we have heard what is to be said in their vindication.

(4) He had brought him upon his trial, according to the duty of his place, v. 17. He had been expeditious in it as soon as ever they had come, without any delay, on the morrow, he had brought on the cause. He had likewise tried him in the most solemn manner: He sat on the judgment-seat. He called a great court on purpose for the trial of Paul, that the sentence might be definitive, and the cause ended.

(5) He was extremely disappointed in the charge they brought against him (v. 18, 19): When the accusers stood up against him they brought no accusations of such things as I supposed. He supposed by the eagerness of their prosecution, and their urging it thus upon the Roman governors one after another, That they had something to accuse him of that was dangerous either to private property or the public peace. Such were the outcries against the primitive Christians, so loud, so fierce, that the standers-by could not but conclude them the worst of men; and to represent them so was the design of that clamour, as it was against our Saviour. That they had something to accuse him of that was cognizable in the Roman courts, and which the governor was properly the judge of, as Gallio expected (ch. xviii. 14). But he finds the matter is not so; they had certain questions against him, instead of proofs and evidences against him. And they were questions of their own superstition, so he calls their religion. The Romans protected their religion according to their law, but not their superstition. But the great question, it seems, was concerning one Jesus that was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive. See how slightly this Roman speaks of Christ, and of his death and resurrection, and of the great controversy between the Jews and the Christians whether he were the Messiah promised or no, and the great proof of his being the Messiah, his resurrection from the dead. What Paul affirmed concerning Jesus, that he is alive, is a matter of such vast importance that if it be not true we are all undone.

(6) He had proposed to Paul that the cause might be adjourned to the Jewish courts, as best able to take cognizance of an affair of this nature (v. 20): "Because I doubted of such manner of questions I asked him whether he would go to Jerusalem and there be judged of these matters."

(7) Paul had chosen rather to remove his cause to Rome than to Jerusalem: "He appealed to be reserved to the hearing of Augustus (v. 21), and therefore I commanded him to be kept till I might send him to Cæsar."

III. The bringing of him before Agrippa.

1. The king desired it (v. 22): "I would also hear the man myself." Agrippa knows more of this matter than Festus does; he has heard of Paul. Nothing would oblige him more than to hear Paul. Agrippa would not for all the world have gone to a meeting to hear Paul preach, any more than Herod to hear Jesus; and yet they are both glad to have them brought before them, only to satisfy their curiosity.

2. Festus granted it: Tomorrow thou shalt hear him. There was a good providence in this, for the encouragement of Paul, who seemed buried alive in his imprisonment, and deprived of all opportunities of doing good. This gives him an opportunity of preaching Christ to a great congregation, and (which is more) to a congregatoin of great ones. Felix heard him in private concerning the faith of Christ. But Agrippa and Festus agree he shall be heard in public.

3. Great preparation was made for it (v. 23): The next day there was a great appearance in the place of hearing.

(1) Agrippa and Bernice took this opportunity to show themselves in state; they came with great pomp. They came with great fancy, so the word is. Great pomp is but great fancy. It neither adds any real excellency, nor gains any real respect, but feeds a vain humour. It is but a show, a dream, a fantastical thing (so the word signifies). The pomp which Agrippa and Bernice appeared in was, [1] Stained by their lewd characters, and all the beauty of it sullied, and all virtuous people that knew them could not but contemn them in the midst of all this pomp as vile persons. [2] Outshone by the real glory of the poor prisoner at the bar. His bonds in so good a cause were more glorious than their chains of gold. Who would be fond of worldly pomp that here sees so bad a woman loaded with it and so good a man loaded with the reverse of it?

(2) The chief captains and principal men of the city took this opportunity to pay their respects to Festus and to his guests. I am apt to think that those who were to appear in pomp perplexed themselves more with care about their clothes than Paul, who was to appear as a prisoner, did with care about his cause.

IV. The speech with which Festus introduced the cause. He addressed himself respectfully to the company: "King Agrippa, and all men who are here present with us." He speaks to all the men as if he intended a tacit reflection upon Bernice. The word used is that which signifies men in distinction from women; what had Bernice to do here? He represents the prisoner as one that the Jews had a very great spite against. The multitude of them, both at Jerusalem and here at Cæsarea, cry out that he ought not to live any longer. He confesses the prisoner's innocency (v. 25): I found that he had committed nothing worthy of death. Upon a full hearing of the case his own conscience brought in Paul not guilty. And why did he not discharge him then, for he stood upon his deliverance? Why, truly, because he was so much clamoured against, and he feared the clamour would turn upon himself if he should release him. It is a pity but every man that has a conscience should have courage to act according to it. He acquaints them with the present state of the case, that the prisoner had appealed to the emperor himself, and that he had admitted his appeal: I have determined to send him. And thus the cause now stood. He desires their assistance in examining the matter calmly and impartially, that he might have at least such an insight into the cause as was necessary to his stating it to the emperor, v. 36, 27. He thought it unreasonable to send a prisoner and not withal to signify the crimes laid against him, that the matter might be put in a readiness for the emperor's determination. He could not as yet write anything certain concerning Paul; so confused were the informations that were given in against him, that Festus could make nothing at all of them. He therefore desired Paul might thus be publicly examined, that he might be advised by them what to write.

CHAP. XXVI

I. The account he gives of himself, 1. His humble address to king Agrippa, ver. 1–3. 2. His account of his origin, and education, his profession as a Pharisee, and his adherence still to that which was then the main article of his creed, the "resurrection of the dead", ver. 3–8. 3. Of his zeal against the Christian religion, in the beginning of his time, ver. 9–11. 4. Of his miraculous conversion, ver. 12–16. 5. Of the commission to preach the gospel to the Gentiles, ver. 17, 18. 6. Of his proceedings pursuant to that commission, ver. 19–21. 7. Of the doctrine which he had made it his business to preach to the Gentiles, ver. 22, 23. II. The remarks that were made upon his apology. 1. Festus slighted him as crazed, ver. 24. In answer to him, he appeals to king Agrippa, ver. 25–27. 2. King Agrippa owns himself almost his convert (ver. 28), and Paul heartily wishes him so, ver. 29. 3. They all agreed that he was an innocent man, that he ought to be set at liberty, and that it was a pity he was appealing to Cæsar, ver. 30–32.

Agrippa was the most honourable person in the assembly, having the title of king bestowed upon him, and, though not here superior, yet senior, to Festus. Festus having opened the cause, Agrippa intimates to Paul a licence given him to speak for himself, v. 1. This was a favour which the Jews would not allow him, but Agrippa freely gives it to him. Notice is taken of his gesture: He stretched forth his hand, as one that had perfect freedom and command of himself.

I. Paul addressed himself with a very particular respect to Agrippa, v. 2, 3. He answered cheerfully before Felix, because he knew he had been many years a judge to that nation, ch. xxiv. 10. But his opinion of Agrippa goes further. Being accused of the Jews, and having many base things laid to his charge, he is glad he has an opportunity of clearing himself. Since he is forced to answer for himself, he is glad it is before king Agrippa, who, being himself a proselyte to the Jewish religion, understood all matters relating to it better than the other Roman governors did: I knew thee to be expert in all customs and questions which are among the Jews. It seems, Agrippa was expert in the customs of the Jewish religion. He was expert also in the questions that arose upon those customs. Agrippa was well versed in the scriptures of the Old Testament, and therefore could make a better judgment upon the controversy concerning Jesus being the Messiah than another could. It is an encouragement to a preacher to have those to speak to that are intelligent, and can discern things that differ. He therefore begs that he would hear him patiently. Paul designs a long discourse, and begs that Agrippa will hear him out, and not be weary; he designs a plain discourse, and begs that he will hear him with mildness, and not be angry. Surely the least we can expect, when we preach the faith of Christ, is to be heard patiently.

II. He professes that though he was branded as an apostate, yet he still adhered to all that good which he was first trained up in.

1. See here what his religion was in his youth: His manner of life was well known, v. 4, 5. He was not indeed born among his own nation, but he was bred among them at Jerusalem. His education was neither foreign nor obscure; it was among his own nation at Jerusalem. Those that knew him from the beginning could testify for him that he was a Pharisee, that he was of the most strict sect of that religion. He was not only called a Pharisee, but he lived a Pharisee. And he was of the better sort of Pharisees; for he was brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, who was an eminent rabbi of the school or house of Hillel. Now if Paul was a Pharisee, and lived a Pharisee, then he was a scholar, a man of learning; the Pharisees knew the law, and were well versed in it. It was a reproach to the other apostles that they had not had an academical education, but were bred fishermen, ch. iv. 13. Here is an apostle raised up that had sat at the feet of their most eminent doctors. Then he was a moralist, a man of virtue, and not a rake or loose debauched young man. He was, as touching the righteousness which is in the law, blameless. As he could not be thought to have deserted his religion because he did not know it (for he was a learned man), so he could not be thought to have deserted it because he did not love it. Then he was orthodox, sound in the faith. He was a Pharisee, in opposition to a Sadducee. They could not say, He quitted his religion for want of a due regard to divine revelation; no, he always had a veneration for the ancient promise made of God unto the fathers.

Now though Paul knew very well that all this would not justify him before God, yet he knew it was for his reputation among the Jews, and an argument, such as Agrippa would feel, that he was not such a man as they represented him to be. Though he counted it but loss that he might win Christ, yet he mentioned it when it might serve to honour Christ. He reflects upon it with some satisfaction that he had before his conversion lived in all good conscience before God.

2. See here what his religion is. He has not indeed such a zeal for the ceremonial law as he had in his youth. But for the main principles of his religion he is as zealous as ever.

(1) His religion is built upon the promise made of God unto the fathers. It is built upon divine revelation; it is built upon divine grace, and that grace manifested and conveyed by promise. The promise of God is the guide and ground of his religion, the promise made to the fathers, which was more ancient than the ceremonial law. Christ and heaven are the two great doctrines of the gospel—that God has given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. Now these two are the matter of the promise made unto the fathers.

(2) His religion consists in the hopes of this promise. He places it not, as they did, in meats and drinks, but in a believing dependence upon God's grace in the covenant, and upon the promise. He had hope in Christ as the promised seed; he hoped to be blessed in him. He had hopes of heaven. Paul had no confidence in the flesh, but in Christ.

(3) Herein he concurred with all the pious Jews. "Our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come to this promise. Now all the Israelites profess to believe in this promise, both of Christ and heaven. They all hope for a Messiah to come, and we that are Christians hope in a Messiah already come; so that we all agree to build upon the same promise. They look for the resurrection of the dead, and this is what I look for. Why should I be looked upon as an apostate from the faith and worship of the Jewish church, when I agree with them in this fundamental article? I hope to come to the same heaven at last that they hope to come to; and, if we expect to meet so happily in our end, why should we fall out so unhappily by the way?" Paul instantly serves God day and night in the gospel of his Son; the twelve tribes by their representatives do so in the law of Moses, but he and they do it in hope of the same promise. Much more should Christians, who hope in the same Jesus, for the same heaven, though differing in the modes and ceremonies of worship, live together in holy love. Those only can upon good grounds hope for eternal life that are diligent and constant in the service of God; and the prospect of that eternal life should engage us to diligence and constancy in all religious exercises. And of those that instantly serve God day and night, though not in our way, we ought to judge charitably.

(4) This was what he was now suffering for: I am judged for the hope of the promise made unto the fathers. He stuck to the promise, against the ceremonial law, while his persecutors stuck to the ceremonial law, against the promise. It is common for men to hate and persecute the power of that religion in others which yet they pride themselves in the form of. Paul's hope was what they themselves also allowed (ch. xxiv. 15), and yet they were thus enraged against him for practising according to that hope.

(5) This was what he would persuade all that heard him cordially to embrace (v. 8): Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead? He explained the promise made to the fathers to be the promise of the resurrection and eternal life, and proved that he was in the right way because he believed in Christ who had risen from the dead, which was a pledge and earnest of that resurrection which the fathers hoped for. Now many of his hearers were Gentiles, Festus particularly, and we may suppose, when they heard him speak so much of Christ's resurrection, and of the resurrection from the dead, that they mocked. If it be above the power of nature, yet it is not above the power of the God of nature. Do we not see a kind of resurrection in nature, at the return of every spring? Has the sun such a force to raise dead plants, and should it seem incredible to us that God should raise dead bodies?

III. He acknowledges that while he continued a Pharisee he was a bitter enemy to Christians and Christianity, and thought he ought to be so. His becoming a Christian and a preacher was not the result of any previous inclination that way. He did not reason himself into Christianity, but was brought into the highest degree of an assurance of it, immediately from the highest degree of prejudice against it. His conversion in such a miraculous way was not only to himself, but to others also, a convincing proof of the truth of Christianity. Perhaps he designs it for an excuse of his prosecutors. Paul himself once thought he did what he ought to do when he persecuted the disciples of Christ, and he charitably thinks they laboured under the like mistake. Observe,

(1) What a fool he was in his opinion (v. 9): He thought with himself that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth. Because it agreed not with the notion he had of the kingdom of the Messiah, he was for doing all he could against it. He thought he did God good service in persecuting those who called on the name of Jesus Christ. It is possible for those to be confident they are in the right who yet are evidently in the wrong.

2. What a fury he was in his practice, v. 10, 11. There is not a more violent principle in the world than conscience misinformed. He gives an account of what he did and aggravates it as one that was truly penitent for it. He filled the jails with Christians. Many of the saints did I shut up in prison (ch. xxvi. 10), both men and women, ch. viii. 3. He made himself the tool of the chief priests. Herein from them he received authority and proud enough he was to be a man in authority for such a purpose. He was very officious to vote the putting of Christians to death, particularly Stephen, to whose death Saul was consenting (ch. viii. 1). He brought them under punishments of an inferior nature, in the synagogues, where they were scourged as transgressors of the rules of the synagogue. He not only punished them for their religion, but he forced them to abjure their religion, by putting them to the torture: "I compelled them to blaspheme Christ." Nothing will lie heavier upon persecutors than forcing men's consciences. His rage swelled so against Christians and Christianity that Jerusalem itself was too narrow a stage for it to act upon, but, being exceedingly mad against them, he persecuted them even to strange cities. He was mad at them, mad to see them multiply the more for their being afflicted. He was exceedingly mad; the stream of his fury would admit no banks, no bounds. Persecutors are mad men, and some of them exceedingly mad. There is not a more restless principle than malice, especially that which pretends conscience.

This was Paul's character, and this his manner of life in the beginning of his time. All imaginable external objections lay against his being a Christian.

All who believe a God must acknowledge that those who speak and act by his direction are not to be opposed; for that is fighting against God. Now Paul here makes it out that he had an immediate call from heaven to preach the gospel of Christ to the Gentile world.

I. He was made a Christian by a divine power. He was brought into it on a sudden by the hand of heaven, by a divine and spiritual energy, by a revelation of Christ from above: and this when he was in the full career of his sin, going to Damascus. Nor was he tempted to give it up by the failing of his friends, for he had at this time as ample an authority and commission from the chief priests to persecute Christianity as ever he had. Two things bring about this surprising change, a vision from heaven and a voice from heaven.

1. He saw a heavenly vision; it was without doubt a divine appearance. He saw a great light, a light from heaven, such as could not be produced by any art at midday; it was not in a house where tricks might have been played with him, but it was in the way, in the open air; it was such a light as was above the brightness of the sun, and this could not be the product of Paul's own fancy, for it shone round about those that journeyed with him: made the sun itself to be in their eyes a less light. They all fell to the earth upon the sight of it, such a mighty consternation did it put them into. In the creation of grace, as of the world, the first thing created is light, 2 Cor. iv. 6. Christ himself appeared to him (v. 16): I have appeared to thee for this purpose. Christ was in this light, though those that travelled with Paul saw the light only, and not Christ in the light.

2. He heard a heavenly voice speaking to him; it is here said to be in the Hebrew tongue, his native language. He called him by his name, and repeated it (Saul, Saul). He convinced him of sin, the sin of persecuting the Christians. He interested himself in the sufferings of his followers: Thou persecutest me (v. 14), and again, It is Jesus whom thou persecutest, v. 15. Little did Paul think, when he was trampling upon those that he looked upon as the blemishes of this earth, that he was insulting one that was so much the glory of heaven. He checked him for his wilful resistance of those convictions: It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks. Christ made himself known to him. Paul asked (v. 15), "Who art thou, Lord?" And he said, "I am Jesus; he whom thou hast despised, and hated." Paul thought Jesus was buried in the earth, and, though stolen out of his own sepulchre, yet laid in some other. All the Jews were taught to say so, and therefore he is amazed to hear him speak from heaven, to see him surrounded with all this glory. This convinced him that the doctrines of Jesus were divine and heavenly, and not to be opposed, but to be cordially embraced: and this is enough to make him a Christian immediately.

II. He was made a minister by a divine authority: That the same Jesus that appeared to him in that glorious light ordered him to go and preach the gospel to the Gentiles. What is said of his being an apostle is here joined immediately to that which was said to him by the way. He puts the two together for brevity-sake: Rise, and stand upon thy feet. He must stand up, for Christ has work for him to do: I have appeared to thee to make thee a minister. Christ has the making of his own ministers. Christ will manifest himself to all those whom he makes his ministers; for how can those preach him who do not know him? And how can those know him to whom he does not by his spirit make himself known?

1. The office to which Paul is appointed: he is made a minister, to attend on Christ, and act for him, as a witness. Christ appeared to him that he might appear for Christ before men.

2. The matter of Paul's testimony: he must give an account to the world, Of the things which he had seen. He saw these things that he might publish them, and he did take all occasions to publish them, as here, and before, ch. xxii. Of those things in which he would appear to him. Paul at first had but confused notions of the gospel, till Christ appeared to him and gave him fuller instructions. The gospel he preached he received from Christ immediately (Gal. i. 12); but he received it gradually. Christ often appeared to Paul and still taught him.

3. The spiritual protection he was taken under (v. 17), delivering thee from the people of the Jews and from the Gentiles. Christ had shown Paul at this time what great things he must suffer (ch. ix. 16), and yet tells him here he will deliver him from the people. Great sufferings are reconcilable to the promise of the deliverance of God's people. Sometimes God delivers them into the hands of their persecutors that he may have the honour of delivering them out of their hands.

4. The special commission given him to go among the Gentiles; it was some years after Paul's conversion before he was sent to the Gentiles.

(1) There is great work to be done among the Gentiles, and Paul must be instrumental in doing it. A world that sits in darkness must be enlightened. He is sent to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light. He shall open their eyes, which before were shut against the light, and they shall be willing to understand. Christ opens the heart by opening the eyes, does not lead men blindfold, but gives them to see their own way. He is sent not only to open their eyes for the present, but to keep them open, to turn them from darkness to light, that is, from following false and blind guides, to follow a divine revelation of unquestionable certainty and truth. This was turning them from darkness to light, from the ways of darkness to those on which the light shines. The great design of the gospel is to rectify the mistakes of those who are in error, that things may be set and seen in a true light. A world that lies in wickedness, must be reformed; it is not enough for them to have their eyes opened, they must have their hearts renewed. Satan rules by the power of darkness, and God by the convincing evidence of light. Sinners are under the power of Satan; converting grace turns them from under the dominion of Satan, and brings them into subjection to God. When gracious dispositions are strong in the soul (as corrupt and sinful dispositions had been), it is then turned from the power of Satan unto God.

(2) There is a great happiness designed for the Gentiles by this work—that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among those who are sanctified; they are turned from the slavery of Satan to the service of God. That they may be restored to his favour, which by sin they have forfeited: That they may receive forgiveness of sins. They are persuaded to lay down their arms, and return to their allegiance, that they may have the benefit of the act of indemnity. That they may be happy in the fruition of him, that they may have an inheritance among those who are sanctified by faith that is in me. Heaven is an inheritance, it descends to all the children of God; for, if children, then heirs. That they may have a right, so some read it; not by merit, but purely by grace. All that are effectually turned from sin to God are not only pardoned, but preferred. All that shall be saved hereafter are sanctified now. None can be happy that are not holy; nor shall any be saints in heaven that are not first saints on earth. We need no more to make us happy than to have our lot among those that are sanctified, to fare as they fare. Those who are sanctified shall be glorified. Let us therefore now cast in our lot among them. We are sanctified and saved by faith in Christ. Some refer it to the word next before, sanctified by faith, for faith purifies the heart. Others refer it to the receiving of both pardon and the inheritance. It comes all to one; for it is by faith that we are justified, sanctified, and glorified. By faith, that faith which is in me; it is emphatically expressed. That faith which in a particular manner fastens upon Jesus Christ and his mediation, by which we rely upon Christ, and resign ourselves to him.

III. He had discharged his ministry by divine aid and under divine direction and protection.

1. God gave him a heart to comply with the call (v. 19): I was not disobedient to the heavenly vision. If Paul had conferred with flesh and blood, and been swayed by his secular interest, he would have done as Jonah did, gone anywhere rather than upon this errand. He accepted his commission and he applied himself to act accordingly.

2. God enabled him to go through a great deal of work, though in it he grappled with a great deal of difficulty, v. 20. He applied himself to the preaching of the gospel with all vigour. He began at Damascus, where he was converted. When he came to Jerusalem, where he had his education, he there witnessed for Christ, where he had most furiously set himself against him. He preached throughout all the coasts of Judæa; he made the first offer of the gospel to the Jews, as Christ had appointed, and did not leave them till they had wilfully thrust the gospel from them. He turned to the Gentiles.

3. His preaching was all practical. He showed them that they ought, (1) To repent of their sins, to be sorry for them, and enter into covenant against them. They ought to change their mind and change their way. (2) To turn to God. They must not only conceive an antipathy to sin, but they must come into a conformity to God; they must turn to God, in love and affection, and return to God in duty and obedience, and turn and return from the world and the flesh. (3) To do works meet for repentance. This was what John preached, who was the first gospel preacher, Matt. iii. 8. Those that profess repentance must practise it, must live a life of repentance. It is not enough to speak penitent words, but we must do works agreeable to those words. Now what fault could be found with such preaching as this?

4. The Jews had no quarrel with him but upon this account, that he did all he could to persuade people to be religious, and to bring them to God by bringing them to Christ (v. 21): It was for these causes, and no other, that the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me; and let anyone judge whether these were crimes worthy of death or of bonds. They caught him in the temple worshipping God, and there they set upon him, as if the better place the better deed.

5. He had no help but from heaven (v. 22): "Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day. I have stood to what I said, and have not been afraid nor ashamed to persist in it." What was it that bore him up? Not any strength of his own resolutions, but having obtained help of God. He could not have gone on in it, but by help obtained of God. Those who are employed in work for God shall obtain help from God. Our continuance to this day must be attributed to help obtained of God. The preachers of the gospel could never have done as they did, if they had not had immediate help from heaven.

6. He preached no doctrine but what agreed with the scriptures of the Old Testament: He witnessed both to small and great. It was an evidence of the grace of the gospel that it was witnessed to the meanest, and the poor were welcome to the knowledge of it; and of the incontestable truth of it that it was neither afraid nor ashamed to show itself to the greatest. The enemies of Paul objected against him that he preached something more than that men should repent, and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance. Besides these, he had preached Christ, and his death, and his resurrection, and this was what they quarrelled with him for. "And so I did," says Paul, "and so I do, but therein also I say no other than that which Moses and the prophets said should come; and what greater honour can be done to them than to show that what they foretold is accomplished?" Three things they prophesied, and Paul preached: (1) That Christ should suffer, that the Messiah should be a sufferer. His ignominious death should be not only consistent with, but pursuant of, his undertaking. The cross of Christ was a stumbling-block to the Jews; but Paul stands to it that, in preaching that, he preached the fulfilling of the Old Testament predictions. (2) That he should be the first that should rise from the dead; that he should be the chief of the resurrection, the head, or principal one. He was the first that rose from the dead to die no more. (3) That he should show light unto the people, and to the Gentiles, to the people of the Jews in the first place. To them he showed light by himself, and then to the Gentiles by the ministry of his apostles. In this Paul refers to his commission (v. 18), To turn them from darkness to light. He rose from the dead on purpose that he might show light to the people. This also was foretold by the Old Testament prophets, that the Gentiles should be brought to the knowledge of God by the Messiah; and what was there in all this that the Jews could justly be displeased at?

We have reason to think that Paul had a great deal more to say. He had just fallen upon that which was the life of the cause—the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Lead him but to this subject and he will never know when to conclude; for the power of Christ's death, and the fellowship of his sufferings, are with him inexhaustible subjects. It was a thousand pities then that he should be interrupted, and that, being permitted to speak for himself (v. 1), he should not be permitted to say all he designed.

I. Festus, the Roman governor, is of opinion that the poor man is crazed. He takes him to be a lunatic, a distracted man, that should be pitied, but at the same time should not be heeded. He thinks he has found out an expedient to excuse himself both from condemning Paul as a prisoner and from believing him as a preacher; for, if he be not compos mentis—in his senses, he is not to be either condemned or credited.

1. What it was that Festus said of him (v. 24): He said with a loud voice that he might oblige Paul to break off his discourse, and might divert the auditors from attending to it: "Paul, thou art beside thyself. Much learning hath made thee mad, thou hast cracked thy brains with studying." This he speaks, not so much in anger, as in scorn and contempt. He did not understand what Paul said; it was all a riddle to him, and therefore he imputes it all to a heated imagination. He owns Paul to be a scholar, and a man of learning. The apostles, who were fishermen, were despised because they had no learning; Paul who was a university-man, is despised as having too much learning. Thus the enemies of Christ's ministers will always have something or other to upbraid them with. He reproaches him as a madman. John Baptist and Christ were represented as having a devil, as being crazed. Festus put this invidious character upon him, which perhaps never a one in the company but himself thought of.

2. How Paul cleared himself from this invidious imputation. He denies the charge, protesting that there was neither ground nor colour for it (v. 25): "I am not mad, most noble Festus. I do not ramble, but speak the words of truth and soberness." He gives him all possible respect, compliments him with his title of honour, most noble Festus, to teach us not to render railing for railing, but to speak civilly to those who speak slightly of us. He appeals to Agrippa concerning what he spoke (v. 26): For the king knows of these things. He therefore spoke freely before him, who knew something of them, and therefore would be willing to know more: For I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him. This thing was not done in a corner; all the country rang of it, and therefore it was unreasonable to censure him as a distracted man for relating it, much more for speaking of the death and resurrection of Christ, which was so universally spoken of. Agrippa could not be ignorant of it, and it was a shame for Festus that he was so.

II. Agrippa is so far from thinking him a madman that he thinks, he never heard a man talk more to the purpose.

1. Paul applies himself closely to Agrippa's conscience. He will speak to those who understand him, and whom he is likely to fasten something upon, and therefore still addresses Agrippa: "King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets?" He does not stay for an answer, but, in compliment to Agrippa, takes it for granted: I know that thou believest; for everyone knew that Agrippa professed the Jews' religion, and therefore both knew the writings of the prophets and gave credit to them. It is good dealing with those who have acquaintance with the scriptures and believe them; for such one has some hold of.

2. Agrippa owns there was a great deal of reason in what Paul said (v. 28): Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian. Some understand this as spoken ironically, Wouldest thou in so little a time persuade me to be a Christian? But, taking it so, it is an acknowledgment that Paul spoke very much to the purpose. Others take it as spoken seriously. He is as near being persuaded to believe in Christ as Felix, when he trembled, was to leave his sins. Many are almost persuaded to be religious who are not quite persuaded; they are under strong convictions, but yet are overruled by some external inducements, and do not pursue their convictions.

3. Paul concludes with a pious wish that all his hearers were Christians, and this wish turned into a prayer: I pray to God for it (v. 29). That not only thou but all that hear me this day were both almost, and altogether, such as I am, except these bonds. He professes his resolution to cleave to his religion. In wishing that they were all as he was, he does in effect declare against ever being as they were, how much soever it might be to his worldly advantage. He intimates his satisfaction not only in the truth, but in the benefit and advantage of Christianity. He could not wish better to the best friend he had in the world than to wish him a faithful zealous disciple of Jesus Christ. He intimates his trouble and concern that Agrippa went no further than being almost a Christian (what good would that do?). He intimates that it would be the unspeakable happiness of every one of them to become true Christians—that there is grace enough in Christ for all, be they ever so many. He intimates the hearty goodwill he bore to them all; he wishes them, (1) As well as he wished his own soul. (2) Better than he now was as to his outward condition. He wishes they might all be comforted Christians as he was, but not persecuted Christians as he was. When he wished them in bonds to Christ, he desired they might never be in bonds for Christ. Nothing could be said more tenderly nor with a better grace.

III. They all agree that Paul is an innocent man. The court broke up with some precipitation (v. 30): When he had spoken the king was afraid he would say something yet more moving. The king himself found his own heart begin to yield, and durst not trust himself to hear more, but, like Felix, dismissed Paul for this time. The king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice and those that sat with them. They all concurred in an opinion of Paul's innocency, v. 31. The court withdrew to consult, and they talked among themselves, all to the same purport, that this man does nothing worthy of death; nay, he does nothing worthy of bonds. Thus was he made manifest in the consciences of those who yet would not receive his doctrine; and the clamours of the hot-headed Jews, who cried out, Away with him, it is not fit he should live, were shamed by the moderate counsels of this court. Agrippa gave his judgment that he might have been set at liberty, if he had not himself appealed to Cæsar (v. 32), but by that appeal he had put a bar in his own door. Agrippa, who was but almost persuaded to be a Christian, proves no better than if he had not been at all persuaded. And now I cannot tell whether Paul repented of his having appealed to Cæsar, now he saw that was the only thing that hindered his discharge. What we think is for our welfare often proves to be a trap; such short-sighted creatures are we. Or whether, notwithstanding this, he was satisfied in what he had done, and believed there was a providence in it, and it would issue well at last. And besides, he was told in a vision that he must bear witness at Rome, ch. xxiii. 11. And it is all one to him whether he goes thither a prisoner or at his liberty.

CHAP. XXVII

An account of Paul's voyage towards Rome. I. The beginning of the voyage was calm and prosperous, ver. 1–8. II. Paul gave them notice of a storm coming, ver. 9–11. III. They met with a great deal of tempestuous weather, and they counted upon nothing but being cast away, ver. 12–20. IV. Paul assured them that by the good providence of God, they should be brought safely through it, ver. 21–26. V. At length they were at midnight thrown upon an island, which proved to be Malta, ver. 27–36. VI. Their narrow escape with their lives, when the ship was wrecked, but all the persons wonderfully preserved, ver. 37–44.

I. How Paul was shipped off for Italy: a long voyage, but there is no remedy. He has appealed to Cæsar, and to Cæsar he must go: It was determined that we should sail into Italy. It was determined by the counsel of God, before it was determined by the council of Festus, that Paul should go to Rome; for God had work for him to do there. Whose custody he was committed to—to one named Julius, a centurion of Augustus's band. He had soldiers under him, who were a guard upon Paul. What bottom he embarked in: they went on board a ship of Adramyttium (v. 2), a sea-port of Africa. What company he had in this voyage; there were some prisoners who were committed to the custody of the same centurion. Paul was linked with these, as Christ with the thieves that were crucified with him, and was obliged to take his lot with them in this voyage; and we find (v. 42) that for their sakes he had like to have been killed, but for his sake they were preserved. But he had also some of his friends with him, Luke particularly, for he puts himself in all along, We sailed into Italy, and, We launched, v. 2. Aristarchus, a Thessalonian, is particularly named, as being now in his company. It was a comfort to Paul to have the society of some of his friends in this tedious voyage. Those that go long voyages at sea have need of wisdom, that they may do good to the bad company they are in, may make them better, or at least be made never the worse by them.

II. What course they steered, and what places they touched at. They touched at Sidon, thither they came the next day. Julius the centurion was extraordinarily civil to Paul. It is probable that he was one of the chief captains, or principal men, that heard him plead his own cause before Agrippa (ch. xxv. 23), and was convinced of his innocency. Though Paul was committed to him as a prisoner, he treated him as a friend, as a gentleman. He gave him liberty to go among his friends to refresh himself. Julius herein gives an example to those in power to be respectful to those whom they find worthy of their respect. God herein encourages those that suffer for him to trust in him; for he can put it into the hearts of those to befriend them from whom they least expect it. And it is likewise an instance of Paul's fidelity. He did not go about to make his escape. If the centurion is so civil as to take his word, he is so just and honest as to keep his word. They thence sailed under Cyprus, v. 4. If the wind had been fair, they had left Cyprus on the right hand; but, the wind not favouring them, they were driven to sailing with a side wind, and left it on the left hand. Sailors must do as they can, when they cannot do as they would, and make the best of their wind, whatever point it is in; so must we all in our passage over the ocean of this world. At a port called Myra they changed their ship. They went on board a vessel of Alexandria bound for Italy, v. 5, 6. Great trading there was between that city and Italy; from Alexandria they carried corn to Rome, and the East-India goods and Persian which they imported at the Red Sea they exported again, especially to Italy. And it was a particular favour shown to the Alexandrian ships in the ports of Italy that they were not obliged to strike sail, when they came into port. With much ado they made The Fair Havens, a port of the island of Crete, v. 7, 8. They sailed slowly many days. It was a great while before they made the point of Cnidus, and were forced to sail under Crete, as before under Cyprus; much difficulty they met with in passing by Salmone, a promontory on the eastern shore of the island of Crete. Though the voyage hitherto was not tempestuous, yet it was very tedious. Thus many that are not driven backward in their affairs by cross providences, yet sail slowly, and do not get forward by favourable providences. The place they came to was called The Fair Havens. It is known to this day by the same name, and answers the name from the pleasantness of its situation and prospect. It was not the harbour they were bound for; it was a fair haven, but it was not their haven. It was not a commodious haven to winter in, v. 12. Every fair haven is not a safe haven; nay, there may be most danger where there is most pleasure.

III. What advice Paul gave them—it was to be content to winter where they were. They had lost a deal of time while they were struggling with contrary winds. Sailing was now dangerous, because the fast was already past, that is, the famous yearly fast of the Jews, the day of atonement, which was on the tenth day of the seventh month; it was about the 20th of our September. But (which is strange) we never have any mention made in all the scripture history of the observance of it, unless it be meant here, where it serves only to describe the season of the year. Michaelmas is reckoned by mariners as bad a time of the year to be at sea in as any other. Paul put them in mind of it, and gave them notice of their danger (v. 10): "I perceive that this voyage will be with hurt and damage." There were some good men in the ship, and many more bad men: but in things of this nature all things come alike to all. If both be in the same ship, they both are in the same danger. They would not be advised by Paul in this matter, v. 11. They thought him impertinent in interposing in an affair of this nature, and the centurion to whom it was referred to determine it, takes upon him to overrule. The centurion gave more regard to the opinion of the master and owner of the ship than to Paul's; for every man is to be credited in his own profession. The centurion was very civil to Paul (v. 3), and yet would not be governed by his advice.

I. The ship putting to sea again, at first with a promising gale. What induced them to leave the fair havens: it was because they thought the harbour not commodious to winter in. They ran upon a mischief to avoid an inconvenience, as we often do. Some of the ship's crew were for staying there. It is better to be safe in an incommodious harbour than to be lost in a tempestuous sea. But they were outvoted, and the greater part advised to depart thence also; yet they aimed not to go far, but only to another port of the same island, here called Phenice. It is here described to lie towards the south-west and north-west. Probably the haven was between two promontories, one of which pointed to the north-west and the other to the south-west, by which it was guarded against the east winds. In vain had nature provided for us the waters to sail on, if it had not likewise provided for us natural harbours to take shelter in. What encouragement they had at first to pursue their voyage. They set out with a fair wind (v. 13), the south wind blew softly, upon which they flattered themselves with hope that they should gain their point, and so they sailed close by the coast of Crete. Those who put to sea with ever so fair a gale know not what storms they may yet meet with, and therefore must not be secure.

II. The ship in a storm presently, a dreadful storm. They imagined that because the south wind now blew softly it would always blow so; in confidence of this, they ventured to sea, but were soon made sensible of their folly in giving more credit to a smiling wind than to the word of God in Paul's mouth.

1. What their danger and distress was. There arose against them a tempestuous wind. This wind the sailors called Euroclydon, a north-east wind, which upon those seas was in a particular manner troublesome and dangerous. The ship was exceedingly tossed (v. 18); it was kicked like a football from wave to wave. The ship could not possibly bear up into the wind, and therefore they folded up their sails, which in such a storm would endanger them rather than do them any service, and so let the ship drive. It is probable that they were very near the haven of Phenice, and thought they should presently be in a quiet haven, and lo, of a sudden, they are in this distress. The use of the loadstone for the direction of sailors not being then found out (so that they had no guide at all, when they could see neither sun nor stars) made the case the more hazardous. Thus melancholy sometimes is the condition of the people of God upon a spiritual account. Thus it may be with them, and yet light is sown for them. They had abundance of winter-weather: No small tempest, so that they were ready to perish for cold; and all this continued many days. See what hardships those often undergo who are much at sea, besides the hazards of life they run; and yet to get gain there are still those who make nothing of all this; and it is an instance of divine Providence that it disposes some to this employment, notwithstanding the difficulties that attend it. Perhaps Christ therefore chose ministers from among seafaring men, because they had been used to endure hardness.

2. What means they used for their own relief. When they could not make head against the wind, they let the ship run adrift. When it is fruitless to struggle, it is wisdom to yield. They nevertheless did what they could to avoid the present danger; there was a little island called Clauda. They took care to prevent their shipwreck, and therefore so ordered their matters that they did not run against the island, but quietly ran under it, v. 16. When they were afraid they should scarcely save the ship, they were busy to save the boat. They had much work to come by the boat (v. 16), but at last they took it up, v. 17. They used means which were proper enough in those times; they undergirded the ship, v. 17. They bound the ship under the bottom of it with strong cables, to keep it from bulging in the extremity of the tempest. For fear of falling into the quicksands they struck sail, and then let the ship go as it would. It is strange how a ship will live at sea (so they express it), even in very stormy weather, if it have but sea-room. The next day they lightened the ship of its cargo, threw the goods and merchandise overboard. See what the wealth of this world is; the time may come when it will be a burden, not only too heavy to be carried safe of itself, but heavy enough to sink him that has it. But see the folly of the children of this world, they can be thus prodigal of their goods when it is for the saving of their lives, and yet how sparing of them in works of piety and charity, and in suffering for Christ. Any man will rather make shipwreck of his goods than of his life; but many will rather make shipwreck of faith and a good conscience than of their goods. The third day they cast out the tacklings of the ship.

3. The despair which at last they were brought to (v. 20): All hope that we should be saved was then taken away. The storm continued, and they saw no symptoms of its abatement. The means they had used were ineffectual, so that they were at their wits' end; and they had no heart either to eat or drink. They had provision enough on board (v. 38), but such bondage were they under, through fear of death, that they could not admit the supports of life.

We have here the issue of the distress of Paul and his fellow-travellers; they escaped with their lives and that was all. We are here told (v. 37) what number there were on board—in all two hundred and seventy-six souls, and one Paul among them worth more than all the rest. We left them in despair, giving up themselves for gone. Paul among these seamen was not, like Jonah, the cause of the storm, but the comforter in the storm.

I. The encouragement Paul gave them, by assuring them that their lives should all be saved. Paul rescued them from their despair first, that they might not die of that, and then they were in a fair way to be rescued from their distress. After long abstinence, Paul stood forth in the midst of them. During the distress hitherto Paul was one of the crowd, helping with the rest to throw out the tackling (v. 19), but now though a prisoner, he undertook to be their counsellor and comforter.

1. He reproves them for not taking his advice (v. 8): "You should have hearkened to me and not have loosed from Crete, and then we should not have gained this harm and loss." They did not hearken to Paul when he warned them of their danger, and yet he will speak comfort and relief to them now that they are in danger, so compassionate is God to those that are in misery, though they bring themselves into it by their own wilfulness. Paul, before administering comfort, will first make them sensible of their sin in not hearkening to him. That which they are blamed for is their loosing from Crete, where they were safe. Most people bring themselves into inconvenience, because they do not know when they are well off, by aiming against advice to better themselves.

2. He assures them that though they should lose the ship yet they should none of them lose their lives. "Your case is sad, but it is not desperate, now, I exhort you to be of good cheer." Thus we say to sinners that are convinced of their sin and folly, "You should have hearkened unto us, and should have had nothing to do with sin; yet now we exhort you to be of good cheer: though you would not take our advice when we said, Do not presume, yet take it now when we say, Do not despair." They would use no further means, because all hope that they should be saved was taken away. Now Paul quickens them to bestir themselves. If they would resume their vigour they should secure their lives. They must count upon the loss of the ship. Their ship shall be wrecked. Not a life shall be lost. This would be good news to those that were ready to die for fear of dying.

3. He tells them what ground he had for this assurance, he has a divine revelation for it. An angel of God appeared to him in the night, and told him that for his sake they should all be preserved (v. 23–25). They should have it not only by providence, but by promise, and as a particular favour to Paul.

(1) The solemn profession Paul makes of relation to God. It is he whose I am, and whom I serve. He looks upon God, as his rightful owner, who has a sovereign incontestable title to him, and dominion over him: Whose I am. We are more his than our own. As his sovereign ruler and master, who has right to give him law: Whom I serve. Because his we are, therefore we are bound to serve him. He does not say, "Whose we are, and whom we serve," for most that were present were strangers to him. This he tells the company, that they might thereby be drawn in to take him for their God, and to serve him likewise.

(2) The account he gives of the vision he had: There stood by me this night an angel of God. Though he was afar off upon the sea (Ps. lxv. 5), yet this could not intercept his communion with God. Thence he can direct a prayer to God, and thither God can direct an angel to him. The ship is tossed with winds and waves, and yet the angel finds a way into it. No storms nor tempests can hinder the communications of God's favour to his people, for he is a very present help. We may suppose that Paul, being a prisoner, had not a cabin of his own in the ship, but was put down into the hold (any dark or dirty place was thought good enough for him in common with the rest of the prisoners), and yet there the angel of God stood by him. Meanness and poverty set none at a distance from God and his favour. Paul had this vision but this last night. He has this fresh vision to assure him of the safety of those with him.

(3) The encouragements that were given him in the vision, v. 14. [1] He is forbidden to fear. Though all about him are at their wits' end, and lost in despair, yet, Fear not, Paul. Let not the saints be afraid, no, not at sea, in a storm; for the Lord of hosts is with them. [2] He is assured that he shall come safely to Rome: Thou must be brought before Cæsar. The rage of the most stormy sea, cannot prevail against God's witnesses till they have finished their testimony. This is comfortable for the faithful servants of God in straits and difficulties, that as long as God has any work for them to do their lives shall be prolonged. [3] For his sake all that were in the ship with him should be delivered too: God hath given thee all those that sail with thee. God chooses by preserving them all for his sake, to show what great blessings good men are to the world. Paul here delivers a whole ship's crew, almost three hundred souls. God often spares wicked people for the sake of the godly. The good people are hated and persecuted in the world as if they were not worthy to live in it, yet really it is for their sakes that the world stands. It was a great favour to Paul, and he looked upon it to be so, that others were saved for his sake: They are given thee. There is no greater satisfaction to a good man than to know that he is a public blessing.

4. He comforts them (v. 25): "Wherefore, sirs, be of good cheer, for I believe God, that it shall be even as it was told me." He would not require them to give credit to that to which he did not himself give credit; and therefore solemnly professes that he believes it himself. And shall it be as God hath said? Then be of good cheer, be of good courage. If with God saying and doing are not two things, then with us believing and enjoying should not be.

5. He gives them a sign, telling them particularly what this tempestuous voyage would issue in (v. 26): "We must be cast upon a certain island, and that will both break the ship and save the passengers." Providence undertakes to bring them to an island that shall be a refuge for them.

II. Their coming at length to an anchor upon an unknown shore, v. 27–29. They had been a full fortnight in the storm, continually expecting death: The fourteenth night they came near land; they were that night driven up and down in Adria, in the Adriatic Sea, a part of the Mediterranean, extending to the African shore; and knew not whereabouts they were. About midnight the mariners apprehended that they drew near to some shore. To try whether it was so or no, they sounded; the water would be shallower as they drew near to shore; by the first experiment they found they drew twenty fathoms deep of water, and by the next fifteen fathoms, which was a demonstration that they were near some shore. They took the hint, and, fearing rocks near the shore, they cast anchor, and wished for the day. When they had light, there was no land to be seen. Now they had no light to see by; no marvel then they wished for day. When those that fear God walk in darkness, and have no light, let them do as these mariners did, cast anchor, and wish for the day, and be assured that the day will dawn.

III. The defeating of the sailors' attempt to quit the ship. 1. The treacherous design of the seamen, and that was to leave the sinking ship (v. 30): They were about to flee out of the ship, and to save themselves, and leave all the rest to perish. They pretended they would cast anchors out of the fore-ship, and in order to this they let down the boat, and were going into it. Paul had, in God's name, assured them that they should come safely to land, but they will rather trust their own refuge of lies than God's word and truth. 2. Paul's discovery of it, v. 31. Paul saw through it, and gave notice to the centurion and the soldiers concerning it, and told them plainly, Except these abide in the ship, you cannot be saved. Now the greatest difficulty of all was before them, and therefore the seamen were now more necessary than ever yet. Now that they are near land, they must use their art to bring the ship to it. When God has done that for us which we could not, we must then in his strength help ourselves. God, who appointed the end, that they should be saved, appointed the means, that they should be saved by the help of these seamen. Duty is ours, events are God's; and we do not trust God, but tempt him, when we do not use proper means, such as are within our power, for our own preservation. 3. The effectual defeat of it by the soldiers, v. 32. It was no time to stand arguing the case with the seamen, and therefore they made no more ado, but cut the ropes of the boat to let it fall off. And now the seamen, being forced to stay in the ship, are forced likewise to work for the safety of the ship, because if the rest perish they must perish with them.

IV. The new life which Paul put into the company. Happy they who had such a one as Paul in their company. The day was coming on. The dawning of the day revived them a little, and then Paul got them together. He chid them for their neglect of themselves: This is the fourteenth day that you have tarried, and continued fasting, having taken nothing, v. 33. They ate very little, next to nothing. "You have continued fasting, that is, you have lost your stomach; you have had no appetite at all to your food, nor any relish of it, through prevailing fear and despair." What folly it is to die for fear of dying! He courts them to their food (v. 34): "Wherefore I pray you to take some meat. We have a hard struggle before us; if our bodies be weak through fasting, we shall not be able to help ourselves." Paul will have these people eat, or otherwise the waves will be too hard for them: I pray you take some nourishment; for this is for your health, or rather your preservation, or safety, at this time. You cannot without nourishment have strength to shift for your lives. As he that will not labour, let him not eat; so he that means to labour must eat. Weak and trembling Christians, that give way to doubts and fears, continue fasting from the Lord's supper, and fasting from divine consolations, and then complain they cannot go on in their spiritual work: and it is owing to themselves. If they would feed and feast as they ought, they would be strengthened, and it would be for their souls' health and salvation. He assured them of their preservation: There shall not a hair fall from the head of any of you. "You cannot eat for fear of dying; I tell you, you are sure of living, and therefore eat." He himself spread their table for them: When he had thus spoken, he took bread. They were not reduced to short allowance, they had plenty, but what good did that do them, when they had no stomach? We have reason to be thankful to God that we have not only food to our appetite, but appetite to our food. He was chaplain to the ship, and they had reason to be proud of their chaplain. He gave thanks to God in presence of them all. Whether he had before this prayed with the whole company promiscuously is not certain. Now he gave thanks to God, in presence of them all, that they were alive, and that they had a promise that their lives should be preserved; he gave thanks for the provision they had, and begged a blessing upon it. We must in everything give thanks; and must particularly have an eye to God in receiving our food. He gave thanks in presence of them all, not only to show that he served a Master he was not ashamed of, but to invite them into his service too. If we crave a blessing upon our meat, and give thanks for it in a right manner, we shall credit our profession, and recommend it to the good opinion of others. He set them a good example: When he had given thanks, he broke the bread (it was sea-biscuit) and he began to eat. Whether they would be encouraged or no, he would. He would eat his meat, and be thankful. The most effectual way of preaching is by example. It had a happy influence upon them all (v. 36): Then were they all of good cheer. They then ventured to believe the message God sent them by Paul when they plainly perceived that Paul believed it himself. It is an encouragement to people to commit themselves to Christ as their Saviour when those who invite them to do so make it to appear that they do so themselves. It is here that the number of the persons is set down: they were in all two hundred threescore and sixteen souls. See how many may be influenced by the good example of one. They did all eat, nay, they did all eat enough (v. 38). They once more lightened the ship. They had before thrown the wares and the tackle overboard, and now the wheat; better they should sink the food than that it should sink them. We may ourselves be under a necessity of throwing that away to save our lives which we had gathered and laid up for the support of our lives.

V. Their putting to shore, and the staving of the ship in the adventure. When it was quite day they began to look about them. They knew not where they were; they could not tell what country it was they were now upon the coast of. It is probable that these seamen had often sailed this way, and yet here they were at a loss. They observed a creek with a level shore, into which they hoped to thrust the ship, v. 39. Though they knew not what country it was, nor whether the inhabitants were civil or barbarous, they determined to cast themselves upon their mercy; it was dry land, which would be very welcome to those that had been so long at sea. It was a pity but they had had some help from the shore. Those who live on the sea-coast have often opportunity of succouring those who are in distress at sea, and of saving precious lives, and they ought to do their utmost in order to it. They made straight to the shore (v. 40): They took up the anchors. They then committed themselves to the sea, and they loosed the rudder-bands, which were fastened during the storm for the greater steadiness of the ship, but, now that they were putting into the port, were loosed, that the pilot might steer with the greater freedom; they then hoisted up the main-sail to the wind, and made towards shore. When they saw the shore they hastened to it as fast as they could, and perhaps made more haste than good speed. And should not a poor soul that has long been struggling with winds and tempests in this world long to put into the safe and quiet haven of everlasting rest? And should it not hoist up the main-sail of faith to the wind of the Spirit, and so with longing desires make to shore? They made a shift among them to run the ship aground, in a shelf or bed of sand, or an isthmus, or neck of land, washed with the sea on both sides, and therefore two seas are said to meet upon it, and there the forepart stuck fast. The hinder part would soon be broken by the violence of the waves. The ship, that had strangely weathered the storm in the vast ocean, where it had room to roll, is dashed to pieces when it sticks fast. Thus if the heart fixes in the world it is lost. Satan's temptations beat against it, and it is gone; but, as long as it keeps above the world, though it be tossed with its cares and tumults, there is hope of it. They had the shore in view, and yet suffered shipwreck in the harbour, to teach us never to be secure.

VI. A particular danger that Paul and the rest of the prisoners were in. In this critical moment the soldiers advised the killing of the prisoners whom they were to give an account of, lest any of them should swim out and escape, v. 42. There was no great danger of that, for they could not escape far, weak and weary as they were; and, under the eye of so many soldiers that had the charge of them, it was not likely they should attempt it. But it was so much the worse that they were thus prodigal of other people's lives when without a miracle of mercy they must lose their own. The centurion, for Paul's sake, quashed this motion. Paul, who was his prisoner, had found favour with him. Julius, though he despised Paul's advice (v. 11), yet, being willing to save Paul, he prevented the execution of that bloody project. As God had saved all in the ship for Paul's sake, so here the centurion saves all the prisoners for his sake; such a diffusive good is a good man.

VII. The saving of the lives of all the persons in the ship. Some were saved by swimming: The centurion commanded his soldiers, as many of them as could swim, to get to land first, and to be ready to receive the prisoners, and prevent their escape. The rest with much ado scrambled to the shore, some on boards, and others on the broken pieces of the ship, and the more busy because they were assured their labour should not be in vain; but so it came to pass that through the good providence of God they escaped all safely to land. They were rescued from the dreaded sea, and brought to the desired haven. Though there be great difficulty in the way of the promised salvation, yet it shall without fail be accomplished; and even the wreck of the ship may furnish out means for the saving of the lives, and, when all seems to be gone, all proves to be safe, though it be on boards, and broken pieces of the ship.

CHAP. XXVIII

After the story of this chapter, we hear no more of him in the sacred history, though we have a great deal of him yet before us in his epistles, and could at last have taken leave of him with the more pleasure if we had left him at liberty; but in this chapter we are to condole with him, and yet congratulate him. I. We condole with him as a poor shipwrecked passenger; and yet congratulate him, 1. As singularly owned by his God in his distress, preserved from receiving hurt by a viper that fastened on his hand (ver. 1–6), and being made an instrument of much good in the island on which they were cast, ver. 7–9. 2. As much respected by the people there, ver. 10. II. We condole with him as a poor confined prisoner (ver. 11–16), and yet we congratulate him, 1. Upon the respect shown him by the Christians at Rome, ver. 15. 2. Upon the favour he found with the captain of the guard, ver. 16. 3. Upon the free conference he had with the Jews at Rome, both about his own affair (ver. 17–22), and upon the subject of the Christian religion in general (ver. 23), the issue of which was that God was glorified, and the apostles justified in preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, ver. 24–29. 4. Upon the undisturbed liberty he had to preach the gospel in his own house for two years together, ver. 30, 31.

What a great variety of places and circumstances do we find Paul in! He was a planet, and not a fixed star. An ill wind indeed it is that blows nobody any good; this ill wind blew good to the island of Melita; for it gave them Paul's company, who was a blessing to every place he came to.

I. The kind reception which the inhabitants of this island gave (v. 2): The barbarous people showed us no little kindness. Providence continues its care of them, and what benefits we receive by the hand of man must be acknowledged to come from the hand of God. As he can make enemies to be at peace, so he can make strangers to be friends, friends in need, and those are friends indeed. 1. The general notice taken of the kindness which the natives of Malta showed. They are called barbarous people, because they did not, in language and customs, conform either to the Greeks or Romans, who looked upon all but themselves as barbarians, though otherwise civilized enough, and perhaps in some cases more civil than they. These barbarous people were full of humanity: They showed us no little kindness. So far were they from making a prey of this shipwreck that they laid hold of it as an opportunity of showing mercy. It is written for our imitation, that we may hence learn to be compassionate to those that are in distress and misery, and to relieve and succour them to the utmost of our ability. If Providence hath so appointed the bounds of our habitation as to give us an opportunity of being frequently serviceable to persons at a loss, we should not place it among the inconveniences of our lot, but the advantages of it. 2. A particular instance of their kindness: They kindled a fire, and they received us every one—made room for us about the fire, and bade us all welcome. Waters from above met those from below, and it rained so hard that this would wet them to the skin presently; and it was a cold rain too, so that they wanted nothing so much as a good fire to warm them, and dry their clothes. Be you warmed, is as necessary as, Be you filled.

II. The further danger that Paul was in by a viper's fastening on his hand.

1. When the fire was to be made, and to be made bigger, Paul was as busy as any of them in gathering sticks, v. 3. Paul was an industrious active man, and loved to be doing when anything was to be done, and would stoop to anything by which he might be serviceable, even to the gathering of sticks to make a fire of. We should be willing to condescend to the meanest offices for the good of our brethren. Those that receive benefit by the fire should help to carry fuel to it.

2. It happened there was a viper among them, that lay as dead till it came to the heat, and then revived, and flew at him that unawares threw it into the fire, and fastened upon his hand, v. 3. As there is a snake under the green grass, so there is often under the dry leaves. See how many perils human life is exposed to, and what danger we are in from the inferior creatures. We often meet with that which is mischievous where we expect that which is beneficial; and many come by hurt when they are honestly employed, and in the way of their duty.

3. The barbarous people concluded that this viper was sent by divine justice to be the avenger of blood. When they saw the venomous animal hang on his hand, they concluded, "No doubt this man is a murderer and therefore, though he has escaped the sea, yet divine vengeance pursues him, and will not suffer him to live."

(1) Some of the discoveries of natural light. They were barbarous people and yet they knew naturally, That there is a God that governs the world and that things do not come to pass by chance but by divine direction. That evil pursues sinners, that there are good works which God will reward and wicked works which he will punish. That murder is a heinous crime, and which shall not long go unpunished. Those that think they shall go unpunished in any evil way will be judged out of the mouth of these barbarians. Learn from these illiterate people that, though malefactors have escaped the vengeance of the sea, yet there is no outrunning divine justice.

(2) Some of the mistakes of natural light. In two things their knowledge was defective: [1] They thought all wicked people were punished in this life. The day of vengeance is to come in the other world, though some are made examples of in this world, to prove that there is a God, yet many are left unpunished, to prove that there is a judgment to come. [2] They thought all who were remarkably afflicted in this life were wicked people. Divine revelation sets this matter in a true light—that all things come ordinarily alike to all, that good men are oftentimes greatly afflicted in this life, for the exercise of their faith and patience.

4. When he shook off the viper from his hand they expected that he would have swollen, or that he would have fallen down dead suddenly. See how apt men are, when once they have got an ill opinion of a man, to abide by it, and to think that God must necessarily confirm their peevish sentence.

III. Paul's deliverance from the danger, and the undue construction the people put upon this. It does not appear that it put him into any fright or confusion at all. He did not shriek or start. Such a wonderful presence of mind he had as no man could have upon such a sudden accident, but by the special aids of divine grace. He shook off the viper into the fire. Thus, in the strength of the grace of Christ, believers shake off the temptations of Satan. When we despise the censures and reproaches of men, having the testimony of conscience for us, then we do, as Paul here, shake off the viper into the fire. It does us no harm. He was none the worse. Those that thought it would have been his death looked a great while, but saw no harm at all come to him. God hereby intended to make way for the entertainment of the gospel among them. They then magnified him as much as before they had vilified him: They changed their minds, and said that he was a god; for they thought it impossible that a mortal man should have a viper hang on his hand so long and be never the worse. See the uncertainty of popular opinion, how it turns with the wind, and how apt it is to run into extremes both ways.

IV. The miraculous cure of an old gentleman that was ill of a fever, and of others, by Paul. The kind entertainment which Publius, the chief man of the island, gave to these distressed strangers; he received them and lodged them three days very courteously. It is happy when God gives a large heart to those to whom he has given a large estate. It became him, who was the chief man of the island, the richest man, to be rich in good works. The illness of the father of Publius: He lay sick of a fever and a bloody flux. Providence ordered it that he should be ill just at this time, that the cure of him might be a present recompence to Publius for his generosity, and a recompence particularly for his kindness to Paul. His cure: Paul took cognizance of his case. He entered in, not as a physician to heal him by medicines, but as an apostle to heal him by miracle; and he prayed for his cure, and then laid his hands on him, and he was perfectly well in an instant. Though he must needs be in years, yet he recovered his health. The cure of many others. If he can heal diseases so effectually, he shall soon have patients enough; and he bade them all welcome. He did not plead that he was a stranger there, thrown accidentally among them, and waiting to be gone by the first opportunity, and therefore might be excused. No, a good man will endeavour to do good wherever the providence of God casts him. Paul thanked God for an opportunity of being useful among them. Hereby he did in effect discharge his quarters, which should encourage us to entertain strangers, for some thereby have entertained angels and some apostles unawares. God will not be behind-hand with any for kindness shown to his people in distress. Never were any people so enriched by a shipwreck on their coasts as these Maltese were.

V. The grateful acknowledgment made of the kindness Paul had done them, v. 10. They honoured us with many honours. They showed them all possible respect. They justly thought nothing too much by which they might testify the esteem they had for them. When we departed, they loaded us with such things as were necessary; they put on board such things as we had occasion for. Paul accepted the kindness of the good people of Melita, not as a fee for his cures (freely he had received, and freely he gave), but as the relief of his wants, and theirs that were with him.

We have here the progress of Paul's voyage towards Rome, and his arrival there at length. After a storm comes a calm: the latter part of his voyage was easy and quiet.

I. Their leaving Malta. When they are refreshed they must put to sea again. The difficulties and discouragements we have met with in our Christian course must not hinder us from pressing forward. The time of their departure: After three months, the three winter months. Better lie by than go forward while the season was dangerous. Paul had warned them against venturing to sea in winter weather, and they would not take the warning; but, now he needed not to warn them. Experience is therefore called the mistress of fools, because those are fools that will not learn till experience has taught them. The ship in which they departed. It was in a ship of Alexandria. This ship had wintered in that isle, and was safe. Here were two ships, both of Alexandria, but one is wrecked there and the other is saved. Events are thus varied, that we may learn both how to want and how to abound. The sign of the ship, which probably gave it its name: it was Castor and Pollux. They hoped they should have better sailing under this badge than they had had before.

II. Their landing in or about Italy, and the pursuing of their journey towards Rome. They landed first at Syracuse in Sicily, the chief city of that island. There they tarried three days. From Syracuse they came to Rhegium, a city in Italy. There, it seems, they stayed one day. It does not appear that they did so much as go ashore, but only came to an anchor in the road. From Rhegium they came to Puteoli, a sea-port town not far from Naples. The ship of Alexandria was bound for that port, and therefore there Paul, and the rest that were bound for Rome, were put ashore, and went the remainder of their way by land. At Puteoli they found brethren. Who brought the knowledge of Christ hither we are not told, but here it was, so wonderfully did the leaven of the gospel diffuse itself. God has many that serve and worship him in places where we little think he has. Though it is probable there were but few brethren in Puteoli, yet Paul found them out. As it were by instinct they got together. Brethren in Christ should find out one another, as those of the same country do in a foreign land. They desired Paul and his companions to tarry with them seven days, that is, to forecast to stay at least one Lord's day with them. Paul was willing to allow them so much of his time; and the centurion agreed to stay one week there, to oblige Paul. From Puteoli they went forward towards Rome. This was their last stage.

III. The meeting which the Christians at Rome gave to Paul.

1. The great honour they did to Paul. They had heard much of his fame and what eminent service he had done to the kingdom of Christ. They had heard of his sufferings, and how God had owned him in them, and therefore thought themselves obliged to show him all possible respect. He had some time ago written a long epistle to them in return for which they showed him this respect. They went to meet him, that they might bring him in state, though he was a prisoner. Some of them went as far as Appiforum, which was fifty-one miles from Rome; others to a place called the Three Taverns. They were so far from being ashamed of him, because he was a prisoner, that for that very reason they counted him worthy of double honour.

2. The great comfort Paul had in this. Now that he was drawing near to Rome he began to have some melancholy thoughts about his appeal to Caesar, and the consequences of it. What things might befall him here he could not tell; but he began to grow dull upon it, till he met with these good people that came from Rome, and when he saw them, (1) He thanked God. If our friends be kind to us, it is God that makes them so, and we must give him the glory of it. When he saw so many Christians that were of Rome, he thanked God that the gospel of Christ had had such wonderful success there in the metropolis of the empire. When we go abroad into the world, and meet with those, even in strange places, that bear up Christ's name, and fear God, we should lift up our hearts to heaven in thanksgiving; blessed be God that there are so many excellent ones on this earth, bad as it is. (2) He took courage. It put new life into him, and now he can enter Rome a prisoner as cheerfully as ever he had entered Jerusalem at liberty. He finds there are those there who love and value him. It is an encouragement to those who are travelling towards heaven to meet with their fellow travellers. When we see the numerous and serious assemblies of good Christians, we should not only give thanks to God, but take courage to ourselves.

IV. The delivering of Paul into custody at Rome, v. 16. He is now come to his journey's end. He is still a prisoner. He had longed to see Rome, but, when he comes there, he is delivered to the captain of the guard, and can see no more of Rome than he will permit him. How many great men had made their entry into Rome, crowned and in triumph, who really were the plagues of their generation! But here a good man makes his entry into Rome, chained and triumphed over as a poor captive. This thought is enough to put one for ever out of conceit with this world. Yet he has some favour shown him. He is a prisoner, but not a close prisoner: Paul was suffered to dwell by himself, and a soldier was appointed to be his guard, who, we hope, let him take all the liberty that could be allowed to a prisoner. This may encourage God's prisoners, that he can give them favour in the eyes of those that carry them captive. If he either makes it easy to them or them easy under it, they have reason to be thankful.

Paul must call his own cause; and here he represents it to the chief of the Jews at Rome, these chief of the Jews were the most distinguished men of that religion. Paul called them together that there might be a good understanding between him and them.

I. What account he gave them of his cause. 1. He professes his own innocency: "I have committed nothing against the people of the Jews; nor have I committed anything against the customs of our fathers." Paul did not impose the customs of the fathers upon the Gentiles: they were never intended for them. But it is as true that he never opposed them in the Jews, but did himself conform to them. 2. He complains of the hard usage he had met with—he was delivered prisoner from Jerusalem into the hands of the Romans. If he had spoken the whole truth in this matter, it would have looked worse upon the Jews, for they would have murdered him if the Romans had not protected him; but, however, they accused him as a criminal, before Felix the governor, in effect, delivering him prisoner into the hands of the Romans. 3. He declares the judgment of the Roman governors concerning him, v. 18. They examined him, enquired into his case. The chief captain examined him, so did Felix, and Festus, and Agrippa, and they could find no cause of death in him; but, on the contrary, would have let him go. Those who most carefully examined his case acquitted him, and none condemned him but unheard, and such as were prejudiced against him. 4. He pleads the necessity he was under to remove his cause to Rome; and that it was only in his own defence, and not with any design to recriminate (v. 19): When the Jews spoke against it he was constrained to appeal unto Caesar. This was all he aimed at in this appeal; not to accuse his nation, but only to vindicate himself. It is an invidious thing to accuse, especially to accuse a nation. Paul made intercession for them, but never against them. The Roman government had at this time an ill opinion of the Jewish nation, and it had been an easy thing to have exasperated the emperor. But Paul would not for ever so much do such a thing; he was for making the best of everybody, and not making bad worse. 5. He puts his sufferings upon the true footing (v. 20): "For this cause I have called for you, not to quarrel with you but to see you and speak with you as my countrymen, because for the hope of Israel I am bound with this chain." He carried the mark of his imprisonment about with him, and probably was chained to the soldier that kept him. He preached that the Messiah was come, he whom Israel hoped for. "Do not all the Jews agree in this, that the Messiah will be the glory of his people Israel? This Messiah I preach, and prove he is come. I preach such a hope in a Messiah already come as must produce a joy in him." He preached that the resurrection of the dead would come. This also was the hope of Israel. "They would have you still expect a Messiah that would free you from the Roman yoke, and make you great and prosperous upon earth. This is what they hate me for,—because I would take you off from the nation of a temporal Messiah, and lead you to that which is the true and real hope of Israel, a spiritual kingdom of holiness and love set up in the hearts of men, to be the pledge of, and preparative for, the joyful resurrection of the dead and the life of the world to come."

II. What was their reply. They own, 1. That they had nothing to say in particular against him; nor had any instructions either by letter or word of mouth (v. 21): "We have neither received letters out of Judæa concerning thee nor have any of the brethren shown or spoken any harm of thee." This was very strange, that that restless rage of the Jews which had followed Paul wherever he went should not follow him to Rome. Some think they told a lie here, and had orders to prosecute him, but durst not own it. But I am apt to think that what they said was true, and Paul now found he had gained the point he aimed at in appealing to Caesar, which was to remove his cause into a court to which they durst not follow it. 2. That they desired to know particularly concerning the religion he took so much pains to propagate in the face of so much opposition (v. 22): We desire to hear of thee what thou thinkest. Though we know little else of Christianity, we know it is a sect everywhere spoken against. This was all they knew concerning the Christian religion, that it was a sect everywhere spoken against. They put it into an ill name, and then ran it down. They looked upon it to be a sect, and this was false. True Christianity establishes that which is of common concern to all mankind, and is not built upon such narrow opinions as sects commonly owe their original to. All its gains are spiritual and eternal. It has a direct tendency to the uniting of the children of men, and not the dividing of them. They said it was everywhere spoken against, and this was too true. It is, and always has been, the lot of Christ's holy religion to be everywhere spoken against.

We have here a short account of a long conference which Paul had with the Jews at Rome about the Christian religion. They were willing to give it a hearing, which was more than the Jews at Jerusalem would do.

I. We are here told how Paul managed this conference. The Jews appointed the time, a day was set for this dispute, v. 23. Those Jews seemed well disposed to receive conviction, and yet it did not prove that they all were so.

1. There were many got together to Paul. Though he was a prisoner yet they were willing to come to him to his lodging. And the confinement he was now under, instead of prejudicing them against his doctrine, ought to confirm it to them; for it was a sign that he thought it worth suffering for. One would visit such a man as Paul in his prison rather than not have instruction from him.

2. He was very full in his discourse with them, seeking their conviction more than his own vindication. He expounded the kingdom of God to them,—showed them the nature of that kingdom, that it is heavenly and spiritual, and shines not in external pomp, but in purity of heart and life. Let but that be expounded to them, and set in a true light, and they will be brought into obedience to it. He not only expounded the kingdom of God, but he testified it,—plainly declared it to them, and confirmed it by incontestable proofs. He attested the extraordinary powers in the kingdom of grace by which it was set up, and the miracles in the kingdom of nature by which it was confirmed. He bore his testimony to it from his own experience of its power. He not only expounded and testified the kingdom of God, but he pressed them with all earnestness to embrace the kingdom of God. He followed his doctrine with a warm and lively applicaton to his hearers. He persuaded them concerning Jesus. The design and tendency of his whole discourse were to bring them to Christ, to convince them of his being the Messiah. He urged upon them the things concerning Jesus, out of the law of Moses and out of the prophets, and showed how they had all had their accomplishment in this Jesus. He dealt with them out of the scriptures of the Old Testament.

3. He was very long; for he continued his discourse from morning till evening. The subject was curious—he was full of it—it was of vast importance —he was in good earnest—he knew not when he should have such another opportunity, and therefore, he kept them all day.

II. What was the effect of this discourse. One would have thought that so good a cause and managed by such a skilful hand as Paul's, could not but carry the day. But it did not prove so: the child Jesus is set for the fall of some and the rising again of others, a foundation stone to some and a stone of stumbling to others. They did not agree among themselves, v. 25. His hearers could not agree about the sense and evidence of what he preached. Some believed the things that were spoken, and some believed not, v. 24. Some are wrought upon by the word, and others hardened; some receive the light, and others shut their eyes against it. So it was among Christ's hearers, some believed and some blasphemed.

III. The awakening word which Paul said to them at parting. He perceived by what they muttered that there were many among them, that were obstinate, and would not yield. "Hold," says Paul, "take one word with you before you go. What do you think will be the effect of your obstinate infidelity? What will it come to?"

1. "You will by the righteous judgment of God be sealed up under unbelief. Turn to that scripture (Isa. vi. 9, 10), and tremble lest the case there described should prove to be your case." As there are in the Old Testament gospel promises, which will be accomplished in all that believe, so there are gospel threatenings of spiritual judgments, which will be fulfilled in those that believe not. Isaiah the prophet is sent to make those worse that would not be made better. Well spoke the Holy Ghost by Esaias the prophet unto our fathers. Though what is there said had in it much of terror to the people and of grief to the prophet, yet it is here said to be well spoken. He that believes not shall be damned is gospel, as well as, He that believes shall be saved, Mark xvi. 16. "Well did Esaias prophesy of you. The Holy Ghost said to your fathers, that which would be fulfilled in you, Hearing you shall hear, and shall not understand." (1) "That which was their great sin against God is yours. Your eyes you have closed," v. 27. "As your fathers would not see God's hand lifted up against them in his judgments, so you will not see God's hand stretched out to you in gospel grace." They did not see, because they were resolved they would not, and none so blind as those that will not see. They have purposely closed their eyes, lest they should see with their eyes the great things which belong to their everlasting peace; will not receive the evidence of them, lest they should hear with their ears. And that which they are afraid of in shutting up their eyes and ears, is, lest they should understand with their heart, and should be converted, and I should heal them. They kept their mind in the dark, or at least in a constant confusion and tumult. God's method is to bring people first to see and hear, and so to understand with their hearts, and then to bow their wills, and so heal them, which is the regular way of dealing with a rational soul; and therefore Satan prevents the conversion of souls to God by blinding the mind and darkening the understanding. And the case is very sad when the sinner joins with him herein, and puts out his own eyes. They are in love with their disease, and are afraid lest God should heal them. This was the sin. (2) "That which was the great judgment of God upon them for this sin is his judgment upon you, and that is, you shall be blind. Hearing you shall hear—but you shall not understand it; because you will not give your minds to understand it, God will not give you strength and grace to understand it. Seeing you shall see but you shall not perceive." What with their resisting the grace of God and rebelling against the light, and God's withdrawing and withholding his grace and light from them,—what with their not receiving the love of the truth, and God's giving them up for that to strong delusions, to believe a lie, the heart of this people is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing. No physic that can be given them operates upon them, and therefore their disease must be adjudged incurable. And how should those be healed that will not be converted to the use of the methods of cure? And how should those be converted that will not be convinced either of their disease or of their remedy? And how should those be convinced that shut their eyes and stop their ears? When once they are thus given up to hardness of heart, they are already in the suburbs of hell.

2. "Your unbelief will justify God in sending the gospel to the Gentile world (v. 28): therefore seeing you put the grace of God away from you, and will not submit to the power of divine truth and love, be it known unto you that the salvation of God is sent unto the Gentiles. They will hear it, and receive it, and be happy in it." Now Paul designs hereby, (1) To abate their displeasure at the preaching of the gospel to the Gentiles, by showing them the absurdity of it. They were angry that the salvation of God was sent to the Gentiles, but, if they thought that salvation of so small a value as not to be worthy of their acceptance, surely they could not grudge it to the Gentiles. The salvation of God was sent into the world, the Jews had the first offer of it, they would not accept the invitation which was given to them first to the wedding-feast and therefore must thank themselves if other guests be invited. (2) To improve their displeasure at the favour done to the Gentiles to their advantage, and to bring good out of that evil. The Jews have rejected the gospel of Christ, but it is not yet too late to repent of their refusal; they may say No, and take it, as the elder brother in the parable, Matt. xxi. 29. Is the gospel sent to the Gentiles? Let us go after it rather than come short of it. And will they hear it, who are thought to be out of hearing? And shall not we hear it, whose privilege it is to have God so nigh to us in all that we call upon him for? Thus he would have them shamed into the belief of the gospel by the welcome it met with among the Gentiles. And, if it had not that effect upon them, it would aggravate their condemnation.

IV. The breaking up of the assembly, as it should seem, in some disorder. They turned their backs upon Paul. When Paul had said these words, he had said enough for them, and they departed, no more affected, either with those terrible words in the close of his discourse or all the comfortable words he had spoken before, than the seats they sat on. They set their faces one against another; for they had great disputes among themselves. Those that agreed to depart from Paul, yet agreed not in the reasons why they departed, but had great reasoning among themselves. Many have great reasoning who yet do not reason right. Nor will men's reasoning among themselves convince them, without the grace of God to open their understandings.

We are here taking our leave of the history of blessed Paul. We should carefully take notice of every particular of the circumstances in which we must here leave him.

I. It cannot but be trouble to us that we must leave him in bonds for Christ. Two whole years of that good man's life are here spent in confinement. He appealed to Cæsar, in hope of a speedy discharge from his imprisonment, and yet he is detained a prisoner. Then his bonds in Christ were manifest in Cæsar's court, as he says, Phil. i. 13. During these two years' imprisonment he wrote his epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians, and to Philemon. How or by what means he obtained his liberty we are not told, only that two years he was a prisoner. Tradition says that after his discharge he went from Italy to Spain, thence to Crete, and so with Timothy into Judæa, and thence went to visit the churches in Asia, and at length came a second time to Rome, and there was beheaded in the last year of Nero. It would grieve one to think that such a useful man as Paul was should be so long in restraint. Two years he was a prisoner under Felix (ch. xxiv. 27), and he is here two years more a prisoner under Nero. How many churches might Paul have planted if he had been at liberty! But God will show that he is no debtor to the most useful instruments he employs, but will carry on his own interest, both without their services and by their sufferings. Even Paul's bonds fell out to the furtherance of the Gospel, Phil. i. 12–14. Yet even Paul's imprisonment was in some respects a kindness to him, for these two years he dwelt in his own hired house, and that was more, for aught I know, than ever he had done before. Such a retirement as this would be a refreshment to one who had been all his days an itinerant. Now he lived for two years in the same house; so that the bringing of him into this prison was like Christ's call to his disciples to come into a desert place, and rest awhile, Mark vi. 31. When he was at liberty, he was in continual fear by reason of the lying in wait of the Jews (ch. xx. 19), but now his prison was his castle.

II. Yet it is a pleasure to us that, though we leave him in bonds for Christ, yet we leave him at work for Christ. His prison becomes a temple, a church, and then it is to him a palace. Thanks be to God, his mouth is not stopped; a faithful zealous minister can better bear any hardship than being silenced. He is bound, but the word of the Lord is not bound. He was glad to see some of them (v. 15), but it would not be half his joy unless he could impart to them some spiritual gift, which here he has an opportunity to do.

1. To whom he preached. Whoever would had liberty to come to his house to hear, and they were welcome. Ministers' doors should be open to such as desire to receive instruction from them. When we cannot do what we would in the service of God we must do what we can. He received all that came to him, and was not afraid of the greatest, nor ashamed of the meanest. He might hope the better to speed because they came in unto him, which supposed a desire to be instructed and a willingness to learn, and where these are it is probable that some good may be done.

2. What he preached. He is God's ambassador, and therefore preaches the kingdom of God. He meddles not with the affairs of the kingdoms of men; let those treat of them whose work it is. He preaches the kingdom of God among men; the same that he defended in his public disputes, testifying the kingdom of God (v. 23), he enforced in his public preaching, as that which will make us all wise and good, wiser and better, which is the end of preaching. He is an agent for Christ, and therefore teaches those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ—the whole history of Christ, all that relates to the mystery of godliness. Paul stuck still to his principle—to know and preach nothing but Christ, and him crucified.

3. With what liberty he preached. Divine grace gave him a liberty of spirit. He preached with all confidence. He was not ashamed of the gospel of Christ. Divine Providence gave him a liberty of speech: No man forbidding him. The Jews that used to forbid him to speak to the Gentiles had no authority here; and the Roman government as yet took no cognizance of the profession of Christianity as a crime. It set bounds to the rage of persecutors; there were many, both Jews and Gentiles, in Rome, that hated Christianity; and yet so it was that Paul though a prisoner was connived at in preaching the gospel. Though there were so many that had it in their power to forbid Paul's preaching, yet God so ordered it, that no man did forbid him. See God here providing comfort for the relief of the persecuted. Though it was not a wide door that was opened to him, yet it was kept open, and it was to many an effectual door, so that there were saints even in Cæsar's household, Phil. iv. 22. When the city of our solemnities is thus made a quiet habitation at any time, we must give thanks to God for it, still longing for that holy mountain in which there shall never be any pricking brier nor grieving thorn.

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO THE

ROMANS

In the Old Testament David's Psalms, and in the New Testament Paul's Epistles, are stars of the first magnitude. We have upon record several particular epistles, more of Paul's than of any other. His apprehension was quick and piercing; his expressions were fluent and copious; his affections very warm and zealous, and his resolutions no less bold and daring: this made him, before his conversion, a very keen and bitter persecutor. He became the most skilful zealous preacher; never any better fitted to win souls, nor more successful.

This epistle to the Romans is placed first, not because of the priority of its date, but because of the superlative excellency of the epistle, it being one of the longest and fullest of all. It is gathered from some passages in the epistle that it was written Anno Christi 56, from Corinth. Paul was now going up to Jerusalem, with the money that was given to the poor saints there; and of that he speaks, ch. xv. 26. The great mysteries treated of in this epistle must needs produce many things dark and hard to be understood, 2 Pet. iii. 16. The former part of it doctrinal, in the first eleven chapters; the latter part practical, in the last five.

I. The doctrinal part of the epistle instructs us,

1. Concerning the way of salvation.

2. Concerning the persons saved, such as belong to the election of grace, Gentiles and Jews. Two things the Jews then stumbled at—justification by faith without the works of the law, and the admission of the Gentiles into the church; and therefore both these he studied to clear and vindicate.

II. The practical part follows.

III. As he draws towards a conclusion, he makes an apology for writing to them, sends particular salutations to many friends there, adds the salutations of his friends with him, and ends with a benediction to them and a doxology to God.

CHAP. I

I. The preface and introduction to the whole epistle, to ver. 16. II. A description of the deplorable condition of the Gentile world, which begins the proof of the doctrine of justification by faith, ver. 17.

Verses 1–7

I. The person who writes the epistle described (v. 1): Paul, a servant of Jesus Christ; this is his title of honour, which he glories in, a servant. Called to be an apostle. Christ sought him to make an apostle of him, Acts ix. 15. He here builds his authority upon his call; he did not run without sending. Called an apostle, as if this were the name he would be called by, though he acknowledged himself not meet to be called so, 1 Cor. xv. 9. Separated to the gospel of God. The Pharisees had their name from separation, because they separated themselves to the study of the law, such a one Paul had formerly been; but now he had changed his studies, was a gospel Pharisee, separated by the counsel of God (Gal. i. 15), separated from his mother's womb. He was an entire devotee to the gospel of God.

II. Having mentioned the gospel of God, he digresses, to give us an encomium of it.

1. The antiquity of it. It was promised before (v. 2); it was of ancient standing in the promises and prophecies of the Old Testament.

2. The subject-matter of it: it is concerning Christ, v. 3, 4. The prophets and apostles all bear witness to him. When Paul mentions Christ, how he heaps up his names and titles, his Son Jesus Christ our Lord. He cannot go on in his discourse without some expression of love and honour, as here, where in one person he shows us his two distinct natures. (1) His human nature: Made of the seed of David (v. 3), that is, born of the virgin Mary, who was of the house of David (Luke i. 27). (2) His divine nature: Declared to be the Son of God (v. 4), according to the Spirit of holiness. According to the flesh, that is, his human nature, he was of the seed of David; but, according to the Spirit of holiness, that is, the divine nature, he is the Son of God. The great proof or demonstration of this is his resurrection from the dead. Those that would not be convinced by that would be convinced by nothing. So that we have here a summary of the gospel doctrine concerning Christ's two natures in one person.

3. The fruit of it (v. 5): By whom we have received grace and apostleship. Paul reckons the apostleship a favour. We may justly reckon it a great favour to be employed in any work or service for God. This apostleship was received for obedience to the faith, that is, to bring people to that obedience. Paul's was for this obedience among all nations, for he was the apostle of the Gentiles. Observe the description here given of the Christian profession: it is obedience to the faith. It does not consist in a notional knowledge, much less does it consist in perverse disputings, but in obedience. The act of faith is the obedience of the understanding to God revealing, and the product of that is the obedience of the will to God commanding. He here speaks of Christianity as an obedience. Christ has a yoke. "Among whom are you, v. 6. You Romans in this stand upon the same level with other Gentile nations of less fame and wealth; you are all one in Christ." No respect of persons with God. The called of Jesus Christ; all those, and those only, are brought to an obedience of the faith that are effectually called of Jesus Christ.

III. The persons to whom it is written (v. 7): To all that are in Rome, beloved of God, called to be saints; that is, to all the professing Christians that were in Rome, bond or free, learned or unlearned. Rich and poor meet together in Christ Jesus. The privilege of Christians: They are beloved of God. He hath a common love to all mankind and a peculiar love for true believers. The duty of Christians; and that is to be holy, for hereunto are they called, called to be saints. Saints, and only saints, are beloved of God with a special and peculiar love. Called saints, saints in profession; it were well if all that are called saints were saints indeed. It will be of little avail at the great day to have been called saints, if we be not really so.

IV. The apostolical benediction (v. 7): Grace to you and peace. It hath not only the affection of a good wish, but the authority of a blessing. The favours desired: Grace and peace. The Old Testament salutation was, Peace be to you; but now grace is prefixed—grace, that is, the favour of God towards us. All gospel blessings are included in these two: grace and peace. Peace, that is, all good. The fountain of those favours, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. All good comes, From God as a Father. We are taught, when we come for grace and peace, to call him our Father. From the Lord Jesus Christ, as Mediator. We have them from his fulness, peace from the fulness of his merit, grace from the fulness of his Spirit.

I. His thanksgiving for them (v. 8): First, I thank my God. It is good to begin everything with blessing God. He speaks this with delight and triumph. Through Jesus Christ. All our duties and performances are pleasing to God only through Jesus Christ, praises as well as prayers.—For you all. We must express our love to our friends, not only by praying for them, but by praising God for them. When some of the Roman Christians met him (Acts xxviii. 15), he thanked God for them, and took courage; but here his true catholic love extends itself further, and he thanks God for them all.—That your faith is spoken of. Wherever he came he heard great commendations of the Christians at Rome, which he mentions, not to make them proud, but to quicken them to answer the general character people gave of them. The greater reputation a man hath for religion, the more careful he should be to preserve it.—Throughout the whole world, that is, the Roman empire. This was indeed a good name, a name for good things with God and good people. It is a desirable thing to be famous for faith. Rome was a city upon a hill, everyone took notice of what was done there. Thus those who have many eyes upon them have need to walk circumspectly, for what they do, good or bad, will be spoken of.

II. His prayer for them, v. 9. Though a famous flourishing church, yet they had need to be prayed for. One of the greatest kindnesses we can do our friends, and sometimes the only kindness that is in the power of our hands, is, by prayer to recommend them to the loving-kindness of God. From Paul's example here we may learn, Constancy in prayer: Always without ceasing. Charity in prayer: I make mention of you. He made express mention of them. It is not unfit sometimes to be express in our prayers for particular churches and places; not to inform God, but to affect ourselves. We are likely to have the most comfort in those friends that we pray most for. He makes a solemn appeal to the searcher of hearts: For God is my witness. It is very comfortable to be able to call God to witness to our constancy in the discharge of a duty. God is particularly a witness to our secret prayers. God, whom I serve with my spirit. Those that serve God with their spirits may, with a humble confidence, appeal to him; hypocrites who rest in bodily exercise cannot. His particular prayer was that he might have an opportunity of paying them a visit (v. 10): Making request, if by any means, &c. The expressions here used intimate that he was very desirous of such an opportunity: if by any means; that he had long and often been disappointed: now at length; and yet that he submitted it to the divine Providence: a prosperous journey by the will of God. Our journeys are prosperous or otherwise according to the will of God, comfortable or not as he pleases.

III. His great desire to see them, with the reasons of it, v. 11–15. Fruitful Christians are as much the joy as barren professors are the grief of faithful ministers. Accordingly, he often purposed to come, but was let hitherto (v. 13), for man purposeth, but God disposeth. Paul was for doing that first, not which was most pleasant (then he would have gone to Rome), but which was most needful.

1. That they might be edified (v. 11): That I may impart unto you. He received, that he might communicate. To the end you may be established. That as they grew upward in the branches they might grow downward in the root. The best saints have need to be more and more established.

2. That he might be comforted, v. 12. What he heard of their flourishing in grace was so much a joy to him that it must needs be much more so to behold it.—By the mutual faith both of you and me. It is very comfortable when there is a mutual confidence between minister and people, they confiding in him as a faithful minister, and he in them as a faithful people. It is very refreshing to Christians to compare notes about their spiritual concerns.—That I might have some fruit, v. 13. The more good he did the greater would his reward be.

3. That he might discharge his trust as the apostle of the Gentiles (v. 14): I am a debtor. His receivings made him a debtor. We should think of this when we covet great things, that all our receivings put us in debt; we are but stewards of our Lord's goods. His office made him a debtor. Paul had improved his talent, and laboured in his work, and done as much good as ever any man did, and yet, he still writes himself debtor.—Debtor to the Greeks, and to the barbarians, to the wise and to the unwise. The Greeks fancied themselves to have the monopoly of wisdom, and looked upon all the rest of the world as barbarians. Paul was a debtor to both, and looked upon himself as obliged to do all the good he could both to the one and to the other. Accordingly, we find him paying his debt, doing good both to Greeks and barbarians. For these reasons he was ready, if he had an opportunity, to preach the gospel at Rome, v. 15. Paul was ready to run the risk at Rome, if called to it: I am ready. It denotes a great readiness of mind. What he did was not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind.

Paul here enters upon a large discourse of justification, describing the deplorable condition of the Gentile world. He was ready to preach the gospel at Rome, for, I am not ashamed of it, v. 16. There is a great deal in the gospel which such a man as Paul might be tempted to be ashamed of, especially that he whose gospel it is was a man hanged upon a tree. Yet Paul was not ashamed to own it. I reckon him a Christian indeed that is neither ashamed of the gospel nor a shame to it.

I. The proposition, v. 16, 17. It reveals to us,

1. The salvation of believers as the end: It is the power of God unto salvation. Paul is not ashamed of the gospel; it shows us the way of salvation. It is through the power of God; without that power the gospel is but a dead letter. It is to those, and those only, that believe. The medicine prepared will not cure the patient if it be not taken.—To the Jew first. The lost sheep of the house of Israel had the first offer made them, both by Christ and his apostles. Upon their refusal the apostles turned to the Gentiles, Acts xiii. 46. Jews and Gentiles now stand upon the same level, both equally welcome to the Saviour. The long-expected Messiah proves a light to enlighten the Gentiles, as well as the glory of his people Israel.

2. The justification of believers as the way (v. 17): For therein is the righteousness of God revealed.

That which will show us the way of salvation must needs show us the way of justification. The gospel makes known a righteousness. There is such a righteousness revealed in the gospel. This evangelical righteousness, (1) Is called the righteousness of God; it is of God's appointing. It is so called to cut off all pretensions to a righteousness resulting from the merit of our own works. It is the righteousness of Christ. (2) It is said to be from faith to faith. From the first faith, by which we are put into a justified state, to after faith, by which we live; from faith engrafting us into Christ, to faith deriving virtue from him as our root: both implied in the next words, The just shall live by faith. Just by faith, there is faith justifying us; live by faith, there is faith maintaining us. Faith is all in all, both in the beginning and progress of a Christian life. It is increasing, continuing, persevering faith. To show that this is no novel upstart doctrine, he quotes for it that famous scripture in the Old Testament: The just shall live by faith. Being justified by faith he shall live by it both the life of grace and of glory. Thus is the evangelical righteousness from faith to faith—from Old Testament faith in a Christ to come to New Testament faith in a Christ already come.

II. The proof of this proposition. Justification must be either by faith or works. It cannot be by works, and therefore he concludes it must be by faith. The apostle, like a skilful surgeon, before he applies the plaster, searches the wound—endeavours first to convince of guilt and wrath, and then to show the way of salvation. This makes the gospel the more welcome. In general (v. 18), the wrath of God is revealed. The light of nature and the light of the law reveal the wrath of God from sin to sin. It is well for us that the gospel reveals the justifying righteousness of God from faith to faith.

1. The sinfulness of man described; he reduceth it to two heads, ungodliness and unrighteousness.

2. The cause of that sinfulness, and that is, holding the truth in unrighteousness. Some ideas they had of the difference of good and evil; but they held them in unrighteousness. They held the truth as a captive or prisoner, that it should not influence them. An unrighteous wicked heart is the dungeon in which many a good truth is detained and buried.

3. The displeasure of God against it: The wrath of God is revealed from heaven; not only in the written word, but in the providences of God, his judgments executed upon sinners. They are a revelation from heaven. Or wrath from heaven is revealed; it is not the wrath of a man like ourselves, but wrath from heaven, therefore the more terrible.

I. The means and helps they had to come to the knowledge of God. Among them he left not himself without witness (Acts xiv. 17).

1. What discoveries they had: That which may be known of God is manifest among them; that is, there were some even among them that had the knowledge of God. That which may be known, which implies that there is a great deal which may not be known. The being of God may be apprehended, but cannot be comprehended. Finite understandings cannot perfectly know an infinite being; but, there is that which may be known.

2. Whence they had these discoveries: God hath shown it to them. Those common natural notions which they had of God were imprinted upon their hearts by the God of nature himself.

3. By what means these discoveries were confirmed, namely, by the work of creation (v. 20): For the invisible things of God, &c.

(1) Observe what they knew: The invisible things of him, even his eternal power and Godhead. The power and Godhead of God are invisible things, and yet are clearly seen in their products. He works in secret but manifests what he has wrought, and therein makes known his power and Godhead. They did come to the knowledge of the Godhead, at least so much knowledge as was sufficient to have kept them from idolatry. This was that truth which they held in unrighteousness.

(2) How they knew it: By the things that are made, which could not make themselves; and therefore must have been produced by some first cause or intelligent agent, which first cause could be no other than an eternal powerful God. The workman is known by his work. The concurrence of all the parts to the good and beauty of the whole, do abundantly prove a Creator and his eternal power and Godhead. Thus did the light shine in the darkness. And this from the creation of the world. To evince this truth, we have recourse to the great work of creation. The date of the discovery. It is as old as the creation of the world. These notices concerning God are ancient truths. The way of the acknowledgment of God is a good old way; it was from the beginning. Truth got the start of error.

II. Their gross idolatry, v. 21–23, 25. We shall the less wonder at the inefficacy of these natural discoveries to prevent the idolatry of the Gentiles if we remember how prone even the Jews were to idolatry; so miserably are the degenerate sons of men plunged in the mire of sense.

1. The inward cause of their idolatry, v. 21, 22. They are therefore without excuse, in that they did know God. Though some have greater light and means of knowledge than others, yet all have enough to leave them inexcusable. They glorified him not as God. To glorify him as God is to glorify him only; but they did not so glorify him, for they set up a multitude of other deities. To glorify him as God is to worship him with spiritual worship; but they made images of him. Not to glorify God as God is in effect not to glorify him at all. Neither were they thankful. Insensibleness of God's mercies is at the bottom of our sinful departures from him. But they became vain in their imaginations, in their reasonings, in their practical inferences. They had a great deal of knowledge of general truths (v. 19), but no prudence to apply them to particular cases. They soon disputed themselves into a thousand vain and foolish fancies. When truth is forsaken, errors multiply. And their foolish heart was darkened. The foolishness and practical wickedness of the heart cloud and darken the intellectual powers and faculties. Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools, v. 22. Those that had the most luxuriant fancy, in framing to themselves the idea of a God, fell into the most gross and absurd conceits. Thus the world by wisdom knew not God. A proud conceit of wisdom is the cause of a great deal of folly. Paul's preaching was no where so laughed at and ridiculed as among the learned Athenians—conceiting themselves to be wise. The plain truth of the being of God would not content them; they thought themselves above that, and so fell into the greatest errors.

2. The outward acts of their idolatry, v. 23–25. (1) Making images of God (v. 23), by which they changed the glory of the incorruptible God. It was the greatest honour God did to man that he made man in the image of God; but it is the greatest dishonour man has done to God that he has made God in the image of man. This is called (v. 25) changing the truth of God into a lie. Idols are called lies, for they belie God, as if he had a body, whereas he is a Spirit. (2) Giving divine honour to the creature: Worshipped and served the creature, besides the Creator. They did in effect disown him by the worship they paid to the creature; for God will be all or none.

Or, above the Creator, thinking the supreme God inaccessible. The sin itself was their worshipping the creature at all; but this is mentioned as an aggravation of the sin, that they worshipped the creature more than the Creator. This was the general wickedness of the Gentile world. Even the wise men among them, who knew and owned a supreme God and were convinced of the nonsense and absurdity of their polytheism and idolatry, yet did as the rest of their neighbours did. I mention this because methinks it doth fully explain that of the apostle here (v. 18): Who hold the truth in unrighteousness. Upon the mention of the dishonour done to God by the idolatry of the Gentiles the apostle expresses himself in an awful adoration of God: Who is blessed for ever. Amen. When we see or hear of any contempt cast upon God or his name, we should think and speak highly and honourably of him. In this as in other things, the worse others are, the better we should be.

III. The judgments of God upon them for this idolatry; not many temporal judgments but spiritual judgments, giving them up to the most brutish and unnatural lusts. He gave them up; it is thrice repeated here, v. 24, 26, 28. Spiritual judgments are of all judgments the sorest. By whom they were given up. God gave them up, in a way of righteous judgment, leaving them to themselves—letting them alone; for his grace is his own, he may give or withhold his grace at pleasure. This we are sure of that it is no new thing for God to give men up to their own hearts' lusts. And yet God is not the author of sin, for, though the greatest wickedness follow upon this giving up, the fault of that is to be laid upon the sinner's wicked heart. If the patient will not submit to the methods prescribed, but wilfully does that which is prejudicial to him, the physician is not to be blamed. The fatal symptoms that follow are not to be imputed to the physician, but to the disease itself and to the folly of the patient. To what they were given up.

1. To uncleanness and vile affections, v. 24, 26, 27. It is (as it is said here) through the lusts of their own hearts—there all the fault is to be laid. Those who dishonoured God were given up to dishonour themselves. A man cannot be delivered up to a greater slavery than to be given up to his own lusts. The particular instances of their uncleanness and vile affections are their unnatural lusts, for which many of the heathen, even of those among them who passed for wise men, were infamous. Perhaps the apostle especially refers to the abominations that were committed in the worship of their idol-gods. Dunghill service for dunghill gods. See what wickedness there is in the nature of man. How much are we beholden to the restraining grace of God! For, were it not for this, man, who was made but little lower than the angels, would make himself a great deal lower than the devils. This is said to be that recompence of their error which was meet.

2. To a reprobate mind in these abominations, v. 28.

(1) They did not like to retain God in their knowledge. The blindness of their understandings was caused by the wilful aversion of their wills and affections. They would neither know nor do anything but just what pleased themselves. There are many that have God in their knowledge, but they do not retain him there. Because it thwarts their lusts; they do not like it. There is a difference between the knowledge and the acknowledgment of God; the pagans knew God, but would not acknowledge him.

(2) Answerable to this wilfulness of theirs God gave them over to a wilfulness in the grossest sins, here called a reprobate mind. See whither a course of sin leads, and into what a gulf it plunges the sinner at last. This reprobate mind was a blind seared conscience, past feeling, Eph. iv. 19. Thus wilful hardness is justly punished with judicial hardness.—To do those things which are not convenient. And here he subjoins a black list of those unbecoming things which the Gentiles were guilty of. No wickedness, so contrary to the light of nature, but a reprobate mind will comply with it. By the histories of those times it appears that these sins here mentioned were reigning national sins. No fewer than twenty-three several sorts of sins and sinners are here specified, v. 29–31. It was time to have the gospel preached among them, for the world had need of reformation.

First, Sins against the first table: Haters of God. Here is the devil in his own colours, sin appearing sin. Every sin has in it a hatred of God. Proud men and boasters put those crowns upon their own heads which must be cast before his throne.

Secondly, Sins against the second table. In general here is a charge of unrighteousness. This is put first, for every sin is unrighteousness. It is especially put for second-table sins, doing as we would not be done by. Against the fifth commandment: Disobedient to parents, and without natural affection. Disobedient children are justly punished with unnatural parents; and unnatural parents with disobedient children. Against the sixth commandment: Wickedness (doing mischief for mischief's sake), maliciousness, envy, murder, debate, malignity, despiteful, implacable, unmerciful; all expressions of that hatred of our brother which is heart-murder. Against the seventh commandment: Fornication. Against the eighth commandment: Unrighteousness, covetousness. Against the ninth commandment: Deceit, whisperers, back-biters, covenant-breakers, inventors of evil things, and without understanding; wise to do evil, and yet having no knowledge to do good. So quick of invention in sin, and yet without understanding (stark fools) in the thoughts of God. Every heart by nature has in it the seed and spawn of all these sins. In the close he mentions the aggravations of the sins, v. 32. 1. They knew the judgment of God. They knew the law. They knew the penalty. They knew that those who commit such things were worthy of death; their own consciences could not but suggest this to them. It is a great aggravation of sin when it is committed against knowledge. It is daring presumption to run upon the sword's point. 2. They not only do the same, but have pleasure in those that do them. To be pleased with other people's sins is to love sin for sin's sake: it is joining in a confederacy for the devil's kingdom. Our own sins are much aggravated by our concurrence with the sins of others.

Now lay all this together, and then say whether the Gentile world could be justified before God by any works of their own.

CHAP. II

The scope of the first two chapters of this epistle may be gathered from ch. iii. 9, "We have before proved both Jews and Gentiles that they are all under sin." In this chapter he proves it upon the Jews. I. Jews and Gentiles stand upon the same level before the justice of God, to ver. 11. II. He shows more particularly what sins the Jews were guilty of, ver. 17, to the end.

Verses 1–16

The apostle had represented the state of the Gentile world to be as bad and black as the Jews were ready enough to pronounce it. Designing to show that the state of the Jews was very bad too, he sets himself to show that God would proceed upon equal terms of justice with Jews and Gentiles.

I. He arraigns them for their censoriousness and self-conceit (v. 1): Thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest. He intends especially the Jews, and to them particularly he applies this general charge, Thou who teachest another teachest thou not thyself? The Jews looked with a great deal of contempt upon the poor Gentiles; while in the meantime they were themselves as bad and immoral—though not idolaters. Therefore thou art inexcusable. If the Gentiles, who had but the light of nature, were inexcusable, much more the Jews, who had the light of the law.

II. He asserts the invariable justice of the divine government, v. 2, 3. He here shows what a righteous God that is with whom we have to do. The judgment of God is according to truth, according to the heart, and not according to the outward appearance, according to the works, and not with respect to persons, for he would not be God if he were not just; but it behoves those especially to consider it who condemn others for those things which they themselves are guilty of, and so think to bribe the divine justice by protesting against sin. As if preaching against sin would atone for the guilt of it. But observe how he puts it to the sinner's conscience (v. 3): Thinkest thou this, O man? The case is so plain that we may venture to appeal to the sinner's own thoughts: "Canst thou think that thou shalt escape the judgment of God? Can the heart-searching God be imposed upon by formal pretences, the righteous Judge of all so bribed?"

III. He draws up a charge against them (v. 4, 5), consisting of two branches:

1. Slighting the goodness of God (v. 4), the riches of his goodness. The more light we sin against the more love we sin against. There is in every wilful sin an interpretative contempt of the goodness of God, particularly the goodness of his patience, taking occasion thence to be so much the more bold in sin. Not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance. What method God takes to bring sinners to repentance. He leads them, not drives them like beasts, allures them; and it is goodness that leads, bands of love. The consideration of the goodness of God, his common goodness to all, should be effectual to bring us all to repentance.

2. Provoking the wrath of God, v. 5. The rise of this provocation is a hard and impenitent heart. To sin is to walk in the way of the heart; and when that is a hard and impenitent heart, how desperate must the course needs be! The provocation is expressed by treasuring up wrath. A treasure denotes abundance. It is a treasure that will be spending to eternity, and yet sinners are still adding to it as to a treasure. A treasure denotes secrecy. It denotes reservation to some further occasion. These treasures will be broken open. They are treasured up against the day of wrath. Though the present day be a day of patience towards sinners, yet there is a day of wrath coming. And that day of wrath will be the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God. The wrath of God is not like our wrath, a heat and passion: but it is a righteous judgment, his will to punish sin. This righteous judgment of God is now many times concealed in the prosperity of sinners, but shortly it will be manifested before all the world.

IV. Having mentioned the righteous judgment of God in v. 5, he here illustrates that judgment, and the righteousness of it.

1. He will render to every man according to his deeds (v. 6).

(1) In dispensing his favours; and this is mentioned twice here, both in v. 7 and v. 10. For he delights to show mercy. The objects of his favour: Those who by patient continuance, &c. Those whom the righteous God will reward are, First, Such as fix to themselves the right end, that seek for glory, and honour, and immortality. There is a holy ambition which is at the bottom of all practical religion, This is looking in our desires and aims as high as heaven, and resolved to take up with nothing short of it. This seeking implies a loss, desire to retrieve it, and pursuits and endeavours consonant to those desires. Secondly, Such as having fixed the right end, adhere to the right way: A patient continuance in well-doing. There must be well-doing, v. 10. It is not enough to know well, and promise well, but we must do well. A continuance in well doing. Not for a fit and a start, like the morning cloud and the early dew; it is perseverance that wins the crown. A patient continuance. This patience respects not only the length of the work, but the difficulties of it. Those that will do well and continue in it must put on a great deal of patience. The product of his favour. He will render to such eternal life. Heaven is life, eternal life, and it is called (v. 10) glory, honour, and peace. Those that seek for the vain glory and honour of this world often miss of them; but those that seek for immortal glory and honour shall have them, and not only glory and honour, but peace. Heavenly glory and honour have peace with them, undisturbed everlasting peace.

(2) In dispensing his frowns (v. 8, 9). The objects of his frowns. Such as are contentious and do not obey the truth. Contentious against God. Every wilful sin is a quarrel with God. Contentious, and do not obey the truth. The truths of religion are not only to be known, but to be obeyed. Disobedience to the truth is interpreted a striving against it. But obey unrighteousness. Those that refuse to be the servants of truth will soon be the slaves of unrighteousness. The products of these frowns: Indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish. These are the wages of sin. And this upon the soul; souls are the vessels of that wrath. Sin qualifies the soul for this wrath. Hell is eternal tribulation and anguish, the product of wrath and indignation. This comes of contending with God. Those that will not bow to his golden sceptre will certainly be broken by his iron rod.

2. There is no respect of persons with God, v. 11. As to the spiritual state, there is a respect of persons; but not as to outward relation or condition. God does not save men with respect to their external privileges, but according as their state and disposition really are. In dispensing both his frowns and favours it is both to Jew and Gentile. If to the Jews first, who had greater privileges, yet also to the Gentiles, whose want of such privileges will neither excuse them from the punishment of their ill-doing nor bar them out from the reward of their well-doing.

V. He proves the equity of his proceedings with all (v. 12–16). Three degrees of light are revealed to the children of men:

1. The light of nature. This the Gentiles have, and by this they shall be judged: As many as have sinned without law shall perish without law; that is, the unbelieving Gentiles, who had no other guide but natural conscience, shall not be reckoned with for the transgression of the law they never had. They shall be judged by the law of nature. The light of nature was to the Gentiles instead of a written law. He had said (v. 12) they had sinned without law, which looks like a contradiction; for where there is no law there is no transgression. But, says he, though they had not the written law, they had that which was equivalent. They had the work of the law. The work of the law is to direct us what to do, and to examine us what we have done. (1) They had that which directed them what to do by the light of nature. They apprehended a clear and vast difference between good and evil. They did by nature the things contained in the law. They had a sense of justice and equity, honour and purity, love and charity. Thus they were a law unto themselves. (2) They had that which examined them as to what they had done: Their conscience also bearing witness. They had that within them which approved what was well done and which reproached them for what was done amiss. Conscience is a witness, and first or last will bear witness, testifying of that which is most secret; and their thought accusing or excusing, passing a judgment upon the testimony of conscience. Conscience is that candle of the Lord which was not quite put out, no, not in the Gentile world. Their thoughts the meanwhile. According as they observed or broke these natural laws and dictates, their consciences did either acquit or condemn them. All this did evince that they had that which was to them instead of a law. So that the guilty Gentiles are left without excuse. God is justified in condemning them. They cannot plead ignorance.

2. The light of the law. This the Jews had, and by this they shall be judged (v. 12): As many as have sinned in the law shall be judged by the law. They sinned in the face and light of so pure and clear a law. These shall be judged by the law; their punishment shall be, as their sin is, so much the greater for their having the law. The Jew first, v. 9. The apostle shows (v. 13) that their having, and hearing, and knowing the law, would not justify them, but their doing it. It was a great privilege that they had the law, but not a saving privilege, unless they lived up to the law they had. We may apply it to the gospel: it is not hearing, but doing that will save us.

3. The light of the gospel: and according to this those that enjoyed the gospel shall be judged (v. 16): According to my gospel; the gospel in general, called Paul's because he was a preacher of it. Some refer those words, according to my gospel, to what he says of the day of judgment. It is good for us to get acquainted with what is revealed concerning that day. There is a day set for a general judgment. The judgment of that day will be put into the hands of Jesus Christ. Nothing speaks more terror to sinners, or more comfort to saints, than this, that Christ shall be the Judge. The secrets of men shall then be judged. That will be the great discovering day.

He had said (v. 13) that not the hearers but the doers of the law are justified; and he here applies that great truth to the Jews.

I. He allows their profession (v. 17–20), that they might see he did not condemn them out of ignorance. He knew the best of their cause.

1. They were a peculiar people, having the written law and the special presence of God among them. Thou art called a Jew. It was a very honourable title. Salvation was of the Jews; and this they were very proud of, and yet many that were so called were the vilest of men. It is no new thing for the worst practices to be shrouded under the best names. And restest in the law. They were mightily puffed up with this privilege, and thought this enough to bring them to heaven, though they did not live up to the law. It is a dangerous thing to rest in external privileges, and not to improve them. And makest thy boast of God. A believing, humble, thankful glorying in God, is the summary of all religion. Boasting in God, and in the outward profession of his name, is the summary of all hypocrisy. Spiritual pride is of all kinds of pride the most dangerous.

2. They were a knowing people (v. 18) and knowest his will. The world will then be set to rights, when God's will is the only will, and all other wills are melted into it. The will of God, that which he would have them do. And approvest the things that are more excellent. A good apprehension in the things of God, reading it thus, Thou discernest things that differ, knowest how to distinguish between good and evil. Good and bad lie sometimes so near together that it is not easy to distinguish them; but the Jews were, or at least thought they were, able to distinguish, to cleave the hair in doubtful cases. Or, we may, understand controversies. A man may be well skilled in the controversies of religion, and yet a stranger to the power of godliness. A warm affection to the things of God, as we read it, Approvest the things that are excellent. There may be a consent of the practical judgment to the law, that it is good, and yet that consent overpowered by the lusts of the flesh, and of the mind:

> I see the better, but pursue the worse.

They got this acqaintance with that which is good, by being instructed out of the law. It was the custom of the Jews to take a great deal of pains in teaching their children, and all their lessons were out of the law; it were well if Christians were but as industrious to teach their children out of the gospel. Now this is called (v. 20), The form of knowledge, and of the truth in the law. A form of knowledge produces but a form of godliness, 2 Tim. iii. 5. A form of knowledge may deceive men, but cannot impose upon the heart-searching God.

3. They were a teaching people, or at least thought themselves so (v. 19, 20): And art confident that thou thyself art a guide of the blind. Apply it, (1) To the Jews in general. They thought themselves guides to the poor blind Gentiles that sat in darkness. All other nations must come to school to them, to learn what is good. (2) To their rabbis, and doctors. The apostle expresses this in several terms, a guide of the blind, a light of those who are in darkness, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, the better to set forth their proud conceit. This was a string they loved to be harping upon. The best work, when it is prided in, is unacceptable to God. It is good to instruct the foolish, but considering our own inability to make these teachings successful without God, there is nothing in it to be proud of.

II. He aggravates their provocations (v. 21–24) from two things:

1. They sinned against their knowledge, did that themselves which they taught others to avoid: Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Teaching is a piece of that charity which begins at home, though it must not end there. The Pharisees pulled down with their lives what they built up with their preaching. The greatest obstructors of the success of the word are those whose bad lives contradict their good doctrine, who in the pulpit preach so well that it is a pity they should ever come out, and out of the pulpit live so ill that it is a pity they should ever come in. He specifies three particular sins that abound among the Jews: (1) Stealing. (2) Adultery, v. 22. Many of the Jewish rabbin are said to have been notorious for this sin. (3) Sacrilege, and this is charged upon those that professed to abhor idols. It was in the latter days of the Old Testament church that they were charged with robbing God in tithes and offerings (Mal. iii. 8, 9), converting that to their own use which was set apart for God. And this is almost equivalent to idolatry.

2. They dishonoured God by their sin, v. 23, 24. While God and his law were an honour to them, which they boasted of, they were a dishonour to God and his law, by giving occasion to those that were without to reflect upon their religion. As it is written, v. 24. He does not mention the place, because he wrote this to those that were instructed in the law. The great evil of the sins of professors is the dishonour done to God and religion by their profession. "Blasphemed through you. The reproaches you bring upon yourselves reflect upon your God, and religion is wounded through your sides." A good caution to professors to walk circumspectly.

III. He asserts the utter insufficiency of their profession to clear them from the guilt of these provocations (v. 25–29): Circumcision verily profiteth, if thou keep the law; that is, obedient Jews shall not lose the reward of their obedience. He is here speaking to the Jews, whose Judaism would benefit them, if they would but live up to the laws of it; but if not "thy circumcision is made uncircumcision. Thou wilt be no more justified than the uncircumcised Gentiles, but more condemned for sinning against greater light."

1. He shows that the uncircumcised Gentiles, if they live up to the light they have, stand upon the same level with the Jews; if they keep the righteousness of the law (v. 26), fulfil the law (v. 27); that is, by submitting sincerely to the conduct of natural light, perform the matter of the law. It seems to be meant of such an obedience as some of the Gentiles did attain to. Doubtless, there were many such instances: and they were the uncircumcision, that kept the righteousness of the law. They were accepted with God. Their uncircumcision was counted for circumcision. Their obedience was a great aggravation of the disobedience of the Jews, v. 27. Judge thee, who by the letter and circumcision dost transgress. To carnal professors the law is but the letter; they read it as a bare writing, but are not ruled by it as a law. External privileges, if they do not do us good, do us hurt. The obedience of those that enjoy less means, and make a less profession, will help to condemn those that enjoy greater means, and make a greater profession, but do not live up to it.

2. He describes the true circumcision, v. 28, 29. It is not that which is outward in the flesh and in the letter. This is not to drive us off from the observances of external institutions (they are good in their place), but from trusting to them and taking up with a name to live, without being alive indeed. He is not a Jew. To be Abraham's children is to do the works of Abraham. It is that which is inward, of the heart, and in the spirit. It is the heart that God looks at. The praise thereof, though it be not of men, who judge according to outward appearance, yet it is of God, for he seeth not as man seeth. Fair pretences and a plausible profession may deceive men: but God sees through shows to realities. This is alike true of Christianity. He is not a Christian that is one outwardly, nor is that baptism which is outward in the flesh.

CHAP. III

1 He answers some objections that might be made against what he had said about the Jews, ver. 1–8. II. He asserts the guilt and corruption of mankind in common, ver. 9–18. III. He argues thence that justification must needs be by faith, and not by the law, ver. 19, to the end.

Verses 1–18

I. Here the apostle answers several objections. Divine truths must be cleared from cavil.

Object. 1. If Jew and Gentile stand so much upon the same level before God, what advantage then hath the Jew? Now does not this levelling doctrine deny them all prerogatives, and reflect dishonour upon the ordinance of circumcision.

Answer. The Jews are, notwithstanding this, a people greatly privileged and honoured (v. 2): Much every way. The door is open to the Gentiles as well as the Jews, but the Jews have a fairer way up to this door. He reckons up many of the Jews' privileges Rom. ix. 4, 5; here he mentions but one that unto them were committed the oracles of God, that is, the scriptures of the Old Testament. The scriptures are the oracles of God: they are a divine revelation. We must have recourse to the law and to the testimony, as to an oracle. Now these oracles were committed to the Jews. The Old Testament was deposited in their hands, to be carefully preserved pure and uncorrupt. The Jews were entrusted with that sacred treasure for their own use and benefit in the first place, and then for the advantage of the world. The Jews had the means of salvation, but they had not the monopoly of salvation. Now this he mentions with a chiefly, this was their prime and principal privilege. The enjoyment of God's word and ordinances is the chief happiness of a people.

Object. 2. To what purpose were the oracles of God committed to them, when so many of them continued strangers to Christ, and enemies to his gospel? Some did not believe, v. 3.

Answer. But shall their unbelief make the faith of God without effect? The apostle startled at such a thought: God forbid! The obstinacy of the Jews could not invalidate those prophecies of the Messiah which were contained in the oracles committed to them. Christ will be glorious. God's words shall be accomplished, though there be a generation that by their unbelief go about to make God a liar. Let God be true but every man a liar; let us abide by this principle, that God is true to every word which he has spoken. Better question the credit of all the men in the world than doubt of the faithfulness of God. All men are liars, compared with God. It is very comfortable, when we find every man a liar (no faith in man), that God is faithful. He quotes Ps. li. 4, That thou mightest be justified, to show, 1. That God will preserve his own honour in the world, notwithstanding the sins of men. 2. That it is our duty to justify God and to assert and maintain his justice, truth, and goodness, however it goes. Thus is God justified in his sayings, and cleared when he is judged, as it is here rendered.

Object. 3. Carnal hearts might hence take occasion to encourage themselves in sin. If all our sin be so far from overthrowing God's honour that it commends it, and his ends are secured, is it not unjust for God to punish our sin and unbelief so severely? If our unrighteousness commend the righteousness of God, what shall we say? v. 5. What inference may be drawn from this? Is God unrighteous, who taketh vengeance? I speak as a man, that is, it is suggested like a man.

Answer. God forbid. Suggestions that reflect dishonour upon God and his justice and holiness are rather to be startled at than parleyed with. For then how shall God judge the world? v. 6. The sin has never the less of malignity in it though God bring glory to himself out of it. It is only accidentally that sin commends God's righteousness. No thanks to the sinner for that. It is not for us to arraign the proceedings of such an absolute Sovereign. The sentence of the supreme court, whence lies no appeal, is not to be called in question.

Object. 4. The former objection is repeated (v. 7, 8). But his setting off the objection in its own colours is sufficient to answer it: If the truth of God has more abounded through my lie, why should I be judged as a sinner, and not rather thence take encouragement to go on in my sin, that grace may abound? Let us do evil that good may come is oftener in the heart than in the mouth of sinners, so justifying themselves in their wicked ways. There were those who charged such doctrines as this upon Paul and his fellow-ministers: Some affirm that we say so. It is no new thing for the best of God's people and ministers to be charged with holding and teaching such things as they do most detest, and it is not to be thought strange, when our Master himself was said to be in league with Beelzebub. It is an old artifice of Satan thus to cast dirt upon Christ's ministers—Lay slander thickly on, for some will be sure to stick.

Answer. He says no more by way of confutation but that the damnation of those is just. Those who deliberately do evil that good may come of it will be so far from escaping, under the shelter of that excuse, that it will rather justify their damnation. Sinning upon such a surmise, and in such a confidence, argues a great deal both of the wit and of the will in the sin. Their damnation is just; and, whatever excuses of this kind they may now please themselves with, they will none of them stand good in the great day, but God will be justified in his proceedings.

II. Paul next revives his assertion of the general guilt of mankind, both of Jews and Gentiles, v. 9–18. "Are we better than they, we Jews, or will this justify us? No, by no means." or, Are we Christians (Jews and Gentiles) so much better than the unbelieving part as to have merited God's grace? Alas! no. They are all under sin. Under the guilt of sin. We are guilty before God, v. 19. And this he had proved. It is a law term: We have charged them with it, and have made good our charge. This charge and conviction he here further illustrates by several scriptures out of the Old Testament. The 10th, 11th, and 12th verses are taken from Ps. xiv. 1–3. The rest that follows here is found in the Septuagint translation of the 14th Psalm. What is said in Ps. xiv is expressly spoken of all the children of men. The Lord looked down, as upon the old world. He who, when he himself had made all, looked upon everything that he had made, and behold all was very good, now that man had marred all, looked, and behold all was very bad. Observe,

1. That which is habitual, which is twofold:

(1) An habitual defect of everything that is good. There is none righteous, none that has an honest good principle of virtue, no, not one; implying that, if there had been but one, God would have found him out. When all the world was corrupt, God had his eye upon one righteous Noah. No righteousness is born with us. There is none that understandeth, v. 11. The fault lies in the corruption of the understanding. Religion and righteousness have so much reason on their side that if people had but any understanding they would be better and do better. Sinners are fools. None that seeketh after God, that is, none that has any desire after him. They are together become unprofitable, v. 12. Those that have forsaken God soon grow good for nothing. There is none that doeth good; no, not a just man upon the earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not.

(2) An habitual defection to everything that is evil: They are all gone out of the way. God made man in the way, set him in right, but he hath forsaken it.

2. That which is actual.

(1) In their words (v. 13, 14), in three things particularly: [1] Cruelty: Their throat is an open sepulchre, waiting an opportunity to do mischief. And when they do not vent it publicly, yet they are underhand intending mischief: the poison of asps is under their lips, the most venomous and incurable poison, with which they blast the good name of their neighbours. [2] Cheating: With their tongues they have used deceit. Herein they show themselves the devil's children. They have used it: it intimates that they make a trade of lying. [3] Cursing: reflecting upon God, and blaspheming his holy name; wishing evil to their brethren: Their mouth is full of cursing and bitterness. How many, who are called Christians, do by these sins evince that they are still under the reign and dominion of sin.

(2) In their ways (v. 15–17): Their feet are swift to shed blood. Wherever they go, destruction and misery go along with them; these are their companions —destruction and misery to themselves at last. Destruction and misery are in their ways; their sin is its own punishment: a man needs no more to make him miserable than to be a slave to his sins. —And the way of peace have they not known. They are strangers to all true peace; they know not the things that belong to their peace.

(3) The root of all this we have: There is no fear of God before their eyes, v. 18. The fear of God is here put for all practical religion. Wicked people have not this before their eyes; they are governed by other rules, aim at other ends. Where no fear of God is, no good is to be expected. When once fear is cast off, prayer is restrained, and then all goes to wreck and ruin quickly. So that we have here a short account of the general depravity and corruption of mankind.

Verses 19–31

From all this Paul infers that it is in vain to look for justification by the works of the law, and that it is to be had only by faith, which he lays down (v. 28) as the summary of his discourse. We conclude that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law. Man, under the power of such corruption, could never, by any works of his own, gain acceptance with God; but it must be resolved purely into the free grace of God, given through Jesus Christ. There are two things from which the apostle here argues: the guiltiness of man, to prove that we cannot be justified by the works of the law, and the glory of God, to prove that we must be justified by faith.

I. He argues from man's guiltiness. The argument is very plain: we can never be justified and saved by the law that we have broken. Now concerning the guiltiness of man,

1. He fastens it particularly upon the Jews (v. 19). This that the law says, it says to those who are under the law; this conviction belongs to the Jews as well as others, for it is written in their law. "The law convicts and condemns you—you see it does." That every mouth may be stopped. Those that are justified have their mouths stopped by a humble conviction; those that are condemned have their mouths stopped too, for they shall at last be convinced.

2. He extends it in general to all the world: That all the world may become guilty before God. May become guilty; that is, may be proved guilty. They must all plead guilty. Guilty before God is a dreadful word. All are guilty, and therefore all have need of a righteousness wherein to appear before God. For all have sinned (v. 23), and have come short of the glory of God—have failed of that which is the chief end of man. Come short, as the archer comes short of the mark, as the runner comes short of the prize; so come short, as not only not to win, but to be great losers. (1) Come short of glorifying God. They glorified him not as God. Man by sin comes short of this, and, instead of glorifying God, dishonours him. (2) Come short of glorying before God. There is no boasting of innocency: if we go about to glory before God we have all sinned, and this will silence us. We may glory before men, who cannot search our hearts, but there is no glorying before God. (3) Come short of being glorified by God. Come short of justification, which is glory begun—come short of sanctification, which is the glorious image of God upon man. It is impossible now to get to heaven in the way of spotless innocency. That passage is blocked up.

3. Further to drive us off from expecting justification by the law, he ascribes this conviction to the law (v. 20): For by the law is the knowledge of sin. That law which convicts and condemns us can never justify us. It is the proper use and intendment of the law to open our wound, and therefore not likely to be the remedy. That which is searching is not sanative. Paul makes this use of the law, ch. vii. 9, Therefore by the deeds of the law shall no flesh be justified in his sight. (1) No flesh shall be justified. The corruption that remained in our nature will for ever obstruct any justification by our own works. (2) Not justified in his sight. As the conscience stands in relation to God, in his sight, we cannot be justified by the deeds of the law.

II. He argues from God's glory to prove that justification must be expected only by faith in Christ's righteousness. Is there no hope? Is the wound become incurable because of transgression? No, blessed be God, it is not (v. 21, 22); there is another way laid open for us, the righteousness of God without the law is manifested now under the gospel. This is called the righteousness of God, righteousness of his ordaining, and providing, and accepting,—righteousness which he confers upon us.

1. Now concerning this righteousness of God. It is manifested. The gospel-way of justification is a highway, it is laid open for us. It is without the law. The righteousness that Christ hath brought in is a complete righteousness. Yet it is witnessed by the law and the prophets. The law is so far from justifying us that it directs us to another way of justification, points at Christ as our righteousness, to whom bear all the prophets witness. It is by the faith of Jesus Christ, that faith which hath Jesus Christ for its object. It is by this that we become interested in that righteousness which God has ordained, and which Christ has brought in. It is to all, and upon all, those that believe. Jews and Gentiles are alike welcome to God through Christ; for there is no difference. It is to all, the gospel excludes none that do not exclude themselves; but it is upon all that believe, not only tendered to them, but put upon them as a crown, as a robe.

2. But now how is this for God's glory?

(1) It is for the glory of his grace (v. 24): Justified freely by his grace. It is by his grace. And, to make it the more emphatic, he says it is freely by his grace. The grace of God comes freely, freely; nothing in us to deserve such favours: no, it is all through the redemption that is in Jesus Christ. It comes freely to us, but Christ bought it, and paid dearly for it. Christ's purchase is no bar to the freeness of God's grace; for grace provided and accepted this vicarious satisfaction.

(2) It is for the glory of his justice and righteousness (v. 25, 26): Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation, &c. [1] Jesus Christ is the great propitiation. He is our throne of grace, in and through whom atonement is made for sin. He is all in all in our reconciliation, not only the maker, but the matter of it. God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself. [2] God hath set him forth. God, the party offended, makes the first overtures towards a reconciliation. Fore-ordained him to this, in the counsels of his love form eternity, and has exhibited him to a guilty world as their propitiation. [3] By faith in his blood we become interested in this propitiation. There is the healing plaster provided. Faith is the applying of this plaster to the wounded soul. And this faith hath a special regard to the blood of Christ. Without blood there should be no remission, and no blood but this would do it effectually. [4] All who by faith are interested in this propitiation have the remission of their sins that are past. It was for this that Christ was set forth to be a propitiation. Through the forbearance of God. Divine patience has kept us out of hell, that we might have space to repent, and get to heaven. Past through the forbearance of God. It is owing to the divine forbearance that we were not taken in the very act of sin. It is owing to the master's goodness and the dresser's mediation that barren trees are let alone in the vineyard. It is owing to Christ that there is ever a sinner on this side hell. [5] God does in all this declare his righteousness. This he insists upon with a great deal of emphasis: To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness. He declares his righteousness, First, In the propitiation itself. It appears that he hates sin, when nothing less than the blood of Christ would satisfy for it. Finding sin, though but imputed, upon his own Son, he did not spare him, because he had made himself sin for us. Secondly, In the pardon upon that propitiation. That he might be just, and the justifier of him that believeth. It is now become not only an act of grace and mercy, but an act of righteousness, in God, to pardon the sins of penitent believers, having accepted the satisfaction that Christ by dying made to his justice for them. He is just, that is, faithful to his word.

(3) It is for God's glory; for boasting is thus excluded, v. 27. Now, if justification were by the works of the law, boasting would not be excluded. If we were saved by our own works, we might put the crown upon our own heads. But the law of faith doth for ever exclude boasting; for faith is a depending, self-emptying, self-denying grace, and casts every crown before the throne. He speaks of the law of faith. Believers are not left lawless: faith is a law, it is a working grace.

From all this he draws this conclusion (v. 28): That a man is justified by faith without the deeds of the law.

III. He shows the extent of this privilege of justification by faith, and that it is not the peculiar privilege of the Jews, but pertains to the Gentiles also; for he had said (v. 22) that there is no difference. He asserts and proves it (v. 29, 30): Is he the God of the Jews only? It is one God of grace that justifies the circumcision by faith, and the uncircumcision through faith. However the Jews, in favour of themselves, will needs fancy a difference, really there is no more difference than between by and through. He obviates an objection (v. 31), as if this doctrine did nullify the law. "No," says he, "though we do say that the law will not justify us, yet we do not therefore say that it was given in vain. We establish the right use of the law, and secure its standing, by fixing it on the right basis. Though we cannot be saved by it as a covenant, yet we own it, and submit to it, as a rule in the hand of the Mediator, subordinate to the law of grace; and so are so far from overthrowing that we establish the law."

CHAP. IV

The great gospel doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law was so very contrary to the notions the Jews had learnt that it would hardly go down with them. Now in this chapter he proves it by example. The example he pitches upon is that of Abraham. The whole chapter is taken up with his discourse upon this instance. I. He proves that Abraham was justified not by works, but by faith, ver. 1–8. II. He observes when and why he was so justified, ver. 9–17. III. He describes and commends that faith of his, ver. 17–22. IV. He applies all this to us, ver. 22–25.

Verses 1–8

Here the apostle proves that Abraham was justified not by works, but by faith. He appeals to the case of Abraham their father, and puts his own name to the relation, being a Hebrew of the Hebrews: Abraham our Father. Now what has he found? All the world is seeking; but none can be truly reckoned to have found, but those who are justified before God; and thus Abraham found this one pearl of great price. What has he found as pertaining to the flesh, that is, by circumcision and his external privileges? Was he justified by them? Was it the merit of his works that recommended him to God's acceptance? No, by no means.

I. If he had been justified by works, room would have been left for boasting. If so, he hath whereof to glory (v. 2). "But was not his name made great, and then might not he glory?" Yes, but not before God; he might deserve well of men, but he could never merit of God. Paul himself had whereof to glory before men, and we have him sometimes glorying in it, but nothing to glory in before God. Man must not pretend to glory in anything before God; no, not Abraham.

II. It is expressly said that Abraham's faith was counted to him for rightcousness. What saith the scripture? v. 3. In all controversies in religion this must be our question. It is not what this great man, and the other good man, say, but What saith the scripture? Now the scripture saith that Abraham believed, and this was counted to him for righteousness (Gen. xv. 6); therefore he had not whereof to glory before God, it being purely of free grace that it was so imputed. It is mentioned in Genesis, upon occasion of a very signal act of faith concerning the promised seed, and it followed upon a grievous conflict he had had with unbelief. It is not the perfect faith that is required to justification, but the prevailing faith, the faith that has the upper hand of unbelief.

III. If he had been justified by works, the reward would have been of debt, and not of grace. This is his argument (v. 4, 5): Abraham's reward was God himself; so he had told him but just before (Gen. xv. 1), I am thy exceeding great reward. Now, if Abraham had merited this by the perfection of his obedience, it had not been an act of grace in God. God will have free grace to have all the glory. And therefore to him that worketh not—that can pretend to no such merit, but casts himself wholly upon the free grace of God in Christ, by a lively, active, obedient faith—to such a one faith is counted for righteousness. Him that justifieth the ungodly, that is, him that was before ungodly. His former ungodliness was no bar to his justification upon his believing. No room therefore is left for despair; though God clears not the impenitent guilty; yet through Christ he justifies the ungodly.

IV. He further illustrates this by a passage out of the Psalms, where David speaks of the remission of sins, as constituting the blessedness of a man, pronouncing blessed, not the man who has no sin, but the man to whom the Lord imputeth not sin. 1. The nature of forgiveness. It is the remission of a debt, it is the covering of sin. God is said to cast sin behind his back, to hide his face from it, which implies that the ground of our blessedness is not our innocency, but God's not laying it to our charge. It is God's not imputing sin (v. 8), which makes it wholly a gracious act of God. The acceptance and the reward cannot be expected as debts; and therefore Paul infers (v. 6) that it is the imputing of righteousness without works. 2. The blessedness of it: Blessed are they. It is said, Blessed are those whose iniquities are forgiven, to show what that blessedness is, and what is the ground of it. Pardoned people are the only blessed people. Oh, how much therefore is it our interest to make it sure to ourselves that our sins are pardoned! For this is the foundation of all other benefits.

St. Paul observes in this paragraph when and why Abraham was thus justified.

I. It was before he was circumcised, v. 10. His faith was counted to him for righteousness while he was in uncircumcision. It was imputed. Now this the apostle takes notice of in answer to the question (v. 9), Cometh this blessedness then on the circumcision only, or on the uncircumcision also? Abraham was pardoned and accepted in uncircumcision. Here are two reasons why Abraham was justified by faith in circumcision:

1. That circumcision might be a seal of the righteousness of faith, v. 11. For the confirmation of Abraham's faith God was pleased to appoint a sealing ordinance, and Abraham received it as a special favour, the sign of circumcision, &c. (1) The nature of sacraments in general; they are signs and seals. They are signs of absolute grace and favour; they are seals of the conditional promises. God does in the sacraments seal to us to be to us a God, and we do therein seal to him to be to him a people. (2) The nature of circumcision in particular: it was the initiating sacrament of the Old Testament. A sign—a sign of that original corruption which we are all born with, and which is cut off by spiritual circumcision. It was an outward and sensible sign of an inward and spiritual grace signified thereby. A seal of the righteousness of the faith. In general, it was a seal of the covenant of grace, particularly of justification by faith. Now if infants were then capable of receiving a seal of the covenant of grace, which proves that they then were within the verge of that covenant, how they come to be now cast out of the covenant, those are concerned to make out that reject the baptism of the seed of believers.

2. That he might be the father of all those that believe. In him commenced a much clearer and fuller dispensation of the covenant of grace than any that had been before extant; and therefore he is called the father of all that believe. The father of all those that believe; that is, a standing pattern of faith, as parents are examples to their children; and a standing precedent of justification by faith, as the liberties of the fathers descend to their children. (1) The father of believing Gentiles, though they be not circumcised. Abraham being himself uncircumcised when he was justified by faith, uncircumcision can never be a bar. Thus were the doubts and fears of the poor Gentiles anticipated. (2) The father of believing Jews because they are not of the circumcision only, but walk in the steps of that faith—not only are of Abraham's family, but follow the example of Abraham's faith. See here who are the genuine children of those that were the church's fathers. Those that tread in their steps; this is the line of succession. Those have most reason to call Christ Father, not that bear his name in being Christians in profession, but that tread in his steps.

II. It was before the giving of the law, v. 13–16.

1. What that promise was—that he should be the heir of the world. The meek are said to inherit the earth, and the world is theirs. Though Abraham had so little of the world in possession, yet he was heir of it all. Or, rather, it points at Christ, the seed here mentioned To thy seed, which is Christ. Now Christ is the heir of the world, and it is in him that Abraham was so.

2. How it was made to him: Not through the law, but through the righteousness of faith. Not through the law; it was upon his trusting God, in his leaving his own country when God commanded him. Now, being by faith, it could not be by the law (v. 14, 15): If those who are of the law be heirs, then faith is made void; for, if it were requisite that there should be a perfect performance of the whole law, then the promise can never take its effect, since the way to life by perfect obedience to the law, and spotless sinless innocency, is wholly blocked up, and the law in itself opens no other way. This he proves, v. 15. The law worketh wrath—wrath in us to God; as the damming up of a stream makes it swell—wrath in God against us. Now it is certain that we can never expect the inheritance by a law that worketh wrath. How the law works wrath he shows in the latter part of the verse: Where no law is there is no transgression (an acknowledged maxim).

3. Why the promise was made to him by faith; for three reasons, v. 16. (1) That it might be by grace and not by the law; by grace, and not of debt, not of merit. Faith hath particular reference to grace granting, as grace hath reference to faith receiving.

God will have every crown thrown at the feet of grace, free grace. (2) That the promise might be sure. The first covenant was not sure: but, through man's failure, the benefits designed by it were cut off. The more effectually to ensure the conveyance of the new covenant, there is another way found out, not by works but by faith, which received all from Christ, in whose keeping it is safe. (3) That it might be sure to all the seed. If it had been by the law, it had been limited to the Jews. It was by faith that Gentiles as well as Jews might become interested in it, the spiritual as well as the natural seed of faithful Abraham. God would contrive the promise in such a way as might comprehend all true believers, and for this (v. 17) he refers us to Gen. xvii. 5, where the reason of the change of his name from Abram—a high father, to Abraham—the high father of a multitude, is thus rendered: For a father of many nations have I made thee; that is, all believers should take Abraham for their pattern, and call him father.

I. Whom he believed: God who quickeneth. It is God himself that faith fastens upon. Now observe what in God Abraham's faith had an eye to. 1. God who quickeneth the dead. It was promised that he should be the father of many nations, when he and his wife were now as good as dead (Heb. xi. 11, 12), and therefore he looks upon God as a God that could breathe life into dry bones. He that quickeneth the dead can do anything, can give a child to Abraham when he is old, can bring the Gentiles, who are dead in trespasses and sins, to a divine and spiritual life, Eph. ii. 1. 2. Who calleth things which are not as though they were. The justification and salvation of sinners, the espousing of the Gentiles that had not been a people, were a gracious calling of things which are not as though they were. This expresses the sovereignty of God and his absolute power and dominion, a mighty stay to faith when all other props sink and totter. It is faith indeed to build upon the all-sufficiency of God for the accomplishment of that which is impossible to anything but that all-sufficiency. Thus Abraham became the father of many nations before him whom he believed. It is by faith in God that we become accepted of him.

II. How he believed. Against hope, he believed in hope, v. 18. There was a hope against him, a natural hope. All the arguments of sense, and reason, and experience, which in such cases usually beget and support hope, were against him. But, against all those inducements to the contrary, he believed; for he had a hope for him: He believed in hope, which arose, as his faith did, from the consideration of God's all-sufficiency. That he might become the father of many nations. Therefore God, by his almighty grace, enabled him thus to believe against hope. It was fit that he who was to be the father of the faithful should have something more than ordinary in his faith. This was that which he believed, when it was counted to him for righteousness. Being not weak in faith, he considered not his own body, v. 19. His own body was now dead—become utterly unlikely to beget a child. When God intends some special blessing for his people, he commonly puts a sentence of death upon the blessing itself. But Abraham did not consider this, he did not dwell in his thoughts upon it. His faith thought of nothing but the faithfulness of the promise, and this kept up his faith. Though it may seem to be the wisdom of carnal reason, yet it is the weakness of faith, to look into the bottom of all the difficulties that arise against the promise. He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief (v. 20). He disputed not; he did not hold any self-consultation about it, did not take time to consider whether he should close with it or no, but by a resolute act of his soul, with a holy boldness, ventured all upon the promise. He took it not for a point that would admit of argument or debate. He staggered not through unbelief. Unbelief is at the bottom of all our staggerings at God's promises. It is not the promise that fails, but our faith that fails when we stagger. He was strong in faith, giving glory to God, he was strengthened in faith, his faith got ground by exercise. Though weak faith shall not be rejected, yet strong faith shall be commended and honoured. The strength of his faith appeared in the victory it won over his fears. Abraham's faith gave God the glory, especially of his faithfulness. Abraham gave glory to God by trusting him. We never hear our Lord Jesus commending anything so much as great faith (Matt. viii. 10 and xv. 28): therefore God gives honour to faith, great faith, because faith, great faith, gives honour to God. He was fully persuaded that what God had promised he was able to perform—was carried on with the greatest confidence and assurance; it is a metaphor taken from ships that come into the harbour with full sail. Abraham saw the storms of doubts, and fears, and temptations likely to rise against the promise. But Abraham, having taken God for his pilot, and the promise for his card and compass, like a bold adventurer sets up all his sails, regards neither winds nor clouds, but trusts to the wisdom and faithfulness of his pilot, and bravely makes to the harbour, and comes home an unspeakable gainer. Such was his full persuasion, built on the omnipotence of God: He was able. Our waverings rise mainly from our distrust of the divine power. It is requisite we believe not only that he is faithful, but that he is able. And therefore it was imputed to him for righteousness, v. 22. Because he ventured his all in the divine promise, God graciously accepted him, and not only answered, but out-did, his expectation, and justified him. This shows why faith is chosen to be the prime condition of our justification, because it is a grace that of all others gives glory to God.

In the close of the chapter, he applies all to us. He here concludes that his justification was to be the pattern of ours: It was not written for his sake alone. It was not intended only for an historical commendation of Abraham, or a relation of something peculiar to him. The accounts we have of the Old Testament saints were not intended for histories only, but for precedents to direct us, for ensamples (1 Cor. x. 11) for our learning, ch. xv. 4. And this particularly concerning Abraham was written for us also, to assure us what that righteousness is which God requireth. For us on whom the ends of the world are come, as well as for the patriarchs; for the grace of God is the same yesterday, today, and for ever.

I. Our common privilege; it shall be imputed to us, that is, righteousness shall. It shall be imputed; he uses a future verb, to signify the continuation of this mercy in the church, that as it is the same now so it will be while God has a church in the world. There is a fountain opened that is inexhaustible.

II. Our common duty, the condition of this privilege, and that is believing. The proper object of this believing is a divine revelation. The revelation to Abraham was concerning a Christ to come; the revelation to us is concerning a Christ already come, which difference in the revelation does not alter the case. Now we are to believe on him that raised up Christ; not only believe his power, but depend upon his grace. So he explains it, v. 25. He was delivered for our offences. He died indeed as a malefactor, because he died for sin; but it was not his own sin. He died to make atonement for our sins. He was raised again for our justification. By the merit of his death he paid our debt, in his resurrection he took out our acquittance. The apostle puts a special emphasis on Christ's resurrection; it is Christ that died, yea, rather, that has risen again, ch. viii. 34. So that upon the whole matter it is very evident that we are not justified by the merit of our own works, but by dependence upon Jesus Christ and his righteousness, which was the truth that Paul in this and the foregoing chapter had been fixing as the great spring and foundation of all our comfort.

CHAP. V

I. He shows the fruits of justification, ver. 1–5. II. He shows the fountain and foundation of justification in the death of Jesus Christ, in the rest of the chapter.

Verses 1–5

The precious benefits and privileges which flow from justification are such as should quicken us all to give diligence to make it sure to ourselves. The fruits of this tree of life are exceedingly precious.

I. We have peace with God, v. 1. It is sin that breeds the quarrel between us and God. Justification takes away the guilt, immediately upon the removing of that obstacle, the peace is made. By faith we lay hold of God's arm and of his strength, and so are at peace. There is more in this peace than barely a cessation of enmity, there is friendship and loving-kindness, for God is either the worst enemy or the best friend. Christ has called his disciples friends, John xv. 13–15. And surely a man needs no more to make him happy than to have God his friend! But this is through our Lord Jesus Christ—through him as the great peacemaker, the Mediator between God and man, not only the maker, but the matter and maintainer, of our peace.

II. We have access by faith into this grace wherein we stand, v. 2. This is a further privilege, not only peace, but grace. The saints' happy state. It is a state of grace, God's loving-kindness to us and our conformity to God. Into this grace we have access: we were not born in this state, but we are brought into it. We could not have got into it of ourselves, but we are led into it as blind, or lame, or weak people are led. We have had access. Paul, in his conversion, had this access; then he was made nigh. It was Christ that introduced and led him by the hand into this grace. By whom we have access by faith. By Christ as the author, by faith as the means of this access. Their happy standing in this state: Wherein we stand. Not only wherein we are, but wherein we stand. The phrase denotes also our progress; while we stand, we are going. We must not lie down, as if we had already attained, but stand as those that are pressing forward, stand as servants attending on Christ our master. The phrase denotes, further, our perseverance: we stand firmly and safely; stand as soldiers stand, that keep their ground. It is not in the court of heaven as in earthly courts, where high places are slippery places.

III. We rejoice in hope of the glory of God. Besides the happiness in hand, there is a happiness in hope, the glory of God. Those that have access by faith into the grace of God now may hope for the glory of God hereafter. Grace is glory begun, the earnest and assurance of glory. Those who hope for the glory of God hereafter, have enough to rejoice in now.

IV. We glory in tribulations also; not only notwithstanding our tribulations, but even in our tribulations. What a growing increasing happiness the happiness of the saints is: Not only so. We glory in tribulations also, especially tribulations for righteousness' sake. This being the hardest point, he sets himself to show the grounds and reasons of it. Tribulations, by a chain of causes, greatly befriend hope, which he shows in the method of its influence. Tribulation worketh patience, the powerful grace of God working in and with the tribulation. It proves, and by proving improves, patience, as steel is hardened by the fire. That which worketh patience is matter of joy; for patience does us more good than tribulations can do us hurt. Tribulation in itself worketh impatience; but, as it is sanctified to the saints, it worketh patience. Patience experience, v. 4. It works an experience of God, the patient sufferers have the greatest experience of the divine consolations. It works an experience of ourselves. It is by tribulation that we make an experiment of our own sincerity. It works an approbation, as he is approved that has passed the test. Experience hope. He who, being thus tried, comes forth as gold, will thereby be encouraged to hope. Experience of God is a prop to our hope. Experience of ourselves helps to evidence our sincerity. This hope maketh not ashamed, will not deceive us. Nothing confounds more than disappointment. It maketh not ashamed of our sufferings. It is in a good cause, for a good Master, and in good hope; and therefore we are not ashamed. Because the love of God is shed abroad. This hope will not disappoint us, because it is sealed with the Holy Spirit as a Spirit of love. The love of God, that is, the sense of God's love to us, drawing out love in us to him again. The ground of all our comfort and holiness, and perseverance in both, is laid in the shedding abroad of the love of God in our hearts. Sense of God's love to us will make us not ashamed, either of our hope in him or our sufferings for him.

The apostle here describes the fountain and foundation of justification, laid in the death of the Lord Jesus. He enlarges upon this instance of the love of God which is shed abroad. 1. The persons he died for, v. 6–8. 2. The precious fruits of his death, v. 9–11. 3. The parallel he runs between the communication of sin and death by the first Adam and of righteousness and life by the second Adam, v. 12, to the end.

I. The character we were under when Christ died for us.

1. We were without strength (v. 6), in a sad condition; altogether unable to help ourselves out of that condition. Therefore, our salvation is here said to come in due time. God's time to help and save is when those that are to be saved are without strength. It is the manner of God to help at a dead lift.

2. He died for the ungodly; not only helpless creatures, and therefore likely to perish, but guilty sinful creatures, and therefore deserving to perish. Being ungodly, they had need of one to die for them. This he illustrates (v. 7, 8) as an unparalleled instance of love; herein God's thoughts and ways were above ours. (1) One would hardly die for a righteous man, that is, one that is unjustly condemned; everybody will pity such a one, but few will hazard their own in his stead. (2) One might perhaps be persuaded to die for a good man, who is more than barely a righteous man. Many that are good themselves yet do but little good to others; but those that are useful commonly get themselves well beloved. And yet observe how he qualifies this: it is but some that would do so, after all, it is but a peradventure. (3) But Christ died for sinners (v. 8), neither righteous nor good; not only such as were useless, but such as were guilty. Now herein God commended his love, not only proved but magnified it and made it illustrious, not only put it past dispute, but rendered it the object of the greatest wonder and admiration. Commendeth his love in order to the shedding abroad of his love in our hearts by the Holy Ghost. While we were yet sinners. He died to save us, not in our sins, but from our sins; but we were yet sinners when he died for us. (4) Nay, which is more, we were enemies (v. 10), not only malefactors, but traitors and rebels. And that for such as these Christ should die is such a mystery, such an unprecedented instance of love, that it may well be our business to eternity to admire and wonder at it. Justly might he who had thus loved us make it one of the laws of his kingdom that we should love our enemies.

II. The precious fruits of his death.

1. Justification and reconcilation are the fruit of the death of Christ: We are justified by his blood (v. 9), reconciled by his death, v. 10. Sin is pardoned, the enmity slain, an end made of iniquity, and an everlasting righteousness brought in. Immediately upon our believing, we are actually put into a state of justification and reconciliation. Justified by his blood. Our justification is ascribed to the blood of Christ because without blood there is no remission, Heb. ix. 22. In all the propitiatory sacrifices, the sprinkling of the blood was of the essence of the sacrifice.

2. Hence results salvation from wrath: Saved from wrath (v. 9), saved by his life, v. 10. If God justified and reconciled us when we were enemies, much more will be save us when we are justified and reconciled. He that has done the greater, which is of enemies to make us friends, will certainly do the less, which is when we are friends to use us friendly and to be kind to us. The apostle, once and again, speaks of it with a much more. We shall be saved from wrath. It is the wrath of God that is the fire of hell. Reconciled by his death, saved by his life. His life here spoken of is not to be understood of his life in the flesh, but his life in heaven. We are reconciled by Christ humbled, we are saved by Christ exalted. The dying Jesus laid the foundation in satisfying for sin, and slaying the enmity, but it is the living Jesus that perfects the work. Christ dying was the testator, who bequeathed us the legacy; but Christ living is the executor, who pays it.

3. All this produces, as a further privilege, our joy in God, v. 11. God is now so far from being a terror to us that he is our joy. We are reconciled and saved from wrath. And not only so, there is more in it yet, a constant stream of favours; not only get into the harbour, but come in with full sail: We joy in God, solacing ourselves in his love. And all this (which he repeats as a string he loved to be harping upon) by virtue of the atonement, for by him we received the atonement. To receive the atonement is, (1) To give our consent to the atonement, being willing and glad to be saved in a gospel way and upon gospel terms. (2) To take the comfort of the atonement. Now we joy in God, now we do indeed receive the atonement, glorying in it.

III. The parallel that the apostle runs between the communication of sin and death by the first Adam and of righteousness and life by the second Adam (v. 12, to the end), showing a correspondence between our fall and our recovery.

1. A general truth laid down as the foundation of his discourse—that Adam was a type of Christ (v. 14): Who is the figure of him that was to come. God dealt with Adam and Adam acted as a common father, of and for all his posterity. Jesus Christ, the Mediator, acted as the head of all the elect, dealt with God for them, as their father, died for them, rose for them, entered within the veil for them, did all for them.

2. A more particular explication of the parallel.

(1) How Adam communicated sin and death to all his posterity (v. 12): By one man sin entered. We see the world under a deluge of sin and death, full of iniquities and full of calamities. It was by one man, and he the first man. [1] By him sin entered. When God pronounced all very good (Gen. i. 31) there was no sin in the world. It never entered into the world of mankind till Adam sinned. Then entered the guilt of Adam's sin imputed to posterity, and a general depravedness of nature. For that (so we read it), rather in whom, all have sinned. Sin entered into the world by Adam, for in him we all sinned. God, as the author of nature, had made this the law of nature, that man should beget in his own likeness. In Adam therefore, as in a common receptacle, the whole nature of man was reposited. Adam therefore sinning and falling, the nature became guilty and corrupt. Thus in him all have sinned. [2] Death by sin, for death is the wages of sin. When sin came, of course death came with it. [3] So death passed, passed through all men, as an infectious disease passes through a town, so that none escape it. It is the universal fate, without exception. Death reigned, v. 14. None are exempted from its sceptre. It is the last enemy, 1 Cor. xv. 26. He shows that sin did not commence with the law of Moses, but was in the world until, or before, that law. Sin was in the world before the law; witness Cain's murder, the apostasy of the old world, the wickedness of Sodom. His inference hence is, Therefore there was a law; for sin is not imputed where there is no law. Original sin is a want of conformity to, and actual sin is a transgression of, the law of God: therefore all were under some law. His proof of it is, Death reigned from Adam to Moses, v. 14. This proves that sin was in the world before the law, and original sin, for death reigned over those that had not sinned any actual sin, that had not sinned after the similitude of Adam's transgression.

(2) How, in correspondence to this, Christ communicates righteousness and life to all true believers. He shows not only wherein the resemblance holds, but wherein the communication of grace and love by Christ goes beyond the communication of guilt and wrath by Adam.

[1] Wherein the resemblance holds, v. 18, 19.

First, By the offence and disobedience of one many were made sinners, and judgment came upon all men to condemnation. Adam's sin was disobedience. The thing he did was therefore evil because it was forbidden, this opened the door to other sins. The malignity and poison of sin are very strong and spreading, else the guilt of Adam's sin would not have reached so far. Who would think there should be so much evil in sin? By Adam's sin many are made sinners: many, that is, all his posterity. Made sinners, It denotes the making of us such by a judicial act. Judgment is come upon all those that by Adam's disobedience were made sinners. All the race of mankind lie under a sentence, like an attainder upon a family.

Secondly, In like manner, by the righteousness and obedience of one are many made righteous, and so the free gift comes upon all. 1. The nature of Christ's righteousness, how it is brought in; it is by his obedience. The disobedience of the first Adam ruined us, the obedience of the second Adam saves us. By his obedience he wrought out a righteousness for us, satisfied God's justice. 2. The fruit of it. There is a free gift come upon all men. The salvation wrought is a common salvation; whoever will may come, and take of these waters of life. This free gift is unto justification of life. It is not only a justification that frees from death, but that entitles to life. Many shall be made righteous, shall be constituted righteous, as by letters patent.

[2] Wherein the communication of grace and love by Christ goes beyond the communication of guilt and wrath by Adam, v. 15–17. It is designed for the magnifying of Christ's love, and for the comfort of believers. First, If guilt and wrath be communicated much more shall grace and love. Much more the grace of God, and the gift by grace. God's goodness is, of all his attributes, in a special manner his glory. We know that God is rather inclined to show mercy; punishing is his strange work. Secondly, If there was so much power and efficacy in the sin of a man, to condemn us, much more are there power and efficacy in the righteousness and grace of Christ, to justify and save us. Surely Adam could not propagate so strong a poison but Jesus Christ could propagate as strong an antidote, and much stronger.

Thirdly, It is but the guilt of one single offence of Adam's that is laid to our charge: The judgment was by one, that is, by one offence, v. 16, 17. But from Jesus Christ we receive and derive an abundance of grace, and of the gift of righteousness. The stream of grace and righteousness is deeper and broader than the stream of guilt. God in Christ forgives all trespasses.

Fourthly, By Adam's sin death reigned; but by Christ's righteousness believers are preferred to reign in life, v. 17. We are by Christ and his righteousness entitled to, and instated in, more and greater privileges than we lost by the offence of Adam. The plaster is wider than the wound, and more healing than the wound is killing.

IV. The law entered that the offence might abound. Not to make sin to abound the more in itself, but to discover the abounding sinfulness of it. The glass discovers the spots, but does not cause them. The letting of a clearer light into a room discovers the dust and filth which were there before, but were not seen. That grace might much more abound—that the terrors of the law might make gospel-comforts so much the sweeter. The greater the strength of the enemy, the greater the honour of the conqueror. This abounding of grace he illustrates, v. 21. Sin reigned unto death; it was a cruel bloody reign. But grace reigns to life, eternal life, and this through righteousness by Jesus Christ our Lord, through the power and efficacy of Christ.

CHAP. VI

The apostle having at large proved the great doctrine of justification by faith, he, with a like cogency of argument, presses the absolute necessity of sanctification and a holy life, as the inseparable fruit of justification; for, wherever Jesus Christ is made of God unto any soul righteousness, he is made of God unto that soul sanctification.

Verses 1–23

The apostle's transition, which joins this discourse with the former: "What shall we say then? (v. 1). Shall we continue in sin that grace may abound?" Shall we hence take encouragement to sin because the more sin we commit the more will the grace of God be magnified in our pardon? The apostle startled at the thought of it (v. 2): "God forbid." Those opinions that give any countenance to sin are to be rejected with the greatest abhorrence. The apostle is very full in pressing the necessity of holiness in this chapter, which may be reduced to two heads: His exhortations to holiness, and his arguments to enforce those exhortations.

I. For the first, we may hence observe the nature of sanctification. It has two things in it, mortification and vivification—dying to sin and living to righteousness.

1. Mortification, putting off the old man. (1) We must live no longer in sin (v. 2). Though there are none that live without sin, yet there are those that do not live in sin. (2) The body of sin must be destroyed, v. 6. The corruption that dwelleth in us is the body of sin. This is the root to which the axe must be laid. We must not only cease from the acts of sin, but we must get the vicious habits and inclinations weakened and destroyed. That henceforth we should not serve sin. It is the body of sin that sways the sceptre; destroy this, and the yoke is broken. (3) We must be dead indeed unto sin, v. 11. As the death of the oppressor is a release, so much more is the death of the oppressed. Thus must we be dead to sin, fulfil its will no more. He that is dead is separated from his former company. Death makes a mighty change; such a change doth sanctification make in the soul, it cuts off all correspondence with sin. (4) Sin must not reign in our mortal bodies that we should obey it, v. 12. Though sin may remain as an outlaw, yet let it not reign as a king. Let it not make laws, so that we should obey it. Though we may be sometimes overtaken and overcome by it, yet let us never be obedient to it. In the lusts thereof. Sin lies very much in the gratifying of the body. And there is a reason implied in the phrase your mortal body. It was sin that made our bodies mortal, and therefore do not yield obedience to such an enemy. (5) We must not yield our members as instruments of unrighteousness, v. 13. The members of the body are made use of by the corrupt nature as tools, but we must not consent to that abuse. One sin begets another; it is like the letting forth of water, therefore leave it before it be meddled with. The members of the body may perhaps be forced to be instruments of sin; but do not yield them to be so, do not consent to it. This is one branch of sanctification, the mortification of sin.

2. Vivification, or living to righteousness. It is to walk in newness of life, v. 4. Newness of life supposes newness of heart; there is no way to make the stream sweet but by making the spring so. Walk by new rules. Make a new choice of the way. Choose new paths to walk in, new leaders to walk after, new companions to walk with. It is to be alive unto God through Jesus Christ our Lord, v. 11. To converse with God, to have a regard to him, a delight in him, this is to be alive to God. It is to have the affections and desires alive towards God. Or, living (our life in the flesh) unto God, to his honour and glory as our end, by his word and will as our rule; this is to live unto God.—Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Christ is our spiritual life; there is no living to God but through him. He is the Mediator; no intercourse between sinful souls and a holy God, but by the mediation of the Lord Jesus. In living to God, Christ is all in all. It is to yield ourselves to God, as those that are alive from the dead, v. 13. The very life and being of holiness lie in the dedication of ourselves to the Lord, giving our own selves to the Lord. "Not yield your estates to him, but yield yourselves; nothing less than your whole selves. Not only submit to him, but comply with him; be always ready to serve him. Yield yourselves to him as wax to the seal, to take any impression, to be, and have, and do, what he pleases." As those that are alive from the dead. To yield a dead carcase to a living God is not to please him, but to mock him: "Yield yourselves as those that are alive and good for something, a living sacrifice, ch. xii. 1. The surest evidence of our spiritual life is the dedication of ourselves to God. It is to yield our members as instruments of righteousness to God. The members of our bodies, when withdrawn from the service of sin, are not to lie idle, but to be made use of in the service of God. The body must be always ready to serve the soul in the service of God. Thus (v. 19), "Yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness. Let them be under the conduct and at the command of the righteous law of God." Righteousness unto holiness, which intimates growth, and progress, and ground obtained. As every sinful act confirms the sinful habit, and makes the nature more and more prone to sin, so every gracious act confirms the gracious habit. One duty fits us for another; and the more we do the more we may do for God.

II. To show the necessity of sanctification. There is such an antipathy in our hearts by nature to holiness that it is no easy matter to bring them to submit to it: it is the Spirit's work.

1. Our baptism carries in it a great reason why we should die to sin, and live to righteousness. Observe this reasoning.

(1) In general, we are dead to sin. Our baptism signifies our cutting off from the kingdom of sin. We are dead to sin by our union with Christ, in and by whom it is killed. All this is in vain if we persist in sin; we return to that to which we were dead, like walking ghosts. For (v. 7) he that is dead is freed from sin; he that is dead to it is freed from the rule and dominion of it. Now shall we be such fools as to return to that slavery from which we are discharged?

(2) In particular, being baptized into Jesus Christ, we were baptized into his death, v. 3. Baptism binds us to Christ. Particularly, we were baptized into his death. As Christ died for sin, so we should die to sin. This was the profession and promise of our baptism, and we do not do well if we do not answer this profession, and make good this promise.

[1] Our conformity to the death of Christ obliges us to die unto sin. Thus we are here said to be planted together in the likeness of his death (v. 5), as the engrafted stock is planted together into the likeness of the shoot, of the nature of which it doth participate. We are planted in the vineyard in a likeness to Christ, which likeness we should evidence in sanctification. Our creed concerning Jesus Christ is, among other things, that he was crucified, dead, and buried; now baptism is a sacramental conformity to him in each of these. First, Our old man is crucified with him, v. 6. The death of the cross was a slow death; but it was a sure death. Such is the mortification of sin in believers. It was a cursed death. Sin dies as a malefactor, devoted to destruction. Crucified with him. The crucifying of Christ for us has an influence upon the crucifying of sin in us. Secondly, We are dead with Christ, v. 8. Christ was obedient to death: when he died, we might be said to die with him. Baptism signifies and seals our union with Christ, so that we are dead with him, and engaged to have no more to do with sin than he had. Thirdly, We are buried with him by baptism, v. 4. Our conformity is complete. We are in profession quite cut off from all commerce and communion with sin. Thus must we be, as Christ was, separate from sin and sinners. We are sealed to be the Lord's, therefore to be cut off from sin. As Christ was buried, that he might rise again to a new and more heavenly life, so we are in baptism buried, that we may rise again to a new life of faith and love.

[2] Our conformity to the resurrection of Christ obliges us to rise again to newness of life. Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father. Now in baptism we are obliged to conform to that pattern, to be planted in the likeness of his resurrection (v. 5), to live with him, v. 8. Conversion is the first resurrection from the death of sin to the life of righteousness; and this resurrection is conformable to Christ's resurrection. We have all risen with Christ. In two things we must conform to the resurrection of Christ: First, He rose to die no more, v. 9. Over Christ death has no more dominion; he was dead indeed, but he is alive, and so alive that he lives for evermore. Thus we must rise from the grave of sin never again to return to it. Secondly, He rose to live unto God (v. 10), to live a heavenly life. He rose again to leave the world. Now I am no more in the world, John xvii. 11. He rose to live to God. Thus must we rise to live to God: this is what he calls newness of life (v. 4), to live by other rules, with other aims, than we have done. A life devoted to God is a new life; before, self was the chief and highest end, but now God.

2. He argues from the precious promises of the new covenant, v. 14. It might be objected that we cannot subdue sin, it is unavoidably too hard for us: "No," says he, "you wrestle with an enemy that may be dealt with and subdued; it is an enemy that is already foiled and baffled. Sin shall not have dominion." Sin may struggle in a believer, and may create him a great deal of trouble, it may vex him, but shall not rule over him. For we are not under the law, but under grace, not under the law of sin and death, but under the law of the spirit of life, which is in Christ Jesus. New lords, new laws. Or, not under the covenant of works, which requires brick, and gives no straw, but under the covenant of grace, which accepts sincerity as our gospel perfection, which requires nothing but what it promises strength to perform. It does not leave our salvation in our own keeping, but lays it up in the hands of the Mediator, who undertakes for us that sin shall not have dominion over us, who hath himself condemned it, and will destroy it. Christ rules by the golden sceptre of grace. We are under grace, grace which accepts the willing mind, which leaves room for repentance, which promises pardon upon repentance. Shall we sin against so much goodness, abuse such love? See how the apostle starts at such a thought (v. 15): Shall we sin because we are not under the law, but under grace? God forbid.

3. This will be evidence of our state, for us, or against us (v. 16): To whom you yield yourselves servants to obey, his servants you are. All the children of men are either the servants of God, or the servants of sin. We must enquire to which of these masters we yield obedience. Our obeying the laws of sin will be an evidence against us that we belong to that family on which death is entailed. Our obeying the laws of Christ will evidence our relation to Christ's family.

4. He argues from their former sinfulness, v. 17–21.

(1) What they had been and done formerly. You were the servants of sin. Those that are now the servants of God would do well to remember the time when they were the servants of sin, to keep them humble, and to quicken them in the service of God. It is a reproach to the service of sin that so many thousands have quitted the service; and never any that sincerely deserted it, and gave up themselves to the service of God, have returned to the former drudgery. "God be thanked that you were so. God be thanked that we can speak of it as a thing past." You have yielded your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity unto iniquity, v. 19. It is the misery of a sinful state that the body is made a drudge to sin. You have yielded. Sinners are voluntary in the service of sin. The devil could not force them into the service, if they did not yield themselves to it. To iniquity unto iniquity. To iniquity as the work unto iniquity as the wages. Sow the wind, and reap the whirlwind; growing worse and worse, more and more hardened. This he speaks after the manner of men. You were free from righteousness (v. 20); not free by any liberty given, but by a liberty taken, which is licentiousness. But a freedom from righteousness is the worst kind of slavery.

(2) How the blessed change was made, and wherein it did consist.

[1] You have obeyed from the heart that form of doctrine which was delivered to you, v. 17. This describes conversion, it is our conformity to, and compliance with, the gospel—Margin. Whereto you were delivered. First, The rule of grace, that form of doctrine. The gospel is the great rule both of truth and holiness; it is the stamp, grace is the impression of that stamp. Secondly, Our conformity to that rule. It is to obey from the heart. The gospel is a doctrine to be obeyed, and that from the heart; not in profession only, but in power—from the heart, the commanding part of us. It is to be delivered into it, as into a mould, as the wax is cast into the impression of the seal, answering it line for line.

[2] Being made free from sin, you became servants of righteousness (v. 18), servants to God, v. 22. Conversion is, First, A freedom from the service of sin. Secondly, A resignation of ourselves to the service of God. When we are made free from sin, it is not that we may live as we list, and be our own masters. We cannot be made the servants of God till we are freed from the power and dominion of sin; we cannot serve two masters.

(3) What apprehensions they now had of their former way. He appeals to themselves (v. 21), whether they had not found the service of sin, [1] An unfruitful service: "What fruit had you then? Did you ever get anything by it?" Besides the future losses, which are infinitely great, the very present gains of sin are not worth mentioning. What fruit? Nothing that deserves the name of fruit. [2] An unbecoming service; it is that of which we are now ashamed. Shame came into the world with sin, and is still the certain product of it. Who would wilfully do that which sooner or later he is sure to be ashamed of?

5. He argues from the end of all these things. To persuade us from sin to holiness here are good and evil, life and death, set before us; and we are put to our choice. The end of sin is death (v. 21): The end of those things is death. Though the way may seem pleasant and inviting, yet it will be bitterness in the latter end. The wages of sin is death, v. 23. Death is as due to a sinner as wages are to a servant. All that are sin's servants and do sin's work must expect to be thus paid. If the fruit be unto holiness the end will be everlasting life—a very happy end!—Though the way be up-hill, yet everlasting life at the end of it is sure. So, v. 23, The gift of God is eternal life. Heaven is life, and it is eternal life, no infirmities attending it, no death to put a period to it. This is the gift of God. The death is the wages of sin; but the life is a gift. Sinners merit hell, but saints do not merit heaven. We must thank God, and not ourselves, if ever we get to heaven. And this gift is through Jesus Christ our Lord. It is Christ that purchased it, prepares us for it, preserves us to it.

CHAP. VII

I. Our freedom from the law an argument to press upon us sanctification, ver. 1–6. II. The excellency and usefulness of the law asserted, notwithstanding, ver. 7–14. III. The conflict between grace and corruption in the heart, ver. 14, 15, to the end.

Among other arguments to persuade us against sin, and to holiness, this was one (v. 14), that we are not under the law; and this argument is here further insisted upon (v. 6): We are delivered from the law. 1. We are delivered from that power of the law which condemns us for the sin committed by us. The law saith, The soul that sins shall die; but we are delivered from the law. 2. We are delivered from that power of the law which provokes the sin that dwelleth in us. This the apostle seems especially to refer to (v. 5): The motions of sins which were by the law. The law, by threatening, corrupt and fallen man, but offering no grace to cure, did but stir up the corruption. We being lamed by the fall, the law comes and directs us, but provides nothing to heal and help our lameness. We are under grace, which promises strength to do what it commands, and pardon upon repentance when we do amiss. The difference between a law-state and a gospel-state he had before illustrated by the similitude of serving a new master; now here under the similitude of being married to a new husband.

I. Our first marriage was to the law. The law of marriage is binding till the death of one of the parties, no matter which, and no longer. For this he appeals to themselves, as persons knowing the law (v. 1): I speak to those that know the law. Many of the Christians at Rome had been Jews, and so were well acquainted with the law. One has some hold of knowing people. The law hath power over a man as long as he liveth; in particular, the law of marriage hath power. The obligation of laws extends no further. The condemnation of laws extends no further; death is the finishing of the law. The severest laws could but kill the body, and after that there is no more that they can do. Thus while we were alive to the law we were under the power of it. Such is the law of marriage (v. 2), the woman is bound to her husband during life, she cannot marry another; if she do, she shall be reckoned an adulteress, v. 3. Thus were we married to the law (v. 5): When we were in the flesh, then the motions of sins which were by the law did work in our members, we were carried down the stream of sin, and the law was but as an imperfect dam, which made the stream to swell the higher. Our desire was towards sin, and sin ruled over us. We were under a law of sin and death, as the wife under the law of marriage; and the product of this marriage was fruit brought forth unto death. Lust, having conceived by the law, bringeth forth sin, and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death, Jam. i. 15. This is the posterity that springs from this marriage to sin and the law. This comes of the motions of sin working in our members.

II. Our second marriage is to Christ.

1. We are freed, by death, from our obligation to the law as a covenant, v. 3. You are become dead to the law, v. 4. He does not say, "The law is dead," but, which comes all to one, You are dead to the law. We are delivered from the law (v. 6); our obligation to it is as a husband is made void. And then he speaks of the law being dead as far as it was a law of bondage to us: That being dead wherein we were held. It is dead, it has lost its power; and this (v. 4) by the body of Christ, that is, by the sufferings of Christ in his body, by his crucified body. We are dead to the law by our union with the mystical body of Christ, but have no more to do with it than the dead servant hath to do with his master's yoke.

2. We are married to Christ. We enter upon a life of dependence on him and duty to him: Married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead. As our dying to sin and the law is in conformity to the death of Christ, and the crucifying of his body, so our devotedness to Christ in newness of life is in conformity to the resurrection of Christ. We are married to the raised exalted Jesus. Now we are thus married to Christ, (1) That we should bring forth fruit unto God, v. 4. One end of marriage is fruitfulness. Now the great end of our marriage to Christ is our fruitfulness in love, and grace, and every good work. As our old marriage to sin produced fruit unto death, so our second marriage to Christ produces fruit unto God. Good works are the children of the new nature. Whatever our professions and pretensions may be, there is no fruit brought forth to God till we are married to Christ. This distinguishes the good works of believers from the good works of hypocrites and self-justifiers that they are done in union with Christ. (2) That we should serve in newness of spirit, and not in the oldness of the letter, v. 6. Still we must serve, but it is a service that is perfect freedom, whereas the service of sin was a perfect drudgery. There must be a renovation of our spirits wrought by the spirit of God, and in that we must serve. Not in the oldness of the letter; that is, we must not rest in mere external services. The letter is said to kill with its bondage and terror, but we are delivered from that yoke that we may serve God without fear, in holiness and righteousness, Luke i. 74, 75. It becomes us to worship within the veil, and no longer in the outward court.

What shall we say then? Is the law sin? He had said so much of the influence of the law that it might easily be misinterpreted as a reflection upon the law, to prevent which he shows the great excellency of it as a guide.

I. The great excellency of the law in itself. Far be it from Paul to reflect upon the law. It is holy, just, and good, v. 12. Laws are as the law-makers are. God, the great lawgiver, is holy, just, and good, therefore his law must needs be so. The ways of the Lord are right. It is good in the design of it; it was given for the good of mankind. It makes the observers of it good. Wherever there is true grace there is an assent to this—that the law is holy, just, and good. The law is spiritual (v. 14), not only in regard to the effect of it, but in regard to the extent of it; it reaches our spirits. It is given to man, whose principal part is spiritual; the soul is the best part, and therefore the law to the man must needs be a law to the soul. Herein the law of God is above all other laws, that it is a spiritual law. The law of God takes notice of the iniquity regarded in the heart. We know this. Wherever there is true grace there is an experimental knowledge of the spirituality of the law of God.

II. The great advantage that he had found by the law. 1. It was discovering: I had not known sin but by the law, v. 7. As that which is straight discovers that which is crooked, so there is no way of coming to that knowledge of sin which is necessary to repentance, but by comparing our hearts and lives with the law. Particularly he came to the knowledge of the sinfulness of lust. By lust he means sin dwelling in us. This he came to know when the law said, Thou shalt not covet. The law spoke in the spiritual sense and meaning of it. By this he knew that lust was sin and a very sinful sin. Paul had a very quick and piercing judgment, and yet never attained the right knowledge of indwelling sin till the Spirit by the law made it known to him. There is nothing about which the natural man is more blind than about original corruption. Thus the law is a schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ. Thus sin by the commandment does appear sin (v. 13); it appears in its own colours. Thus by the commandment it becomes exceedingly sinful; that is, it appears to be so. 2. It was humbling (v. 9): I was alive. He thought himself in a very good condition, very secure and confident of the goodness of his state. Thus he was once, in times past, when he was a Pharisee; and the reason was he was then without the law. Though brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, though himself a strict observer of it, yet without the law. He had the letter of the law, but he had not the spiritual meaning of it —the shell, but not the kernel. He had the law in his hand and in his head, but he had it not in his heart. But when the commandment came (not to his eyes only, but to his heart), sin revived, as the dust in a room rises when the sunshine is let into it. Paul then saw that in sin which he had never seen before—sin in its consequences, sin with death at the heels of it, sin and the curse entailed upon it. "The Spirit, by the commandment, convinced me that I was in a state of sin, and in a state of death because of sin." Of this excellent use is the law; it is a lamp and a light; it opens the eyes, prepares the way of the Lord.

III. The ill use that his corrupt nature made of the law. Sin, taking occasion by the commandment, wrought in me all manner of concupiscence, v. 8. Paul had in him all manner of concupisence, as touching the righteousness of the law, blameless, and yet sensible of all manner of concupiscence. And it was sin that wrought it, indwelling sin, and it took occasion by the commandment. The corrupt nature would not have swelled and raged so much if it had not been for the restraints of the law. Ever since Adam ate forbidden fruit, we have all been fond of forbidden paths. Without the law sin was dead, as a snake in winter, which the sunbeams of the law quicken and irritate. It deceived me. Sin puts a cheat upon the sinner, and it is a fatal cheat, v. 11. By it slew me. It deceived and slew him. It wrought death in me by that which is good, v. 13. Nothing so good but a corrupt and vicious nature will pervert it, and make it an occasion of sin. Now in this sin appears sin. The worst thing that sin does is the perverting of the law. Thus the commandment, which was ordained to life, proved unto death, v. 10. The same word which to some is an occasion of life unto life is to others an occasion of death unto death. The same sun that makes the garden of flowers more fragrant makes the dunghill more noisome. The way to prevent this mischief is to bow our souls to the commanding authority of the law of God.

Here is a description of the conflict between grace and corruption in the heart, and it is applicable two ways: 1. To the struggles that are in a convinced soul, but yet unregenerate, in the person of whom it is supposed, by some, that Paul speaks. 2. To the struggles that are in a renewed sanctified soul, but yet in a state of imperfection, as other apprehend. And a great controversy there is of which of these we are to understand the apostle here.

I. Apply it to the struggles that are felt in a convinced soul, that is yet in a state of sin, knows his Lord's will, but does it not, continues a slave to his reigning lusts. The apostle had said (ch. vi. 14), Sin shall not have dominion, because you are not under the law, but under grace, for the proof of which he here shows that a man under the law, and not under grace, may be under the dominion of sin. The law may discover sin, and convince of sin, but it cannot conquer and subdue sin. It discovers the defilement but will not wash it off. It makes a man weary and heavy laden (Matt. xi. 28), burdens him with his sin; and yet it yields no help towards the shaking off of that burden; this is to be had only in Christ. The law may make a man cry out, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me? and yet leave him thus fettered. Now a soul advanced thus far by the law is in a fair way towards a state of liberty by Christ, though many rest here and go no further. It is possible for a man to go to hell with his eyes open, and to carry about with him a self-accusing conscience, even in the service of the devil. He may consent to the law that it is good, may have that within him that witnesses against sin and for holiness; and yet all this overpowered by the reigning love of sin. Drunkards and unclean persons have some faint desires to leave off their sins, and yet persist in them. Of such as these there are many that will needs have all this understood. It is very hard to imagine why, if the apostle intended this, he should speak all along in his own person; and not only so, but in the present tense.

II. It seems rather to be understood of the struggles that are maintained between grace and corruption in sanctified souls. That there are remainders of indwelling corruption, even where there is a living principle of grace, is past dispute. If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, 1 John i. 8, 10. That true grace strives against these sins and corruptions is likewise certain (Gal. v. 17): The flesh lusteth against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh; and these are contrary the one to the other, so that you cannot do the things that you would. And his design is further to open the nature of sanctification, that it does not attain to a sinless perfection in this life. That which we do sincerely strive against, shall not be laid to our charge, and through grace the victory is sure at last.

1. What he complains of—the remainder of indwelling corruptions. The law is insufficient to justify even a regenerate man, which is not the fault of the law, but of our own corrupt nature, which cannot fulfil the law. Observe the particulars of this complaint. (1) I am carnal, sold under sin, v. 14. Even where there is spiritual life there are remainders of carnal affections, and so far a man may be sold under sin. (2) What I would, that I do not; but what I hate, that do I, v. 15. And to the same purport, v. 19, 21, When I would do good, evil is present with me. He was pressing forward towards perfection, yet he acknowledges that he had not already attained, neither was already perfect, Phil. iii. 12. Fain he would perfectly do the will of God, but his corrupt nature drew him another way: it was like the bias in a bowl, which, when it is thrown straight, yet draws it aside. (3) In me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good, v. 18. There is no good to be expected, any more than one would expect good corn growing upon a rock. As the new nature cannot commit sin (1 John iii. 9), so the flesh, the old nature, cannot perform a good duty. How should it? For the flesh serveth the law of sin (v. 25). (4) I see another law in my members warring against the law of my mind, v. 23. Christ having set up his throne in his heart, it was only the rebellious members of the body that were the instruments of sin—all that corrupt nature which is the seat not only of sensual but of more refined lusts. This wars against the law of the mind, the new nature, to which corrupt disposition and inclination are as great a burden and grief as the worst drudgery and captivity could be. It brings me into captivity. To the same purport (v. 25). With the flesh I serve the law of sin, the unregenerate part, is continually working towards sin. (5) His general complaint we have v. 24, O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death? The thing he complains of is a body of death; either the body of flesh, which is a mortal dying body, or the body of sin, the corrupt nature, which tends to death. It was as troublesome to Paul as if he had had a dead body tied to him. This made him cry out, O wretched man that I am! Had I been required to speak of Paul, I should have said, "O blessed man that thou art." But in his own account he was a wretched man, because of the corruption of nature. Who shall deliver me? He speaks like one that was sick of it. The remainders of indwelling sin are a very grievous burden to a gracious soul.

2. What he comforts himself with. Three things comforted him:

(1) His conscience witnessed for him that he had a good principle ruling and prevailing in him, notwithstanding. The rule of this good principle which he had was the law of God, to which he here speaks of having a threefold regard. [1] I consent unto the law that it is good, v. 16. Here is the approbation of the judgment. Wherever there is grace there is not only a dread of the severity of the law, but a consent to the goodness of the law. This is a sign that the law is written in the heart. The sanctified judgment not only concurs to the equity of the law, but to the excellency of it. [2] I delight in the law of God after the inward man, v. 22. He delighted not only in the promises of the word, but in the precepts and prohibitions of the word. All that are born again do truly delight in the law of God, never better pleased than when heart and life are in the strictest conformity to the law and will of God. After the inward man; First, The mind or rational faculties. The soul is the inward man, and that is the seat of gracious delights, which are therefore sincere and serious, but secret. Secondly, The new nature. The new man is called the inner man (Eph. iii. 16). [3] With the mind I myself serve the law of God, v. 25. It is not enough to consent to the law, and to delight in the law, but we must serve the law. Thus it was with Paul's mind; this it is with every sanctified renewed mind.

(2) The fault lay in that corruption of his nature which he did really bewail and strive against: It is no more I that do it, but sin that dwelleth in me. This he mentions twice (v. 17, 20), not as an excuse for the guilt of sin, but that he might not sink in despair, but take comfort from the covenant of grace, which accepts the willingness of the spirit, and has provided pardon for the weakness of the flesh. He here professes his dissent from the law of sin. "It is not I; it is against my mind that it is done."

(3) His great comfort lay in Jesus Christ (v. 25) I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord. In the midst of his complaints he breaks out into praises. It is a special remedy against fears and sorrows to be much in praise: many a poor, drooping soul hath found it so. Who shall deliver me? says he (v. 24), as one at a loss for help. At length he finds an all-sufficient friend, even Jesus Christ. If it were not for Christ, this iniquity that dwells in us would certainly be our ruin. It is Christ that has purchased deliverance for us in due time. Blessed be God that giveth us this victory through our Lord Jesus Christ!

CHAP. VIII

The apostle, in this chapter, applies himself to the consolation of the Lord's people. It is the will of God that his people should be a comforted people. Many of the people of God have, accordingly, found this chapter a well-spring of comfort to their souls, living and dying. I. The particular instances of Christians' privileges, ver. 1–28. II. The ground thereof laid in predestination, ver. 29, 30. III. The apostle's triumph herein, in the name of all the saints ver. 31, to the end.

Verses 1–9

I. The apostle here begins with one signal privilege of true Christians, and describes the character of those to whom it belongs: There is therefore now no condemnation to those that are in Christ Jesus, v. 1. This is his triumph after that melancholy complaint and conflict. The complaint he takes to himself, but humbly transfers the comfort to all true believers. It is the unspeakable privilege of all those that are in Christ Jesus that there is therefore now no condemnation to them. He does not say, "There is no accusation against them", for this there is; but the accusation is thrown out. He does not say, "There is nothing in them that deserves condemnation", for this there is, and they see it, and own it; but it shall not be their ruin. He does not say, "There is no cross, no affliction to them", for this there may be; but no condemnation. Now this arises from their being in Christ Jesus; by virtue of their union with him through faith they are thus secured. It is the undoubted character of all those who are so in Christ Jesus that they walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit. The character is given from their walk, not from any one particular act.

II. How we come by this great privilege, and how we may answer this character.

1. How we come by these privileges—the privilege of justification, the privilege of sanctification. The law could not do it, v. 3. It could neither justify nor sanctify. The law made nothing perfect: It was weak. Yet that weakness was not through any defect in the law, but through the flesh, through the corruption of human nature. In case of failure, the law, as a covenant of works, made no provision, and so left us as it found us. The law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus does it, v. 2. The covenant of grace in Christ is a treasury of merit and grace, and thence we receive pardon and a new nature, are freed from the law of sin and death, both from the guilt and power of sin. We are under another covenant, under the law of the Spirit, the law that gives the Spirit, spiritual life to qualify us for eternal. The foundation of this freedom is laid in Christ's undertaking for us, of which he speaks, v. 3, God sending his own Son. When the law failed, God provided another method. Christ comes to do that which the law could not do. The best exposition of this verse we have Heb. x. 1–10. (1) How Christ appeared: In the likeness of sinful flesh. Not sinful, but in the likeness of that flesh. He took upon him that nature which was corrupt, though perfectly abstracted from the corruptions of it. It was great condescension that he who was God should be made in the likeness of flesh; but much greater that he who was holy should be made in the likeness of sinful flesh. And for sin. God sent him in the likeness of sinful flesh, and as a sacrifice for sin. (2) What was done by this appearance of his: Sin was condemned. For all that are Christ's both the damning and the domineering power of sin is broken. Though it live and remain, its life in the saints is still but like that of a condemned malefactor. The condemning of sin saved the sinner from condemnation. Christ was made sin for us (2 Cor. v. 21). When he was condemned, sin was condemned in the flesh of Christ. So was satisfaction made to divine justice, and way made for the salvation of the sinner. (3) The happy effect of this upon us (v. 4): That the righteousness of the law might be fulfilled in us. A righteousness of satisfaction for the breach of the law is fulfilled by the imputation of Christ's perfect righteousness. A righteousness of obedience to the law is fulfilled in us, when by the Spirit the law of love is written upon the heart, and that love is the fulfilling of the law, ch. xiii. 10. Us who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. This is the description of all those that are interested in this privilege.

2. How we may answer to this character, v. 5, &c.

(1) By looking to our minds. By examining what we mind, the things of the flesh or the things of the spirit. The favour of God, the welfare of the soul, the concerns of eternity, are the things of the Spirit. The man is as the mind is. The mind is the forge of thoughts. Which way do the thoughts move with most pleasure? The mind is the seat of wisdom. Whether are we more wise for the world or for our souls? They savour the things of the flesh; so the word is rendered, Matt. xvi. 23. It is a great matter what truths, what tidings, what comforts, we do most relish. Now, to caution us against this carnal-mindedness, he shows the great misery of it, and compares it with the unspeakable comfort of spiritual-mindedness. [1] It is death, v. 6. It is the death of the soul; for it is its alienation from God, in union and communion with whom the life of the soul consists. A carnal soul is a dead soul, dead as a soul can die. Death includes all misery; carnal souls are miserable souls. But to be spiritually minded is life and peace. A sanctified soul is a living soul, and that life is peace; it is a very comfortable life. It is life and peace in the other world, as well as in this. Spiritual-mindedness is eternal life and peace begun. [2] It is enmity to God (v. 7) and this is worse than the former. The former speaks the carnal sinner a dead man, but this speaks him a devil of a man. It is not only the alienation of the soul from God, but the opposition of the soul against God. To prove this, he urges that it is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. The holiness of the law of God, and the unholiness of the carnal mind, are as irreconcilable as light and darkness. The carnal man may, by the power of divine grace, be made subject to the law of God, but the carnal mind never can; this must be broken and expelled. Hence he infers (v. 8), Those that are in the flesh cannot please God. Pleasing God is our highest end, of which those that are in the flesh cannot but fall short; they cannot please him, nay, they cannot but displease him.

(2) By enquiring whether we have the Spirit of God and Christ, or not (v. 9): You are not in the flesh, but in the Spirit. It denotes our being overcome and subdued by one of these principles. Now the great question is whether we are in the flesh or in the Spirit; and how may we come to know it? Why, by enquiring whether the Spirit of God dwell in us. The Spirit visits many that are unregenerate; but in all that are sanctified he dwells. Shall we put this question to our own hearts, Who dwells, who rules, who keeps house, here? To this he subjoins a general rule of trial: If any man has not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his. To be Christ's is a privilege and honour which many pretend to that have no part nor lot in the matter. None are his but those that have his Spirit; that are spirited as he was spirited. The frame and disposition of our souls must be conformable to Christ's pattern. That are actuated and guided by the Holy Spirit of God. Having the Spirit of Christ is the same with having the Spirit of God to dwell in us. All that are actuated by the Spirit of God as their rule are conformable to the spirit of Christ as their pattern.

Verses 10–16

Two more excellent benefits, which belong to true believers.

I. Life. The happiness is not barely a negative happiness, not to be condemned; but it is positive (v. 10, 11): If Christ be in you. Now we are here told what becomes of the bodies and souls of those in whom Christ is.

1. We cannot say but that the body is dead; it is a frail, mortal, dying body. In the midst of life we are in death: be our bodies ever so strong, they are as good as dead, and this because of sin. It is sin that kills the body. Methinks, were there no other argument, love to our bodies should make us hate sin, because it is such an enemy to our bodies.

2. But the spirit, that is life. The life of the saint lies in the soul, while the life of the sinner goes no further than the body. When the body dies the spirit is life. Death to the saints is but the freeing of the heaven-born spirit from the clog and load of this body, that it may be fit to partake of eternal life. And this because of righteousness. The righteousness of Christ imputed to them secures the soul from death; the righteousness of Christ inherent in them, preserves it, and at death elevates it, and makes it meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light.

3. There is a life reserved too for the poor body at last: He shall also quicken your mortal bodies, v. 11. The body shall be reunited to the soul, and clothed with a glory agreeable to it. Two great assurances of the resurrection of the body are mentioned: (1) The resurrection of Christ: He that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken. Christ rose as the forerunner of all the saints, 1 Cor. xv. 20. It is in the virtue of Christ's resurrection that we shall rise. (2) The indwelling of the Spirit. The same Spirit that raiseth the soul now will raise the body shortly: By his Spirit that dwelleth in you. The Spirit, breathing upon dead and dry bones, will make them live, and the saints even in their flesh shall see God. Hence the apostle infers how much it is our duty to walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit, v. 12, 13. Two motives he mentions here: [1] We are not debtors to the flesh. We are indeed bound to clothe, and feed, and take care of the body, as a servant to the soul in the service of God, but no further. We are not debtors to it. We are debtors to Christ and to the Spirit: there we owe our all. See 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20. [2] Consider what will be at the end of the way. If you live after the flesh, you shall die; that is, die eternally. Dying indeed is the soul's dying: the death of the saints is but a sleep. But, on the other hand, You shall live, that is the true life: If you through the Spirit mortify the deeds of the body. We cannot do it without the Spirit working it in us, and the Spirit will not do it without our doing our endeavour. We are put upon this dilemma, either to displease the body or destroy the soul.

II. The Spirit of adoption v. 14–16.

1. All that are Christ's are taken into the relation of children to God, v. 14. (1) Their property: They are led by the Spirit of God, not driven as beasts, but led as rational creatures. It is the undoubted character of all true believers that they are led by the Spirit of God. They do in their obedience follow that guidance, and are sweetly led into all truth and all duty. (2) Their privilege: They are the sons of God, owned and loved by him as his children.

2. And those that are the sons of God have the Spirit,

(1) To work in them the disposition of children. You have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, v. 15. Understand it, First, Of that spirit of bondage which the Old Testament church was under, by reason of the darkness of that dispensation. You are not under that dispensation, you have not received that spirit. Secondly, Of that spirit of bondage which many of the saints themselves were under at their conversion. Then the Spirit himself was to the saints a spirit of bondage: "But," says the apostle, "with you this is over." But you have received the Spirit of adoption. It is God's prerogative, when he adopts, to give a spirit of adoption—the nature of children. A sanctified soul bears the image of God, as the child bears the image of the father. Whereby we cry, Abba, Father. Praying is here called crying. Children that cannot speak vent their desires by crying. Now, the Spirit teaches us in prayer to come to God as a Father. And why both, Abba, Father? Because Christ said so in prayer (Mark xiv. 36), Abba, Father. It denotes an affectionate endearing importunity. Little children, begging of their parents, can say little but Father, Father, and that is rhetoric enough. It also denotes that the adoption is common both to Jews and Gentiles.

(2) To witness to the relation of children, v. 16. Beareth witness with our spirit. Many speak peace to themselves to whom the God of heaven does not speak peace. But those that are sanctified have God's Spirit witnessing with their spirits. This testimony is always agreeable to the written word, and is therefore always grounded upon sanctification. The Spirit witnesses to none the privileges of chidren who have not the nature and disposition of children.

A fourth happiness of believers, namely, a title to the future glory. If children, then heirs, v. 17. In earthly inheritances this rule does not hold, only the first-born are heirs. Heaven is an inheritance that all the saints are heirs to. They do not come to it by any merit of their own; but as heirs, purely by the act of God. Their present state is a state of education and preparation for the inheritance. 1. Heirs of God. The Lord himself is the portion of the saints' inheritance. The vision of God and the fruition of God make up the inheritance the saints are heirs to. 2. Joint-heirs with Christ. True believers shall inherit all things. Those that now partake of the Spirit of Christ, as his brethren, shall partake of his glory. Lord, what is man, that thou shouldst thus magnify him! Now this future glory is the reward of present sufferings, the accomplishment of present hopes.

I. The reward of the saints' present sufferings. If so be that we suffer with him (v. 17), or forasmuch as we suffer with him. The state of the church in this world always is an afflicted state. He tells them that they suffered with Christ, and should be glorified with him. Though we may be losers for him, we shall not be losers by him in the end. This the gospel is filled with the assurances of. He holds the balance (v. 18), in a comparison between the two. 1. In one scale he puts the sufferings of this present time. The sufferings of the saints last no longer than the present time (2 Cor. iv. 17), light affliction, and but for a moment. So that on the sufferings he writes tekel, weighed in the balance and found light. 2. In the other scale he puts the glory, and finds that an exceeding and eternal weight: Glory that shall be revealed. In our present state we come short, not only in the enjoyment, but in the knowledge of that glory: it shall be revealed. It surpasses all that we have yet seen and known. There is something to come, something behind the curtain, that will outshine all. Shall be revealed in us; not only revealed to us, to be seen, but revealed in us, to be enjoyed. He concludes the sufferings not worthy to be compared with the glory. They cannot merit that glory; and, if suffering for Christ will not merit, much less will doing. The sufferings are small and short, and concern the body only; but the glory is rich and great, and concerns the soul, and is eternal. This he reckons as an arithmetician that is balancing an account. He first sums up what is disbursed for Christ in the sufferings of this present time, and finds they come to very little; he then sums up what is secured to us by Christ in the glory that shall be revealed, and this he finds to be an infinite sum. And who would be afraid then to suffer for Christ, who as he is beforehand with us in suffering, so he will not be behind-hand with us in recompence? He could reckon not by art only, but by experience, for he knew both. And, upon the view of both, he gives this judgment here. The reproach of Christ appears riches to those who have respect to the recompence of reward.

II. The accomplishment of the saints' present hopes and expectations, v. 19, &c. As the saints are suffering for it, so they are waiting for it. He will establish that word unto his servants on which he has caused them to hope. If hope deferred makes the heart sick, surely when the desire comes it will be a tree of life. Now he observes an expectation of this glory.

1. In the creatures, v. 19–22. That must needs be a great, a transcendent glory, which all the creatures are so earnestly expecting and longing for. By the creature here we understand the whole frame of nature, the whole creation. The sense of the apostle in these four verses we may take in the following observations: (1) There is a present vanity to which the creature, by reason of the sin of man, is made subject, v. 20. When man sinned, the ground was cursed for man's sake, and with it all the creatures. Under the bondage of corruption, v. 21. The creation is sullied and stained, much of the beauty of the world gone. And it is not the least part of their bondage that they are used, or abused rather, by men as instruments of sin. And this not willingly, not of their own choice. All the creatures desire their own perfection. When they are made instruments of sin it is not willingly. They are thus captivated, not for any sin of their own, but for man's sin: By reason of him who hath subjected the same. And this yoke (poor creatures) they bear in hope that it will not be so always. We have reason to pity the poor creatures that for our sin have become subject to vanity. (2) The creatures groan and travail in pain together under this vanity and corruption, v. 22. Sin is a burden to the whole creation. There is a general outcry of the whole creation aganst the sin of man. (3) The creature shall be delivered from this bondage into the glorious liberty of the children of God (v. 21)—they shall no more be subject to vanity and corruption. This lower world shall be renewed: when there will be new heavens there will be a new earth. (4) The creature doth therefore earnestly expect the manifestation of the children of God, v. 19. Now the saints are God's hidden ones, the wheat seems lost in a heap of chaff; but then they shall be manifested. The children of God shall appear in their own colours. And this redemption of the creature is reserved till then. This the whole creation longs for; and it may serve as a reason why now a good man should be merciful to his beast.

2. In the saints, who are new creatures, v. 23–25. (1) The grounds of this expectation in the saints. It is our having received the first-fruits of the spirit. Grace is the first-fruits of glory, it is glory begun. We, having received such clusters in this wilderness, cannot but long for the full vintage in the heavenly Canaan. Not only they—not only the creatures, but even we cannot but long for something more and greater. In having the first-fruits of the Spirit we have that which is very precious, but we have not all we would have. We groan within ourselves with silent groans, which pierce heaven soonest of all. Or, We groan among ourselves. It is the unanimous vote of the whole church. Present receivings and comforts are consistent with a great many groans; as the throes of a woman in travail—groans that are symptoms of life, not of death. (2) The object of this expectation. The adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body. The resurrection is here called the redemption of the body. It shall then be rescued from the power of death and the grave. It shall be made like that glorious body of Christ, Phil. iii. 21; 1 Cor. xv. 42. This is called the adoption. It is the adoption manifested before all the world, angels and men. As Christ was, so the saints will be, declared to be the sons of God with power, by the resurrection from the dead, ch. i. 4. It is the adoption perfected and completed. The children of God have bodies as well as souls; and, till those bodies are brought into the glorious liberty of the children of God, the adoption is not perfect. (3) The agreeableness of this to our present state, v. 24, 25. Our happiness is not in present possession: We are saved by hope. Our reward is out of sight. Those that will deal with God must deal upon trust. Faith respects the promise, hope the thing promised. Faith is the evidence, hope the expectation, of things not seen. Faith is the mother of hope. We do with patience wait. In hoping for this glory we have need of patience. Our way is rough and long, though he seem to tarry, it becomes us to wait for him.

Verses 26–28

Two privileges more to which true Christians are entitled:

I. The help of the Spirit in prayer.

1. Our weakness in prayer: We know not what we should pray for as we ought. As to the matter of our requests, we know not what to ask. We are short-sighted. We are like foolish children, that are ready to cry for fruit before it is ripe and fit for them. As to the manner, we know not how to pray as we ought. The apostle speaks of this in the first person: We know not. He puts himself among the rest. If so great a saint as Paul knew not what to pray for, what little reason have we to go forth about that duty in our own strength!

2. The assistances which the Spirit gives us. He helps our infirmities, meant especially of our praying infirmities. The Spirit in the word helps. The Spirit in the heart helps; for this end the Holy Ghost was poured out. Helpeth, heaves with us, over against us, helps as we help one that would lift up a burden, by lifting over against him at the other end. We must not sit still, and expect that the Spirit should do all; when the Spirit goes before us we must bestir ourselves. We cannot without God, and he will not without us. The Spirit itself makes intercession for us. Christ intercedes for us in heaven, the Spirit intercedes for us in our hearts; so graciously has God provided for the encouragement of the praying remnant. Now this intercession which the Spirit makes is, (1) With groanings that cannot be uttered. There may be praying in the Spirit where there is not a word spoken. It is not the rhetoric and eloquence, but the faith and fervency, of our prayers, that the Spirit works, in us. Cannot be uttered; we know not what to say, nor how to express ourselves. When we can but cry, Abba, Father, with a holy humble boldness, this is the work of the Spirit. (2) According to the will of God, v. 27. The Spirit interceding in us evermore melts our wills into the will of God.

3. The sure success of these intercessions: He that searches the heart knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, v. 27. To a hypocrite, all whose religion lies in his tongue, nothing is more dreadful than that God searches the heart. To a sincere Christian, who makes heart-work of his duty, nothing is more comfortable. He will hear and answer those desires which we want words to express. He knows what we have need of before we ask. Christ had said, "Whatever you ask the Father according to his will he will give you." But how shall we learn to ask according to his will. Why, the Spirit will teach us that.

II. The concurrence of all providences for the good of those that are Christ's, v. 28. Notwithstanding all these privileges, we see believers compassed about with manifold afflictions, but in this the Spirit's intercession is always effectual, that all this is working together for their good.

1. The character of the saints, who are interested in this privilege. They love God. Those that love God make the best of all he does, and take all in good part. They are the called according to his purpose, not according to any merit or desert of ours, but according to God's own gracious purpose.

2. The privilege of the saints, that all things work together for good to them. All the providences of God are theirs—merciful providences, afflicting providences. They are all for good; perhaps for temporal good, at least, for spiritual and eternal good. Either directly or indirectly, every providence has a tendency to the spiritual good of those that love God. They work together, as several ingredients in a medicine concur to answer the intention. He worketh all things together for good; so some read it. All this we know—know it for a certainty, from the word of God, from our own experience, and from the experience of all the saints.

Verses 29, 30

The apostle, having reckoned up so many ingredients of the happiness of true believers, comes here to represent the ground of them all, which he lays in predestination. He here sets before us the order of the causes of our salvation, a golden chain, which cannot be broken. There are four links of it:

I. Whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son. All that God designed for glory and happiness as the end he decreed to grace and holiness as the way. God's foreknowledge of the saints is the same with that everlasting love wherewith he is said to have loved them. Whom he did foreknow, that is, whom he designed for his friends and favourites. Now those whom God thus foreknew he did predestinate to be conformed to Christ. 1. Holiness consists in our conformity to the image of Christ. This takes in the whole of sanctification. Christ is the express image of his Father, and the saints are conformed to the image of Christ. Thus it is that we have God's love restored to us and God's likeness renewed upon us. 2. All that God hath from eternity foreknown with favour he hath predestinated to this conformity. It is not we that can conform ourselves to Christ. None can know their election but by their conformity to the image of Christ; for all that are chosen are chosen to sanctification. 3. That which is herein chiefly designed is the honour of Jesus Christ, that he might be the first-born among many brethren; that is, that Christ might have the honour of being the great pattern, might have pre-eminence. And blessed be God that there are many brethren; though they seem but a few in one place at one time, yet, when they come all together, they will be a great many. In spite of all the opposition of the powers of darkness, Christ will be the first-born among many, very many brethren.

II. Whom he did predestinate those he also called, not only with the external call, but with the internal and effectual call. The former comes to the ear only, but this to the heart. The call is then effectual when we come at the call; and we then come at the call when the Spirit draws us, persuades and enables us to embrace Christ in the promises. It is an effectual call from self and earth to God, and Christ—from sin and vanity to grace, and holiness. This is the gospel call. Them he called, that the purpose of God, according to election, might stand.

III. Whom he called those he also justified. All that are effectually called are accepted as righteous through Jesus Christ. They are no longer dealt with as criminals, but owned and loved as friends and favourites.

IV. Whom he justified those he also glorified. The power of corruption being broken in effectual calling, and the guilt of sin removed in justification, nothing can come between that soul and glory. It is spoken of as a thing done: He glorified, because of the certainty of it; he hath saved us. God's design of love has its full accomplishment. This was what he aimed at all along—to bring them to heaven. Are they chosen? It is to salvation. Called? It is to his kingdom and glory. Begotten again? It is to an inheritance incorruptible. Afflicted? It is to work for them this exceeding and eternal weight of glory. The author of all these is the same. God himself hath undertaken the doing of it from first to last. This is a mighty encouragement to our faith and hope.

The apostle closes with a holy triumph, in the name of all the saints. What shall we then say to these things? What use shall we make of all that has been said? He speaks as one wondering at the height and depth, and length and breadth, of the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge. The more we know of other things the less we wonder at them; but the further we are led into an acquaintance with gospel mysteries the more we are affected with the admiration of them. If ever Paul rode in a triumphant chariot on this side of heaven, here it was. He here makes a challenge, dares all the enemies of the saints to do their worst: If God be for us, who can be against us? This includes all, that God is for us. All that he is, and has, and does, is for his people. And, if so, who can be against us, so as to prevail against us? Be they ever so strong, ever so many, what can they do? While God is for us, and we keep in his love, we may defy all the powers of darkness. Let Satan do his worst, he is chained. Who then dares fight against us, while God himself is fighting for us? And this we say to these things.

I. We have supplies ready in all our wants (v. 32): He that spared, &c. Who can cut off our streams, while we have a fountain to go to? 1. What God has done for us, on which our hopes are built: He spared not his own Son. Now we may know that he loves us, in that he hath not withheld his Son. If nothing less will save man, rather than man shall perish let him go. Thus did he deliver him up for us all, not only for our good, but in our stead, to be a propitiation for sin. He did not spare his own Son that served him, that he might spare us. 2. What we may therefore expect he will do: He will with him freely give us all things. It is implied that he will give us Christ, for other things are bestowed with him. He will with him freely give us all things, all good things, and more we should not desire. Freely, without reluctancy; and freely, without recompence. How shall he not? Can it be imagined that he should give so great a gift for us when we were enemies, and should deny us any good thing, now that we are friends and children? He that hath prepared a crown and kingdom for us will be sure to give us enough to bear our charges in the way to it.

II. We have an answer ready to all accusations and a security against all condemnations (v. 33, 34): Who shall lay anything? This is enough, It is God that justifieth. If God justifies, this answers all. We may challenge all our accusers to come and put in their charge. This overthrows them all; it is God, the righteous faithful God, that justifieth. Who is he that condemneth? Though they cannot make good the charge, yet they will be ready to condemn; but we have a plea ready which cannot be overruled. It is Christ that died, &c. It is by Christ, and our union with him, that we are thus secured. 1. His death: It is Christ that died. By the merit of his death he paid our debt. 2. His resurrection: Yea, rather, that has risen again. This is a much greater encouragement. Therefore the apostle mentions it with a yea, rather. If he had died, and not risen again, we had been where we were. 3. His sitting at the right hand of God: He is even at the right hand of God a mighty encouragement to us in reference to all accusations, that we have a friend, such a friend, in court. Our friend is himself the judge. 4. The intercession which he makes there. He is there, not unconcerned about us, not forgetful of us, but making intercession. And is not this abundant matter for comfort? What room is left for doubting and disquietment? Some understand the accusation and condemnation here spoken of as that which the suffering saints met with from men. The primitive Christians had many black crimes laid to their charge. For these the ruling powers condemned them: "But no matter for that" (says the apostle); "while we stand right at God's bar it is of no great moment how we stand at men's."

III. We have good assurance of our preservation and continuance in this blessed state, v. 35, to the end. The fears of the saints lest they should lose their hold of Christ are often very discouraging and disquieting, but here is that which may silence their fears, that nothing can separate them.

1. A daring challenge to all the enemies of the saints to separate them, if they could, from the love of Christ. Who shall? None shall, v. 35–37. God having manifested his love in giving his own Son for us, can we imagine that anything else should divert or dissolve that love?

(1) The present calamities of Christ's beloved ones supposed—that they meet with tribulation, are in distress, are followed with persecution from an angry malicious world that always hated those whom Christ loved, pinched with famine, and starved with nakedness, exposed to the greatest perils, the sword of the magistrate drawn against them. Can a case be supposed more black and dismal? It is illustrated (v. 36) by a passage quoted from Ps. xliv. 22, For thy sake we are killed all the day long, that is, continually exposed to and expecting the fatal stroke. Accounted as sheep for the slaughter; they make no more of killing a Christian than of butchering a sheep.

(2) The inability of all these things to separate us from the love of Christ. All this will not cut the bond of love and friendship that is between Christ and true believers. [1] Christ doth not, will not, love us the less for all this. They are neither a cause nor an evidence of the abatement of his love. These things separate us from the love of other friends. When Paul was brought before Nero all men forsook him, but then the Lord stood by him, 2 Tim. iv. 16, 17. Whatever persecuting enemies may rob us of, they cannot rob us of the love of Christ, and therefore, let them do their worst, they cannot make a true believer miserable. [2] We do not, will not, love him the less for this, because we do not think that he loves us the less. A true Christian loves Christ never the less though he suffer for him, thinks never the worse of Christ though he lose all for him.

(3) The triumph of believers in this (v. 37): Nay, in all these things we are more than conquerors.

[1] We are conquerors. A strange way of conquering, but it was Christ's way. It is a surer and a nobler way of conquest by faith and patience than by fire and sword. The enemies have sometimes confessed themselves baffled and overcome by the invincible courage and constancy of the martyrs.

[2] We are more than conquerors. Those are more than conquerors that conquer, First, With little loss. Many conquests are dearly bought; but what do the suffering saints lose? Why, they lose that which the gold loses in the furnace, nothing but the dross. Secondly, With great gain. The spoils are exceedingly rich; glory, honour, and peace, a crown of righteousness that fades not away. In this the suffering saints have triumphed. As afflictions abound, consolations much more abound, 2 Cor. i. 5. Those that have gone smiling to the stake, and stood singing in the flames —these were more than conquerors.

[3] It is only through Christ that loved us. We are conquerors, not in our own strength, but in the grace that is in Christ Jesus. We are conquerors by virtue of Christ's victory. We have nothing to do but to pursue the victory, and to divide the spoil, and so are more than conquerors.

2. A direct and positive conclusion of the whole matter: For I am persuaded, v. 38, 39. And here he enumerates all those things which might separate between Christ and believers, and concludes that it could not be done. (1) Neither death nor life, neither the fear of death nor the hope of life. We shall not be separated from that love either in death or in life. (2) Nor angels, nor principalities, nor powers. The good angels will not, the bad shall not; and neither can. The good angels are engaged friends, the bad are restrained enemies. (3) Nor things present, nor things to come—neither the sense of troubles present nor the fear of troubles to come. Time shall not separate us, eternity shall not, from the love of Christ, whose favour is twisted in with both present things and things to come. (4) Nor height, nor depth—neither the height of prosperity, nor the depth of adversity, nothing from heaven above, nothing on earth below. (5) Nor any other creature—anything than can be named or thought of. It will not, it cannot, separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord. Nothing does it, can do it, but sin. This is the ground of the steadfastness of the love, because Jesus Christ, in whom he loves us, is the same yesterday, today and for ever.

CHAP. IX

What becomes of the Jews, especially those of them that do not embrace Christ, nor believe the gospel? What becomes of the promise made to the fathers, which entailed salvation upon the Jews? That the consequence of the rejection of the unbelieving Jews follows from Paul's doctrine he grants, but endeavours to soften and mollify, ver. 1–5. But that from this it follows that the word of God takes no effect, he denies (ver. 6), and proves the denial in the rest of the chapter, which serves likewise to illustrate the great doctrine of predestination.

Verses 1–5

The apostles' solemn profession of a great concern for the nation and people of the Jews—that he was heartily troubled that so many of them were enemies to the gospel. For this he had great heaviness and continual sorrow. It is wisdom as much as may be to mollify those truths which sound harshly: dip the nail in oil, it will drive the better. He introduces his discourse with this affectionate profession, that they might not think he triumphed over the rejected Jews. Paul was so far from desiring it that he most patheticaly deprecates it.

I. He asserts it with a solemn protestation (v. 1): I say the truth in Christ, "I speak it as one of God's people, children that will not lie. I appeal to Christ concerning it." He appeals likewise to his own conscience. That which he was going to assert was a secret; it was concerning a sorrow in his heart to which none was a capable competent witness but God and his own conscience.—That I have great heaviness, v. 2. The very mention of it was unpleasant.

II. He backs it with a very serious imprecation out of love to the Jews. I could wish; he does not say, I do wish, for it was no proper means appointed for such an end; but, if it were, I could wish that myself were accursed from Christ for my brethren—a very high pang of zeal and affection for his countrymen. Love is apt to be thus bold, and venturous, and self-denying. Because the glory of God's grace in the salvation of many is to be preferred before the welfare and happiness of a single person, Paul would be content to forego all his own happiness to purchase theirs. 1. He would be content to be cut off from the land of the living, as an anathema. They thirsted for his blood, persecuted him as the most obnoxious person in the world. "I am willing to bear all this, and a great deal more, for your good. Your unbelief and rejection create in my heart a heaviness so much greater than all these troubles can that I could look upon them not only as tolerable, but as desirable, rather than this rejection." 2. He would be content to be excommunicated from the society of the faithful if that would do them any good. He could wish himself no more remembered among the saints. He would be content to have his name buried in oblivion or reproach, for the good of the Jews. 3. He could be content to be cut off from all his share of happiness in Christ, if that might be a means of their salvation.

III. He gives us the reason of this affection and concern.

1. Because of their relation to them: My brethren, my kinsmen, according to the flesh. Though they were very bitter against him upon all occasions, thus respectfully does he speak of them. It shows him to be a man of forgiving spirit. My kinsmen. Paul was a Hebrew of the Hebrews. We ought to be in a special manner concerned for the spiritual good of our relations. Concerning them, and our usefulness to them, we must in a special manner give account.

2. Especially because of their relation to God (v. 4, 5): Who are Israelites, distinguished by visible church privileges, many of which are here mentioned: (1) The adoption; not that which is saving, and which entitles to eternal happiness, but that which was external. (2) And the glory. The many tokens of the divine presence and guidance, the cloud, the Shechinah, the distinguishing favours conferred upon them—these were the glory. (3) And the covenants—the covenant made with Abraham, and often renewed with his seed upon divers occasions. Still these pertained to Israel. (4) And the giving of the law. It is a great privilege to have the law of God among us, and it is to be accounted so. (5) And the services of God. They had the ordinances of God's worship among them—the temple, the altars, the priests, the sacrifices, the feasts. While other nations were worshipping and serving stocks, and stones, and devils, and they knew not what of other idols their own invention, the Israelites were serving the true God in the way of his own appointment. (6) And the promises—promises relating to the Messiah and the gospel state. The comfort of the promises is to be had in obedience to that law and attendance upon that service. (7) Whose are the fathers (v. 5), Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, that stood so high in the favour of God. It was for the fathers' sake that they were taken into covenant. (8) But the greatest honour of all was that of them as concerning the flesh, Christ came. This was the great privilege of the Jews, that Christ was of kin to them. Mentioning Christ, he interposes a very great word concerning him, that he is over all, God blessed for ever. It is a very full proof of the Godhead of Christ; he is not only over all, as Mediator, but he is God blessed for ever. It was likewise the honour of the Jews that, seeing God blessed for ever would be a man, he would be a Jew.

The rejection of the Jews, by the establishment of the gospel dispensation, did not at all invalidate the word of God's promise to the patriarchs: Not as though the word of God hath taken no effect (v. 6). We are not to ascribe inefficacy to any word of God: nothing that he has spoken does or can fall to the ground; see Isa. lv. 10, 11. This is to be understood especially of the promise of God, which may be to a wavering faith very doubtful; but it is not, it cannot be, made of no effect.

Now the difficulty is to reconcile the rejection of the unbelieving Jews with the word of God's promise. This he does in four ways: 1. By explaining the true meaning and intention of the promise, v. 6–13. 2. By asserting the absolute sovereignty of God, v. 14–24. 3. By showing how this rejection of the Jews, and the taking in of the Gentiles, were foretold in the Old Testament, v. 25–29. 4. By fixing the true reason of the Jews' rejection, v. 30, to the end.

In this paragraph the apostle explains the true meaning and intention of the promise. When we misunderstand the promise, no marvel if we are ready to quarrel with God about the accomplishment. When God said he would be a God to Abraham, and to his seed, he did not mean it of all his seed according to the flesh. He intended it with a limitation. And as from the beginning it was appropriated to Isaac and not to Ishmael, to Jacob and not to Esau, and yet for all this the word of God was not made of no effect; so now the same promise is appropriated to believing Jews that embrace Christ, and, though it throws off multitudes that refuse Christ, yet the promise is not therefore invalidated.

I. He lays down this proposition—that they are not all Israel who are of Israel (v. 6), neither because they are, &c., v. 7. They are not all really Israel that are so in name and profession. Grace does not run in the blood.

II. He proves this by instances. Some of Abraham's seed were chosen, and others not; God therein wrought according to the counsel of his own will.

1. He specifies the case of Isaac and Ishmael, both of them the seed of Abraham; and yet Isaac only taken into covenant with God, and Ishmael rejected. For this he quotes Gen. xxi. 12, In Isaac shall thy seed be called, because the covenant was to be established with Isaac, Gen. xvii. 19. The blessings wrapt up in that great word, being communicated by God as a benefactor, he was free to determine on what head they should rest, and accordingly entailed them upon Isaac. This he explains further (v. 8, 9). The children of the flesh, as such, are not therefore the children of God, for then Ishmael had put in a good claim. This remark comes home to the unbelieving Jews. They had confidence in the flesh. Ishmael was a child of the flesh, representing those that expect justification and salvation by their own strength and righteousness. The children of the promise are counted for the seed. Those that have the happiness of being counted for the seed have it not for the sake of any merit of their own, but purely by virtue of the promise. Isaac was a child of promise; this he proves, v. 9. He was also conceived and born by virtue of the promise, and so a proper type of those who are now counted for the seed, even true believers, who are born, not of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

2. The case of Jacob and Esau (v. 10–13), which is much stronger. There was a previous difference between Ishmael and Isaac, before Ishmael was cast out: Ishmael was of a fierce disposition, and had mocked or persecuted Isaac. But, in the case of Jacob and Esau, they were both the sons of Isaac by one mother. The difference was made between them by the divine counsel before they were born, or had done any good or evil. Both lay struggling alike in their mother's womb, when it was said, The elder shall serve the younger, that the purpose of God according to election might stand—that this great truth may be established, that God chooses some and refuses others by his own absolute and sovereign will. This difference that was put between Jacob and Esau he further illustrates by a quotation from Mal. i. 2, 3, where it is said, not of Jacob and Esau, but the Edomites and Israelites their posterity, Jacob have I loved, and Esau have I hated. The people of Israel were taken into the covenant, while the Edomites were rejected. Such a difference did God put between those two nations, that both descended from the loins of Abraham and Isaac, as at first there was a difference put between Jacob and Esau. (1) Some understand it of the election and rejection of conditions or qualifications. As God chose Isaac and Jacob, and rejected Ishmael and Esau, so he might and did choose faith to be the condition of salvation and reject the works of the law. (2) Others understand it of the election and rejection of particular persons—some loved, and others hated, from eternity. But the apostle speaks of Jacob and Esau, not in their own persons, but as ancestors. Nor does God condemn any merely because he will do it, without any reason taken from their own deserts. (3) Others therefore understand it of the election and rejection of people considered complexly. His design is to justify God, and his mercy and truth, in calling the Gentiles, while he suffered the obstinate part of the Jews to persist in unbelief. The choosing of Jacob the younger, and preferring him before Esau the elder (so crossing hands), were to intimate that the Jews, though the natural seed of Abraham, should be laid aside; and the Gentiles, who were as the younger brother, should be taken in in their stead. The Jews had for many ages been the favourites of heaven. Now that the gospel was preached, Christian churches (and in process of time Christian nations), become their successors in the divine favour.

The apostle comes here to maintain the absolute sovereignty of God, in disposing of the children of men. God is to be considered as an owner and benefactor, giving to the children of men such grace and favour as he has determined in and by his secret and eternal will.

Now this part of his discourse is in answer to two objections.

I. It might be objected, Is there unrighteousness with God? This the apostle startles at the thought of: God forbid! Far be it from us to think such a thing. He denies the consequences, and proves the denial.

1. In respect of those to whom he shows mercy, v. 15, 16. He quotes that scripture to show God's sovereignty in dispensing his favours (Exod. xxxiii. 19): I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious. All God's reasons of mercy are taken from within himself. He dispenses his gifts to whom he will, without giving us any reason. The expression is very emphatic, and the repetition makes it more so: I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, he will do what he will. Therefore God's mercy endures for ever, because the reason of it is fetched from within himself; therefore his gifts and callings are without repentance. Hence he infers (v. 16), It is not of him that willeth. It is not to be ascribed to the most generous desire, nor to the most industrious endeavour, of man, but only and purely to the free grace and mercy of God. In Jacob's case it was not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth; but only the mercy and grace of God. The reason why the unworthy, undeserving Gentiles are called, while the greatest part of the Jews are left to perish in unbelief, is not because those Gentiles were better deserving or better disposed for such a favour, but because of God's free grace that made that difference. Such is the method of God's grace towards all that partake of it, for he is found of those that sought him not (Isa. lxv. 1).

2. In respect of those who perish, v. 17. God's sovereignty is here discovered in the instance of Pharaoh. What God did with Pharaoh. He raised him up. Thus doth God raise up sinners in outward prosperity, external privileges. What he designed in it: That I might show my power in thee. God would, by all this, serve the honour of his name, and manifest his power. His conclusion concerning both these we have, v. 18. He hath mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth. The various dealings of God must be resolved into his absolute sovereignty. He is debtor to no man, his grace is his own; we have none of us deserved it, nay, we have all justly forfeited it a thousand times. Those who are saved must thank God only, and those who perish must thank themselves only. We are bound to do our utmost for the salvation of all we have to do with; but God is bound no further than he has been pleased to bind himself; and that is that he will receive, and not cast out, those that come to Christ. Had he mercy on the Gentiles? It was because he would have mercy on them.

II. It might be objected, Why doth he yet find fault? For who hath resisted his will? (v. 19). He might well find fault if people refused to come up to the terms on which such a salvation is offered; the salvation being so great, the terms could not be hard. If God, while he gives effectual grace to some, denies it to others, why doth he find fault with those to whom he denies it? This objection he answers at large,

1. By reproving the objector (v. 20): Nay but, O man. This is not an objection fit to be made by the creature against his Creator, by man against God. Observe how contemptibly he speaks of man, when he comes to argue with God his Maker: "Who art thou, thou that art so foolish, so incompetent a judge of the divine counsels? art thou able to fathom such a depth." That repliest against God. It becomes us to submit to him, not to reply against him; not to fly in his face, nor to charge him with folly.

2. By resolving all into the divine sovereignty. We are the thing formed, and he is the former; and it does not become us to arraign his wisdom in ordering and disposing of us into this or that shape of figure. God's sovereignty over us is fitly illustrated by the power that the potter hath over the clay; compare Jer. xviii. 6.

(1) He gives us the comparison, v. 21. The potter, out of the same lump, may make either a fashionable vessel, or a contemptible vessel, and herein he acts arbitrarily.

(2) The application of the comparison, v. 22–24. Two sorts of vessels God forms out of the great lump of fallen mankind: Vessels of wrath. In these God is willing to show his wrath. God will make it appear that he hates sin. He will likewise make his power known. In order to this, God endured them with much long-suffering—exercised a great deal of patience towards them, and so they became fitted for destruction, fitted by their own sin and self-hardening. The reigning corruptions and wickedness of the soul are its preparedness for hell. Vessels of mercy. The happiness bestowed upon the saved remnant is the fruit, not of their merit, but of God's mercy. Vessels of honour must to eternity own themselves vessels of mercy. What he designs in them: To make known the riches of his glory, that is, of his goodness; for God's goodness is his greatest glory. God makes known his glory, this goodness of his, in the preservation and supply of all the creatures: the earth is full of his goodness, but when he would demonstrate the riches of his goodness, he does it in the salvation of the saints. What he does for them: he does before prepare them to glory. This is God's work. We can destroy ourselves fast enough, but we cannot save ourselves. Sinners fit themselves for hell, but it is God that prepares saints for heaven. And would you know who these vessels of mercy are? Those whom he hath called (v. 24); for whom he did predestinate those he also called with an effectual call: and these not of the Jews only, but of the Gentiles. The question is not now whether of the seed of Abraham or no, but whether or no called according to his purpose.

Verses 25–29

The apostle here shows how the rejection of the Jews, and the taking in of the Gentiles, were foretold in the Old Testament. The Jews would, no doubt, willingly refer it to the Old Testament. Now he shows how this was there spoken of.

I. By the prophet Hosea. The Gentiles had not been the people of God: "But," says he, "I will call them my people, make them such and own them as such, notwithstanding all their unworthiness." Former badness is no bar to God's present grace and mercy.—And her beloved which was not beloved. Those whom God calls his people he calls beloved: he loves those that are his own. In the place where it was said, &c., there shall they be called. Wherever they are scattered over the face of the earth, there will God own them. Behold, what manner of love! This honour have all his saints.

II. By the prophet Isaiah, who speaks of the casting off of many of the Jews, in two places:

1. One is Isa. x. 22, 23, which speaks of the saving of a remnant, that is, but a remnant. It is no strange thing for God to abandon to ruin a great many of the seed of Abraham, and yet maintain his word of promise to Abraham in full force. This is intimated in the supposition that the number of children of Israel was as the sand of the sea. And yet only a remnant shall be saved; for many are called, but few are chosen. In this salvation of the remnant we are told (v. 28) from the prophet, (1) That he will complete the work: He will finish the work. When God begins he will make an end, whether in ways of judgment or of mercy. As for God, his work is perfect. Margin, He will finish the account. God has taken an account of the children of men: and he will finish the account, call in as many as belong to the election of grace, and then the account will be finished. (2) That he will finish it quickly. Now he will cut it short, and make a short work upon the earth. But he will cut it short in righteousness. Men, when they cut short, do amiss; but, when God cuts short, it is always in righteousness. The work (the word, the law) was under the Old Testament very long. Our duty is now, under the gospel, summed up in much less room than it was under the law; religion is brought into a less compass. With us contractions are apt to darken things, but it is not so in this case. Though it be cut short, it is clear and plain; and, because short, the more easy.

2. Another is quoted from Isa. i. 9, where the prophet is showing how God would preserve a seed. It was no strange thing for God to leave the greatest part of the people of the Jews to ruin, and to reserve to himself only a small remnant: and they must not wonder if he did so now. What God is. He is the Lord of sabaoth, that is, the Lord of hosts. When God secures a seed to himself he acts as Lord of sabaoth. It is an act of almighty power and infinite sovereignty. What his people are; they are a seed, a small number. But they are a useful number. It is a wonder of divine power and mercy that there are any saved; for even those that are left to be a seed, if God had dealt with them according to their sins, had perished with the rest.

The true reason of the reception of the Gentiles, and the rejection of the Jews. There was a difference in the way of their seeking, and therefore there was that different success. He concludes like an orator, What shall we say then?

I. Concerning the Gentiles. 1. How they had been alienated from righteousness: they followed not after it. God was found of those that sought him not, Isa. lxv. 1. Thus doth God delight to dispense grace in a way of sovereignty and absolute dominion. 2. How they attained to righteousness, notwithstanding: By faith; by embracing Christ, and believing in Christ. They attained to that by the short cut of believing sincerely in Christ for which the Jews had been long in vain beating about the bush.

II. Concerning the Jews. 1. How they missed their end: they followed after the law of righteousness (v. 31). As many as stuck to their old Jewish principles and ceremonies, embracing the shadows now that the substance was come, these fell short of acceptance with God. 2. How they mistook their way, which was the cause of their missing the end, v. 32, 33. They sought, but not in the right way. Not by faith, not by depending upon the merit of Christ, and submitting to the terms of the gospel, which were the very life and end of the law. But they sought by the works of the law. This was the stumbling-stone at which they stumbled. They could by no means be reconciled to the doctrine of Christ, which brought them to expect justification through the merit of another. Christ himself is to some a stone of stumbling, for which he quotes Isa. viii. 14; xxviii. 16. It is sad that Christ should be set for the fall of any, and yet it is so (Luke ii. 34). So he is to multitudes; so he was to the unbelieving Jews. But still there is a remnant that do believe on him; and they shall not be ashamed, their hopes and expectations of justification by him shall not be disappointed, as theirs are who expect it by the law. The unbelieving Jews have no reason to quarrel with God for rejecting them; they had a fair offer made to them upon gospel terms, which they did not like. If they perish, they may thank themselves.

CHAP. X

To two great truths I would reduce this chapter: I. That there is a great difference between the righteousness of the law, which the unbelieving Jews were wedded to, and the righteousness of faith offered in the gospel, ver. 1–11. II. That there is no difference between Jews and Gentiles; but the gospel sets them both upon the same level, ver. 12, to the end.

Verses 1–11

The scope of the apostle in this part of the chapter is to show the great pre-eminence of the righteousness of faith above that of the law; that he might persuade the Jews to believe in Christ.

I. Paul here professes his good affection to the Jews (v. 1, 2), where he gives them a good wish, and a good witness.

1. A good wish (v. 1), a wish that they might be saved. Though Paul preached against them, yet he prayed for them. This, he says, was his heart's desire and prayer. The strength and sincerity of his desire. It was his heart's desire; it was not a formal compliment, as good wishes are with many from the teeth outward, but a real desire. The soul of prayer is the heart's desire. Cold desires do but beg denials. The offering up of this desire to God. It was his prayer. There may be desires in the heart, and yet no prayer. Wishing and woulding, if that be all, are not praying.

2. A good witness, as a reason of his good wish (v. 2): I bear them record that they have a zeal of God. The unbelieving Jews were the most bitter enemies Paul had in the world, and yet Paul gives them as good a character as the truth would bear. Charity teaches us to put the best construction upon words and actions that they will bear. We should take notice of that which is commendable even in bad people. They have a zeal of God. Their opposition to the gospel is from a principle of respect to the law. There is such a thing as a blind misguided zeal: such was that of the Jews.

II. He here shows the fatal mistake that the unbelieving Jews were guilty of. Their zeal was not according to knowledge. It is true God gave them that law for which they were so zealous; but they might have known that, by the appearance of the promised Messiah, an end was put to it. He gave the most convincing evidence that could be of his being the Messiah; and yet they would not own him, but shut their eyes against the clear light, so that their zeal for the law was blind. This he shows further, v. 3.

1. The nature of their unbelief. They have not submitted themselves to the righteousness of God. Unbelief is a non-submission to the righteousness of God. Have not submitted. In true faith, there is need of a great deal of submission.

2. The causes of their unbelief, and these are two: (1) Ignorance of God's righteousness. They did not consider what need we have of a righteousness wherein to appear before him; if they had, they would never have expected justification by their own works, as if they could satisfy God's justice. (2) A proud conceit of their own righteousness: Going about to establish their own—a righteousness of their own working out, by the merit of their works. They thought they needed not to be beholden to the merit of Christ.

III. He here shows the folly of that mistake.

1. The subserviency of the law to the gospel (v. 4): Christ is the end of the law for righteousness. The design of the law was to lead people to Christ. The use of the law was to direct people for righteousness to Christ. (1) Christ is the end of the ceremonial law, because he is the perfection of it. (2) Christ is the end of the moral law in that he did what the law could not do (ch. viii. 3). The end of the law was to bring men to perfect obedience, and so to obtain justification. The law is not destroyed, but, full satisfaction being made by the death of Christ for our breach of the law, the end is attained, and we are put in another way of justification. Christ is thus the end of the law; but it is only to everyone that believeth.

2. The excellency of the gospel above the law.

(1) What is the righteousness which is of the law? This he shows, v. 5. The tenor of it is, Do, and live. It owneth nothing as a righteousness sufficient to justify a man but that of perfect obedience. For this he quotes that scripture (Lev. xviii. 5), You shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, which if a man do, he shall live in them. The doing supposed must be perfect and sinless, without the least breach or violation. Now, was it not extreme folly in the Jews to adhere so closely to this way of justification and salvation, when there was a new and a living way opened?

(2) What is that righteousness which is of faith, v. 6, &c. This he describes in the words of Moses, in Deuteronomy. He quotes it from Deut. xxx. 11–14, and shows,

[1] That it is not at all hard or difficult. The way of justification and salvation has in it no such depths or knots as may discourage us, no insuperable difficulties attending it. First, We need not go to heaven to enquire into the secrets of the divine counsel. It is true Christ is in heaven; but we may be justified and saved without going thither. Secondly, We need not go to the deep, to fetch Christ out of the grave: Into the deep, to bring up Christ from the dead. It is true that Christ was in the grave, and it is as true that he is now in heaven; but we need not perplex ourselves with fancied difficulties. No, salvation is not put at so vast a distance from us.

[2] But it is very plain and easy: The word is nigh thee. Christ is nigh thee, for the word is nigh thee. It is in thy mouth, and in thy heart. The work thou hast to do lies within thee. All that which is to be done for us is already done to our hands. Those that were under the law were to do all themselves, Do this, and live; but the gospel discovers the greatest part of the work done already, and what remains cut short in righteousness, salvation, brought to our door, as it were. It is in our mouth—we are reading it daily; it is in our heart—we are, or should be, thinking of it daily. Even the word of faith. Now what is this word of faith? We have the tenor of it, v. 9, 10. What is promised to us: Thou shalt be saved. It is salvation that the gospel exhibits and tenders which Christ is the author of, a Saviour to the uttermost. Upon what terms. Two things are required as conditions of salvation: (a) Confessing the Lord Jesus—openly professing relation to him and dependence on him, standing by him in all weathers. Our Lord Jesus lays a great stress upon this confessing of him before men; see Matt. x. 32, 33. It was a very great thing, especially, when the profession of Christ and Christianity hazarded life, and all that is dear in this world, which was the case in the primitive times. (b) Believing in the heart that God raised him from the dead. The profession of faith with the mouth, if there be not the power of it in the heart, is but a mockery; especially concerning his resurrection, which is the fundamental article of the Christian faith. This is further illustrated (v. 10), and the order inverted, because there must first be faith in the heart before there can be an acceptable confession with the mouth. Concerning faith: It is with the heart that man believeth, which implies more than an assent of the understanding, and takes in the consent of the will. This is unto righteousness. There is the righteousness of justification and the righteousness of sanctification. Faith is to both. Concerning profession: It is with the mouth that confession is made—confession to God in prayer and praise, confession to men by owning the ways of God before others. And this is said to be unto salvation, because it is the performance of the condition of that promise, Matt. x. 32. Justification by faith lays the foundation of our title to salvation; but by confession we build upon that foundation. So that we have here a brief summary of the terms of salvation, that we must give up, to God, our souls and our bodies—our souls in believing with the heart, and our bodies in confessing with the mouth. For this (v. 11) he quotes Isa. xlv. 17, Whosoever believeth on him shall not be ashamed. He will not be ashamed to own that Christ in whom he trusts; he that believes in the heart will not be ashamed to confess with the mouth. He shall not be ashamed of his hope in Christ. He shall never have cause to repent his confidence in reposing such a trust in the Lord Jesus.

There is no difference between Jews and Gentiles, but they stand upon the same level in point of acceptance with God. In Jesus Christ there is neither Greek nor Jew, Col. iii. 11. There is no difference.

I. God is the same to all: The same Lord over all is rich unto all. There is not one God to the Jews who is more kind, and another to the Gentiles who is less kind; but he is the same to all. When he proclaimed his name, The Lord, the Lord God, gracious and merciful, he thereby signified not only what he was to the Jews, but what he is and will be to all his creatures that seek unto him: liberal and bountiful in dispensing his favours to all that call upon him. Something must be done by us, and it is as little as can be, we must call upon him. We have nothing to do but to draw out by prayer.

II. The promise is the same to all (v. 13): Whoever shall call. Calling upon the name of the Lord is here put for all practical religion. What is the life of a Christian but a life of prayer? He that thus calls upon him shall be saved. It is but ask and have; what would we have more? For the further illustration of this he observes,

1. How necessary it was that the gospel should be preached to the Gentiles, v. 14, 15. This was what the Jews were so angry with Paul for. He shows how needful it was to bring them within the reach of the promise. They cannot call on him in whom they have not believed. Except they believe that he is God, they will not call upon him by prayer. The grace of faith is absolutely necessary to the duty of prayer; we cannot pray aright without it. He that comes to God by prayer must believe, Heb. xi. 6. They cannot believe in him of whom they have not heard. Some way or other the divine revelation must be made known to us, before we can receive it and assent to it; it is not born with us. They cannot hear without a preacher. Somebody must tell them what they are to believe. They cannot preach except they be sent. How shall a man act as an ambassador, unless he have both his credentials and his instructions from the prince that sends him? It is God's prerogative to send ministers. He only can qualify men for, and incline them to, the work of the ministry. But the competency of that qualification, and the sincerity of that inclination, must not be left to the judgment of every man for himself. This must needs be submitted to the judgment of those who are presumed the most able judges, and who are empowered to set apart such as they find so qualified and inclined. And those that are thus set apart, not only may, but must preach, as those that are sent.

2. How welcome the gospel ought to be to those to whom it was preached, because it showed the way to salvation, v. 15. For this he quotes, Isa. lii. 7. What the gospel is: It is the gospel of peace. Peace is put in general for all good; so it is explained here; it is glad tidings of good things. The things of the gospel are good things indeed, the best things; the best news that ever came from heaven to earth. What the work of ministers is: To bring these glad tidings; to evangelize peace (so the original is). Every preacher is in this sense an evangelist. How acceptable they should therefore be for their work's sake: How beautiful are the feet, that is, how welcome are they! Those that preach the gospel of peace should see to it that their feet (their life and conversation) be beautiful: the holiness of ministers' lives is the beauty of their feet. How beautiful! namely, in the eyes of those that hear them. Those that welcome the message cannot but love the messengers.

3. He answers an objection against all this (v. 16): But they have not all obeyed the gospel. All the Jews have not, all the Gentiles have not; far the greater part of both remain in unbelief and disobedience. The gospel is given us not only to be known and believed, but to be obeyed. It is no strange thing, but it is a very sad and uncomfortable thing, for the ministers of Christ to bring the report of the gospel, and not to be believed in it. He shows that the word preached is the ordinary means of working faith (v. 17): So then, though many that hear do not believe, yet those that believe have first heard. Faith cometh by hearing. The beginning, progress, and strength of faith, are by hearing. The word of God is therefore called the word of faith. God gives faith, but it is by the word as the instrument. Hearing is by the word of God. It is not hearing the enticing words of man's wisdom, but hearing the word of God, that will befriend faith. Those who would not believe the report of the gospel, yet, having heard it, were thereby left inexcusable, v. 18, to the end.

(1) The Gentiles have heard it (v. 18): Have they not heard? They have either heard the gospel, or at least heard of it. Their sound went into all the earth; not only a confused sound, but their words are gone unto the ends of the world. The commission which the apostles received runs thus: Go you into all the world —preach to every creature—disciple all nations; and they did with indefatigable industry and wonderful success pursue that commission. It was in order to this that the gift of tongues was poured so plentifully upon the apostles.

(2) The Jews have heard it too, v. 19–21. For this he appeals to two passages of the Old Testament. Did not Israel know that the Gentiles were to be called in? They might have known it from Moses and Isaiah.

First, One is taken from Deut. xxxii. 21, I will provoke you to jealousy. The Jews not only had the offer; they had the refusal. In all places where the apostles came still the Jews had the first offer, and the Gentiles had but their leavings. If one would not, another would. Now this provoked them to jealousy. The Gentiles are here called no people, and a foolish nation. How much soever there be of the wit and wisdom of the world, those that are not the people of God are a foolish people. Such was the state of the Gentile world, who yet were made the people of God, and Christ to them the wisdom of God. What a provocation it was to the Jews to see the Gentiles taken into favour we may see, especially Acts xxii. 22. It was an instance of the great wickedness of the Jews that they were thus enraged. God often makes people's sin their punishment. A man needs no greater plague than to be left to the impetuous rage of his own lusts.

Secondly, Another is taken from Isa. lxv. 1, 2, and in it Esaias is very bold. Those that will be found faithful have need to be very bold. Those that are resolved to please God must not be afraid to displease any man. Now Esaias speaks boldly and plainly, Of the preventing grace and favour of God in the reception of the Gentiles (v. 20): I was found of those that sought me not. The prescribed method is, Seek and find; this is a rule for us, not a rule for God, who is often found of those that do not seek. Thus he manifested himself to the Gentiles, by sending the light of the gospel among them. Was not this our own particular case? Did not God begin in love, and manifest himself to us when we did not ask after him? And was not that a time of love indeed, to be often remembered with a great deal of thankfulness? Of the obstinacy and perverseness of Israel, v. 21. God's great goodness to them: All day long I have stretched forth my hands. (a) His offers: I have stretched forth my hands, offering them life and salvation. Stretching forth the hands is the gesture of those that require audience, or desire acceptance. Christ was crucified with his hands stretched out. Stretched forth my hands as offering reconciliation—come let us shake hands and be friends; and our duty is to give the hand to him. (b) His patience in making these offers: All day long. He waits to be gracious. He bears long, but he will not bear always. Their great badness to him. They were a disobedient gainsaying people, not only disobedient to the call, but gainsaying, and quarrelling with it. The Jews contradicted and blasphemed. It is a wonder of mercy in God that his goodness is not overcome by man's badness; and it is a wonder of wickedness in man that his badness is not overcome by God's goodness.

CHAP. XI

It might be said, "Hath God then cast away his people?" The apostle therefore sets himself to make a reply to this objection, and that two ways. I. He shows at large what the mercy is that is mixed with this wrath, ver. 1–32. II. He infers thence the infinite wisdom and sovereignty of God, with the adoration of which he concludes this chapter and subject, ver. 32–36.

Verses 1–32

The apostle proposes here a plausible objection, which might be urged against the divine conduct (v. 1): "Hath God cast away his people?" Is the rejection total and final? Will he have no more a peculiar people to himself? He shows that there was a great deal of goodness and mercy expressed along with this seeming severity: 1. That, though some of the Jews were cast off, yet they were not all so. 2. That, though the body of the Jews were cast off, yet the Gentiles were taken in. And, 3. That, though the Jews were cast off at present, yet in God's due time they should be taken into his church again.

I. The Jews, it is true, were many of them cast off, but not all. The supposition of this he introduces with a God forbid.

1. There was a chosen remnant of believing Jews, that obtained righteousness and life by faith in Jesus Christ, v. 1–7. These are said to be such as he foreknew (v. 2), whom he thus foreknew he did predestinate. Here lies the ground of the difference. They are called the election (v. 7). Believers are the election, all those and those only whom God hath chosen. He shows that he himself was one of them: For I also am an Israelite. Paul was a chosen vessel (Acts ix. 15), and yet he was of the seed of Abraham. He suggests that as in Elias's time, so now, this chosen remnant was really more and greater than one would think it was. (1) His mistake concerning Israel; as if he himself was the only faithful servant God had in the world. He refers to 1 Kings xix. 14, where (it is here said) he maketh intercession to God against Israel. A strange kind of intercession! He deals with God against Israel; so it may be read. In prayer we deal with God. It is said of Elijah (Jas. v. 17) that he prayed in praying. We are then likely to pray in praying, when we pray as those that are dealing with God. Elijah in this prayer spoke as if there were none left faithful in Israel but himself. See to what a low ebb the profession of religion may sometimes be brought. The powers of Israel were then persecuting powers: They have killed thy prophets, and digged down thine altars, and they seek my life. The multitude of Israel were then idolatrous: I am left alone. Thus those few that were faithful to God were not only lost in the crowd of idolaters, but crushed and driven into corners. Digged down thine altars. When altars were set up for Baal, it is no wonder if God's altars were pulled down; they could not endure that standing testimony against their idolatry. This was his intercession against Israel. It is a very sad thing for any person or people to have the prayers of God's people against them, for God espouses, and sooner or later will visibly own, the cause of his praying people. (2) The rectifying of this mistake (v. 4): I have reserved. Things are often much better with the church of God than wise and good men think they are. In times of general apostasy, there is usually a remnant that keep their integrity—all do not go one way. When there is a remnant who keep their integrity it is God that reserves to himself that remnant. It is his free and almighty grace that makes the difference between them and others.—Seven thousand: a competent number, and yet, compared with the many thousands of Israel, a very small number. Now the description of this remnant is that they had not bowed the knee to the image of Baal. In court, city, and country, Baal had the ascendant; and the generality of people, more or less, paid their respect to Baal. The best evidence of integrity is to swim against the stream when it is strong. This is thankworthy, not to bow to Baal when everybody bows. Sober singularity is commonly the badge of true sincerity. (3) The application of this instance to the case in hand: Even so at this present time, v. 5–7. As it has been, so it is. In Elijah's time there was a remnant, and so there is now. A remnant, a few of many, a remnant of believing Jews. This is called a remnant according to the election of grace. If the difference between them and others be made purely by the grace of God, as certainly it is (I have reserved them, saith he, to myself), then it must needs be according to the election. Now concerning this remnant we may observe, First, Whence it takes its rise, from the free grace of God (v. 6), that grace which excludes works. Election is purely according to the good pleasure of his will, Eph. i. 5. Paul's heart was so full of the freeness of God's grace that he turns aside to make this remark. If of grace, then not of works. Secondly, What it obtains: that which Israel in vain sought for (v. 7): Israel hath not obtained that which he seeketh for, that is, justification, and acceptance with God, but the election have obtained it. In them the promise of God has its accomplishment, and God's ancient kindness for that people is remembered. They were the persons whom God had in his eye in the counsels of his love.

2. The rest were blinded, v. 7. Some are chosen and called. But others are left to perish in their unbelief. The gospel, which to those that believed was the savour of life unto life, to the unbelieving was the savour of death unto death. The same sun softens wax and hardens clay. They were blinded; they were hardened; so some. They could neither see the light nor feel the touch, of gospel grace. Blindness and hardness are expressive of the same senselessness and stupidity of spirit. This seemed harsh doctrine: to qualify it, therefore, he vouches two witnesses out of the Old Testament.

(1) Isaiah, who spoke of such a judgment in his day, ch. xxix. 10; vi. 9. The spirit of slumber. They are under the power of a prevailing unconcernedness, like people that are slumbering and sleeping. Eyes, that they should not see, and ears, that they should not hear. They had the faculties, but in the things that belonged to their peace they had not the use of those faculties. They saw Christ, but they did not believe in him; they heard his word, but they did not receive it. It was all one as if they had neither seen nor heard—Unto this day. Ever since Esaias prophesied, this hardening work has been in the doing; some among them have been blind and senseless. It is still true concerning multitudes of them, even to this day in which we live.

(2) David (v. 9, 10), quoted from Ps. lxix. 22, 23, where David having foretold the sufferings of Christ from his own people the Jews, particularly that of their giving him vinegar to drink, foretells the dreadful judgments of God upon them for it: Let their table become a snare, which the apostle here applies to the present blindness of the Jews, and the offence they took at the gospel. He speaks here, [1] Of the ruin of their comforts: Let their table be made a snare, that is, as the psalmist explains it, Let that which should be for their welfare be a trap to them. The curse of God will turn meat into poison. Their very food, that should nourish them, shall choke them. [2] Of the ruin of their powers and faculties (v. 10), their eyes darkened, their backs bowed down, that they can neither find the right way, nor, if they could, are they able to walk in it. They mind earthly things. We have our eyes darkened if we are bowed down in worldly-mindedness.

II. Another thing which qualified this doctrine of the rejection of the Jews was that though they were cast off, yet the Gentiles were taken in (v. 11-14), which he applies by way of caution to the Gentiles, v. 17–22.

1. The Jews' leavings were a feast for the poor Gentiles (v. 11): "Have they stumbled that they should fall? Had God no other end in rejecting them than their destruction?" He startled at this as usually he does when anything is suggested which seems to reflect upon the wisdom, or righteousness, or goodness of God: God forbid! no, through their fall salvation is come to the Gentiles. By the divine appointment it was so ordered that the gospel should be preached to the Gentiles upon the Jews' refusal of it. And so it was in the history (Acts xiii. 46): It was necessary that the word of God should first have been spoken to you; but, seeing you put it from you, lo, we turn to the Gentiles. The Jews had the refusal, and so the tender came to the Gentiles. See how Infinite Wisdom brings light out of darkness, good out of evil. To the same purport he says (v. 12), The fall of them was the riches of the world. The riches of the Gentiles was the multitude of converts among them. True believers are God's jewels. To the same purport (v. 15): The casting away of them is the reconciling of the world. God's displeasure towards them made way for his favour towards the Gentiles. God was in Christ reconciling the world, 2 Cor. v. 19. In every nation he that feared God and wrought righteousness should be accepted of him.

2. The use that the apostle makes of this doctrine.

(1) As a kinsman to the Jews, here is a word of exhortation to them, to stir them up to receive the gospel offer. This God intended in his favour to the Gentiles, to provoke the Jews to jealousy (v. 11), and Paul endeavours to enforce it accordingly (v. 14): If by any means I might provoke to emulation those who are my flesh. "Shall the despised Gentiles run away with all the comforts and privileges of the gospel, and shall not we repent of our refusal, and now at last put in for a share?" There is a commendable emulation in the affairs of our souls; why should not we be as holy and happy as any of our neighbours? The blessings are not lessened by the multitudes of the sharers.—And might save some of them. See what was Paul's business, to save souls; and yet the utmost he promises himself is but to save some. Of the many he dealt with he could but save some. Ministers must think their pains well bestowed if they can but be instrumental to save some.

(2) As an apostle to the Gentiles, here is a word of caution for them: "I speak to you Gentiles. You believing Romans, you hear what riches of salvation are come to you by the fall of the Jews, but take heed lest you do anything to forfeit it." Paul takes this, as other occasions, to apply his discourse to the Gentiles, because he was the apostle of the Gentiles. This was the purport of his extraordinary mission, Acts xxii. 21, I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles. It ought to be our great and special care to do good to those that are under our charge: we must particularly mind that which is our own work. The Gentile world was a wider province; and the work to be done in it required a very able, courageous workman. God calls those to special work whom he either sees or makes fit for it.—I magnify my office. There were those that vilified it, and him because of it. It is a sign of true love to Jesus Christ to reckon that service for him truly honourable which the world looks upon with scorn. The office of the ministry is an office to be magnified. Ministers are stewards of the mysteries of God, and for their work's sake are to be esteemed highly in love.—My office, my ministry, my service. It was not the dignity but the work, of an apostle, that Paul was so much in love with. Now two things he exhorts the Gentiles to,

[1] To have a respect for the Jews, and to desire their conversion. The advantage that would accrue to the church by their conversion, v. 12, 15. It would be as life from the dead; and therefore they must long for the receiving of them in again.

[2] To take heed to themselves, lest they should stumble and fall, as the Jews had done, v. 17–22.

First, The privilege which the Gentiles had by being taken into the church. They were grafted in (v. 17), as a branch of a wild olive into a good olive, which is contrary to the custom of the husbandman, who grafts the good olive into the bad; but those that God grafts into the church he finds wild and barren, and good for nothing. Men graft to mend the tree; but God grafts to mend the branch. The church of God is an olive-tree, flourishing and fruitful, the fruit useful. Those that are out of the church are as wild olive-trees not only useless, but what they do produce is sour and unsavoury: Wild by nature, v. 24. It is the natural state of everyone of us to be wild by nature. Conversion is the grafting in of wild branches into the good olive. Those that are grafted into the good olive-tree partake of the root and fatness of the olive. All that are by a lively faith grafted into Christ partake of him as the branches of the root. The Gentiles, being grafted into the church, partake of the same privileges that the Jews did, the root and fatness. Christ only is the root. Now the believing Gentiles partake of this root.

Secondly, A caution not to abuse these privileges. 1. "Be not proud (v. 18): Boast not against the branches." Grace is given, not to make us proud, but to make us thankful. The law of faith excludes all boasting either of ourselves or against others. "Do not say (v. 19): They were broken off that I might be grafted in; that is, do not think that thou didst merit more at the hand of God than they. But remember, thou bearest not the root, but the root thee. Though thou art grafted in, thou art still but a branch borne by the root; nay, and an engrafted branch, brought into the good olive contrary to nature (v. 24), not free-born, but by an act of grace. Therefore, if thou boast, know (this word must be supplied to clear the sense) thou bearest not the root but the root thee." 2. "Be not secure (v. 20): Be not high-minded, but fear. Be not too confident of your own strength and standing." A holy fear is an excellent preservative against high-mindedness: happy is the man that thus feareth always. Fear what? "Why fear lest thou lose the privileges thou now enjoyest, as they have lost theirs." The evils that befall others should be warnings to us. The patent which churches have of their privileges is not for a certain term, but it runs as long as they carry themselves well, and no longer. Consider, (1) "How they were broken off. It was not undeservedly, but because of unbelief." They did by this cut themselves off. They were natural branches (v. 21), yet, when they sunk into unbelief, God did not spare them. Prescription, long usage, the faithfulness of their ancestors, would not secure them. It was in vain to plead, though they insisted much upon it, that they were Abraham's seed. This is called here severity, v. 22. Severity is a word that sounds harshly; and I do not remember that it is anywhere else in scripture ascribed to God. God is most severe towards those that have been in profession nearest to him, if they rebel against him. Of all judgments, spiritual judgments are the sorest; for of these he is here speaking, v. 8. (2) "How thou standest, thou that are engrafted in." "By what means thou standest: By faith, which is a depending grace. Thou dost not stand in any strength of thy own: thou art no more than the free grace of God makes thee. That which ruined them was unbelief, and by faith thou standest." On what terms (v. 22): "Towards thee goodness, if thou continue in his goodness, that is, continue in a dependence upon the free grace of God." The condition of our happiness, is to keep ourselves in the love of God.

III. Another thing that qualifies this doctrine of the Jews' rejection is that the rejection is not final.

1. How this conversion of the Jews is here described. It is said to be their fulness (v. 12), that is, the addition of them to the church. This would be the enriching of the world with a great deal of light and strength and beauty. It is called the receiving of them. They shall be received into the love of Christ. And this will be as life from the dead—so strange and surprising, and yet withal so welcome and acceptable. It is called the grafting of them in again (v. 23). That which is grafted in receives sap and virtue from the root; so does a soul that is truly grafted into the church receive life, and strength, and grace from Christ the quickening root. They shall be grafted into their own olive-tree (v. 24) to retrieve those privileges which they had so long enjoyed, but have now sinned away and forfeited by their unbelief. It is called the saving of all Israel, v. 26. The adding of them to the church is the saving of them.

2. What it is grounded upon, and what reason we have to look for it.

(1) Because of the holiness of the first-fruits and the root, v. 16. A good beginning promises a good ending. By the first-fruits understand the same with the root, namely, the patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Now, if they were holy—if they were in the covenant—then we have reason to conclude that God hath a kindness for the lump—the body of that people; and for the branches—the particular members of it. If the root be holy, so are the branches. Though a wise man does not beget a wise man, yet a free man begets a free man. Though grace does not run in the blood, yet external privileges do (till they are forfeited). The Jewish branches are reckoned holy, because the root was so. This is expressed more plainly (v. 28): They are beloved for the fathers' sakes. And the same love would revive their privileges for still the ancient loving-kindness is remembered. Though, as concerning the gospel, they are enemies to it for your sakes, that is, for the sake of the Gentiles, against whom they have such an antipathy; yet, when God's time shall come, this will wear off, and God's love to their fathers will be remembered. Many fare the better for the sake of their godly ancestors. It is upon this account that the church is called their own olive-tree, which is some encouragement to us to hope that there may be room for them in it again, for old acquaintance-sake. That which hath been may be again.

(2) Because of the power of God (v. 23): God is able to graft them in again. Our comfort is that God is able to work a change, able to graft those in that have been long cast out and withered. If they abide not still in unbelief. So that nothing is to be done but to remove that unbelief, and God is able to take that away, though nothing less than an almighty power will do it.

(3) Because of the grace of God manifested to the Gentiles. This is his argument (v. 24): "If thou wast grafted into a good olive, that was wild by nature, much more shall these that were the natural branches." This is a suggestion very proper to check the insolence of those Gentile Christians that looked with disdain upon the rejected Jews. This is his argument (v. 30, 31): As you in times past have not, &c. It is good for those that have found mercy with God to be often thinking what they were in time past, and how they obtained that mercy. He argues further from the occasion of the Gentiles' call: "You have obtained mercy through their unbelief; much more shall they obtain mercy through your mercy. That through your mercy they might obtain mercy, that is, that they may be beholden to you, as you have been to them." True grace hates monopolies. Those that have found mercy themselves should endeavour that through their mercy others also may obtain mercy.

(4) Because of the promises and prophecies of the Old Testament. He quotes a very remarkable one, v. 26, from Isa. lix. 20, 21. [1] The coming of Christ promised: There shall come out of Zion the deliverer. Jesus Christ is the great deliverer. In Isaiah it is, the Redeemer shall come to Zion. There he is called the Redeemer; here the deliverer; he delivers in a way of redemption, by a price. There he is said to come to Zion, because when the prophet prophesied he was yet to come into the world. When the apostle wrote this, he had come, and he is speaking of the fruits of his appearing, which shall come out of Zion. [2] The purpose of this coming: He shall turn away ungodliness from Jacob. Christ's errand into the world was to turn away ungodliness, that iniquity might not be our ruin, and that it might not be our ruler. Especially to turn it away from Jacob. What greater kindness could he do them than to turn away ungodliness from them, and then make way for all good? In Isaiah it is, The Redeemer shall come to Zion, and unto those that turn from transgression in Jacob, those only that leave their sins and turn to God; to them Christ comes as a Redeemer.—For this is my covenant with them—this, that the deliverer shall come to them—this, that my Spirit shall not depart from them. The apostle adds, When I shall take away their sins. Pardon of sin is laid as the foundation. For I will be merciful. Now from all this he infers that certainly God had great mercy in store for that people, and he proves his inference (v. 29) by this truth: For the gifts and callings of God are without repentance. Those gifts and callings are immutable; whom he so loves, he loves to the end. We never find God repenting that he had given a man grace, or effectually called him.

3. The time and extent of this conversion, when and where it is to be expected. It is called a mystery (v. 25), that which was not obvious, and which one would not expect upon the view of the present state of that people. The case of the rejected Jews seemed as bad now as that of the Gentiles had been. Now he would have them know so much of this mystery as to keep them humble: lest you be wise in your own conceit. Ignorance is the cause of our self-conceitedness. (1) Their present state: Blindness, in part, is happened to Israel, v. 25. It is but in part; there is a remnant that see the things which belong to their peace, v. 7, 8. To the same purport (v. 32): God has concluded them all in unbelief, shut them up as in a prison. They all stand before God convicted of unbelief. They would not believe. "Why then," saith God, "you shall not." (2) When this blessed change should be: when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, when the gospel has had its intended success, and made its progress in the Gentile world. The Jews shall continue in blindness, till God hath performed his whole work among the Gentiles. God's taking them again was not because he had need of them, but of his own free grace. (3) The extent of it: All Israel shall be saved, v. 26. He will have mercy upon all, v. 32. They should be brought to believe in Christ the true Messiah whom they crucified, and become one sheep-fold with the Gentiles under Christ the great Shepherd. Some think it is done already, when before, and in, and after, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, multitudes of the Jews were convinced, and turned Christians. Others think that it is yet to have its accomplishment towards the end of the world.

The apostle having insisted so largely upon reconciling the rejection of the Jews with the divine goodness, he concludes here with the acknowledgment of the divine wisdom in all this.

I. The secrecy of the divine counsels: O the depth! in general, the whole mystery of the gospel, which we cannot fully comprehend.—The riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God, a depth which the angels pry into, 1 Pet. i. 12. Much more may it puzzle any human understanding. He confesses himself at a loss in the contemplation, and, despairing to find the bottom, he humbly sits down at the brink, and adores the depth. Those that know most in this state of imperfection cannot but be most sensible of their own weakness and short-sightedness.—The depth of the riches. Men's riches are shallow, you may soon see the bottom; but God's riches are deep. There is not only depth in the divine counsels, but riches too, and that passing knowledge.—Riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God. His seeing all things—that all is naked and open before him: there is his knowledge. His ruling and ordering all things and bringing about his own purposes in all; this is his wisdom.—How unsearchable are his judgments! that is, his counsels and purposes: and his ways, that is, the execution of these counsels and purposes. We know not what he has in view; it is past finding out. Secret things belong not to us. What he does we know not now, John xiii. 7. We cannot give a reason of God's proceedings. The judgments of his hands, and the ways of his providence, are dark and mysterious, which therefore we must not pry into, but silently adore. The apostle speaks this especially with reference to that strange turn, the casting off of the Jews, and the entertainment of the Gentiles, with a purpose to take in the Jews again in due time. These are methods unaccountable, concerning which we must say, O the depth!—Past finding out, cannot be traced. God leaves no prints nor footsteps behind him, but his paths of providence are new every morning. He does not go the same way so often as to make a track of it. It follows (v. 34), For who hath known the mind of the Lord? Is there any creature made of his cabinet-council? Is there any to whom he has imparted his counsels, to know the way that he takes? The apostle makes the same challenge (1 Cor. ii. 16): For who hath known the mind of the Lord? And yet there he adds, But we have the mind of Christ. He that knew the mind of the Lord has declared him, John i. 18. And so, though we know not the mind of the Lord, yet if we have the mind of Christ, we have enough.—Or who has been his counsellor? It is nonsense for any man to prescribe to God, or to teach him how to govern the world.

II. The sovereignty of the divine counsels. In all these things God does what he will, because he will, and yet there is no unrighteousness with him.

1. He challenges any to prove God a debtor to him (v. 35): Who hath first given to him? Who is there of all the creatures that can prove God is beholden to him? Of thine own we have given thee. All the duties we can perform are not requitals, but rather restitutions. The apostle here proclaims, in God's name, that payment is ready: It shall be recompenced to him again. It is certain God will let nobody lose by him; but never anyone yet durst make a demand of this kind. This is here suggested, (1) To silence the clamours of the Jews. When God took away their visible church-privileges from them, he did but take his own. (2) To silence the insultings of the Gentiles. When God sent the gospel among them, it was not because he owed them so much favour, but of his own good pleasure.

2. He resolves all into the sovereignty of God (v. 36): For of him, and through him, and to him, are all things, that is, God is all in all. Of God as the spring and fountain of all, through Christ, as the conveyance, to God as the ultimate end. If all be of him and through him, there is all the reason in the world that all should be to him and for him. To do all to the glory of God is to make a virtue of necessity; for all shall in the end be to him, whether we will or no. And so he concludes with a short doxology: To whom be glory for ever. Amen. Paul had been discoursing at large of the counsels of God concerning man, but, after all, he concludes with the acknowledgment of the divine sovereignty, as that into which all these things must be ultimately resolved. Especially when we come to talk of the divine counsels and actings, it is best for us to turn our arguments into awful and serious adorations.

CHAP. XII

The apostle comes in the next place to press the principal duties. We mistake our religion if we look upon it only as a system of notions and a guide to speculation. No, it is a practical religion. The duties are drawn from the privileges by way of inference. The foundation of Christian practice must be laid in Christian knowledge and faith. It is joined to the foregoing discourse by the word "therefore". It is the practical application of doctrinal truths that is the life of preaching. The faith that justifies is a faith that "works by love". And there is no other way to heaven but the way of holiness and obedience. The particular exhortations of this chapter are reducible to the three principal heads of Christian duty: our duty to God, to ourselves, and to our brother. The grace of God teaches us, in general, to live "godly, soberly, and righteously". Now this chapter will give us to understand what godliness, sobriety, and righteousness, are.

Verses 1–21

I. Concerning our duty to God. We see what is godliness.

1. It is to surrender ourselves to God, and so to lay a good foundation. This is here pressed as the spring of all duty and obedience, v. 1, 2.

(1) The body must be presented to him, v. 1. The exhortation is here introduced very pathetically: I beseech you, brethren. Though he was a great apostle, yet he calls the meanest Christians brethren, a term of affection and concern. He uses entreaty; this is the gospel way. This is to insinuate the exhortation, that it might come with the more pleasing power. Many are sooner wrought upon if they be accosted kindly, are more easily led than driven.

[1] The duty pressed—to present our bodies a living sacrifice. Your bodies—your whole selves. Our bodies and spirits are intended. Sacrifice is here taken for whatsoever is by God's own appointment dedicated to himself. Christ, who was once offered to bear the sins of many, is the only sacrifice of atonement; but our persons and performances, tendered to God through Christ, are as sacrifices of acknowledgment to the honour of God. Presenting them denotes a voluntary act. It must be a free-will offering. The presenting of the body to God implies not only the avoiding of the sins that are committed with or against the body, but the using of the body as a servant of the soul in the service of God. It is to yield the members of our bodies as instruments of righteousness, ch. vi. 13. Though bodily exercise alone profits little, yet in its place it is a proof of the dedication of our souls to God. First, Present them a living sacrifice. A Christian makes his body a sacrifice to God. A body sincerely devoted to God is a living sacrifice. It is Christ living in the soul by faith that makes the body a living sacrifice. Holy love kindles the sacrifices, puts life into the duties. Alive, that is, to God, v. 11. Secondly, They must be holy. There must be that real holiness which consists in an entire rectitude of heart and life, our bodies must not be made the instruments of sin and uncleanness, but set apart for God, and put to holy uses. It is the soul that is the proper subject of holiness; but a sanctified soul communicates a holiness to the body. That is holy which is according to the will of God; when the bodily actions are so, the body is holy.

[2] The arguments to enforce this, which are three: First, Consider the mercies of God: I beseech you by the mercies of God. This is an argument most sweetly cogent. There is the mercy that is in God and the mercy that is from God—mercy in the spring and mercy in the streams: both are included here. God is a merciful God, therefore let us present our bodies to him; he will be sure to use them kindly. We receive from him every day the fruits of his mercy, particularly mercy to our bodies: he made them, he maintains them, he bought them. The greatest mercy of all is that Christ hath made not his body only, but his soul, an offering for sin. Let us render ourselves as an acknowledgment of all these favours—all we are, all we have, all we can do; and, after all, it is but very poor returns, and yet, because it is what we have, Secondly, It is acceptable to God. These living sacrifices are acceptable to God. If the presenting of ourselves will but please him, we may easily conclude that we cannot bestow ourselves better. Thirdly, It is our reasonable service. There is an act of reason in it; for it is the soul that presents the body. Our God must be served in the spirit and with the understanding. God does not impose upon us anything hard or unreasonable, but that which is altogether agreeable to the principles of right reason. That is a reasonable service which we are able and ready to give a reason for.

into the same image from glory to glory. Not that we can work such a change ourselves: we could as soon make a new world as make a new heart by any power of our own; it is God's work. "Use the means which God hath appointed and ordained for it." It is God that turns us, and then we are turned. "Lay your souls under the changing transforming influences of the blessed Spirit." Though the new man be created of God, yet we must put it on (Eph. iv. 24), and be pressing forward towards perfection.

[1] What is the great enemy to this renewing; and that is, conformity to this world: Be not conformed to this world. All the disciples and followers of the Lord Jesus must be nonconformists to this world. Do not fashion yourselves according to the world. We must not conform to the things of the world. We must not conform to the men of the world, we must not follow a multitude to do evil. If sinners entice us, we must not consent to them, but in our places witness against them. True Christianity consists much in a sober singularity. Yet we must take heed of the extreme of affected rudeness and moroseness, which some run into. The rule of the gospel is a rule of direction, not a rule of contrariety.

[2] What is the great effect of this renewing: That you may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God. By the will of God, here we are to understand his revealed will concerning our duty, that will which we pray may be done by us as it is done by the angels. First, The will of God is good, and acceptable, and perfect; three excellent properties of a law. It is good in itself. It is good for us. It is acceptable, it is pleasing to God. The only way to attain his favour as the end is to conform to his will as the rule. It is perfect, to which nothing can be added. Secondly, It concerns Christians to prove what is that will of God which is good, and acceptable, and perfect; to know it experimentally, to know the excellency of the will of God by the experience of a conformity to it. It is to approve things that are excellent (Phil. i. 10). It is to be of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord, Isa. xi. 3. Thirdly, Those are best able to prove what is the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God, who are transformed by the renewing of their mind. It disposes the soul to receive the revelations of the divine will. The promise is (John vii. 17), If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine. A good wit can dispute about the will of God; while an honest, humble heart loves it.

2. When this is done, to serve him (v. 11, 12), Serving the Lord. To be religious is to serve God. (1) We must make a business of it, and not be slothful in that business. Not slothful in business. We must not drive on slowly in religion. Slothful servants will be reckoned with as wicked servants. (2) We must be fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. God must be served with the spirit under the influences of the Holy Spirit. And there must be fervency in the spirit —a holy zeal, and warmth, as those that love God not only with the heart and soul, but with all our hearts, and with all our souls. This is the holy fire that kindles the sacrifice and carries it up to heaven, an offering of a sweet-smelling savour. (3) Rejoicing in hope. God is honoured by our hope and trust in him, especially when we rejoice in that hope. (4) Patient in tribulation. Thus also God is served, not only by working for him when he calls us to work, but by sitting still quietly when he calls us to suffer. Those that rejoice in hope are likely to be patient in tribulation. (5) Continuing instant in prayer. Prayer is a friend to hope and patience, and we do in it serve the Lord.

II. Concerning our duty which respects ourselves; this is sobriety.

1. A sober opinion of ourselves, v. 3. I say, through the grace given unto me. It is said to everyone of us, one as well as another. Pride is a sin that is bred in the bone of all of us. Not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think. We must take heed of having too great an opinion of ourselves. We must not be self-conceited, nor esteem too much our own wisdom. There is a high thought of ourselves which we may and must have to think ourselves too good to be the slaves of sin and drudges to this world. We should think soberly, that is, we must have a modest opinion of ourselves and our own abilities, according to what we have received from God, and not otherwise. The words will bear yet another sense agreeable enough. Of himself is not in the original; therefore it may be read, That no man be wise above what he ought to be wise, but be wise unto sobriety. There is a knowledge that puffs up. We must take heed of this, and labour after that knowledge which tends to sobriety. To this head refers also that exhortation (v. 16), Be not wise in your own conceits. It is good to be wise, but it is bad to think ourselves so; for there is more hope of a fool than of him that is wise in his own eyes. It was an excellent thing for Moses to have his face shine and not know it. Now the reasons are these:

(1) Because whatever we have that is good, God hath dealt it to us. The best and most useful man in the world is no more, no better, than what the free grace of God makes him every day. When we are thinking of ourselves, we must remember to think not how we have attained; but think how kind God hath been to us.

(2) Because God deals out his gifts in a certain measure: According to the measure of faith. The measure of spiritual gifts he calls the measure of faith, for this is the radical grace. What we have and do that is good is so far right and acceptable as it is founded in faith. Christ had the Spirit given him without measure. But the saints have it by measure. Christ, who had gifts without measure, was meek and lowly; and shall we, that are stinted, be proud and self-conceited?

(3) Because God has dealt out gifts to others as well as to us: Dealt to every man. Had we the monopoly of the Spirit there might be some pretence for this conceitedness of ourselves; but others have their share as well as we. Therefore it ill becomes us to lift up ourselves, and to despise others, as if we only were the people in favour with Heaven. This reasoning he illustrates by a comparison taken from the members of the natural body. As we have many members in one body, &c., v. 4, 5. [1] All the saints make up one body in Christ, who is the head of the body. Believers lie not in the world as a confused disorderly heap, but are organized and knit together. [2] Particular believers are members of this body, deriving life and spirits from the head. Some members in the body are bigger and more useful than others, and each received according to its proportion. If the little finger should receive as much nourishment as the leg, how unseemly and prejudicial would it be! We must remember that we are not the whole; we are but parts. [3] All the members have not the same office (v. 4), but each hath its respective place and work assigned it. So in the mystical body, some are called to one sort of work; others are called to another sort of work. [4] Each member hath its place and office, for the good of the whole, and of every other member. We are not only members of Christ, but we are members one of another, v. 5. We are engaged to do all the good we can one to another. Whatever we have we received it not for ourselves, but for the good of others.

2. A sober use of the gifts that God hath given us. As we must not on the one hand be proud of our talents, so on the other hand we must not bury them. We must not say, "I am nothing, therefore I will sit still, and do nothing"; but, "I am nothing in myself, and therefore I will lay out myself to the utmost in the strength of the grace of Christ." Having gifts, let us use them. Gifts differing. The immediate design is different, though the ultimate tendency of all is the same. According to the grace. It is grace that appoints the office, qualifies and inclines the person. Seven particular gifts he specifies (v. 6-8), which seem to be meant of so many distinct offices. There are two general ones here expressed by prophesying and ministering, the former the work of the bishops, the latter the work of the deacons. The five latter will therefore be reduced to the two former.

(1) Prophecy. Whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith. It is not meant of the extraordinary gifts of foretelling things to come, but the ordinary office of preaching the word. The work of the Old Testament prophets was not only to foretell future things, but to warn the people concerning sin and duty. And thus gospel preachers are prophets. Those that preach the word must do it according to the proportion of faith, [1] As to the manner of our prophesying, it must be according to the proportion of the grace of faith. Let him that preaches set all the faith he hath on work, to impress the truths he preaches upon his own heart in the first place. As people cannot hear well, so ministers cannot preach well, without faith. And we must remember the proportion of faith—that, though all men have not faith, yet a great many have besides ourselves. "Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself; and do not make it a ruling rule to others, remembering that thou hast but thy proportion." [2] As to the matter of our prophesying, it must be according to the proportion of the doctrine of faith. There are some staple-truths, as I may call them, plainly and uniformly taught in the scripture, which are the touchstone of preaching, by which we must prove all things, and then hold fast that which is good, 1 Thess. v. 20, 21. Truths that are more dark must be examined by those that are more clear, for it is certain one truth can never contradict another. See here what ought to be the great care of preachers—to preach sound doctrine. It is necessary that it be according to the proportion of faith: for it is the word of faith that we preach. Now there are two particular works which he that prophesieth hath to mind—teaching and exhorting. First, Let him that teacheth wait on teaching. Teaching is the bare explaining and proving of gospel truths, without practical application. Now he that has a faculty of teaching, and has undertaken that province, let him stick to it. It is a good gift, let him use it, and give his mind to it. Secondly, Let him that exhorteth wait on exhortation. Let him give himself to that. This is the work of the pastor, to apply gospel truths and rules more closely to the people, and to press upon them that which is more practical. Many that are very accurate in teaching may yet be very cold and unskilful in exhorting; and on the contrary. The one requires a clearer head, the other a warmer heart. To wait on our work is to bestow the best of our time and thoughts upon it, and to study not only to do it, but to do it well.

(2) Ministry. If a man hath the office of a deacon let him use that office well. It includes all those offices which concern the outward business of the house of God. Serving tables, Acts vi. 2. Now let him on whom this care of ministering is devolved attend to it with faithfulness and diligence. [1] He that giveth, let him do it with simplicity. Those church-officers that were the stewards of the church's alms. Let them do it liberally and faithfully, with all sincerity and integrity, having no other intention in it than to glorify God and do good. He that hath wherewithal, let him give, and give plentifully and liberally. God loves a cheerful bountiful giver. [2] He that ruleth with diligence. It should seem, he means those that were assistants to the pastors in exercising church-discipline. Now such must do it with diligence. The word denotes both care and industry to discover what is amiss to keep the church pure. [3] He that showeth mercy with cheerfulness. Some think it is meant in general of all that in anything show mercy; Let them be willing to do it, and take a pleasure in it. But it seems to be meant of some particular church-officers, whose work it was to take care of the sick and strangers. Now this must be done with cheerfulness. A pleasing countenance in acts of mercy is a great relief and comfort to the miserable; when they see it is not done grudgingly and unwillingly, but with pleasant looks and gentle words. Those that have to do with such as are sick and sore, and commonly cross and peevish, have need to put on not only patience, but cheerfulness.

III. Concerning that part of our duty which respects our brethren. Now all our duty towards one another is summed up in one word, and that a sweet word, love. Therefore the apostle mentions this first: Let love be without dissimulation; not in compliment and pretence, but in reality. There is a love owing to our friends, and to our enemies. He specifies both.

1. To our friends. There is a mutual love that Christians owe, and must pay.

(1) An affectionate love (v. 10): Be kindly affectioned one to another, with brotherly love—it signifies not only love, but a readiness and inclination to love, kindness flowing out as from a spring. It properly denotes the love of parents to their children. Such must our love be to one another, and such it will be where there is a new nature and the law of love is written in the heart. One to another. This may recommend the grace of love to us, that, as it is made our duty to love others, so it is as much their duty to love us. And what can be sweeter on this side heaven than to love and be beloved?

(2) A respectful love: In honour preferring one another. Let us be forward to give to others the pre-eminence. We should be forward to take notice of the gifts, and graces, and performances of our brethren, and value them accordingly, be more pleased to hear another praised than ourselves; going before, or leading one another in honour; so some read it: not in taking honour, but in giving honour. Though we must prefer others (as our translation reads it) as more capable and deserving than ourselves, yet we must not make that an excuse for doing nothing, nor under a pretence of honouring others, indulge ourselves in ease and slothfulness. Therefore he immediately adds (v. 11), Not slothful in business.

(3) A liberal love (v. 13): Distributing to the necessities of saints. It is but a mock love which rests in the verbal expressions of kindness and respect, while the wants of our brethren call for real supplies, and it is in the power of our hands to furnish them. It is no strange thing for saints in this world to want necessaries for the support of their natural life. Surely the things of this world are not the best things; if they were, the saints would not be put off with so little of them. It is the duty of those who have wherewithal to distribute, or (as it might better be read) to communicate to those necessities. It is not enough to draw out the soul, but we must draw out the purse, to the hungry. Communicating. Our poor brethren have a kind of interest in that which God hath given us; and our relieving them should come from a fellow-feeling of their wants. The charitable benevolence of the Philippians to Paul is called their communicating with his affliction, Phil. iv. 14. We are in a special manner bound to communicate to the saints. There is a common love owing to our fellow-creatures, but a special love owing to our fellow-christians. He mentions another branch of this bountiful love: Given to hospitality. As there is occasion, we must welcome strangers. I was a stranger, and you took me in, is mentioned as one instance of the mercifulness of those that shall obtain mercy. It intimates, not only that we must take opportunity, but that we must seek opportunity, thus to show mercy.

(4) A sympathizing love (v. 15): Rejoice with those that do rejoice, and weep with those that weep. True love will interest us in the sorrows and joys of one another, and teach us to make them our own. Some rejoicing, and others weeping for the trial, as of other graces, so of brotherly love and Christian sympathy. Not that we must participate in the sinful mirths or mournings of any. Not envying those that prosper, but rejoicing with them; not despising those that are in trouble, but concerned for them, and ready to help them.

(5) A united love: "Be of the same mind one towards another (v. 16). Agree in affection; endeavour to be all one; wishing the same good to others that you do to yourselves"; so some understand it. This is to love our brethren as ourselves.

(6) A condescending love: Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate, v. 16. True love cannot be without lowliness. To love one another aright is to be willing to stoop to the meanest offices of kindness for the good of one another. Love is a condescending grace. Mind not high things. We must not be ambitious of honour and preferment. The Romans, living in the imperial city, were perhaps ready to take occasion thence to think the better of themselves. Therefore the apostle so often cautions them against high-mindedness; compare ch. xi. 20. Condescend to men of low estate. It may be meant of mean things, to which we must condescend. If our condition in the world be poor and low, yet we must bring our minds to it, and acquiesce in it. So the margin: Be contented with mean things. Be reconciled to the place which God in his providence hath put us in. We must account nothing below us but sin. It may be meant of mean persons; so we read it (I think both are to be included): Condescend to men of low estate. We need not be ashamed to converse with the lowly, while the great God overlooks heaven and earth to look at such. True love values grace in rags as well as in scarlet. A jewel is a jewel, though it lie in the dirt. Condescend; that is, suit yourselves to them, stoop to them for their good. He adds, Be not wise in your own conceits; to the same purport with v. 3. We shall never find in our hearts to condescend to others while we find there so great a conceit of ourselves: and therefore this must needs be mortified. "Be not wise by yourselves, be not confident of the sufficiency of your own wisdom, nor be shy of communicating what you have to others. It is the merchandise of wisdom that we profess; now merchandise consists in commerce, receiving and returning."

(7) A love that engages us, as much as lies in us, to live peaceably with all men, v. 18. Even those with whom we cannot live intimately and familiarly, yet we must with such live peaceably. Thus must we labour to preserve the peace, that it be not broken, and to piece it again when it is broken. It is not expressed so as to oblige us to impossibilities: If it be possible, as much as lies in you. Study the things that make for peace.—If it be possible. It is not possible to preserve the peace when we cannot do it without offending God and wounding conscience. The wisdom that is from above is first pure and then peaceable, Jas. iii. 17. Peace without purity is the peace of the devil's palace.—As much as lieth in you. There must be two words to the bargain of peace. We may be unavoidably striven with. Our care must be that nothing be wanting on our parts to preserve the peace.

2. To our enemies. Those that embrace religion have reason to expect to meet with enemies in a world whose smiles seldom concur with Christ's. Now Christianity teaches us how to behave towards our enemies; and it quite differs from all other rules and methods, which generally aim at victory and dominion; but this at inward peace. Whoever are our enemies, our rule is to do them all the good we can.

(1) To do them no hurt (v. 17): Recompence to no man evil for evil. We have so learned God, who does so much for his enemies (Matt. v. 45), much more have we so learned Christ, who died for us when we were enemies (ch. v. 8, 10).—"To no man; not to one that has been thy friend, for by recompencing evil for evil thou wilt certainly lose him; not to one that has been thine enemy, for by not recompencing evil for evil thou mayest perhaps gain him." To the same purport, v. 19, Dearly beloved, avenge not yourselves. He addresses himself to such in this endearing language, to mollify them. Anything that breathes love sweetens the blood. Would you pacify a brother offended? Call him dearly beloved. Such a soft word may be effectual to turn away wrath. Avenge not yourselves. It forbids private revenge, which flows from anger and ill-will. See how strict the law of Christ is in this matter, Matt. v. 38–40. It is forbidden not only to take it into our own hands to avenge ourselves, but to thirst after even that judgment in our case which the law affords, for the satisfying of a revengeful humour. This is a hard lesson to corrupt nature; and therefore he subjoins, [1] A remedy against it: Rather give place unto wrath. Not to our own wrath; to give place to this is to give place to the devil. We must resist and suppress this. First, To the wrath of our enemy. "Give place to it; do not answer wrath with wrath, but with love rather." When men's passions are up, and the stream is strong, let it have its course, lest it be made to rage and swell the more. When others are angry, let us be calm. Secondly, Many apply it to the wrath of God: "Give place to this, and let him alone to deal with thine adversary." [2] A reason against it: For it is written, Vengeance is mine. God is the sovereign King, the righteous Judge, and to him it belongs to administer justice. Some of this power he hath trusted in the hands of the civil magistrates; their legal punishments therefore are to be looked upon as a branch of God's revengings. If vengeance be God's we may not do it. We step into the throne of God if we do. We need not do it. For God will, if we meekly leave the matter with him.

(2) We must not only not do hurt to our enemies, but do them all the good we can. It is a command peculiar to Christianity: Love your enemies, Matt. v. 44. We are here taught to show that love to them both in word and deed.

[1] In word: Bless those who persecute you, v. 14. It has been the common lot of God's people to be persecuted. Now we are here taught to bless those that so persecute us. Bless them; "Speak well of them. Speak respectfully to them, not rendering railing for railing." We must wish well to them. We must offer up that desire to God, by prayer for them. We can testify our goodwill by praying for them.—Bless and curse not. It denotes a thorough goodwill; not, "Bless them when you are at prayer, and curse them at other times"; but, "Bless them always, and curse not at all." Cursing ill becomes the mouths of those whose work it is to bless God.

[2] In deed (v. 20): "If thine enemy hunger be ready to show him any kindness, and be never the less forward for his having been thine enemy, that thou mayest thereby testify the sincerity of thy forgiveness of him." First, What we must do. We must do good to our enemies. "If he hunger, do not say, Now God is avenging me of him. But feed him. Then, when he has need of thy help, and thou hast an opportunity of starving him, feed him (a significant word)—feed him abundantly; feed him, as we do children and sick people, with much tenderness. Contrive to do it so as to express thy love. If he thirst, give him drink: in token of reconciliation and friendship. So confirm your love to him." Secondly, Why we must do this. Thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head; that is, "Thou shalt either," 1. "Melt him into repentance and friendship" (alluding to those who melt metals; they not only put fire under them, but heap fire upon them) "thou wilt win a friend by it, and if thy kindness have not that effect then," 2. "It will make his malice against thee the more inexcusable." Not that this must be our intention in showing him kindness, but such will be the effect. Those that revenge are the conquered, and those that forgive are the conquerors. (1) "Be not overcome of evil. Let not the evil of any provocation that is given you have such a power over you as to disturb your peace, to destroy your love, or to bring you to study or attempt any revenge." He that cannot quietly bear an injury is perfectly conquered by it. (2) "But overcome evil with good, with the good of patience and forbearance, nay, and of kindness and beneficence to those that wrong you." He that hath this rule over his spirit is better than the mighty.

3. There remain two exhortations which recommend all the rest as good in themselves, and of good report.

(1) As good in themselves (v. 9): Abhor that which is evil, cleave to that which is good. We must not only not do evil, but we must abhor that which is evil. We must hate sin with an utter and irreconcilable hatred. We must not only do that which is good, but we must cleave to it. It denotes a deliberate choice of, a sincere affection for, and a constant perseverance in, that which is good.

(2) As of good report (v. 17): "Provide things honest in the sight of all men; study and take care to do, that which recommends religion to all with whom you converse."

CHAP. XIII

There are three good lessons taught us in this chapter. I. A lesson of subjection to lawful authority, ver. 1–6. II. A lesson of justice and love to our brethren, ver. 7–10. III. A lesson of sobriety and godliness in ourselves, ver. 11, to the end.

Verses 1–6

We are here taught how to conduct ourselves towards magistrates, and those that are in authority over us, called here the higher powers, intimating their authority (they are powers), and their dignity (they are higher powers). The just power which they have must be submitted to and obeyed.

I. The duty enjoined: Let every soul be subject. Every soul—every person, one as well as another, not excluding the clergy.—Every soul. Not that our consciences are to be subjected to the will of any man. It is God's prerogative to make laws immediately to bind conscience. Our subjection must be free and voluntary, sincere and hearty. The subjection of soul here required includes inward honour and outward reverence and respect, both in speaking to them and in speaking of them. "They are higher powers; be content they should be so, and submit to them accordingly." Now there was good reason for the pressing of this duty, 1. Because of the reproach which the Christian religion lay under in the world, as an enemy to public peace, order, and government. Our Lord Jesus was so reproached, though he told them his kingdom was not of this world: no marvel, then, if his followers have been loaded in all ages with the like calumnies, called facetious, seditious, and turbulent. The apostle therefore shows that obedience to civil magistrates is one of the laws of Christ, whose religion helps to make people good subjects. 2. Because of the temptation which the Christians lay under to be otherwise affected to civil magistrates. The apostle enjoins obedience to civil government, which was the more necessary to be pressed now because the magistrates were heathens and unbelievers, which yet did not destroy their civil power and authority.

II. The reasons to enforce this duty.

1. For wrath's sake. Magistrates bear the sword; it is to no purpose to contend with him that bears the sword. The least show of resistance in a Christian would be very prejudicial to the whole society; and therefore they had more need than others to be exact in their subjection. To this head must that argument be referred (v. 2), Those that resist shall receive to themselves damnation: they shall be called to an account for it. God will reckon with them for it, because the resistance reflects upon him. The magistrates will reckon with them for it. So it follows (v. 3), Rulers are a terror. This is a good argument, but it is low for a Christian.

2. We must be subject, not only for wrath, but for conscience' sake; not so much from the fear of punishment, as from the love of virtue. Now to oblige conscience to this subjection he argues, v. 1–4, 6,

(1) From the institution of magistracy: There is no power but of God. God as the ruler of the world hath appointed the ordinance of magistracy, so that all civil power is derived from him. The usurpation of power and the abuse of power are not of God, but the power itself is. The most unjust and oppressive princes in the world have no power but what is given them from above (John xix. 11). It is an instance of God's wisdom, power, and goodness, in the management of mankind, that he has disposed them into such a state as distinguishes between governors and governed, and has not left them like the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the less.—The powers that be: whatever the particular form and method of government are. It is an ordinance of God, and it is to be received and submitted to accordingly.—Ordained of God. Hence it follows (v. 2) that whosoever resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God. Magistracy is from God as an ordinance, that is, it is a great law, and it is a great blessing. And those who spurn at their power reflect upon God himself. Magistrates are here again and again called God's ministers. He is the minister of God, v. 4, 6. Magistrates are in a more peculiar manner God's servants; the dignity they have calls for duty. Though they are lords to us, they are servants to God.

(2) From the intention of magistracy: Rulers are not a terror to good works, but to the evil, &c. Magistracy was designed to be,

[1] A terror to evil works and evil workers. They bear the sword; not only the sword of war, but the sword of justice. Such is the power of sin and corruption that many will not be restrained from the greatest enormities by any regard to the law of God and nature; but only by the fear of temporal punishments. Laws with penalties for the lawless and disobedient (1 Tim. i. 9) must be constituted in Christian nations, and are agreeable with, and not contradictory to, the gospel. In this work the magistrate is the minister of God, v. 4. He acts as God's agent, and therefore must take heed of infusing into his judgments any private personal resentments of his own.—To execute wrath upon him that doeth evil. The judicial processes of the most vigilant faithful magistrates yet come far short of the judgment of God: they reach only to the evil act, on him that doeth evil.—He beareth not the sword in vain. It is not for nothing that God hath put such a power into the magistrate's hand. And therefore, "If thou do that which is evil, be afraid; for civil powers have quick eyes and long arms." It is a good thing when the punishment of malefactors is managed as an ordinance of God. As a holy God, that hates sin. As King of nations, and the God of peace and order. As the protector of the good. As one that by the punishment of some would terrify others, and so prevent the like wickedness.

[2] A praise to those that do well. "Do that which is good (v. 3), and thou needest not be afraid of the power, nay, thou shalt have praise of it." This is the intention of magistracy, and therefore we must, for conscience' sake, be subject to it, as a constitution designed for the public good. But pity it is that ever this gracious intention should be perverted. Yet even then the blessing and benefit of a common protection, and a face of government and order, are such that it is our duty rather to submit to persecution for well-doing, than by any irregular and disorderly practices to attempt a redress. Better a bad government than none at all.

(3) From our interest in it: "He is the minister of God to thee for good." Protection draws allegiance. By upholding the government, we keep up our own hedge. This subjection is likewise consented to by the tribute we pay (v. 6): "For this cause pay you tribute, as a testimony of your submission, and an acknowledgment that in conscience you think it to be due. By your paying tribute you not only own the magistrate's authority, but the blessing of that authority to yourselves. Honour is a burden: and, if he do as he ought, he is attending continually upon this very thing, in consideration of which fatigue, we pay tribute." He does not say, "You give it as an alms," but, "You pay it as a just debt." This is the lesson the apostle teaches, and it becomes all Christians to learn and practise it, that the godly in the land may be found (whatever others are) the quiet and the peaceable in the land.

We are here taught a lesson of justice and charity.

I. Of justice (v. 7): Render therefore to all their dues. What we have we have as stewards; others have an interest in it, and must have their dues. Render to all their dues; and that readily and cheerfully, not tarrying till you are by law compelled to it. Due taxes: Tribute to whom tribute is due, custom to whom custom. He wrote this to the Romans, who, as they were rich, so they were drained by taxes and impositions, to the just and honest payment of which they are here pressed by the apostle. Our Lord was born when his mother went to be taxed; and he enjoined the payment of tribute to Cæsar. Many, who in other things seem to be just, yet make no conscience of this, but pass it off with a false ill-favoured maxim, that it is no sin to cheat the king. Due respect: Fear to whom fear, honour to whom honour. This sums up the duty which we owe not only to magistrates, but to all that are over us in the Lord, according to the fifth commandment: Honour thy father and mother. Where there is not this respect in the heart to our superiors, no other duty will be paid aright. Due payment of debts (v. 8): "Owe no man anything; do not continue in anyone's debt, while you are able to pay it." Many that are very sensible of the trouble think little of the sin of being in debt.

II. Of charity: Owe no man anything. "Whatever you owe, it is eminently summed up in this debt of love. But to love one another, this is a debt that must be always in the paying, and yet always owing." Love is a debt. Love is the fulfilling of the law; not perfectly, but it is a good step towards it. It is inclusive of all the duties of the second table, which he specifies, v. 9, and these suppose the love of God. If the love be sincere, it is accepted as the fulfilling of the law. Surely we serve a good master, that has summed up all our duty in one word, and that a short word and a sweet word—love, the beauty and harmony of the universe. Loving and being loved is all the pleasure, joy, and happiness, of an intelligent being. God is love (1 John iv. 16), and love is his image upon the soul. Now, to prove that love is the fulfilling of the law, he gives us, 1. An induction of particular precepts, v. 9. He specifies the last five of the ten commandments, which he observes to be all summed up in this royal law, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. On this is built that golden rule of doing as we would be done by. Were there no restraints of human laws in these things the law of love would of itself be effectual to keep peace and good order among us. The apostle puts the seventh before the sixth, and mentions this first, Thou shalt not commit adultery; for though this commonly goes under the name of love (pity it is that so good a word should be so abused) yet it is really as great a violation of it as killing and stealing. He that tempts others to sin, though he may pretend the most passionate love does really hate them. 2. A general rule concerning the nature of brotherly love: Love worketh no ill (v. 10)—he that walks in love worketh no ill to his neighbour, to anyone that he has anything to do with. Love intends and designs no ill to anybody. More is implied than is expressed; it not only worketh no ill, but it worketh all the good that may be. Love is a living active principle of obedience to the whole law. The whole law is written in the heart, if the law of love be there.

We are here taught a lesson of sobriety and godliness in ourselves. Four things we are here taught, as a Christian's directory for his day's work: when to awake, how to dress ourselves, how to walk, and what provision to make.

I. When to awake: Now it is high time to awake (v. 11). We have need to be often excited and stirred up to awake. The word of command to all Christ's disciples is, Watch. "Awake—be concerned about your souls and your eternal interest. Considering," 1. "The time we are cast into: Knowing the time. Consider what time of day it is with us, and you will see it is high time to awake. It is gospel time, it is a time when more is expected than was in the times of that ignorance which God winked at, when people sat in darkness. It is high time to awake; for the sun has been up a great while, and shines in our faces. It is high time to awake; for others are awake and up about us. Know the time to be a busy time; we have a great deal of work to do. Know the time to be a perilous time. We are in the midst of enemies and snares. It is time to awake, for we have slept enough." 2. "The salvation we are upon the brink of: Now is our salvation nearer than when we believed. The eternal happiness we chose for our portion is now nearer to us than it was when we became Christians. Let us mind our way and mend our pace. The nearer we are to our centre the quicker should our motion be. Is there but a step between us and heaven, and shall we be so very slow and dull in our Christian course?"

II. How to dress ourselves. This is the next care, when we are awake and up: "The night is far spent, the day is at hand; therefore it is time to dress ourselves." Clearer discoveries will be quickly made of gospel grace than have been yet made, as light gets ground.

1. "What we must put off; our night-clothes, which it is a shame to appear abroad in: Cast off the works of darkness." Sinful works are works of darkness. Let us therefore, who are of the day, cast them off, and have no more to do with them.

2. "What we must put on." Our care must be wherewithal we shall be clothed, how shall we dress our souls? (1) Put on the armour of light. Christians are soldiers in the midst of enemies, therefore their array must be armour. A Christian may reckon himself undressed if he be unarmed. The graces of the Spirit are this armour, to secure the soul from Satan's temptations. This is called the armour of light. The graces of the Spirit are suitable splendid ornaments. (2) Put on the Lord Jesus Christ, v. 14. This stands in opposition to a great many base lusts, mentioned, v. 13. Rioting and drunkenness must be cast off. "Put on Christ, this includes all. Put on the righteousness of Christ for justification; be found in him (Phil. iii. 9) as a man is found in his clothes. Put on the spirit and grace of Christ for sanctification; put on the new man (Eph. iv. 24)." Jesus Christ is the best clothing for Christians to adorn themselves with, to arm themselves with. All other things are filthy rags. By baptism we have in profession put on Christ. Let us do it in truth and sincerity. The Lord Jesus Christ. "Put him on as Lord to rule you, as Jesus to save you, and in both as Christ, appointed by the Father to this ruling saving work."

III. How to walk. When we are up and dressed, we are not to sit still. What have we good clothes for, but to appear abroad in them?—Let us walk. Christianity teaches us how to walk so as to please God. Our conversation must be as becomes the gospel. Walk honestly; decently and becomingly. Christians should be careful to conduct themselves well in those things wherein men have an eye upon them, and to study that which is lovely and of good report. We must not walk in rioting and drunkenness; we must abstain from all excess in eating and drinking. We must not give the least countenance to revelling. Not in chambering and wantonness; not in any of those lusts of the flesh, those works of darkness—whatsoever transgresseth the pure and sacred law of chastity and modesty. Not in strife and envying. These are also works of darkness; for, though the acts and instances of strife and envy are very common, yet none are willing to acknowledge themselves envious and contentious. To strive and to envy ill becomes the disciples and followers of the peaceable and humble Jesus. Where there are riot and drunkenness, there usually are chambering and wantonness, and strife and envy.

IV. What provision to make (v. 14): "Make not provision for the flesh. Be not careful about the body." Our great care must be to provide for our souls; but must we take no care about our bodies? Two things are here forbidden: 1. Perplexing ourselves with an inordinate care; do not stretch your wits, nor set your thoughts upon the tenter-hooks, in making this provision. It forbids an anxious encumbering care. 2. Indulging ourselves in an irregular desire. The necessities of the body must be considered, but the lusts of it must not be gratified. Natural desires must be answered but wanton appetites must be checked and denied.

CHAP. XIV

The apostle having directed our conduct one towards another in civil things, comes in this to direct our demeanour one towards another in sacred things. It seems there was something amiss among the Roman Christians which he here labours to redress. But the rules are general, and of standing use in the church. Nothing is more threatening, nor more often fatal, to Christian societies than the contentions and divisions of their members.

Verses 1–23

I. An account of the unhappy contention which had broken out in the Christian church.

1. There was a difference among them about the distinction of meats and days. The members of the Christian church at Rome were some of them originally Gentiles, and others of them Jews. Now those that had been Jews were trained up in the observance of the ceremonial appointments touching meats and days, and therefore retained the ceremonial institutions, while other Christians made no such difference. Concerning meats (v. 2): One believeth that he may eat all things—he is well satisfied that every creature of God is good, and nothing to be refused; nothing unclean of itself, v. 14. This the strong Christian is clear in, and practises accordingly, eating what is set before him. On the other hand, another, who is weak, is dissatisfied in this point; he will eat no flesh at all, but eateth herbs, contenting himself with only the fruits of the earth. Concerning days, v. 5. Those who thought themselves still under some kind of obligation by the ceremonial law esteemed one day above another—kept up a respect to the times of the passover, pentecost, new moons, and feast of tabernacles. Those who knew that all these things were abolished by Christ's coming esteemed every day alike. We must understand it with an exception of the Lord's day, which all Christians unanimously observed. The apostle seems willing to let the ceremonial law wither by degrees, and to let it have an honourable burial.

2. It was not so much the difference itself that did the mischief as the mismanagement of the difference, making it a bone of contention. Those who were strong, and knew their Christian liberty, despised the weak, who did not. They should have pitied them, and helped them. So apt are those who have knowledge to be puffed up with it, and to look disdainfully and scornfully upon their brethren. Those who were weak, and durst not use their Christian liberty, judged and censured the strong, who did, as if they were loose Christians. They judged them as breakers of the law. Well, this was the disease, and we see it remaining in the church to this day.

II. We have proper suggestions laid down for allaying this contention. Not by excommunicating, suspending, and silencing either side, but by persuading them both to a mutual forbearance: reasoning the case with the strong that they should not be so scornful, and with the weak that they should not be so censorious. Let us observe the rules he gives, some to the strong and some to the weak, and some to both.

1. Those who are weak must be received, but not to doubtful disputations, v. 1. Spend your zeal in those things wherein you and all the people of God are agreed. Receive him, take him to you, lend him your hand, to help him. Receive him into your company. Receive him: not to quarrel with him, and to argue about uncertain points that are in controversy. Let not your Christian friendship be disturbed with such vain janglings and strifes of words.—Not to judge his doubtful thoughts (so the margin). Receive him, not to expose him, but to instruct and strengthen him.

2. Those who are strong must by no means despise the weak; nor those who are weak judge the strong, v. 3. This is levelled directly against the fault of each party. It is seldom that any such contention exists but there is a fault on both sides. We must not despise nor judge our brethren. Why so?

(1) Because God hath received them. Strong believers and weak believers, if they be true believers, are accepted of God. "Nay, God doth not only receive him, but hold him up (v. 4). If they have true faith, they shall be held up—the one in his integrity, and the other in his comfort. This hope is built upon the power of God, for God is able to make him stand."

(2) Because they are servants to their own master (v. 4): Who art thou that judgest another man's servant?

We reckon it a piece of ill manners to meddle with other people's servants. Weak and strong Christians are indeed our brethren, but they are not our servants. We make ourselves our brethren's masters, and do in effect usurp the throne of God, when we take upon us thus to judge them. God sees not as man sees; and he is their master, and not we. If we must needs be judging, let us exercise our faculty upon our own hearts and ways.—To his own master he stands or falls. How well for us is it that we are not to stand nor fall by the judgment one of another, but by the judgment of God.

(3) Because both the one and the other, if they be true believers, have an eye to God, and do approve themselves to God in what they do, v. 6. He that regards the day—it is well. We have reason to think, because in other things he conducts himself like a good Christian, that he regardeth it unto the Lord; and God will accept of his honest intention. The sincerity and uprightness of the heart were never rejected for the weakness and infirmity of the head: so good a master do we serve. On the other hand, he that regards not the day, but esteems every day alike—he does not do it out of a spirit of contradiction, or contempt of his brother. If he be a good Christian we charitably conclude that to the Lord he does not regard it. He makes no such difference of days only because he knows God hath made none; and therefore intends his honour in endeavouring to dedicate every day to him. So for the other instance: He that eateth whatever is set before him he eateth to the Lord. He understands the liberty that God has granted him, and uses it to the glory of God. He giveth God thanks for the variety of food he has, and the liberty he has to eat it. On the other hand, he that eateth not, to the Lord he eateth not. It is for God's sake, because he is afraid of offending God by eating that which he is sure was once prohibited; and he giveth God thanks too that there is enough besides. Thus, while both approve themselves to him in their integrity, why should either of them be judged or despised? Whether we eat flesh, or eat herbs, it is a thankful regard to God, the author and giver of all our mercies, that sanctifies and sweetens it. It appears by this that saying grace (as we commonly call it), before and after meat was the common known practice of the church. Blessing the creatures in the name of God before we use them, and blessing the name of God for them after, are both included. Observe his description of true Christians, taken from their end and aim (v. 7, 8), and the ground of it, v. 9.

[1] Our end and aim: not self, but the Lord. If we would know what way we walk in, we must enquire what end we walk towards. First, Not to self. We have learned to deny ourselves: None of us liveth to himself. This is a thing in which all the people of God are one, however they differ in other things. Not one that hath given up his name to Christ is allowedly a self-seeker; it is contrary to the foundation of true Christianity. We neither live to ourselves nor die to ourselves. The business of our lives is not to please ourselves, but to please God. When we come to die it is to the Lord, that we may depart and be with Christ. Secondly, But to the Lord (v. 8), to the Lord Christ. Christ is the gain we aim at, living and dying. We live to glorify him; we die to glorify him, and to go to be glorified with him. Christ is the centre, in which all the lines of life and death do meet. So that, whether we live or die, we are the Lord's. Though some Christians are weak and others strong, yet they are all the Lord's, and are accordingly owned and accepted of him. Is it for us then to judge or despise them, as if we were their masters?

[2] The ground of this, v. 9. It is grounded upon Christ's absolute sovereignty, the fruit and end of his death and resurrection. To this end he both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of dead and living. He is head over all things to the church. He is Lord of those that are living to rule them, of those that are dead to receive them and raise them up. We must consider that Christ is Lord of the dead, as well as of the living. If they are dead, they have already given up their account, and let that suffice. And this leads to another reason against judging and despising.

(4) Because both the one and the other must shortly give an account, v. 10–12. Why dost thou that are weak judge thy brother that is strong? And why dost thou that art strong set at nought thy brother that is weak? Why is all this clashing, and contradicting, and censuring, among Christians? We shall all stand before the judgment-seat of Christ. Christ will be the Judge, and before him we shall stand as persons to be tried. To illustrate this (v. 11), he quotes a passage out of the Old Testament, which speaks of Christ's universal sovereignty and dominion, and that established with an oath: As I live (saith the Lord), every knee shall bow to me. It is a prophecy, in general, of Christ's dominion. Here is a proof of Christ's Godhead. Divine honour is due to him, and must be paid. The bowing of the knee to him, and the confession made with the tongue, are but outward expressions of inward adoration and praise. Every knee and every tongue, either freely or by force.

[1] All his friends do it freely. Bowing to him—the understanding bowed to his truths, the will to his laws, the whole man to his authority; and this expressed by the bowing of the knee, the posture of adoration and prayer. Confessing to him—acknowledging his glory, grace, and greatness—acknowledging our own meanness and vileness, confessing our sins to him.

[2] All his foes shall be constrained to do it. Hence he concludes (v. 12), Everyone of us shall give account of himself to God. We must not give account for others, nor they for us; but everyone for himself. We have little to do to judge others, for they are not accountable to us, nor are we accountable for them. They must give account to their own master, and not to us; if we can in anything be helpers of their joy, it is well; but we have not dominion over their faith. We have the more to do to judge ourselves. We have an account of our own to make up. Let this take up his thoughts, and he that is strict in judging himself will not be apt to judge and despise his brother.

(5) Because the stress of Christianity is not to be laid upon these things, nor are they at all essential to religion. Why should you spend your zeal either for or against those things which are so minute and inconsiderable in religion? The kingdom of God is not meat, &c. Observe here,

[1] The nature of true Christianity. It is here called, The kingdom of God; it is a religion intended to rule us. First, It is not meat and drink: it does not consist either in using or in abstaining from such and such meats and drinks. Christianity gives no rule in that case. The matter is left at large. Every creature of God is good, 1 Tim. iv. 4. It is not being of this party and persuasion, of this or the other opinion in minor things, that will recommend us to God. But it will be asked, "Who feared God and worked righteousness, and who did not?" Secondly, It is righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost. These are some of the essentials of Christianity in the pursuit of which we must spend our zeal. Righteousness, peace, and joy, are very comprehensive words. As to God, our great concern is righteousness, for the righteous Lord loveth righteousness. As to our brethren, it is peace—to live in peace and love, and charity with them. Christ came into the world to be the great peacemaker. As to ourselves, it is joy in the Holy Ghost.

Next to our compliance with God, to delight ourselves always in the Lord. Surely we serve a good Master, who makes peace and joy so essential to our religion. Thirdly, It is in these things to serve Christ (v. 18), to do all this out of respect to Christ himself as our Master, to his will as our rule and to his glory as our end. What is Christianity but the serving of Christ?

[2] The advantages of it. He that duly observeth these things is acceptable to God. He has the love and favour of God, and we need no more to make us happy. Those are most pleasing to God that are best pleased with him. He is approved of men—of all wise and good men, and the opinion of others is not to be regarded. The approbation of men is not to be slighted; for we must provide things honest in the sight of all men: but the acceptance of God is to be aimed at in the first place.

3. In these doubtful things everyone not only may, but must, walk according to the light that God hath given him. This is laid down, v. 5, Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind; that is, "Practise according to your own judgment in these things, and leave others to do so too. If your sober sentiments be otherwise, do not make their practice a rule to you, any more than you must prescribe yours as a rule to them. First be persuaded that what you do is lawful, before you venture to do it." In doubtful things, it is good keeping on the sure side of the hedge. To this purport he argues, v. 14 and 23, which two verses give us a rule not to act against the dictates,

(1) Of a mistaken conscience, v. 14. If we really think it a sin to do it it is to us a sin, because we act against our consciences, though mistaken and misinformed.

[1] His own clearness in this matter. "I know and am persuaded—I am fully persuaded that there is nothing unclean of itself, that is, no kind of meat that lies under any ceremonial uncleanness, nor is forbidden to be eaten." Sin had brought a curse upon the whole creation. Now that Christ has removed the curse the matter is set at large again. Therefore Paul says that he was persuaded by the Lord Jesus, not only as the author of that persuasion, but as the ground of it. So that now there is nothing unclean of itself, every creature of God is good; nothing common; nothing profane; in this sense the Jews used the word common. This was Paul's own clearness, and he practised accordingly.

[2] But here is a caution: To him that esteemeth anything to be unclean, to him it is unclean. He who does a thing which he verily believes to be unlawful, however the thing be in itself, to him it is a sin. Our wills, in all their choices should follow the dictates of our understandings. This order is broken if the understanding (though misguided) tells us that such a thing is a sin, and yet we will do it. This is a will to do evil; there is the same corruption of the will in the doing of it as if really it were a sin. It must be understood likewise with this proviso, though men's judgments and opinions may make that which is good in itself to become evil to them, yet they cannot make that which is evil in itself to become good.

(2) Nor must we act against the dictates of a doubting conscience. He that doubteth is damned if he eat (v. 23), that is, it turns into sin to him; he is condemned of his own conscience, because he eateth not of faith, because he does that which he is not fully persuaded he may lawfully do. Here his own heart cannot but condemn him as a transgressor.—For whatsoever is not of faith is sin. Whatever is done while we are not clearly persuaded of the lawfulness of it, is a sin against conscience. He that will venture to do that which his own conscience suggests to him to be unlawful, when it is not so in itself, will by a like temptation be brought to do that which his conscience tells him is unlawful when it is really so. It is a dangerous thing to put a force upon conscience, though it be under a mistake (v. 22). Happy is he that condemns not himself in that thing which he allows. Many a one allows himself in practice to do that which yet in his judgment and conscience he condemns himself for. Whilst he does it his own heart gives him the lie, and his conscience condemns him for it. Now, happy is the man who so orders his conversation as not to expose himself to the reproaches of his own conscience. He is happy that has peace and quietness within.

4. Another rule here prescribed is to those who know their Christian liberty, yet to take heed of using it so as to give offence to a weak brother. This is laid down v. 13, Let us not judge one another any more. "Judge this rather, instead of censuring the practice of others, let us look to our own, that no man put a stumbling-block, or an occasion to fall, in his brother's way." We must take heed of saying or doing anything which may occasion our brother to stumble or fall; which may be an occasion,

(1) Of grief to our brother, "One that is weak, and thinks it unlawful to eat such and such meats, will be greatly troubled to see thee eat them." Christians should take heed of grieving one another, and of saddening the hearts of Christ's little ones.

(2) Of guilt to our brother. The former is a stumbling-block, that gives our brother a great shake; but this is an occasion to fall. "If thy weak brother, purely by thy example and influence, be drawn to act against his conscience and to walk contrary to the light he has, and so to contract guilt upon his soul, thou art to be blamed for giving the occasion." To the same purport (v. 21) he recommends it to our care not to give offence by the use of lawful things: It is good neither to eat flesh nor to drink wine; these are things not necessary to the support of human life, and therefore we must deny ourselves in them, rather than give offence. It is good—pleasing to God, profitable to our brother, and no harm to ourselves. This is to be extended to all things whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, is involved either in sin or in trouble: or is made weak—his graces weakened, his comforts weakened, his resolutions weakened. Observe the motives to enforce this caution.

[1] Consider the royal law of Christian love and charity, which is hereby broken (v. 15): If thy brother be grieved with thy meat. Possibly thou art ready to say, "Now he talks foolishly and weakly." We are apt, in such a case, to lay all the blame on that side. But the reproof is here given to the stronger: Now walkest thou not charitably. Thus the apostle takes part with the weakest, and condemns the defect in love on the one side more than the defect in knowledge on the other side. Charity to the souls of our brethren is the best charity. True love would make us tender of their peace and purity, and beget a regard to their consciences as well as to our own. Christ deals gently with those that have true grace, though they are weak in it.

[2] Consider the design of Christ's death: Destroy not him with thy meat for whom Christ died, v. 15. First, Drawing a soul to sin threatens the destruction of that soul. It denotes an utter destruction. Secondly, The consideration of the love of Christ in dying for souls should make us very tender of the happiness and salvation of souls. Did Christ quit a life for souls, such a life, and shall not we quit a morsel of meat for them? Did he think it worth while to deny himself so much for them as to die for them, and shall not we think it worth while to deny ourselves so little for them?—With thy meat. Thou pleadest that it is thy own meat, but remember that, though the meat is thine, the brother offended by it is Christ's.

While thou destroyest thy brother thou art helping forward the devil's design, and, as much as in thee lies, thou art crossing the design of Christ, and dost not only offend thy brother, but offend Christ. But are any destroyed for whom Christ died? No thanks to thee if they be not destroyed; by doing that which has a tendency to it, thou dost manifest a great opposition to Christ.

[3] Consider the work of God (v. 20): "For meat destroy not the work of God." Do not undo that which God hath done. You should work together with God, do not countermine his work. The work of grace and peace is the work of God. The same for whom Christ died (v. 15) are here called the work of God; besides the work that is wrought for us there is a work to be wrought in us. Every saint is God's workmanship. We must be very careful to do nothing which tends to the destruction of this work, either in ourselves or others. We must deny ourselves rather than obstruct and prejudice our own or others' grace and peace. Many do for meat and drink destroy the work of God in themselves, so likewise in others. Think what thou destroyest—the work of God; think for what thou destroyest it—for meat, which was but for the belly, and the belly for it.

[4] Consider the evil of giving offence. He grants that all things indeed are pure. But, if we abuse this liberty, it turns into sin to us: It is evil to him that eats with offence. Lawful things may be done unlawfully. It is observable that the apostle directs his reproof most against those who gave the offence. He directs his speech to the strong, because they were better able to bear the reproof, and to begin the reformation. For the further pressing of this rule, we may here observe two directions.—First, Let not then your good be evil spoken of (v. 16)—take heed of doing any thing which may give occasion to others to speak evil, either of the Christian religion in general, or of your Christian liberty in particular. It is true we cannot hinder loose and ungoverned tongues from speaking evil of us, and of the best things we have; but we must not (if we can help it) give them any occasion to do it. We must deny ourselves in many cases for the preservation of our credit and reputation, forbearing to do that which we rightly know we may lawfully do, when our doing it may be a prejudice to our good name. In such a case we must rather cross ourselves than shame ourselves. We should manage all our good duties in such a manner that they may not be evil spoken of. As we tender the reputation of the good we profess and practise, let us so order it that it may not be evil spoken of. Secondly, Hast thou faith? Have it to thyself before God, v. 22. "Art thou satisfied that thou mayest eat all meats, and observe all days (except the Lord's day) alike? Have it to thyself, and do not trouble others by the imprudent use of it." In these indifferent things, though we must never contradict our persuasion, yet we may sometimes conceal it, when the avowing of it will do more hurt than good. A rule to thyself (not to be imposed upon others, or made a rule to them), or a rejoicing to thyself. Paul had faith in these things: I am persuaded that there is nothing unclean of itself; but he had it to himself, so as not to use his liberty to the offence of others. In things necessary let there be unity, in things unnecessary let there be liberty, and in both let there be charity.—Have it to thyself before God. The end of such knowledge is that we may have a conscience void of offence towards God. Those are right indeed that are so in God's sight.

5. There is one rule more laid down here: Let us therefore follow after the things which make for peace, and things wherewith one may edify another, v. 91. We must study mutual peace. Many wish for peace, and talk loudly for it, that do not follow the things that make for peace. Meekness, humility, self-denial, and love, are the springs of peace, the things that make for our peace. We are not always so happy as to obtain peace; there are so many that delight in war: but the God of peace will accept us if we follow after the things that make for peace. We must study mutual edification. We cannot edify one another, while we are quarrelling and contending. We are God's building, God's temple, and have need to be edified. None so strong but they may be edified; none so weak but may edify.

CHAP. XV

The apostle, in this chapter, continues the discourse of the former, concerning mutual forbearance in indifferent things; and so draws towards a conclusion of the epistle. I. His precepts to them. II. His prayers for them. III. His apology for writing to them. IV. His account of himself and his own affairs. V. His declaration of his purpose to come and see them. VI. His desire of a share in their prayers.

Verses 1–4

The apostle here lays down two precepts, showing the duty of the strong Christian to consider the weakest.

I. We must bear the infirmities of the weak, v. 1. We all have our infirmities; but the weak are more subject to them than others. We must bear with their infirmities, and not have our affections alienated from them. Thus Christ bore with his weak disciples. We must also bear their infirmities by sympathizing with them, ministering strength to them. This is bearing one another's burdens.

II. We must not please ourselves, but our neighbour, v. 1, 2.

1. Christians must not please themselves. It is good for us to cross ourselves sometimes, and then we shall the better bear others crossing of us. We shall be spoiled if we be always humoured. The first lesson we have to learn is to deny ourselves, Matt. xvi. 24.

2. Christians must please their brethren. Christians should study to be pleasing. How amiable and comfortable a society would the church of Christ be if Christians would study to please one another!—Please his neighbour, not in everything, but for his good, especially for the good of his soul. To edification, that is, not only for his profit, but for the profit of others, to edify the body of Christ. The closer the stones lie, and the better they are squared to fit one another, the stronger is the building. For even Christ pleased not himself. The self-denial of our Lord Jesus is the best argument against the selfishness of Christians.

(1) Christ pleased not himself. He did not consult his own worldly credit, ease, safety, nor pleasure; he emptied himself, and made himself of no reputation: and all this for our sakes, and to set us an example. His whole life was a self-denying, self-displeasing life.

(2) Herein the scripture was fulfilled: As it is written, The reproaches of those that reproached thee fell on me. It is quoted to show that Christ was so far from pleasing himself that he did in the highest degree displease himself. In his humiliation the content and satisfaction of natural inclination were altogether crossed and denied. He preferred our benefit before his own ease and pleasure. This the apostle chooses to express in scripture language. The shame of those reproaches, which Christ underwent. Whatever dishonour was done to God was a trouble to the Lord Jesus. Christ also did himself endure the greatest indignities; there was much of reproach in his suffering. The sin of those reproaches. Every sin is a kind of reproach to God. Now the guilt of these fell upon Christ, when he was made a sin-offering for us.

Nothing could be more contrary to him, nor more against him, than to be made sin and a curse for us, and to have the reproaches of God fall upon him. We must not please ourselves, for Christ pleased not himself; we must bear the infirmities of the weak, for Christ bore the reproaches of those that reproached God. He bore the guilt of sin and the curse for it; we are only called to bear a little of the trouble of it. He bore the presumptuous sins of the wicked; we are called only to bear the infirmities of the weak.—Even Christ. Even he pleased not himself, even he bore our sins. And should not we be humble, and self-denying, and ready to consider one another.

(3) Therefore we must go and do likewise: For whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning. [1] That which is written of Christ, is written for our learning; he hath left us an example. The example of Christ is recorded for our imitation. [2] That which is written in the scriptures of the Old Testament is written for our learning. What happened to the Old Testament saints happened to them for ensample. They are written, that they might remain for our use and benefit. First, For our learning. We must therefore labour, not only to understand the literal meaning of the scripture, but to learn out of it that which will do us good. Practical observations are more necessary than critical expositions. Secondly, That we through patience and comfort of the scriptures might have hope. The scripture was written that we might know what to hope for from God. Now the way of attaining this hope is through patience and comfort of the scripture. Patience and comfort suppose trouble and sorrow; such is the lot of the saints in this world. But both these befriend that hope which is the life of our souls. Patience works experience, and experience hope, which maketh not ashamed, ch. v. 3–5. The more patience we exercise under troubles the more hopefully we may look through our troubles; nothing more destructive to hope than impatience. And the comfort of the scriptures, that comfort which springs from the word of God is likewise a great stay to hope, as it is an earnest in hand of the good hoped for.

The apostle, having delivered two exhortations, intermixes here a prayer for the success of what he had said.

I. The title he gives to God: The God of patience and consolation. He gives the grace of patience; he confirms and keeps it up as the God of consolation. When he comes to beg the pouring out of the spirit of love and unity he addresses himself to God as the God of patience and consolation. 1. As a God that bears with us and comforts us, is not extreme to mark what we do amiss—to teach us so to testify our love to our brethren. Or, 2. As a God that gives us patience and comfort. He had spoken (v. 4) of patience and comfort of the scriptures; it comes through the scripture as the conduit-pipe, but from God as the fountain-head. Nothing breaks the peace more than an impatient, and peevish, melancholy temper.

II. The mercy he begs of God: Grant you to be like-minded one towards another, according to Christ Jesus. The foundation of Christian love and peace is laid in likemindedness. This like-mindedness must be according to Christ Jesus, according to the precept of Christ, the royal law of love, according to the pattern and example of Christ, which he had propounded to them for their imitation, v. 3. The method of our prayer must be first for truth, and then for peace; for such is the method of the wisdom that is from above: it is first pure, then peaceable. This is to be like-minded according to Christ Jesus. Like-mindedness among Christians, according to Christ Jesus, is the gift of God. We are taught to pray that the will of God may be done on earth as it is done in heaven: now there it is done unanimously, among the angels; and our desire must be that the saints on earth may do so too.

III. The end of his desire: that God may be glorified, v. 6. We should have the glory of God in our eye in every prayer. Like-mindedness among Christians is in order to our glorifying God, 1. With one mind and one mouth. It will not suffice that there be one mouth, but there must be one mind; nay, there will hardly be one mouth where there is not one mind. 2. As the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. God must be glorified as he has now revealed himself in the face of Jesus Christ, in whom he is our Father. The unity of Christians glorifies God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

He had exhorted the strong to receive the weak (ch. xiv. 1), here, Receive one another; for sometimes the prejudices of the weak Christian make him shy of the strong, as much as the pride of the strong Christian makes him shy of the weak, neither of which ought to be. Let there be a mutual embracing among Christians. Now the reason why Christians must receive one another is taken, as before, from the condescending love of Christ to us: As Christ also received us, to the glory of God. Has Christ been so kind to us, and shall we be so unkind to those that are his? Christ has received us into the nearest and dearest relations to himself. He has received us (though we were strangers and enemies, and had played the prodigal) into fellowship and communion with himself. Those words, to the glory of God, may refer both to Christ's receiving us, which is our pattern, and to our receiving one another, which is our practice according to that pattern.

I. Christ hath received us to the glory of God. The end of our reception by Christ is that we might glorify God in this world, and be glorified with him in that to come. We are called to an eternal glory by Christ Jesus, John xvii. 24.

II. We must receive one another to the glory of God. This must be our great end in all our actions, that God may be glorified; and nothing more conduces to this than the mutual love and kindness of those that profess religion; compare v. 6, That you may with one mind and one mouth glorify God. He shows how Jesus Christ has received both Jews and Gentiles; in him they are both one, one new man, Eph. ii. 14–16. Those that agree in Christ may well afford to agree among themselves.

1. He received the Jews, v. 8. Let not any think hardly or scornfully therefore of those that were originally Jews. (1) Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision. He was a minister—a servant. Christ blessed them, looked upon himself as primarily sent to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, laid hold of the seed of Abraham (Heb. ii. 16, margin), and by them, as it were, caught at the whole body of mankind. Christ's personal ministry was appropriated to them. (2) He was so for the truth of God. That is, to make good the promises given to the patriarchs concerning the special mercy God had in store for their seed.—To confirm the promises made unto the fathers. The best confirmation of promises is the performance of them. When Messiah the Prince appeared in the fulness of time, as a minister of the circumcision, all these promises were confirmed. In Christ all the promises of God are Yea, and in him Amen.

2. He received the Gentiles likewise. This he shows, v. 9–12.

(1) Christ's favour to the Gentiles. One design of Christ was that the Gentiles likewise might be converted. A good reason why they should not think the worse of any Christian for his having been formerly a Gentile; for Christ has received him. That the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy. They shall have matter for praise, even the mercy of God. Considering the miserable and deplorable condition that the Gentile world was in, the receiving of them appears more as an act of mercy than the receiving of the Jews. The greatest mercy of God to any people is the receiving of them into covenant with himself. They shall have a heart for praise. They shall glorify God for his mercy. God intended to reap a harvest of glory from the Gentiles, who had been so long turning his glory into shame.

(2) The fulfilling of the scriptures in this. The favour of God to the Gentiles was not only mercy, but truth. Though there were not promises directly given to them, yet there were many prophesies concerning them, which related to the calling of them, some of which he mentioned. Thus, by referring them to the Old Testament, he labours to qualify their dislike of the Gentiles. [1] It was foretold that the Gentiles should have the gospel preached to them: "I will confess to thee among the Gentiles (v. 9), thy name shall be known and owned in the Gentile world." Christ, in and by his apostles and ministers, whom he sent to disciple all nations, did confess to God among the Gentiles. Christ's declaring God's name to his brethren is called his praising God in the midst of the congregation, Ps. xxii. 22. When David's psalms are read and sung among the Gentiles, to the praise and glory of God, it may be said that David is confessing to God among the Gentiles, and singing to his name. He that was the sweet psalmist of Israel is now the sweet psalmist of the Gentiles. Converting grace makes people greatly in love with David's psalms. If any confess to God among the Gentiles, and sing to his name, it is not they, but Christ and his grace in them. [2] The Gentiles should rejoice with his people, v. 10. Those Jews that retain a prejudice against the Gentiles will by no means admit them to any of their joyful festivities. But, the partition-wall being taken down, the Gentiles are welcome to rejoice with his people. [3] They should praise God (v. 11): Praise the Lord, all ye Gentiles. Converting grace sets people praising God. The Gentiles had been, for many ages, praising their idols of wood and stone, but now they are brought to praise the Lord. [4] They should believe in Christ (v. 12), quoted from Isa. xi. 10. First, The revelation of Christ, as the Gentiles' king. He is here called the root of Jesse. Christ, as God, was David's root; Christ, as man, was David's offspring.—And he that shall rise to reign over the Gentiles. When Christ rose from the dead, when he ascended on high, it was to reign over the Gentiles. Secondly, The recourse of the Gentiles to him: In him shall the Gentiles trust. The prophet has it, to him shall the Gentiles seek. The method of faith is first to seek unto Christ, as to one proposed to us for a Saviour; and, finding him able and willing to save, then to trust in him. Those that know him will trust in him. This seeking to him is the effect of a trust in him. We shall never seek to Christ till we trust in him. Trust is the mother; diligence in the use of means the daughter. Jews and Gentiles being thus united in Christ's love, why should they not be united in one another's love?

Here is another prayer directed to God, as the God of hope.

I. He addresses himself to God, as the God of hope. He is the foundation on which our hope is built, and he is the builder that doth himself raise it: he is both the object of our hope, and the author of it. That hope is but fancy, which is not fastened upon God and which is not of his working in us.

II. What he asks of God, not for himself, but for them.

1. That they might be filled with all joy and peace in believing. Joy and peace are two of those things in which the kingdom of God consists, ch. xiv. 17. (1) How desirable this joy and peace are; they are filling. Carnal joy puffs up the soul, but cannot fill it. True, heavenly, spiritual joy is filling to the soul; it has a satisfaction in it, answerable to the soul's vast and just desires. Nothing more than this joy, only more of it, even the perfection of it in glory, is the desire of the soul that hath it. (2) How it is attainable. By prayer. Prayer fetches in spiritual joy and peace. By believing. True substantial joy is the fruit of faith. It is owing to the weakness of our faith that we are so much wanting in joy and peace. Only believe; believe the goodness of Christ, the love of Christ, and the result must needs be joy and peace. It is all joy and peace—all sorts of true joy and peace. When we come to God by prayer we must enlarge our desires. Ask for all joy.

2. That they might abound in hope through the power of the Holy Ghost. What is laid out upon them is but little, compared with what is laid up for them; therefore the more hope they have the more joy and peace they have. Christians should desire and labour after an abundance of hope, such hope as will not make ashamed. This is through the power of the Holy Ghost. Our own power will never reach it; and therefore where this hope is, and is abounding, the blessed spirit must have all the glory.

I. He commends these Christians. He began his epistle with their praises (ch. i. 8), Your faith is spoken of throughout the world. Because sometimes he had reproved them sharply, he now concludes with the like commendation, to part friends. It was not a piece of idle flattery, but a due acknowledgment of their worth, and of the grace of God in them. We must be forward to observe and commend in others that which is excellent and praiseworthy. Paul had no personal acquaintance with these Christians, and yet he says he was persuaded of their excellencies, though he knew them only by hearsay. As we must not, on the one hand, be so simple as to believe every word; so, on the other hand, we must not be so sceptical as to believe nothing; but especially we must be forward to believe good concerning others. It is safer to err on this side. They were full of goodness; therefore the more likely to take in good part what he had written, and to account it a kindness; and not only so, but to put it in practice, especially that which relates to the healing of their differences. A good understanding of one another, and a goodwill to one another, would soon put an end to strife. Filled with all knowledge. Goodness and knowledge together! A very rare and an excellent conjunction; the head and the heart of the new man. Able to admonish one another. Those that have goodness and knowledge should communicate what they have. "You that excel so much in good gifts may think you have no need of any instructions of mine." How gladly would ministers leave off their admonishing work, if people were able and willing to admonish one another! Would to God that all the Lord's people were prophets.

II. He clears himself from the suspicion of intermeddling needlessly with that which did not belong to him, v. 15. Observe how affectionately he speaks to them: My brethren (v. 14), and again, brethren, v. 15. He had himself, and taught others, the art of obliging. He acknowledges he had written boldly in some sort.

1. He did it only as their remembrancer: As putting you in mind. People commonly excuse themselves from hearing the word with this, that the minister can tell them nothing but what they knew before. Yet have they not need to know it better, and to be put in mind of it?

2. He did it as the apostle of the Gentiles. It was in pursuance of his office: Because of the grace given to me of God, to be the minister of Jesus Christ to the Gentiles, v. 16. He thus laid out himself among the Gentiles, that he might not receive that grace of God in vain. Christ received that he might give; so did Paul; so have we talents which must not be buried. Paul was a minister. Whose minister he was: the minister of Jesus Christ; his we are, and him we serve. To whom: to the Gentiles. These Romans were Gentiles: "Now," says he, "I do not thrust myself upon you, I am appointed to it: my commission is my warrant. What he ministered: the gospel of God—ministering as about holy things (so the word signifies). For what end: that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable. Paul laid out himself thus to bring about something that might be acceptable to God. It is the offering up of the Gentiles; the oblation of the Gentiles, in which the Gentiles are looked upon either, (1) As the priests, offering the oblation of prayer and praise. Long had the Jews been the holy nation, the kingdom of priests, but now the Gentiles are made priests unto God. Or, (2) The Gentiles are themselves the sacrifice offered up to God by Paul. Paul gathered in souls by his preaching, not to keep them to himself, but to offer them up to God. And it is an acceptable offering, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost. That which made them sacrifices to God was their sanctification; and this was not his work, but the work of the Holy Ghost. None are acceptably offered to God but those that are sanctified.

He goes on further to magnify his office in the efficacy of it, and to mention to the glory of God the wonderful things that God had done by him. Though, compared with the multitude of their idolatrous neighbours, they were but a little flock, yet, there were many that were their companions in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ. It was likewise a great confirmation of the truth of the Christian doctrine that it had such strange success. Therefore Paul gives them this account, which he makes the matter of his glorying; not vain glory, but holy gracious glorying; it is through Jesus Christ. Thus does he centre all his glorying in Christ. And it is in those things which pertain to God. Whereof I may glory. I would rather read it thus: Therefore I have a rejoicing in Christ Jesus concerning the things of God. Paul would have them to rejoice with him in the efficacy of his ministry, of which he speaks not only with the greatest deference possible to the power of Christ, but with a protestation of the truth of what he said (v. 18): I will not dare to speak of any of those things which Christ hath not wrought by me. He would not take the praise of another man's work, for (says he) I dare not do it.

I. His unwearied diligence and industry in his work.

1. He preached in many places: From Jerusalem and round about unto Illyricum. We have in the book of the Acts an account of Paul's travels. There we find him, after he was sent forth to preach to the Gentiles (Acts xiii), labouring in Seleucia, Cyprus, Pamphylia, Pisidia, and Lycaonia (Acts xiii, xiv), afterwards travelling through Syria and Cilicia, Phrygia, Galatia, Mysia, Troas, and thence called over to Macedonia, and so into Europe, Acts xv, xvi. Then we find him very busy at Thessalonica, Berea, Athens, Corinth, Ephesus, and the parts adjacent. Now it might be suspected that if Paul undertook so much work, surely he did it by the halves. "No," says he, "I have fully preached the Gospel of Christ—have given them a full account of the truth and terms of the gospel, have not shunned to declare the whole counsel of God."

2. He preached in places that had not heard the gospel before, v. 20, 21. He broke up the fallow ground, and introduced Christianity where nothing had reigned for many ages but idolatry and witchcraft. Paul broke the ice, and therefore must needs meet with the more difficulties and discouragements in his work. Paul was called out to the hardest work. He was a bold man that made the first attack upon the palace of the strong man armed in the Gentile world, and Paul was that man who ventured the first onset in many places, and suffered greatly for it. He mentions this as a proof of his apostleship; for the office of the apostles was especially to bring in those that were without. He principally laid himself out for the good of those that sat in darkness. He was in care not to build upon another man's foundation. He quotes a scripture for this out of Isa. lii. 15, To whom he was not spoken of, they shall see. The transition from darkness to light is more sensible than the after-growth and increase of that light. And commonly the greatest success of the gospel is at its first coming to a place; afterwards most people become sermon-proof.

II. The great success that he had in his work: It was effectual to make the Gentiles obedient. The design of the gospel is to bring people to be obedient. This Paul aimed at in all his travels. Now how was this great work wrought? Christ was the principal agent. He does not say, "which I worked," but "which Christ wrought by me," v. 18. Whatever good we do, it is not we, but Christ by us, that does it. Paul takes all occasions to own this. Paul was a very active instrument: By word and deed, that is, by his preaching, and by the miracles he wrought, or his preaching and his living. Those ministers are likely to win souls that preach both by word and deed. This is according to Christ's example, who began both to do and teach.—Through mighty signs and wonders. These made the preaching of the word so effectual. The power of the Spirit of God made this effectual, v. 19. (1) The power of the Spirit in Paul, as in the other apostles, for the working of those miracles. Miracles were wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost. Or, (2) The power of the Spirit in the hearts of those who saw the miracles. Paul himself could not make one soul obedient further than the power of the Spirit of God accompanied his labours. This is an encouragement to faithful ministers, who labour under the sense of great weakness and infirmity. The same almighty Spirit that wrought with Paul often perfects strength in weakness. The converted nations were his joy and crown of rejoicing: and he tells them of it, that they might rejoice with him.

St. Paul here declares his purpose to come and see the Christians at Rome. The manner of his expression is gracious, and for our imitation. Even our common discourse should have an air of grace; by this it will appear what country we belong to. It should seem that Paul's company was very much desired at Rome. Should the apostle of the Gentiles be a stranger at Rome, the metropolis of the Gentile world? He promises to come shortly, and gives a good reason why he could not come now.

I. He excuses it that he never came yet. 1. He assures them that he had a great desire to see them; not to see Rome, but to come unto you (v. 3), a company of poor despised saints in Rome. These were the men that Paul was ambitious of an acquaintance with at Rome. And he had a special desire to see them, because of the great character they had in all the churches for faith and holiness. This desire Paul had had for many years, and yet could never compass it. God's dearest servants are not always gratified in everything that they have a mind to. 2. He tells them that the reason why he could not come to them was because he had so much work cut out for him elsewhere. For which cause he was so much hindered. God had opened a wide door for him in other places, and so turned him aside. (1) The gracious providence of God about his ministers, casting their lot, not according to their contrivance, but according to his own purpose. Man purposes but God disposes. The gospel does not come by chance to any place, but by the will and counsel of God. (2) The gracious prudence of Paul, in bestowing his time and pains where there was most need. Had Paul consulted his own honour, the greatness of the work would never have hindered him from seeing Rome. Paul sought the things of Christ more than his own things. There was now a gale of opportunity, the fields were white unto the harvest; such a season slipped might never be retrieved. It concerns us all to do that first which is most needful. This Paul mentions as a sufficient satisfying reason. We must not take it ill of our friends if they prefer necessary work, which is pleasing to God, before unnecessary visits and compliments.

II. He promised to come and see them shortly, v. 23, 24, 29. Having no more place in these parts, namely, in Greece, where he then was. He had driven the chariot of the gospel to the sea-coast, and having thus conquered Greece he is ready to wish there were another Greece to conquer.

1. How he forecasted his intended visit. His project was to see them in his way to Spain. It appears by this that Paul intended a journey into Spain. But it is not certain whether ever he fulfilled his purpose, and went to Spain. He did indeed come to Rome, but he was brought thither a prisoner, and there was detained two years; and whither he went after is uncertain. The grace of God often with favour accepts the sincere intention, when the providence of God in wisdom prohibits the execution. Now, in his way to Spain he proposed to come to them. I trust to see you: not, "I am resolved I will," but, "I hope I shall." We must purpose all our purposes in like manner with a submission to the divine providence.

2. What he expected in his intended visit. (1) What he expected from them. He expected they would bring him on his way towards Spain. It was not a stately attendance but a loving attendance, such as friends give, that Paul expected. They might be helpful to Paul in his voyage thither; and it was not barely their accompanying him part of the way, but their furthering him in his expedition, that he counted upon. (2) What he expected in them: to be somewhat filled with their company. That which Paul desired was their company and conversation. Paul was himself a man of great attainments in knowledge and grace, and yet see how he pleased himself with the thoughts of good company. He intended to make some stay with them, for he would be filled with their company; not just look at them, and away. It is but somewhat filled, he thought he should leave them with a desire of more of their company. The satisfaction we have in communion with the saints in this world is but partial. It is partial compared with our communion with Christ. That will fill the soul. It is partial compared with the communion we hope to have with the saints in the other world. (3) What he expected from God with them, v. 29. He expected to come in the fulness of the blessing of the gospel of Christ. Concerning what he expected from them he speaks doubtfully: I trust to be brought on my way, and to be filled with your company. Paul had learnt not to be too confident of the best. These very men slipped from him afterwards, At my first answer, no man stood by me; none of the Christians at Rome. But concerning what he expected from God he speaks confidently. I am sure when I do come I shall come in the fulness, &c. We cannot expect too little from man, nor too much from God. Now Paul expected that God would bring him to them, loaded with blessings. Compare ch. i. 11, That I may impart unto you some spiritual gift. The blessing of the gospel of Christ is the best and most desirable blessing. There is then a happy meeting between people and ministers, when they are both under the fulness of the blessing. When ministers are fully prepared to give out, and people fully prepared to receive, this blessing, both are happy.

III. He gives them a good reason why he could not come and see them now. He must first make a journey to Jerusalem, v. 25–28. He was going to Jerusalem, as the messenger of the church's charity.

1. Concerning this charity itself. And he speaks of that probably to excite the Roman Christians to do the like. Examples are moving, and Paul was very ingenious at begging, not for himself, but for others. (1) For whom it was intended: For the poor saints which are at Jerusalem, v. 26. It is no strange thing for saints to be poor. Riches are not the best things, nor is poverty a curse. It seems, the saints at Jerusalem were poorer than other saints because the famine that was over all the world in the days of Claudius Cæsar did in a special manner prevail in Judæa. This was the occasion of that contribution mentioned, Acts xi. 28–30. Though the saints at Jerusalem were at a great distance from them, yet they thus extended their bounty to them, to teach us to stretch out the hand of our charity to all that are of the household of faith, though in places distant from us. We must extend our bounty, as the sun his beams. (2) By whom it was collected: By those of Macedonia (the chief of whom were the Philippians) and Achaia (the chief of whom were the Corinthians). It seems those of Macedonia and Achaia were rich and wealthy, while those at Jerusalem were poor and needy, so that some should have what others want, and so this mutual dependence of Christians one upon another might be maintained.—It pleased them. This intimates how ready they were to it, and how cheerful they were in it.—To make a certain contribution; a communication, in token of the communion of saints, as in the natural body one member communicates to the relief of another, as there is occasion. Time was when the saints at Jerusalem were on the giving hand, when they laid their estates at the apostles' feet for charitable uses, and took special care that the Grecian widows should not be neglected in the daily ministration. And now that the providence of God had turned the scale, and made them necessitous, they found the Greeians kind to them; for the merciful shall obtain mercy. (3) What reason there was for it (v. 27): And their debtors they are. The Gentiles were greatly beholden to the Jews, and were bound in gratitude to be very kind to them. From the stock of Israel came Christ himself; out of the same stock came the prophets, and apostles, and first preachers of the gospel. The Jews, having had the lively oracles committed to them, were the Christians' library-keepers. They were cut off, that the Gentiles might be admitted in. Thus did the Gentiles partake of their spiritual things, and receive the gospel of salvation as it were at secondhand from the Jews; and therefore their duty is to minister unto them in carnal things: it is the least they can do.

2. Concerning Paul's agency in this business. He ministered unto the saints (v. 25) by stirring up others, receiving what was gathered, and transmitting it to Jerusalem. Many good works of that kind stand at a stay for want of some one active person to lead in them, and to set the wheels going. Besides this, Paul had other business in this journey, to visit and confirm the churches. Paul was one that laid out himself to do good every way, like his Master, to the bodies as well as to the souls of people. This Paul had undertaken, and therefore he resolves to go through with it, before he fell upon other work (v. 28): When I have sealed to them this fruit. He calls the alms fruit, for it is one of the fruits of righteousness; it sprang from a root of grace in the givers. And his sealing it intimates his great care about it. Paul was very solicitous to approve himself faithful in the management of this matter.

Verses 30–33

I. St. Paul's desire of a share in the prayers of the Romans for him, expressed very earnestly, v. 30–32. He had prayed much for them, and this he desires as the return of his kindness. Interchanging prayers is an excellent token of the interchanging of loves. How careful should we be lest we do anything to forfeit our interest in the love and prayers of God's praying people!

1. Why they must pray for him. I beseech you, "For the Lord Jesus Christ's sake. You love Christ, and own Christ; for his sake then do me this kindness. For the love of the Spirit. As a proof of that love which the Spirit works in the hearts of believers one to another, pray for me. If ever you experienced the Spirit's love to you, and would be found returning your love to the Spirit, be not wanting in this office of kindness."

2. How they must pray for him: That you strive together. That you strive in prayer. We must put forth all that is within us in that duty; pray with fixedness, faith, and fervency. This not only when we are praying for ourselves, but when we are praying for our friends. True love to our brethren should make us as earnest for them as sense of our own need makes us for ourselves. "Strive together with me, who am wrestling with God daily, upon my own and my friends' account." He would have them to ply the same oar. Those who are put far asunder by the disposal of God's providence may yet meet together at the throne of his grace.

3. What they must beg of God for him. In praying both for ourselves and for our friends, it is good to be particular. He recommends himself to their prayers, with reference to three things: (1) The dangers which he was exposed to: That I may be delivered from those that do not believe in Judæa. Some prospect he had of trouble from them in this journey; and therefore they must pray that God would deliver him. We may, and must, pray against persecution. (2) His services: Pray that my service which I have for Jerusalem may be accepted of the saints. Why, was there any danger that it would not be accepted? Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles, and as the unbelieving Jews looked spitefully at him, which was their wickedness, so those that believed were shy of him, which was their weakness. "Pray that it may be accepted." As God must be sought unto for the restraining of the ill will of our enemies, so also for the preserving and increasing of the goodwill of our friends. (3) His journey to them. To engage their prayers for him, he interests them in his concerns (v. 32): That I may come unto you with joy. If he should not do good, and prosper, in one visit, he thought he should have small joy of the next: may come with joy, by the will of God. All our joy depends upon the will of God.

II. Here is another prayer of the apostle for them (v. 33): Now the God of peace be with you all, Amen. He describes God under this title here, because of the divisions among them; if God be the God of peace, let us be men of peace. Those who have the fountain cannot want any of the streams. With you all; both weak and strong. Those who are united in the blessing of God should be united in affection one to another.

CHAP. XVI

Paul is now concluding this long and excellent epistle, and he does it with a great deal of affection. He appears to have been a very loving man. It is observable how often Paul speaks as if he were concluding, and yet takes fresh hold again. These repeated benedictions, which stand for valedictions, speak Paul loth to part. I. His recommendation of one friend to the Roman Christians, and his particular salutation of several among them, ver. 1–16. II. A caution to take heed of those who caused divisions, ver. 17–20. III. Salutations added from some who were with Paul, ver. 21–24. IV. He concludes with a solemn celebration of the glory of God, ver. 25–27.

Verses 1–16

I. Here is the recommendation of a friend, by whom (as some think) this epistle was sent—one Phebe, v. 1, 2. It should seem that she was a person of quality and estate, who had business which called her to Rome, where she was a stranger; and therefore Paul recommends her to the acquaintance of the Christians there. Courtesy and Christianity agree well together.

1. He gives a very good character of her. (1) As a sister to Paul: Phebe our sister; not in nature, but in grace. Both Christ and his apostles had some of their best friends among the devout (and upon that account honourable) women. (2) As a servant to the church at Cenchrea: a servant by office, not to preach the word (that was forbidden to women), but in acts of charity and hospitality. Phebe seems to have been a person of some account; and yet it was no disparagement to her to be a servant to the church. Everyone in his place should strive to serve the church, for therein he serves Christ. Cenchrea was a small sea-port town adjoining to Corinth. (3) As a succourer of many, and particularly of Paul, v. 2. She relieved many that were in want and distress. Her bounty was extensive, she was a succourer of many. Observe the gratitude of Paul in mentioning her particular kindness to him: And to myself also. Acknowledgment of favours is the least return we can make.

2. He recommends her to their care. "Receive her in the Lord. Entertain her; bid her welcome, as a servant and friend of Christ." As it becometh saints to receive, who love Christ, and therefore love all that are his for his sake; or, as becometh saints to be received, with love and honour. Assist her in whatsoever business she has need of you. Being a woman, a stranger, a Christian, she had need of help: and Paul engaged them to be assistant to her. It becomes Christians to be helpful one to another in their affairs, especially to be helpful to strangers; for we are members one of another. Paul bespeaks help for one that had been so helpful to many.

II. Here are commendations to some particular friends among those to whom he wrote. Though the care of all the churches came upon Paul daily, enough to distract an ordinary head, yet he could retain the remembrance of so many; and his heart was so full of love and affection as to send salutations to each of them. Greet them, salute them; it is the same word, "Let them know that I remember them."

1. Concerning Aquila and Priscilla, a famous couple, that Paul had a special kindness for. They were originally of Rome, but were banished thence by the edict of Claudius, Acts xviii. 2. At Corinth, Paul became acquainted with them, wrought with them at the trade of tent-making; after some time, they returned to Rome. He calls them his helpers in Christ Jesus. Nay, they did not only do much, but they ventured much, for Paul: They have for my life laid down their own necks. They exposed themselves to secure Paul, hazarded their own lives for the preservation of his. Paul was in a great deal of danger at Corinth; but they sheltered him. It was a good while ago that they had done Paul this kindness; and yet he speaks as feelingly of it as if it had been but yesterday. To whom not only I give thanks, but also all the churches of the Gentiles; who were all beholden to these good people for helping to save the life of him that was the apostle of the Gentiles. He sends likewise greeting to the church in their house, v. 5. Religion reigning in a family, will turn a house into a church. It had a good influence upon this that Priscilla the good wife of the family was so very eminent and forward in religion, so eminent that she is often named first. When Priscilla and Aquila were at Ephesus, though but sojourners there, yet there also they had a church in their house, 1 Cor. xvi. 19. A truly godly man will be careful to take religion along with him wherever he goes.

2. Concerning Epenetus, v. 5. He calls him his well-beloved. Endearing language should pass among Christians to express love, and to engage love. So he calls Amplias, beloved in the Lord; and Stachys, his beloved. Of Epenetus it is further said that he was the first-fruit of Achaia unto Christ: one that was offered up to God by Paul, as the first-fruits of his ministry there; an earnest of a great harvest; for in Corinth, the chief city of Achaia, God had much people, Acts xviii. 10. Special respect is to be paid to those that set out early, and come to work in the vineyard at the first hour.

3. Concerning Mary, and some others. Mary, who bestowed much labour on us. True love never sticks at labour, but rather takes a pleasure in it; where there is much love there will be much labour. He says of Tryphena and Tryphosa that they laboured in the Lord (v. 12), and of the beloved Persis, that she laboured much in the Lord, abounding more in the work of the Lord.

4. Concerning Andronicus and Junia, v. 7. Some take them for a man and his wife. They were Paul's cousins, akin to him; so was Herodion, v. 11. Religion does not take away, but sanctifies, and improves, our respect to our kindred, engaging us to rejoice in them the more, when we find them related to Christ by faith. They were his fellow-prisoners. Partnership in suffering sometimes does much towards the union of souls and the knitting of affections. They were of note among the apostles. They were eminent for knowledge, and gifts, and graces, which made them famous among the apostles. Who also were in Christ before me. In time they had the start of Paul. How ready was Paul to acknowledge in others any kind of precedency!

5. Concerning Apelles, who is here said to be approved in Christ (v. 10), a high character! One that had been tried; his friends and enemies had tried him, and he was as gold, a man that one might trust and repose a confidence in.

6. Concerning Aristobulus and Narcissus; notice is taken of their household, v. 10, 11. Those of their household who are in the Lord (as it is limited, v. 11), that were Christians. How studious was Paul to leave none out of his salutations that he had any knowledge of or acquaintance with!

7. Concerning Rufus (v. 13), chosen in the Lord. He was a choice Christian, whose gifts and graces evinced that he was eternally chosen in Christ Jesus. —And his mother and mine, his mother by nature and mine by Christian love. This good woman, upon some occasion, or other, had been as a mother to Paul, and Paul here gratefully owns it.

8. Concerning the rest, he salutes the brethren who are with them (v. 14), and the saints who are with them (v. 15). It is the good property of saints to delight in being together; and Paul thus joins them together in his salutations to endear them one to another. In Christian congregations there should be smaller societies linked together in love and converse.

Lastly, He concludes with the recommendation of them to the love and embraces one of another: Salute one another with a holy kiss. Mutual salutations, as they express love, so they increase and strengthen love. Paul here encourages the use of them, and only directs that they may be holy. He adds, in the close, a general salutation to them all, in the name of the churches of Christ (v. 16): "The churches of Christ salute you; that is, the churches which I am with desire me to testify their affection to you and good wishes for you." This is one way of maintaining the communion of saints.

A caution to take heed of those whose principles and practices were destructive to Christian love.

I. The caution itself: I beseech you, brethren. He does not will and command, but for love's sake beseeches. He teaches them, 1. To see their danger: Mark those who cause divisions and offences. Our Master had himself foretold that divisions and offences would come, and against such we are here cautioned. Those who burden the church with dividing and offending impositions cause divisions and offences, contrary to, or different from, the doctrine which we have learned. If truth be once deserted, unity and peace will not last long. Now, mark those that thus cause divisions. There is need of a piercing watchful eye to discern the danger we are in from such people; for commonly the pretences are plausible, when the projects are very pernicious. A danger discovered is half prevented. 2. To shun it: "Avoid them. Shun all unnecessary communion and communication with them, lest you be leavened and infected by them.—Their word will eat as doth a canker." Some think he especially warns them to take heed of the judaizing teachers.

II. The reasons to enforce this caution.

1. Because of the pernicious policy of these seducers, v. 18. His description of them, in two things: (1) The master they serve: not our Lord Jesus Christ. Though they call themselves Christians, they do not serve Christ, whatever they pretend. But they serve their own belly. It is some base lust or other that they are pleasing. Their God is their belly, Phil. iii. 19. What a base master do they serve, and how unworthy to come in competition with Christ. (2) The method they take to compass their design: By good words and fair speeches they deceive the hearts of the simple. Their words and speeches have a show of holiness and zeal for God (it is an easy thing to be godly from the teeth outward), and a show of kindness and love to those into whom they instil their corrupt doctrines. We have great need therefore to keep our hearts with all diligence.

2. Because of the peril we are in: "For your obedience has come abroad unto all men—you are noted in all the churches for a willing, tractable, complying people." (1) Therefore, because it was so, these seducing teachers would be the more apt to assault them. "The false teachers hear that you are an obedient people, and therefore they will be likely to come among you, to see if you will be obedient to them." (2) Though it were so, yet they were in danger from these seducers. This Paul suggests, not as one suspicious of them, but as one solicitous for them: "Your obedience has come abroad unto all men; I am glad therefore on your behalf." Thus does he insinuate their commendation, the better to make way for the caution. "You must not be secure: I would have you wise unto that which is good, and simple concerning evil." A pliable temper is good when it is under good government; but otherwise it may be very ensnaring. Two general rules: [1] To be wise unto that which is good. There is need of a great deal of wisdom in our adherence to good truths, and good duties, and good people, lest in any of these we be imposed upon and deluded. [2] To be simple concerning evil—so wise as not to be deceived, and yet so simple as not to be deceivers. The wisdom of the serpent becomes Christians, but not the subtlety of the old serpent. That is a wisely simple man that knows not how to do anything against the truth. Now Paul was the more solicitous for the Roman church, because it was so famous; it was a city upon a hill, and many eyes were upon the Christians there.

3. Because of the promise of God, that we shall have victory at last (v. 20): The God of peace shall bruise Satan under your feet.

(1) The titles he gives to God: The God of peace. When we come to God for spiritual victories, we must not only eye him as the Lord of hosts, whose all power is, but as the God of peace, a God at peace with us, creating peace for us. Victory comes from God more as the God of peace than as the God of war.

(2) The blessing he expects from God—a victory over Satan. Satan tempting and troubling, acting as a deceiver and as a destroyer, the God of peace will bruise under our feet. "Though you cannot overcome in your own strength and wisdom, yet the God of peace will do it for you." [1] The victory shall be complete: He shall bruise Satan under your feet, plainly alluding to the first promise the Messiah made in paradise (Gen. iii. 15). Christ hath overcome for us, and we have nothing to do but to pursue the victory. Let this quicken us to our spiritual conflict, to fight the good fight of faith. [2] The victory shall be speedy: He shall do it shortly. It will encourage soldiers when they know the war will be at an end quickly, in such a victory. It is the victory which all the saints shall have over Satan when they come to heaven, together with the present victories which through grace they obtain in earnest of that. Hold out therefore, faith and patience, yet a little while! The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. If the grace of Christ be with us, who can be against us so as to prevail? Paul, not only as a friend, but as an apostle, thus with authority blesses them, and repeats it, v. 24.

He here adds an affectionate remembrance of them from some particular persons who were now with him. 1. Some that were his particular friends. Timotheus my work-fellow. Paul sometimes calls Timothy his son; but here he styles him his work-fellow, as one equal with him. Lucius, probably Lucius of Cyrene, a noted man in the church of Antioch (Acts xiii. 1). Sosipater, supposed to be the same with Sopater of Berea, mentioned Acts xx. 4. These Paul calls his kinsmen. It is a very great comfort to see the holiness and usefulness of our kindred. 2. One that was Paul's amanuensis (v. 22): I Tertius, who wrote this epistle. Paul made use of a scribe because he wrote a bad hand, which was not very legible, which he excuses, when he writes to the Galatians with his own hand (Gal. vi. 11). The least piece of service done to the church shall not pass without a remembrance and a recompence. 3. Some others that were of note among the Christians (v. 23): Gaius my host. Paul commends him for his great hospitality; not only my host, but of the whole church. Erastus, the chamberlain of the city, is another; he means the city of Corinth. It seems he was a person of honour and account, one in public place. Not many mighty, not many noble, are called, but some are. Quartus is likewise mentioned, and called a brother.

Verses 25–27

Here the apostle solemnly closes his epistle with a magnificent ascription of glory to the blessed God. He does, as it were, breathe out his soul to these Romans in the praise of God.

I. A description of the gospel of God, which comes in in a parenthesis. To establish you according to my gospel. Paul calls it his gospel, because he was the preacher of it. Paul had his head and heart so full of the gospel that he could scarcely mention it without a digression to set forth the nature and excellency of it.

1. It is the preaching of Jesus Christ. The sum and substance of the whole gospel is Jesus Christ and him crucified. We preach not ourselves, says Paul, but Christ Jesus the Lord. That which establishes souls is the plain preaching of Jesus Christ.

2. It is the revelation of the mystery which was kept secret since the world began, and by the scriptures of the prophets made known. The subject-matter of the gospel is a mystery. Blessed be God, there is as much of this mystery made plain as will suffice to bring us to heaven, if we do not wilfully neglect so great salvation.

(1) This mystery was kept secret since the world began: It was wrapped up in silence from eternity; so some. Before the foundation of the world was laid, the mystery was hid in God, Eph. iii. 9. Or, since the world began, so we translate it. During all the times of the Old Testament this mystery was comparatively kept secret. Thus it was hid from ages and generations, even among the Jews, much more among the Gentiles. Even the disciples of Christ themselves, before his resurrection and ascension, were very much in the dark about the mystery of redemption.

(2) It is now made manifest. The shadows of the evening are done away, and the Sun of righteousness has risen upon the world. But how is it made manifest by the scriptures of the prophets? Surely, because now the event has given the best exposition to the prophecies of the Old Testament. Being accomplished, they are explained. The Old Testament does not only borrow light from, but return light to, the revelation of the New Testament. Now Christ appears to have been the treasure hid in the field of the Old Testament. To him bear all the prophets witness. See Luke xxiv. 27.

(3) It is manifested according to the commandment of the everlasting God. Lest any should object, "Why was this mystery kept secret so long, and why made manifest now?"—he resolves it into the will of God. The everlasting God. He is from everlasting. He is to everlasting. We must never look for any new revelation, but abide by this, for this is according to the commandment of the everlasting God. Christ, in the gospel, is the same yesterday, today, and for ever.

(4) It is made known to all nations for the obedience of faith. The extent of this revelation he often takes notice of. Christ is salvation to the ends of the earth, to all nations. And the design of it is very observable; it is for the obedience of faith. The gospel is revealed, not to be talked of, and disputed about, but to be submitted to. See here what is the right faith—even that which works in obedience; and what is the right obedience—even that which springs from faith; and what is the design of the gospel—to bring us to both.

II. A doxology to that God whose gospel it is, ascribing glory to him for ever (v. 27).

1. The matter of this praise. In thanking God, we fasten upon his favours, to us; in praising and adoring God, we fasten upon his perfections in himself. Two of his principal attributes are here taken notice of: (1) His power (v. 25): To him that is of power to establish you. It is no less than a divine power that establishes the saints. In giving God the glory of this power we may, and must, take to ourselves the comfort of it—that whatever our doubts, and difficulties, and fears, may be, our God, whom we serve, is of power to establish us. (2) His wisdom (v. 27): To God only wise. Power to effect without wisdom to contrive, and wisdom to contrive without power to effect, are alike vain and fruitless; but both together, and both infinite, make a perfect being. He is only perfectly and infallibly wise. He is the spring and fountain of all the wisdom of the creatures. With him are strength and wisdom.

2. The Mediator of this praise: Through Jesus Christ. To God only wise through Jesus Christ; so some. It is in and through Christ that God is manifested to the world as the only wise God. Or rather, as we read it, glory through Jesus Christ. All the glory that passes from fallen man to God must go through the hands of the Lord Jesus. As he is the Mediator of all our prayers, so he is, and I believe will be to eternity, the Mediator of all our praises.

THE FIRST EPISTLE TO THE CORINTHIANS

Corinth was a principal city of Greece. It was situated on the isthmus that joined Peloponnesus to the rest of Greece, and had two ports adjoining, one called Lechæum, not far from the city, whence they traded to Italy and the west, the other, called Cenchrea, at a more remote distance, whence they traded to Asia. From this situation, it is no wonder that Corinth should be a place of great trade and wealth; and neither is it to be wondered at if a place so famous for wealth and arts should be infamous for vice. Yet in this lewd city did Paul plant and raise a Christian church, chiefly among the Gentiles. You know that you were Gentiles, carried away to those dumb idols even as you were led, though it is not improbable that many Jewish converts might be also among them, for we are told that Crispus, the chief ruler of the synagogue, believed on the Lord, with all his house, Acts xviii. 8. He continued in this city nearly two years, being encouraged by a divine vision assuring him God had much people in that city, Acts xviii. 9, 10.

Some time after he left them he wrote this epistle to them, to water what he had planted and rectify some gross disorders which during his absence had been introduced. Pride, avarice, luxury, lust, with all these either the body of this people or some particular persons among them are here charged by the apostle. Their pride discovered itself in their parties and factions. And this vice was not wholly fed by their wealth, but by the insight they had into the Greek learning and philosophy. Their avarice was manifest in their law-suits before heathen judges. Their luxury appeared in more instances than one, in their dress, in their debauching themselves even at the Lord's table. Their lust broke out in a most flagrant and infamous instance—that a man should have his father's wife. And it is plain from other passages of the epistle that they were not so entirely free from their former lewd inclinations as not to need very strict cautions against fornication. The pride of their learning had also carried many of them so far as to disbelieve or dispute against the doctrine of the resurrection.

It is manifest that there was much that deserved reprehension, and needed correction, in this church. And the apostle sets himself to do both with all wisdom and faithfulness, and with a due mixture of tenderness and authority. After a short introduction he first blames them for their discord and factions, and prescribes humility as a remedy for the evils that abounded amongst them. This he does through the first four chapters. In the fifth he treats of the case of the incestuous person. In the sixth chapter he blames them for their law-suits, carried on before heathen judges, and in the close of the chapter warns them against the sin of fornication. In the seventh chapter he gives advice upon a case of conscience about marriage. He gives also some directions here about virgins. In the eighth he directs them about meats offered to idols. From this he also takes occasion, in the ninth chapter, to expatiate a little on his own conduct. In the tenth chapter he dissuades them against having communion with idolaters, by eating of their sacrifices, inasmuch as they could not be at once partakers of the Lord's table and the table of devils. In the eleventh chapter he gives direction about their habit in public worship, blames them for their gross irregularities and scandalous disorders in receiving the Lord's supper. In the twelfth chapter he enters on the consideration of spiritual gifts, which were poured forth in great abundance on this church. Towards the close he informs them that he could recommend to them something far more excellent, upon which he breaks out, in the thirteenth chapter, into the commendation and characteristics of charity. And then, in the fourteenth, he directs them how to keep up decency and order in the churches in the use of their spiritual gifts. The fifteenth chapter is taken up in confirming and explaining the great doctrine of the resurrection. The last chapter consists of some particular advices and salutations.

CHAP. I

I. The preface or introduction to the whole epistle, ver. 1 9. II. One principal occasion of writing it, their divisions and the origin of them, ver. 10-13. III. An account of Paul's ministry among them, ver. 14–17. IV. The manner wherein he preached the gospel, ver. 17, to the end.

Verses 1–9

We have here the apostle's preface to his whole epistle.

I. The inscription. It is an epistle from Paul to the church of Corinth, which he himself had planted, though there were some among them that now questioned his apostleship (ch. ix. 1, 2). The most faithful and useful ministers are not secure from this contempt. Paul, called to be an apostle of Jesus Christ, through the will of God. He had not taken this honour to himself, but had a divine commission for it. It was necessary at this time, to assert his character, and magnify his office, when false teachers made a merit of running him down. It was not pride in Paul, but faithfulness to his trust to maintain his apostolical character and authority. He joins Sosthenes with him in writing. Paul, and Sosthenes his brother, once a ruler of the Jewish synagogue, afterwards a convert to Christianity. He speaks, through the rest of the epistle, in his own name, and in the singular number. The persons to whom this epistle was directed were the church of God that was at Corinth, sanctified in Christ Jesus, and called to be saints. All Christians are thus far sanctified in Christ Jesus, that they are by baptism dedicated and devoted to him. If they be not truly holy, it is their own fault and reproach. It is the design of Christianity to sanctify us in Christ. He directs the epistle to all that in every place call on the name of Christ Jesus our Lord, both theirs and ours. God hath a remnant in all places; and we should have a common concern for and hold communion with all that call on Christ's name.

II. The apostolical benediction. Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. Grace and peace—the favour of God, and reconciliation to him. It is indeed the summary of all blessings. This advantage we have by the gospel, 1. That we are directed how to obtain that peace from God: it is in and by Christ. 2. We are told what must qualify us for this peace; namely, grace: first grace, and then peace.

III. The apostle's thanksgiving to God on their behalf. Paul begins most of his epistles with thanksgiving to God for his friends and prayer for them. He gives thanks, 1. For their conversion to the faith of Christ: For the grace which was given you through Jesus Christ, v. 4. Those who are united to him by faith, are the objects of divine favour. God loves them. 2. For the abundance of their spiritual gifts. They did not come behind any of the churches in any gift, v. 7. He specifies utterance and knowledge, v. 5. Many have the flower of utterance that have not the root of knowledge, and their converse is barren. Many have the treasure of knowledge, and want utterance to employ it for the good of others, and then it is in a manner wrapped up in a napkin. But, where God gives both, a man is qualified for eminent usefulness. These gifts were a confirmation of the testimony of Christ among them, v. 6. So that the more plentifully they were poured forth on any church the more confirming evidence they had of their divine mission. And it is no wonder that when they had such a foundation for their faith they should live in expectation of the coming of their Lord Jesus Christ, v. 7. It is the character of Christians that they wait for Christ's second coming. And the more confirmed we are in the Christian faith the more earnest our expectation of it.

IV. The encouraging hopes the apostle had of them for the time to come, founded on the power and love of Christ, and the faithfulness of God, v. 8, 9. He who had begun a good work in them, would not leave it unfinished. Those that wait for the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ will be kept by him, and those that are so will be blameless in the day of Christ. How glorious are the hopes of such a privilege, whether for ourselves or others! O glorious expectation, especially when the faithfulness of God comes in to support our hopes! Those that come at his call shall never be disappointed in their hopes in him. If we approve ourselves faithful to God, we shall never find him unfaithful to us.

Here the apostle enters on his subject.

I. He exhorts them to unity and brotherly love, and reproves them for their divisions. He had received an account from some that wished them well of some unhappy differences among them. He writes to them in a very engaging way: "I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ; be unanimous. Speak all the same thing; avoid divisions or schisms. Be perfectly joined together in the same mind. In the great things of religion be of a mind: but, when there is not a unity of sentiment, let there be a union of affections."

II. He hints at the origin of these contentions. Pride lay at the bottom, and this made them factious. They quarrelled about their ministers. Those who were disposed to be contentious broke into parties, and set their ministers at the head of their several factions: some cried up Paul, others cried up Apollos, some Cephas, or Peter, and some were for none of them, but Christ only. So liable are the best things in the world to be corrupted, and the gospel and its institutions, which are at perfect harmony with themselves and one another, to be made the engines of variance, discord, and contention. How far will pride carry Christians in opposition to one another! Even so far as to set Christ and his own apostles at variance, and make them rivals and competitors.

III. He expostulates with them upon their discord and quarrels: "Is Christ divided? No, there is but one Christ, and therefore Christians should be of one heart. Was Paul crucified for you? Was he your sacrifice and atonement? Or, were you baptized in the name of Paul? Were you devoted to my service, or engaged to be my disciples, by that sacred rite?" Ministers, however instrumental they are of good to us, are not to be put in Christ's stead. And happy were it for the churches if there were no name of distinction among them, as Christ is not divided.

Verses 14–16

Here the apostle gives an account of his ministry among them. He thanks God he had baptized but a few among them, Crispus, who had been a ruler of a synagogue at Corinth (Acts xviii. 8), Gaius, and the household of Stephanas, besides whom, he says, he did not remember that he had baptized any. He is not to be understood in such a sense as if he were thankful for not having baptized at all, but for not having done it in present circumstances. He left it to other ministers to baptize, while he filled up his time with preaching the gospel. This, he thought, was more his business. In this sense he says, Christ sent him not to baptize, but to preach the gospel—not so much to baptize as to preach. Ministers should consider themselves set apart more especially to that service in which Christ will be most honoured and the salvation of souls promoted, and for which they are best fitted. The principal business Paul did among them was to preach the gospel (v. 17), the cross (v. 18), Christ crucified, v. 23. He did not preach his own fancy, but the gospel. Christ crucified is the foundation of all our hopes and the fountain of all our joys. By his death we live. This is what Paul preached, what all ministers should preach, and what all the saints live upon.

I. The manner in which Paul preached the gospel, and the cross of Christ: Not with the wisdom of words (v. 17), the enticing words of man's wisdom (ch. ii. 4), lest the cross of Christ should be of no effect, lest the success should be ascribed to the force of art, and not of truth; not to the plain doctrine of a crucified Jesus, but to the powerful oratory of those who spread it. He preached a crucified Jesus in plain language, and told the people that that Jesus who was crucified at Jerusalem was the Son of God and Saviour of men, and that all who would be saved must repent of their sins, and believe in him. This truth needed no artificial dress; it shone out with the greatest majesty in its own light, and prevailed in the world by its divine authority, without any human helps. The plain preaching of a crucified Jesus was more powerful than all the oratory and philosophy of the heathen world.

II. We have the different effects of this preaching: To those who perish it is foolishness, but to those who are saved it is the power of God, v. 18. It is to the Jews a stumbling-block, and to the Greeks foolishness; but unto those who are called, both Jews and Greeks, Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God, v. 23, 24. 1. Christ crucified is a stumbling-block to the Jews. They despised him, and looked upon him as execrable, because he did not gratify them with a sign to their mind, though his divine power shone out in innumerable miracles. The Jews require a sign, v. 22. 2. He was to the Greeks foolishness. They laughed at the story of a crucified Saviour. They sought for wisdom. There was nothing in the plain doctrine of the cross to suit their taste: they entertained it therefore with scorn and contempt. What, hope to be saved by one that could not save himself! And trust in one who was condemned and crucified as a malefactor, a man of mean birth and poor condition in life! This was what the pride of human reason and learning could not relish. It is just with God to leave those to themselves who pour such proud contempt on divine wisdom and grace. 3. To those who are saved he is the wisdom of God, and the power of God. Those who are enlightened by the Spirit of God, discern more glorious discoveries of God's wisdom and power in the doctrine of Christ crucified than in all his other works.

III. We have here the triumphs of the cross over human wisdom, according to the ancient prophecy (Isa. xxix. 14): I will destroy the wisdom of the wise, and bring to nothing the understanding of the prudent. Where is the wise? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world? Hath not God made foolish the wisdom of this world? (v. 19, 20). All the valued learning of this world was confounded by the Christian revelation and the glorious triumphs of the cross. When God would save the world, he took a way by himself; and good reason, for the world by wisdom knew not God, v. 21. All the boasted science of the heathen world did not, could not, effectually bring home the world to God. Men were puffed up by their imaginary knowledge, and therefore it pleased him, by the foolishness of preaching, to save those that believe.

1. The thing preached was foolishness in the eyes of worldly-wise men. Our living through one who died, our being blessed by one who was made a curse, our being justified by one who was himself condemned, was all folly.

2. The manner of preaching the gospel was foolishness to them too. None of the famous men for wisdom or eloquence were employed. A few fishermen were called out, and sent upon this errand. These were commissioned to disciple the nations. The proud pretenders to learning and wisdom despised the doctrine for the sake of those who dispensed it. And yet the foolishness of God is wiser than men, v. 25. "You see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called," v. 26, &c. There is a great deal of meanness and weakness in the outward appearance of our religion. Few of distinguished character in any of these respects were chosen for the work of the ministry. Not the wise men after the flesh. Not the mighty and noble. But God seeth not as man seeth. He hath chosen the foolish things of the world, the weak things of the world, the base and despicable things of the world, men of mean birth, of low rank, of no liberal education, to be the preachers of the gospel. He is a better judge than we what instruments and measures will best serve the purposes of his glory. Few of distinguished rank and character were called to be Christians. As the preachers were poor and mean, so generally were the converts. Few of the wise, and mighty, and noble, embraced the doctrine of the cross. Yet what glorious discoveries are there of divine wisdom in the whole scheme of the gospel.

IV. We have an account how admirably all is fitted, 1. To beat down the pride and vanity of men. God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, the weak things of the world to confound the mighty, and base things, and things which are despised, and things which are not, to bring to nought (to abolish) things that are; the conversion of the Gentiles was to open a way to the abolishing of that constitution upon which they valued themselves so much. It is common for the Jews to speak of the Gentiles under this character, as things that are not. The gospel is fitted to bring down the pride of both Jews and Greeks, that no flesh should glory in his presence (v. 29), that there might be no pretence for boasting. Divine wisdom alone had the contrivance of the method of redemption; divine grace alone revealed it, and made it known. It lay, in both respects, out of human reach. The gospel dispensation is a contrivance to humble man. 2. It is as admirably fitted to glorify God. The hand of the Lord went along with the preachers, and was mighty in the hearts of the hearers; and Jesus Christ was made both to ministers and Christians what was truly great and honourable. All we have we have from God as the fountain, and in and through Christ as the channel of conveyance. He is made of God to us wisdom, righteousness, sanctification, and redemption (v. 30). We are foolishness and he is made wisdom to us. We are guilty and he is made righteousness. We are depraved and corrupt; and he is made sanctification. We are in bonds, and he is made redemption to us. And what is designed in all is that all flesh may glory in the Lord, v. 31. Man is humbled, and God glorified by the whole scheme.

CHAP. II

The apostle, I. Reminds the Corinthians of the plain manner wherein he delivered the gospel to them, ver. 1–5. II. Shows them that he had communicated to them a treasure of the highest wisdom, such as could never have entered into the heart of man if it had not been revealed, nor can be received but by the light and influence of that Spirit who revealed it, ver. 6, to the end.

Verses 1–5

The apostle reminds the Corinthians how he acted when he first preached the gospel among them.

I. As to the matter or subject he tells us (v. 2), He determined to know nothing among them but Jesus Christ and him crucified. Christ, in his person and offices, is the sum and substance of the gospel, and ought to be the great subject of a gospel minister's preaching. Anyone that heard Paul preach found him to harp so continuously on this string that he would say he knew nothing but Christ and him crucified.

II. The manner wherein he preached Christ. Negatively. He came not among them with excellency of speech or wisdom, v. 1. His speech and preaching were not with enticing words of man's wisdom, v. 4. He did not set himself to captivate the ear by eloquent expressions, nor to entertain the fancy with lofty flights. Divine wisdom needed not to be set off with such human ornaments. Positively. He came among them declaring the testimony of God, v. 1. He published a divine revelation. Ornaments of speech and philosophical skill and argument could add no weight to what came recommended by such authority. He was also among them in weakness and fear, and in much trembling; and yet his speech and preaching were in demonstration of the Spirit and of power, v. 3, 4. His enemies in the church of Corinth spoke very contemptuously of him: His bodily presence, say they, is weak, and his speech contemptible, 2 Cor. x. 10. Possibly he had a little body, and a low voice; but, it is plain that he was no mean speaker. Nor did he want courage nor resolution, he was in nothing terrified by his adversaries. Yet he was no boaster. He did not proudly vaunt himself, like his opposers. None know the fear and trembling of faithful ministers; and a deep sense of their own weakness is the occasion of this fear and trembling. They know how insufficient they are. Yet he spoke with authority: In the demonstration of the Spirit and of power. He preached the truths of Christ in their native dress, with plainness of speech. He laid down the doctrine as the Spirit delivered it; and left the Spirit to demonstrate the truth of it.

III. Here is the end mentioned for which he preached Christ crucified: That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of man, but the power of God (v. 5)— that they might not be drawn by human motives, nor overcome by mere human arguments. When nothing but Christ crucified was plainly preached, the success must be entirely attributed to a divine power.

The apostle shows them that he had communicated to them a treasure of the truest and the highest wisdom: We speak wisdom among those who are perfect (v. 6). Those that receive the doctrine as divine, and have looked well into it, discover true wisdom in it. Though what we preach is foolishness to the world, it is wisdom to them. Those who are wise themselves are the only proper judges of what is wisdom: not indeed the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, but the wisdom of God in a mystery (v. 6, 7); not worldly wisdom, but divine; not such as the men of this world could have discovered, nor such as worldly men, destitute of the Spirit of God, can receive. How different is the judgment of God from that of the world! The wisdom he teaches is of a quite different kind from what passes under that notion in the world. But the wisdom of God in a mystery, the hidden wisdom of God. The depth of which, now it is revealed, none but himself can fathom. Now, concerning this wisdom, observe,

I. The rise and origin of it: It was ordained of God, before the world, to our glory, v. 7. It was ordained of God; he had determined long ago to make it known; and that to our glory, the glory of us, either us apostles or us Christians. It was a great honour put upon the apostles, to be entrusted with the revelation of this wisdom. It was a great privilege for Christians to have this glorious wisdom discovered to them. And the wisdom of God taught by the gospel prepares for our everlasting glory and happiness in the world to come. What honour does he put on his saints!

II. The ignorance of the great men of the world about it: Which none of the princes of this world knew (v. 8). The Roman governor, and the rulers of the Jewish nation, seem to be the persons here chiefly meant. Jesus Christ is the Lord of glory, and the reason why he was hated was because he was not known. Had his crucifiers known him, known who and what he was, they would have withheld their impious hands. Thus he pleaded with his Father for their pardon: Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do, Luke xxiii. 34.

III. It is such wisdom as could not have been discovered without a revelation, according to what the prophet Isaiah says (Isa. lxiv. 4), Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for those that love him—for him that waiteth for him, that waiteth for his mercy, so the LXX. Waiting upon God is an evidence of love to him. There are things which God hath prepared for those that love him, and wait for him. But the apostle speaks here of the divine revelation under the gospel. The great truths of the gospel are things lying out of the sphere of human discovery: Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard them, nor have they entered into the heart of man. Were they objects of sense there had been no need of a revelation. But, lying out of the sphere of nature, we cannot discover them but by the light of revelation.

IV. By whom this wisdom is discovered to us: God hath revealed them to us by his Spirit, v. 10. The scripture is given by inspiration of God. And the apostles spoke by inspiration of the same Spirit. What he taught was revealed of God by his Spirit, that Spirit that searches all things, yea, the deep things of God, and knows the things of God, as the spirit of a man that is in him knows the things of a man, v. 11. A double argument in proof of the divinity of the Holy Ghost: 1. Omniscience is attributed to him: He searches all things, even the deep things of God. He enters into the very depths of God, penetrates into his most secret counsels. Now who can have such a thorough knowledge of God but God? 2. This allusion seems to imply that the Holy Spirit is as much in God as a man's mind is in himself. He is as much and as intimately one with God as the man's mind is with the man. The Spirit of God knows the things of God because he is one with God. Neither can we know the secret counsels and purposes of God till they are made known to us by his Holy Spirit. And it was by this Spirit that the apostles had received the wisdom of God in a mystery. "Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things freely given to us of God (v. 12). We have what we deliver in the name of God by inspiration from him; and it is by his gracious illumination that we know the things freely given to us of God unto salvation" —that is, "the great privileges of the gospel." Though these things are given to us, we cannot know them to any saving purpose till we have the Spirit.

V. In what manner this wisdom was taught: Which things we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teaches, but which the Holy Ghost teaches, v. 13. They had received the wisdom they taught from the Spirit of God. Nor did they put a human dress on it, but plainly declared the doctrine of Christ, in terms also taught them by the Holy Spirit. The truths of God need no garnishing by human skill or eloquence, but look best in the words which the Holy Ghost teaches. Comparing spiritual things with spiritual—one part of revelation with another. Spiritual things, when brought together, will help to illustrate one another; but, if the principles of human art and science are to be made a test of revelation, we shall certainly judge amiss concerning it. The language of the Spirit of God is the most proper to convey his meaning.

VI. How this wisdom is received.

1. The natural man receiveth not the things of God, for they are foolishness to him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned, v. 14. Either, (1) The man under the power of corruption, and never yet illuminated by the Spirit of God. Men unsanctified receive not the things of God. The truths of God are foolishness to such a mind. Evil inclinations and wicked principles render the man unwilling to enter into the mind of God. It is the quickening beams of the Spirit of truth and holiness that must help the mind to discern their excellency. Thus the natural man cannot know them, because they are spiritually discerned. Or, (2) The natural man, that is, the wise man of the world (ch. i. 19, 20), one who hath the wisdom of the world, man's wisdom (ch. ii. 4–6), a man that would receive nothing by faith, nor own any need of supernatural assistance. This was very much the character of the philosophy and the Grecian learning and wisdom in that day. Such a man receives not the things of the Spirit of God. Revelation is not with him a principle of science; he looks upon it as the extravagant thought of some deluded dreamer. For that reason he can have no knowledge of things revealed, because they are only spiritually discerned.

2. But he that is spiritual judgeth all things, yet he himself is judged of no man, v. 15. He who is sanctified is capable of judging about matters of human wisdom, and has also a relish and savour of divine truths. It is the sanctified mind that must discern the real beauties of holiness; but they do not lose their power of discerning about common and natural things. The spiritual man may judge of all things, natural and supernatural, human and divine. But he himself is judged or discerned of no man. The carnal man knows no more of a spiritual man than he does of other spiritual things. The spiritual man does not lie open to his observation. He that is spiritual can judge both of common things and things divine. He does not lose the power of reasoning by founding his religion on revelation.

But he himself is judged of no man—can be judged, so as to be confuted, by no man. He who founds all his knowledge upon principles of science, and the mere light of reason, can never be a judge of the truth or falsehood of what is received by revelation. For who hath known the mind of the Lord, that he may instruct him (v. 16), that is, the spiritual man? Who can enter so far into the mind of God as to instruct him who has the Spirit of God, and is under his inspiration? Very few have known anything of the mind of God by a natural power. But, adds the apostle, we have the mind of Christ: and the mind of Christ is the mind of God. It is the great privilege of Christians that they have the mind of Christ.

CHAP. III

The apostle, I. Blames the Corinthians for their carnality and divisions, ver. 1–4. II. He instructs them how what was amiss among them might be rectified, by remembering, 1. That their ministers were no more than ministers, ver. 5. 2 That they carried on the same design, ver. 6–10. 3. That they built on one and the same foundation, ver. 11–15. III. He exhorts them to give due honour to their bodies (ver. 16, 17), and to humility, ver. 18–21. IV. And dehorts them from glorying in particular ministers, ver. 22, to the end.

Here, I. Paul blames the Corinthians for their weakness. Those who are renewed to a spiritual life may yet in many things be defective. The apostle tells them he could not speak to them as unto spiritual men, but as unto carnal men, as to babes in Christ, v. 1. It was but too evident they were much under the command of carnal and corrupt affections. They were still mere babes in Christ. They had received some of the first principles of Christianity, but had not grown up to maturity. He had communicated no more of the deep things of it to them. They could not bear such food, they needed to be fed with milk, not with meat, v. 2. It is the duty of a faithful minister of Christ to consult the capacities of his hearers and teach them as they can bear. And yet it is natural for babes to grow up to men; and babes in Christ should endeavour to grow in stature, and become men in Christ. Christians are utterly to blame who do not endeavour to grow in grace and knowledge.

II. He blames them for their carnality, and mentions their contention and discord about their ministers as evidence of it: For you are yet carnal; for whereas there are among you envyings, and strifes, and divisions, are you not carnal, and walk as men? (v. 3). While one said, I am of Paul; and another, I am of Apollos, v. 4. Contentions and quarrels about religion are sad evidences of remaining carnality. True religion makes men peaceable and not contentious. Do not you walk as men? It is to be lamented that many who should walk as Christians, above the common rate of men, do indeed walk as men, live and act too much like other men.

Here the apostle instructs them how to cure this humour.

I. By reminding them that the ministers about whom they contended were but ministers: Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom you believed? Even as the Lord gave to every man, v. 5, mere instruments used by the God of all grace. We should take care not to deify ministers, nor put them into the place of God. All the gifts and powers that even apostles discovered and exerted in the work of the ministry were from God. They were intended to manifest their mission and doctrine to be divine. Paul had planted and Apollos had watered, v. 6. Both were useful, one for one purpose, the other for another. Paul was fitted for planting work, and Apollos for watering work, but God gave the increase. The success of the ministry must be derived from the divine blessing: Neither he that planteth is anything, nor he that watereth, but God who giveth the increase, v. 7. Even apostolical ministers can do nothing with efficacy and success unless God give the increase. Paul and Apollos are nothing at all in their own account, but God is all in all.

II. By representing to them the unanimity of Christ's ministers: He that planteth and he that watereth are one (v. 8), employed by one Master, busied in one work, in harmony with one another, however they may be set in opposition to each other by factious party-makers. All the faithful ministers of Christ are one in the great business and intention of their ministry. All such may expect a glorious recompence of their fidelity, and in proportion to it: Every man shall receive his own reward, according to his own labour. Those that work hardest shall fare best. Those that are most faithful shall have the greatest reward. They are labourers with God, fellow-labourers (v. 9). They are engaged in his business. They are working together with God, and he who knows their work will take care they do not labour in vain. The judgment of God is according to truth. He ever rewards in proportion to the diligence and faithfulness of his servants. They are always under his eye, employed in his husbandry and building; and therefore, to be sure, he will carefully look over them: "You are God's husbandry, you are God's building; and therefore are neither of Paul nor of Apollos. It is all for God that we have been doing among you." According to the grace of God which is given unto me, as a wise master-builder, I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. It was honourable to be a master-builder in the edifice of God; but it added to his character to be a wise one. But, though he gives himself such a character, it is not to gratify his own pride, but to magnify divine grace. He was a wise master-builder, but the grace of God made him such. Spiritual pride is abominable. But to take notice of the favours of God to promote our gratitude to him, and to speak of them to his honour, is but a proper expression of the duty and regard we owe him. Ministers should not be proud of their gifts or graces; but the better qualified they are for their work, and the more success they have in it, the more thankful should they be to God. I have laid the foundation, and another buildeth thereon. It was Paul that laid the foundation of a church among them. He would derogate from none that had done service among them, nor would he be robbed of his own honour and respect. Faithful ministers may and ought to have a concern for their own reputation. Their usefulness depends much upon it. But let every man take heed how he buildeth thereon. There may be very indifferent building on a good foundation. Nothing must be laid upon it but what the foundation will bear, and what is of a piece with it. Gold and dirt must not be mingled together. Ministers of Christ should take great care that they do not build their own fancies or false reasonings on the foundation of divine revelation.

Here the apostle informs us what foundation he had laid. Other foundation can no man lay besides what is laid—even Jesus Christ. The doctrine of our Saviour and his mediation is the principal doctrine of Christianity. It lies at the bottom, and is the foundation, of all the rest. But of those that hold the foundation there are two sorts:

I. Some build upon this foundation gold, silver, and precious stones (v. 12), namely, those who hold nothing but the truth as it is in Jesus, and preach nothing else. This is building well upon a good foundation.

II. Others build wood, hay, and stubble, on this foundation; that is, though they adhere to the foundation, they depart from the mind of Christ in many particulars, and build upon the good foundation what will not abide the test when the day of trial shall come. There is a time coming when a discovery will be made of what men have built on this foundation: Every man's work shall be made manifest. Every man's work shall be made manifest to himself, and made manifest to others, both those that have been misled by him and those that have escaped his errors. There is a day coming that will show us ourselves, and show us our actions in the true light, without covering or disguise: For the day shall declare it (that is, every man's work), because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work, of what sort it is, v. 13. The day shall declare and make it manifest, the last day, the great day of trial; see ch. iv. 5. There is a day coming that will distinguish one man from another, and one man's work from another's, as the fire distinguishes gold from dross, or metal that will bear the fire from other materials that will be consumed in it. Some men's works will abide the trial. It will appear that they not only held the foundation, but that they built regularly and well upon it. The foundation and the superstructure were all of a piece. And such a builder shall not, cannot fail of a reward. He will have praise and honour in that day, and eternal recompence after it. Fidelity in the ministers of Christ will meet with a full and ample reward in a future life. And, Lord, how great! how much exceeding their deserts! There are others whose works shall be burnt (v. 15). The great day will pluck off all disguises, and make things appear as they are: He whose work shall be burnt will suffer loss. If he have built upon the right foundation wood and hay and stubble, he will suffer loss, though he may in the general have been an honest and an upright Christian. This part of his work will be lost, though he himself may be saved. Those who hold the foundation of Christianity, though they build hay, wood, and stubble, upon it, may be saved. This may help to enlarge our charity. Nothing will damn men but wickedness. He shall be saved, yet so as by fire, saved out of the fire. God will have no mercy on their works, though he may pluck them as brands out of the burning.

Verses 16, 17

Here the apostle resumes his argument, founding it on his former allusion, You are God's building, v. 9. Know you not that you are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? If any man defile (corrupt and destroy) the temple of God, him shall God destroy (the same word is in the original in both clauses), for the temple of God is holy, which temple you are. It looks from other parts of the epistle (see ch. vi. 13–20), as if the false teachers among the Corinthians were not only loose livers, but taught licentious doctrines. Such doctrine was not to be reckoned among hay and stubble, which would be consumed while the person who laid them on the foundation escaped the burning. Those who spread principles of this sort would provoke God to destroy them. Know you not that you are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? Christian churches are temples of God. He dwells among them by his Holy Spirit. Every Christian is a living temple of the living God. Christ by his Spirit dwells in all true believers. The temple was set apart from every common to a holy use, to the immediate service of God. So all Christians are separated from common uses, and set apart for God and his service. They are sacred to him. Christians are holy by profession, and should be pure and clean both in heart and conversation.

Verses 18–20

Here he prescribes humility for the remedy of the irregularities in the Church of Corinth: "Let no man deceive himself (v. 18). Do not be led away from the truth and simplicity of the gospel." We are in great danger of deceiving ourselves when we have too high an opinion of human wisdom and arts. But he who seems to be wise must become a fool that he may be wise. He must be sensible of his own ignorance, and lament it; he must distrust his own understanding, and not lean on it. The person who resigns his own understanding, that he may follow the instruction of God, is in the way to true and everlasting wisdom. He that has a low opinion of his own knowledge and powers will submit to better information; but the proud man, conceited of his own wisdom and understanding, will undertake to correct even divine wisdom itself. We must abase ourselves before God if we would be either truly wise or good: For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God, v. 19. There can be no more comparison between his wisdom and ours than between his power and being and ours. There is no common measure by which to compare finite and infinite. And much more is the wisdom of man foolishness with God when set in competition with his. How justly does he despise, how easily can he baffle and confound it! He knows the thoughts of the wise, that they are vain (v. 20). God has a perfect knowledge of the thoughts of men, their most secret counsels and purposes. And he knows them to be vanity. And should not all this teach us modesty, and a deference to the wisdom of God? He who would be wise indeed must learn of God, and not set his own wisdom up in competition with God's.

Verses 21–23

An exhortation against over-valuing their teachers. They had an equal interest in all their ministers: Therefore let no man glory in men (v. 21)—forget that their ministers are men, or pay that deference to them that is due only to God, set them at the head of parties. The only way to avoid this mischief is to have a due sense of the common weakness of human understanding, and an entire deference to the wisdom of God. Ministers are not to be set up in competition with one another. They were appointed of Christ, for the common benefit of the church: "Paul, and Apollos, and Cephas, are all yours. All are to be valued and used for your own spiritual benefit." Upon this occasion also he gives in an inventory of the church's possessions, the spiritual riches of a true believer: "All is yours. Nay, the world itself is yours. Life is yours, that you may prepare for the life of heaven; and death is yours, that you may go to the possession of it. It is the kind messenger that will fetch you to your Father's house. Things present are yours, for your support on the road; things to come are yours, to enrich you for ever at your journey's end." All is ours, time and eternity, earth and heaven, life and death. But it must be remembered, at the same time, that we are Christ's. All things are ours, upon no other ground than our being Christ's. Those that would be safe for time, and happy to eternity, must be Christ's. And Christ is God's. He is the Christ of God, anointed of God, and commissioned by him. God in Christ reconciling a sinful world to himself, and shedding abroad the riches of his grace on a reconciled world, is the sum and substance of the gospel.

CHAP. IV

The apostle, I. Directs them how to account of him and his fellow-ministers, ver. 1–6. II. He cautions them against pride and self-elation, ver. 7–13. III. He challenges their regard to him as their father in Christ, ver. 14–16. IV. He tells them of his having sent Timothy to them, and of his own purpose to come to them shortly, ver. 17 to the end.

I. The apostle challenges the respect due to him on account of his character and office. Let a man so account of us as of the ministers of Christ, and stewards of the mysteries of God (v. 1). In our opinion of ministers we should be careful to avoid extremes. Apostles themselves were, 1. Not to be overvalued, for they were ministers, not masters. They were servants of Christ, and no more. They had no authority to propagate their own fancies, but to spread Christian faith. 2. Apostles were not to be undervalued; for, they were ministers of Christ. They are not stewards of the common things of the world, but of divine mysteries. They did not set up for masters, but they deserved respect and esteem in this honourable service. Especially,

II. When they did their duty in it. It is required in stewards that a man be found faithful (v. 2), trustworthy. The stewards in Christ's family must appoint what he hath appointed. They must teach what he hath commanded. When they have the testimony of a good conscience, and the approbation of their Master, they must slight the opinions and censures of their fellow-servants: But with me, saith the apostle, it is a small thing that I should be judged of you, or of man's judgment, v. 3. Indeed, reputation and esteem among men are a good step towards usefulness in the ministry. But he that would make it his chief endeavour to please men would hardly approve himself a faithful servant of Christ, Gal. i. 10. He that would be faithful to Christ must despise the censures of men for his sake. The best of men are too apt to judge rashly, and harshly. It is a comfort that men are not to be our final judges. Nay, we are not thus to judge ourselves: "Yea, I judge not myself. For though I know nothing by myself, cannot charge myself with unfaithfulness, yet am I not thereby justified; but he that judgeth me is the Lord. It is his judgment that must determine me. Such I am as he shall find and judge me to be."

III. The apostle takes occasion hence to caution the Corinthians against censoriousness: Therefore judge nothing before the time, until the Lord come, v. 5. It is judging out of season, judging persons' future state, or the secret springs and principles of their actions. To judge in these cases is to assume the seat of God. How bold a sinner is the forward and severe censurer! How ill-timed and arrogant are his censures! But there is one who will judge the censurer, and those he censures. This should make them now cautious of judging others, and careful in judging themselves. There is a time coming when the Lord will bring to light the hidden things of darkness, and make manifest the counsels of the hearts. There is a day coming that will fetch men's secret sins into open day and discover the secrets of their hearts. The Lord Jesus Christ will manifest the counsels of the heart, of all hearts. The Lord Jesus Christ must have the knowledge of the counsels of the heart, else he could not make them manifest. We should be very careful how we censure others, when we have to do with a Judge from whom we cannot conceal ourselves. When he shall come to judge, every man shall have praise of God. Every man, that is, everyone qualified for it. Christians may well be patient under unjust censures, when they know such a day as this is coming. But how fearful should they be of loading any with reproaches now whom their common Judge shall hereafter commend.

IV. The apostle here lets us into the reason why he had used his own name and that of Apollos in this discourse of his. He had done it in a figure, and he had done it for their sakes. He chose rather to mention his own name, and the name of a faithful fellow-labourer, than the names of any heads of factions among them, that hereby he might avoid what would provoke. That they might learn not to think of men above what is written, nor be puffed up for one against another (v. 6). Apostles were not to be esteemed other than servants of Christ. We must be very careful not to transfer the honour and authority of the Master to his servant. We must not think of them above what is written. Pride commonly lies at the bottom of these quarrels. We shall not be puffed up for one against another if we remember that they are all instruments employed by God in his husbandry and building, and endowed by him with their various talents and qualifications.

Here the apostle improves the foregoing hint to a caution against pride and self-conceit.

I. He cautions them against pride; all the distinction made among them was owing to God: Who maketh thee to differ? And what hast thou that thou didst not receive? (v. 7). Here the apostle turns his discourse to the ministers who set themselves at the head of these factions. What had they to glory in, when all their peculiar gifts were from God? But it may be taken as a general maxim: We have no reason to be proud of our attainments, or performances; all that we have, or are, or do, that is good, is owing to the free and rich grace of God. Boasting is for ever excluded. Those who receive all should be proud of nothing. Due attention to our obligations to divine grace would cure us of arrogance and self-conceit.

II. He presses the duty of humility upon them by a very smart irony: "You are full, you are rich, you have reigned as kings without us. You have not only a sufficiency, but an affluence, of spiritual gifts; nay, you can make them the matter of your glory without us." There is a very elegant gradation from sufficiency to wealth, and thence to royalty, to intimate how much the Corinthians were elated by the abundance of their wisdom and spiritual gifts. "You have reigned as kings," says the apostle, "that is, in your own conceit; and I would to God you did reign, that we also might reign with you. I wish you had as much of the true glory of a Christian church upon you as you arrogate to yourselves." Those do not commonly know themselves best who think best of themselves. The Corinthians might have reigned, and the apostle with them, if they had not been blown up with an imaginary royalty. Pride is a great prejudice to our improvement. He is stopped from growing wiser or better who thinks himself at the height; not only full, but rich, nay, a king.

III. He comes to set forth his own circumstances and those of the other apostles, and compares them with theirs. 1. To set forth the case of the apostles: For I think it hath pleased God to set forth us the apostles last, as it were appointed to death. For we are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men. Never were any men in this world so hunted and worried. An allusion is made to some of the bloody spectacles in the Roman amphitheatres, where the victor did not escape with his life, but was only reserved for another combat, so that such wretched criminals might very properly be called persons devoted or appointed to death. They are said to be set forth last, because those who combated one another in the after-part of the day, were most exposed, being obliged to fight naked. The general meaning is that the apostles were exposed to continual danger of death. God had set them forth. The apostles were shown to manifest the power of divine grace, to confirm the truth of their mission and doctrine. These were ends worthy of God—noble views, fit to animate them to the combat. The office of an apostle was, as an honourable, so a hard and hazardous one: "For we are made a spectacle to the world, and to angels, and to men, v. 9. A show. Angels and men are witnesses to our persecutions, patience, and magnanimity. They all see that we suffer for our fidelity to Christ. How sharp our sufferings, and how patiently we endure them, by the power of divine grace. Ours is hard work, but honourable; it is hazardous, but glorious. The world cannot but see and wonder at our undaunted resolution, our invincible patience." 2. He compares his own case with that of the Corinthians: "We are fools for Christ's sake, but you are wise in Christ; we are weak, but you are strong; you are honourable, but we are despised, v. 10. We can pass for fools in the world, and be despised as such, so that the honour of the gospel may by this means be secured and displayed. But you are wise in Christ. You have the fame of being wise and learned Christians, and you do not a little value yourselves upon it. We are weak, but you are strong. We are suffering for Christ's sake when you are in easy and flourishing circumstances." All Christians are not alike exposed. The standard-bearers in an army are most struck at. So ministers in a time of persecution are commonly the first and greatest sufferers. Those are not always the greatest proficients in Christianity who think thus of themselves, or pass for such upon others. The Corinthians may think themselves, and be esteemed by others, as wiser and stronger men in Christ than the apostles themselves. But O! how gross is the mistake!

IV. He enters into some particularities of their sufferings: Even to this present hour; we hunger and thirst, and are naked, and are buffeted, and have no certain dwelling-place, and labour, working with our own hands, v. 11, 12. Nay, they were made as the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things, v. 13. Poor circumstances indeed, for the prime ministers of our Saviour's kingdom to have no house nor home, and to be destitute of food and raiment! But yet no poorer than his who had not where to lay his head, Luke ix. 58. But O glorious charity and devotion, that would carry them through all these hardships! How ardently did they love God. They thought they had a rich amends for all the outward good things they wanted, if they might but serve Christ and save souls. Nay, though they were made the filth of the world, and the off-scouring of all things. They were treated as men not fit to live. And apostles could not meet with better usage. They suffered in their persons and characters as the very worst and vilest men. Nay, as the off-scouring of all things. To be the off-scouring of anything is bad, but what is it to be the off-scouring of all things! How much did the apostles resemble their Master! They suffered for him, and they suffered after his example. Those may be very dear to God, and honourable in his esteem, whom men may think unworthy to live, and use and scorn as the very dirt and refuse of the world.

V. We have here the apostles' behaviour under all: Being reviled, we bless; being persecuted, we suffer it; being defamed, we entreat, v. 12, 13. They returned blessings for reproaches, and were patient under the sharpest persecutions. The disciples of Christ, and especially his ministers, should hold fast their integrity, and keep a good conscience. They must be content, with him and for him, to be despised and abused.

Verses 14–16

Here Paul challenges their regard to him as their father. 1. What he had written was not for their reproach, but admonition (v. 14): I write not to shame you, but as my beloved children I warn you. Reproofs that expose commonly do but exasperate, when those that kindly and affectionately warn are likely to reform; to lash like an enemy or executioner will provoke and render obstinate. To expose to open shame is but the way to render shameless. 2. He shows them upon what foundation he called them his sons. He was their father: for in Christ Jesus he had begotten them by the gospel, v. 15. They were made Christians by his ministry. He was the instrument of their new birth, and therefore claimed the relation of a father to them. There commonly is, and always ought to be, an endeared affection between faithful ministers and those they beget in Christ Jesus through the gospel. They should love like parents and children. 3. We have here the special advice he urges on them: Wherefore I beseech you be you followers of me, v. 16. This he elsewhere explains and limits (ch. xi. 1): "Be you followers of me, as I also am of Christ. Follow me as far as I follow Christ. I would not have you be my disciples, but his." Ministers should so live that their people may live after their copy. They should guide them by their lives as well as their lips, go before them in the way to heaven, and not content themselves with pointing it out.

I. He tells them of his having sent Timothy to them, to bring them into remembrance of his ways in Christ, as he taught everywhere in every church (v. 17). Those who have had ever so good teaching are apt to forget and need to have their memories refreshed. He had not one doctrine for one place and people, and another for another. He therefore taught the same things in every church, and lived after the same manner in all times and places. The truth of Christ is one and invariable. What one apostle taught at one time and in one place, he taught at all times and in all places. To render their regard to Timothy the greater, he gives them his character. He was his beloved son, a spiritual child of his, as well as themselves. The children of one father should have one heart. But he adds, "He is faithful in the Lord—trustworthy, as one that feared the Lord." It is a great commendation of any minister that he is faithful in the Lord; this must go a great way in procuring regard to his message.

II. He rebukes those who imagined he would not come to them, by letting them know this was his purpose: "I will come to you shortly." But he adds, if the Lord will. All our purposes must be formed with a dependence on Providence.

III. He lets them know what would follow upon his coming to them: I will know, not the speech of those that are puffed up, but the power, v. 19. He would bring the great pretenders among them to a trial, would know what they were by the authority and efficacy of what they taught, and whether it was accompanied with divine influences and saving effects on the minds of men. For, adds he, the kingdom of God is not in word, but in power, the powerful influence of divine truth on the minds and manners of men. It is a good way in the general to judge of a preacher's doctrine, to see whether the effects of it upon men's hearts be truly divine. That is most likely to come from God which in its own nature is most fit, and in event is found to produce most likeness to God.

IV. He puts it to their choice how he should come among them, whether with a rod or in love and the spirit of meekness (v. 21); that is, according as they were they would find him. Stubborn offenders must be used with severity. In families, in Christian communities, paternal pity and tenderness, Christian love and compassion, will sometimes force the use of the rod. But this is far from being desirable, if it may be prevented. Or in love and the spirit of meekness. As much as if he had said, "Take warning, cease your unchristian feuds, and you shall find me as gentle and benign as you can wish. I had rather come and display the tenderness of a father among you than assert his authority." It is a happy temper in a minister to have the spirit of love and meekness predominant, and yet to maintain his just authority.

CHAP. V

The apostle, I. Blames them for their indulgence in the case of the incestuous person, ver. 1–6. II. He exhorts them to Christian purity, ver. 7, 8. And, III. Directs them to shun Christians who were guilty of any notorious and flagitious wickedness, ver. 9, to the end.

I. One of their community was guilty of fornication, v. 1. It was told in all places, to their dishonour. The heinous sins of professed Christians are quickly noted and noised abroad. We should walk circumspectly, for many eyes are upon us. This was not a common instance of fornication, but such as was not so much as named among the Gentiles, that a man should have his father's wife. Not that there were no such instances of incestuous marriages among the heathens; but, whenever they happened, they gave a shock to every man of virtue and probity among them. They could not mention them without detestation. Yet such a horrible wickedness was committed by one in the church of Corinth. The best churches are, in this state of imperfection, liable to very great corruptions.

II. He greatly blames them for their own conduct hereupon: They were puffed up (v. 2), they gloried. Perhaps on account of this very scandalous person. He might be a man very greatly esteemed. Instead of mourning for his fall, and their own reproach upon his account, they continued to applaud him and pride themselves in him. Pride or self-esteem often lies at the bottom of our immoderate esteem of others, and this makes us as blind to their faults as to our own. Or else some of the opposite party were puffed up. It is a very wicked thing to glory over the miscarriages and sins of others. Probably this was one effect of the divisions among them. The opposite party made their advantage of this scandalous lapse, and were glad of the opportunity. The sins of others should be our sorrow.

III. We have the apostle's direction to them how they should now proceed with this scandalous sinner. He would have him excommunicated and delivered to Satan (v. 3–5); as absent in body, yet present in spirit, he had judged already as if he had been present. He says this to let them know that, though he was at a distance, he did not pass an unrighteous sentence, nor judge without having as full cognizance of the case as if he had been on the spot. The apostle adds, him who hath so done this deed. He had so committed the evil as to heighten the guilt by the manner of doing it. In dealing with scandalous sinners, not only are they to be charged with the fact, but the aggravating circumstances of it. Paul had judged that he should be delivered to Satan (v. 5), and this was to be done in the name of Christ, and in a full assembly, where the apostle would be also present in spirit. Some think that this is to be understood of mere ordinary excommunication, and that delivering him to Satan is only meant of disowning him, that by this means he might be brought to repentance, and his flesh might be mortified. Those that live in sin, when they profess relation to Christ, belong to another master, and by excommunication should be delivered up to him; and this in the name of Christ. It was to be done also when they were gathered together. The more public the more solemn, and the more solemn the more likely to have a good effect on the offender. Others think the apostle is not to be understood of mere excommunication, but of a miraculous power or authority they had of delivering a scandalous sinner into the power of Satan, which is the meaning of the destruction of the flesh. In this sense the destruction of the flesh has been a happy occasion of the salvation of the spirit. The great end of church-censures is the good of those who fall under them. It is that their spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus, v. 5.

IV. He hints the danger of contagion from this example: Your glorying is not good. Know you not that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump? The bad example of a man in rank and reputation is very mischievous, spreads the contagion far and wide. A little leaven will quickly spread the ferment through a great lump.

Here the apostle exhorts them to purity.

I. The advice itself, addressed either, 1. To the church in general; and so purging out the old leaven, that they might be a new lump, refers to the putting away from themselves that wicked person, v. 13. Or, 2. To each particular member of the church. And so it implies that they should purge themselves from all impurity of heart and life. Christians should be careful to keep themselves clean, as well as purge polluted members out of their society. They were also to purge themselves from malice and wickedness. This is leaven that sours the mind to a great degree. Christians should be careful to keep free from malice and mischief. Love is the very essence and life of the Christian religion. It is the fairest image of God, for God is love (1 John iv. 16), and therefore it is no wonder if it be the greatest beauty and ornament of a Christian.

II. The reason with which this advice is enforced: For Christ our passover is sacrificed for us, v. 7. The Jews, after they had killed the passover, kept the feast of unleavened bread. So must we; not for seven days only, but all our days. The whole life of a Christian must be a feast of unleavened bread. He must purge out the old leaven, and keep the feast of unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. He must be without guilt in his conduct towards God and man. The sacrifice of our Redeemer is the strongest argument with a gracious heart for purity and sincerity. Heinous evil could not be expiated but with the blood of the Son of God! And shall a Christian love the murderer of his Lord? God forbid.

Here the apostle advises them to shun the company of scandalous professors.

I. The advice itself: I wrote to you in a letter not to company with fornicators, v. 9. Some think this was an epistle written to them before, which is lost. Some think it is to be understood of this very epistle, but thought it needful now to be more particular. And therefore he tells them that if any man called a brother, and being a member of a Christian church, were a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolater, or a railer, that they should not keep company with him, not so much as eat with such a one. They were to avoid all familiarity with him; but, that they might shame him, and bring him to repentance, must disclaim and shun him. They may call themselves brethren in Christ, but they are not Christian brethren. They are only fit companions for their brethren in iniquity.

II. How he limits this advice. He does not forbid their eating nor conversing with the fornicators of this world, &c. They know no better. They profess no better. "You must needs go out of the world if you will have no conversation with such men. It is impossible, as long as you are in the world, but you must fall into their company. This cannot be wholly avoided."

III. The reason of this limitation is here assigned. Christians must have gone out of the world to avoid the company of loose heathens. But the dread of sin wears off by familiar converse with the wicked. Besides, heathens were such as Christians had nothing to do to judge and censure, and avoid upon a censure passed; for they are without (v. 12), and must be left to God's judgment, v. 13. But, as to members of the church, they are within, are professedly bound by the laws and rules of Christianity, and not only liable to the judgment of God, but to the censures of the fellow-members of the same body, when they transgress those rules. They are to be punished, by having this mark of disgrace put upon them, that they may be shamed, and, if possible, reclaimed thereby. Though the church has nothing to do with those without, it must endeavour to keep clear of the guilt and reproach of those within.

IV. How he applies the argument to the case before him: "Therefore put away from among yourselves that wicked person, v. 13. Cast him out of your fellowship."

CHAP. VI

The apostle, I. Reproves them for going to law with one another, and bringing the cause before heathen judges, ver. 1–8. II. He takes occasion hence to warn them against many gross sins, ver. 9–11. III. And he vehemently dehorts them from fornication, ver. 12, to the end.

Verses 1–8

Here the apostle reproves them for going to law with one another before heathen judges for little matters; and therein blames all vexatious law-suits.

I. The fault he blames them for. Brother went to law with brother (v. 6). The bonds of fraternal love were broken through. Christians should not contend with one another, for they are brethren. They brought the matter before the heathen magistrates: they went to law before the unjust, not before the saints (v. 1), brought the controversy before unbelievers (v. 6). This tended much to the reproach of Christianity. And therefore, says the apostle, "Dare any of you, having a controversy with another, go to law before the unjust?" Here is at least an intimation that they went to law for trivial matters, for the apostle blames them that they did not suffer wrong rather than go to law (v. 7). Christians should be of a forgiving temper. And it is more for their honour to suffer small injuries than seem to be contentious.

II. He lays before them the aggravations of their fault: Do you not know that the saints shall judge the world (v. 2), shall judge angels? (v. 3). And are they unworthy to judge the smallest matters, the things of this life? It was a dishonour to their Christian character, as saints, for them to carry little matters, about the things of life, before heathen magistrates. When they were to judge the world, nay, to judge angels, it is unaccountable that they could not determine little controversies among one another. They are not partners in their Lord's commission, but see his proceeding against the wicked world, and approve it. Others understand it as condemning the world by their faith and practice. The first sense seems to be most natural. "Shall Christians have the honour to sit with the sovereign Judge, and are they not worthy to judge of the trifles about which you contend before heathen magistrates? Cannot they make up your mutual differences? Must you, about the affairs of this life, set those to judge who are of no esteem in the church?" i.e., heathen magistrates (so some read, and perhaps most properly, v. 4). "Must those be called in to judge in your controversies of whom you ought to entertain so low an opinion? Is not this shameful?" v. 5. Some who read it as our translators make it an ironical speech: "If you have such controversies depending, set those to judge who are of least esteem among yourselves. They are trifles not worth contending about. Bear and forbear, and the men of meanest skill among you may end your quarrels. I speak it to your shame," v. 5.

III. He puts them on a method to remedy this fault. 1. By referring it to some to make it up: "Is it so that there is no wise man among you, no one able to judge between his brethren? (v. 5). You who value yourselves so much upon your wisdom and knowledge, is there none among you that has wisdom enough to judge in these differences? Must brethren quarrel, and the heathen magistrate judge, in a church so famous as yours for knowledge and wisdom?" 2. By suffering wrong rather than taking this method to right themselves: It is utterly a fault among you to go to law in this matter: it is always a fault of one side to go to law, except in a case where the title is indeed dubious, and there is a friendly agreement of both parties to refer it to the judgment of those learned in the law to decide it. Should you not rather take wrong, rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded? A Christian should rather put up with a little injury than tease himself, and provoke others, by a litigious contest. The peace of his own mind, and the calm of his neighbourhood, are of more worth than victory in such a contest. But the apostle tells them they were so far from bearing injuries that they actually did wrong, and defrauded, and that their brethren. It is utterly a fault to wrong and defraud any; but it is an aggravation of this fault to defraud our Christian brethren.

Here he takes occasion to warn them against many heinous evils, to which they had been formerly addicted.

I. He puts it to them as a plain truth, that such sinners should not inherit the kingdom of God. The meanest among them must know this much, that the unrighteous shall not inherit the kingdom of God (v. 9). He specifies several sorts of sins: against the first and second commandments, as idolaters; against the seventh, as adulterers, fornicators, effeminate, and Sodomites; against the eighth, as thieves and extortioners; against the ninth, as revilers; and against the tenth, as covetous and drunkards. Heaven could never be intended for these. The scum of the earth are no ways fit to fill the heavenly mansions.

II. Yet he warns them against deceiving themselves: Be not deceived. Those who cannot but know the fore-mentioned truth are but too apt not to attend to it. Men are very much inclined to flatter themselves that they may live in sin and yet die in Christ, may lead the life of the devil's children and yet go to heaven with the children of God. But this is all a gross cheat. We cannot hope to sow to the flesh and yet reap everlasting life.

III. He puts them in mind what a change the gospel and grace of God had made in them: Such were some of you (v. 11). Some that are eminently good after their conversion have been as remarkably wicked before. How glorious a change does grace make! It changes the vilest of men into saints and the children of God. You are not what you were. You are washed, you are sanctified, you are justified in the name of Christ, and by the Spirit of our God. The washing of regeneration can purge away all guilt and defilement. You are sanctified, you are justified. None are cleansed from the guilt of sin, and reconciled to God through Christ, but those who are also sanctified by his Spirit. All who are made righteous in the sight of God are made holy by the grace of God.

The twelfth verse and former part of the thirteenth seem to relate to that early dispute among Christians about the distinction of meats, and yet to be prefatory to the caution that follows against fornication. The connection seems plain enough if we attend to the famous determination of the apostles, Acts xv, where the prohibition of certain foods was joined with that of fornication. Now some among the Corinthians seem ready to say, even in the case of fornication, All things are lawful for me. This pernicious conceit Paul here sets himself to oppose: he tells them that many things lawful in themselves were not expedient. Christians should not barely consider what is in itself lawful to be done, but what is fit for them to do. They should be very careful that by carrying this maxim too far they be not brought into bondage, either to a crafty deceiver or a carnal inclination. All things are lawful for me, says he, but I will not be brought under the power of any, v. 12. There is a liberty wherewith Christ has made us free, in which we must stand fast. But surely he would never carry this liberty so far as to put himself into the power of any bodily appetite. He would not become a glutton nor a drunkard. And much less would he abuse the maxim of lawful liberty to countenance the sin of fornication. He would not abuse this maxim about eating and drinking to encourage any intemperance, nor indulge a carnal appetite: "Though meats are for the belly and the belly for meats (v. 13). If I am in danger of being subjected to my belly and appetite, I will abstain. But God shall destroy both it and them." There is a time coming when the need and use of food shall be abolished. The transition to his arguments against fornication seems very natural: But the body is not for fornication, but for the Lord, and the Lord for the body, v. 13. Meats and the belly are for one another; not so fornication and the body.

I. The body is not for fornication, but for the Lord. This is the first argument he uses against this sin, for which the heathen inhabitants of Corinth were infamous. The body is not for fornication; it was never formed for any such purpose, but for the Lord. It is to be a member of Christ, and therefore must not be made the member of a harlot, v. 15. And the Lord is for the body, that is, as some think, Christ is to be Lord of the body, to have property in it and dominion over it. We must take care that we do not use what belongs to Christ as if it were our own, and much less to his dishonour.

II. Some understand this last passage, The Lord is for the body, thus: He is for its resurrection and glorification, according to what follows, v. 14, which is a second argument against this sin, the honour intended to be put on our bodies: God hath both raised up our Lord, and will raise us up by his power (v. 14). It will be an honour to our bodies that they will be raised. Let us not abuse those bodies by sin which, if they be kept pure, shall be made like to Christ's glorious body.

III. A third argument is the honour already put on them: Know you not that your bodies are the members of Christ? v. 15. If the soul be united to Christ by faith, the whole man is become a member of his mystical body. The body is in union with Christ as well as the soul. But now, says the apostle, shall I take the members of Christ, and make them the members of a harlot? God forbid. Would it not be dishonouring Christ, and dishonouring ourselves to the very last degree? What, make Christ's members the members of a harlot? God forbid. Know you not that he who is joined to a harlot is one body with hers? For two, says he, shall be one flesh. But he who is joined to the Lord is one spirit, v. 16, 17. He is joined to the Lord in union with Christ, and made partaker by faith of his Spirit. How shall one in so close a union with Christ as to be one spirit with him yet be so united to a harlot as to become one flesh with her? Can anything be more inconsistent with our profession or relation? It is no wonder therefore that the apostle should say, "Flee fornication" (v. 18). Other vices may be conquered in fight, this only by flight; so speak many of the fathers.

IV. A fourth argument is that it is a sin against our own bodies. Every sin that a man does is without the body; he that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body (v. 18); every sin, that is, every external act of sin besides, is without the body. This sin is in a peculiar manner styled uncleanness, pollution, because no sin has so much external turpitude in it, especially in a Christian. He sins against his own body; he defiles it, he degrades it. He casts vile reproach on what his Redeemer has dignified to the last degree by taking it into union with himself. We should not make our present vile bodies more vile by sinning against them.

V. The fifth argument against this sin is that the bodies of Christians are the temples of the Holy Ghost which is in them, and which they have of God, v. 19. He that is joined to Christ is one spirit. He is yielded up to him and is hereupon possessed, and inhabited, by his Holy Spirit. This is the proper notion of a temple—a place where God dwells, and sacred to his use. Such temples real Christians are of the Holy Ghost. Hence we are not our own. We are possessed by and for God; nay, and this in virtue of a purchase made of us: You are bought with a price. In short, our bodies were made for God, they were purchased for him. And shall we desecrate his temple, and offer it up to the use and service of a harlot? The temple of the Holy Ghost must be kept holy. Our bodies must be kept as his whose they are, and fit for his use and residence.

VI. The apostle argues from the obligation we are under to glorify God both with our body and spirit, which are his, v. 20. He made both, he bought both. They must be kept as vessels fitted for our Master's use. We must look upon our whole selves as holy to the Lord. We are to honour him with our bodies and spirits, which are his. Body and spirit are to be kept clean, that God may be honoured by both. But God is dishonoured when either is defiled by so beastly a sin. Therefore flee fornication, nay, and every sin. Use your bodies for the glory and service of their Lord and Maker.

CHAP. VII

The apostle answers some cases proposed to him by the Corinthians about marriage. I. He shows them that marriage was appointed as a remedy against fornication, ver. 1–9. II. He gives direction to those who are married to continue together, though they might have an unbelieving relative, unless the unbeliever would part, ver. 10–16. III. He shows them that becoming Christians does not change their external state, ver. 17–24. IV. He advises them, by reason of the present distress, to keep themselves unmarried; and shows them how worldly cares distract them in the service of God, ver. 25–35. V. He directs them in the disposal of their virgins, ver. 36–38. VI. And closes the chapter with advice to widows how to dispose of themselves in that state, ver. 39, 40.

Verses 1–9

The apostle comes now to answer some cases of conscience which the Corinthians had proposed to him. They were things whereof they wrote to him, v. 1. The apostle was as ready to resolve as they were to propose their doubts. In the former chapter, he warns them to avoid fornication; here he gives some directions about marriage.

I. It was good to abstain from marriage altogether: It is good for a man not to touch a woman (not to take her to wife), by good here not understanding what is so conformable to the mind of God as if to do otherwise were sin, an extreme into which many of the ancients have run in favour of celibacy and virginity. At this juncture it would be a convenience for Christians to keep themselves single, provided they can keep themselves chaste.

II. He informs them that marriage, and the comforts and satisfactions of that state, are by divine wisdom prescribed for preventing fornication (v. 2). And, when they are married, let each render the other due benevolence (v. 3). And therefore they should not defraud one another of the use of their bodies, except it be with mutual consent (v. 5) and for a time only, while they employ themselves in some extraordinary duties of religion, or give themselves to fasting and prayer. Seasons of deep humiliation require abstinence from lawful pleasures.

III. The apostle limits what he had said (v. 2). Paul did not bind every man to marry. No, he could wish all men were as himself (v. 7). Natural constitutions vary.

IV. He sums up (v. 9, 10): Marriage, with all its inconveniences, is much better than to burn with impure and lustful desires.

Verses 10–16

The apostle gives them direction in a case which must have been frequent in that age of the world, whether they were to live with heathen relatives in a married state. Moses's law permitted divorce. This might move a scruple in many minds.

I. Marriage, by Christ's command, is for life. The wife must not depart from the husband (v. 10), nor the husband put away his wife, v. 11. The Lord himself had forbidden such separations, Matt. v. 32. They must not separate for any other cause than what Christ allows. Husbands and wives should not quarrel at all, or should be quickly reconciled. They are bound to each other for life. They cannot throw off the burden, and therefore should set their shoulders to it, and endeavour to make it as light to each other as they can.

II. The case of such as had an unbelieving mate (v. 12). It does not mean that the apostle decided this case by his own wisdom. He closes this subject with a declaration to the contrary (v. 40).

1. The advice itself, that if an unbelieving husband or wife were pleased to dwell with a Christian relative, the other should not separate, v. 12, 13. The Christian calling did not dissolve the marriage covenant, but bind it the faster. Yet, if the unbelieving relative desert the believer, in such a case a brother or sister is not in bondage (v. 15). In such a case the deserted person must be free to marry again. The apostle says (v. 11), If the woman depart from her husband let her remain unmarried.

2. The reasons of this advice. (1) The relation is sanctified by the holiness of either party (v. 14). The apostle tells them that, though they were yoked with unbelievers, yet, if they themselves were holy, marriage was to them a holy state. He is sanctified for the wife's sake. She is sanctified for the husband's sake. Else were your children unclean, but now are they holy (v. 14). The children born to Christians, though married to unbelievers, are not to be reckoned as part of the world, but of the church. (2) Another reason is that God hath called Christians to peace, v. 15. (3) It is possible for the believing relative to be an instrument of the other's salvation (v. 16). Should a Christian desert a mate, when an opportunity offers to give the most glorious proof of love? Endeavour to save a soul. It is not impossible. What know I but I may save his soul? should move me to attempt it.

I. He lays down this rule in general—as God hath distributed to everyone. And again, As the Lord hath called everyone, so let him walk. In every state a man may live so as to be a credit to it. The apostle adds that this was a general rule, to be observed in all places: So ordain I in all churches.

II. He specifies particular cases: 1. That of circumcision. It matters not whether a man be a Jew or Gentile (v. 19). External observances without internal piety are as nothing. Therefore let every man abide in the calling (the state) wherein he was called, v. 20. 2. That of servitude and freedom. "Now," says the apostle, "art thou called being a servant? Care not for it. It is not inconsistent with thy duty, profession, or hopes, as a Christian. Yet, if thou mayest be made free, use it rather," v. 21. There are many conveniences in a state of freedom above that of servitude. But men's outward condition does neither hinder nor promote their acceptance with God. He who is a slave may yet be a Christian freeman; he who is a freeman may yet be Christ's servant. He must not be so the servant of men, that Christ's will is not obeyed, and regarded, more than his master's. The servants of Christ should be at the absolute command of no other master besides himself.

III. He sums up his advice (v. 24). He should quietly abide in the condition in which he is; and this he may well do, when he may abide therein with God. The presence and favour of God are not limited to any outward condition. He who is bound may have it as well as he who is free. The favour of God is not bound.

Verses 25–35

The apostle here gives directions to virgins how to act.

I. The manner wherein he introduces them, v. 25. Though Christ had before delivered no universal law about that matter, he now gives direction by an inspired apostle.

II. A state of celibacy was preferable. It is worded with modesty, but delivered with apostolical authority. Ministers do not lose their authority by prudent condescensions. The married state would bring more care and cumber along with it (v. 33, 34), and would therefore make persecution more terrible.

III. He is very careful to satisfy them that he does not condemn marriage, nor declare it unlawful. Though he says, "If thou art loosed from a wife do not seek a wife," yet he adds, "If thou art bound to a wife, do not seek to be loosed. It is thy duty to continue in the married relation." Duty must be done, and God trusted with events. Marrying is not in itself a sin, but marrying at that time was likely to add to the calamities of the times.

IV. General rules to all Christians to carry themselves with a holy indifference towards the world. Those that had wives must be as though they had none. They know not how soon they shall have none. Those that have children should be as though they had none. Those that are their comfort now may prove their greatest cross. Those that weep must be as though they wept not. Even in sorrow the heart may be joyful, and the end of our grief may be gladness. Those that rejoice should be as though they rejoiced not. Here is not their rest, nor are these things their portion. Those that buy must be as though they possessed not. Buying and possessing should not too much engage our minds. They hinder many people altogether from minding the better part. Those that use this world as not abusing it, v. 31. The world may be used, but must not be abused. It is abused when, instead of being oil to the wheels of our obedience, it is made fuel to lust. We must keep the world out of our hearts, that we may not abuse it when we have it in our hands.

V. Two reasons, v. 29. We have but little time to continue in this world. Therefore do not set your hearts on worldly enjoyments. Do not be overwhelmed with worldly cares and troubles (v. 31). It is not so much a world as the appearance of one. All is show with nothing solid in it; and it is transient show too, and will quickly be gone.

VI. The embarrassment of worldly cares, v. 32. A wise concern about worldly interests is a duty; but to be careful, full of care, is a sin. God must be attended upon without distraction, v. 35. But how is this possible when the mind is swallowed up of the cares of this life? This is the general maxim by which the apostle would have Christians govern themselves. In the application of it Christian prudence must direct. The unmarried man and woman mind the things of the Lord, that they may please the Lord, and be holy both in body and spirit, v. 32, 34. Not but the married person may be holy both in body and spirit too. It is the constant care of those in that relation to please each other. At that season, therefore, the apostle advises that those who were single should abstain from marriage. And the very same rule must determine persons for marriage, if in the unmarried state persons are likely to be more distracted in the service of God than if they were married. That condition of life should be chosen by the Christian in which it is most likely he will have the best helps, and the fewest hindrances, in the service of God.

Advice about the disposal of children in marriage. It was in that age reckoned a disgrace for a woman to remain unmarried past a certain number of years. "Now," says the apostle, "if any man thinks he behaves unhandsomely towards his daughter, he may use his pleasure. It is no sin in him to dispose of her to a suitable mate. But if a man has determined in himself to keep her a virgin with her consent, he does well."

Verses 39, 40

Advice to widows. Death only can annul the bond. Second marriages are not unlawful. She has such a liberty only with a limitation that she marry in the Lord, v. 40. It will be much more for the peace and quiet of such, and give them less hindrance in the service of God, to continue unmarried.

CHAP. VIII

Eating those things that had been sacrificed to idols. I. A caution against too high an esteem of their knowledge, ver. 1–3. II. The vanity of idols, ver. 4–6. III. Regard must be had to the weakness of Christian brethren, ver. 7, to the end.

Verses 1–3

Things that had been offered to idols. It was a custom among the heathens to make feasts of their sacrifices. These were usually kept in the temple, where the sacrifice was offered (v. 10). What remained, after all, belonged to the priests, who sometimes sold it in the markets. See ch. x. 25. It was accounted a very profane thing among them to eat at their private tables any meat whereof they had not first sacrificed. What should Christians do if anything that had been sacrificed should be set before them? What, if they should be invited to feast with them in their temples? The Corinthians had an opinion that even this might be done, because they knew an idol was nothing in the world, v. 4. Paul says, "We who abstain know as much of the vanity of idols, and that they are nothing. Knowledge puffeth up, but charity edifieth," v. 1. The preference of charity to conceited knowledge. There is no evidence of ignorance more common than a conceit of knowledge. He that knows most best understands his own ignorance. He that imagines himself a knowing man has reason to suspect that he knows nothing aright. Much may be known when nothing is known to any good purpose. But, adds the apostle, if any man love God, the same is known of God. He shall be approved of God; he will accept him and have pleasure in him. The charitable person is most likely to have God's favour. How much better is it to be approved of God than to have a vain opinion of ourselves!

Verses 4–6

The vanity of idols. Heathen idols have no divinity in them. They are merely imaginary gods. The gods of the heathen have nothing of real godhead belonging to them; for there is no other God but one. We Christians well know there is but one God. All things are of him, and we, and all things else, are for him. It is the great privilege of us Christians that we know the true God, and true Mediator between God and man.

Verses 7–13

Their inference was not just, namely, that therefore they might go into the idol-temple and feast there with their heathen neighbours. He does not so much insist upon the unlawfulness as the mischief such freedom might do to weaker Christians.

I. Every Christian man, at that time, was not so fully convinced that an idol was nothing. Weak Christians may be ignorant, or have but a confused knowledge of the greatest and plainest truths. So their conscience, being weak, was defiled. They were weak in their understanding, and, while they ate what was sacrificed contracted the guilt of idolatry and so greatly polluted themselves. We should be careful to do nothing that may occasion weak Christians to defile their consciences.

II. He tells them that mere eating and drinking had nothing in them virtuous nor criminal, v. 8. Some of the Corinthians made a merit of their eating what had been offered to idols, and that in their very temples too (v. 10), because it plainly showed that they thought the idols nothing. Eating this food, and forbearing that, have nothing in them to recommend a person to God.

III. He cautions them against abusing their liberty. Even upon the supposition that they had such power, they must be cautious how they use it; it might be a stumbling-block to the weak (v. 9). We must deny ourselves rather than occasion their stumbling, and endanger their souls (v. 11): Through thy knowledge shall thy weak brother perish, for whom Christ died? If he had such compassion as to die for them, we should have so much compassion for them as to deny ourselves, for their sakes. That man has very little of the spirit of the Redeemer who had rather his brother should perish than himself be abridged of his liberty. The hurt done to them Christ takes as done to himself, v. 12. Injuries done to Christians are injuries to Christ. Shall we be void of compassion for those to whom Christ has shown so much? Shall we sin against Christ who suffered for us?

IV. His own example (v. 13). We must not rigorously claim our own rights, to the hurt and ruin of a brother's soul, and so to the injury of our Redeemer, who died for him. And, if we must be so careful not to occasion other men's sins, how careful should we be to avoid sin ourselves!

CHAP. IX

I. He asserts his apostolical mission and authority, ver. 1, 2. II. He claims a right to subsist by his ministry, ver. 3–14. III. He shows that he had willingly waived this privilege, ver. 15–18. IV. He specifies several other things, in which he had denied himself, ver. 19–23. And, V. Concludes his argument by showing what animated him to this course, ver. 24, to the end.

Paul not only met with opposition from those without, but discouragement from those within.

Some among the Corinthians questioned, if they did not disown, his apostolical character. He asserts his apostolical mission and character: Am I not an apostle? Have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord? To be a witness of his resurrection was one great branch of the apostolical charge. "Am I not free?" It was not because he had no right to live of the gospel that he maintained himself with his own hands. He offers the success of his ministry among them as a proof of his apostleship. He justly upbraids the Corinthians with their disrespect, v. 2. "You, above all others, should own my character, and not call it in question." It was aggravated ingratitude for this people to call in question his authority.

He proceeds to claim the rights belonging to his office.

I. These he states, v. 3–6.

II. He proceeds to prove his claim, from the common practice of mankind. Those who give themselves up to any way of business in the world expect to live out of it (v. 7–9). It is very reasonable for ministers to expect a livelihood out of their labours, v. 8. It is also consonant to the old law. But this law was not chiefly given out of God's regard to oxen, but to teach mankind that all due encouragement should be given to those who are labouring for our good—that the labourers should taste of the fruit of their labours, v. 10. Those that lay themselves out to do our souls good should not have their mouths muzzled. He argues from common equity. What they had sown was much better than they expected to reap. They had been instruments of conveying to them the greater spiritual blessings; and had they no claim to a share in their carnal things? What, get so much good by them, and yet grudge to do so little good to them! He argues from the maintenance they afforded others. Who has so just a claim as I from the church of Corinth? Who has laboured so much for your good? He renounced his right, rather than by claiming it he would hinder his success, but asserted his right lest his self-denial should prove prejudicial to the ministry. He argues from the old Jewish establishment: "Do you not know that those who minister about holy things live of the things of the temple, and those who wait at the altar are partakers with the altar? (v. 13). He asserts it to be the institution of Christ: "Even so hath the Lord ordained that those who preach the gospel should live of the gospel" (v. 14). But those transgress an appointment of Christ who deny or withhold it.

Verses 15–18

I. He had neglected to claim his right in times past, v. 15. Nor did he write this to make his claim now.

II. He would not have his glorying made void, v. 15, to have it justly said that he preferred his wages to his work. It is the glory of a minister to deny himself, that he may serve Christ, and save souls.

III. This self-denial yielded him much more content than his preaching did, v. 16. This is a duty expressly bound upon him. Those who are set apart to the office of the ministry have it in charge to preach the gospel. Woe be to them if they do not. But it is not given in charge to all, nor any preacher of the gospel, to do his work gratis. It may be his duty to preach under some circumstances, without receiving a maintenance for it; but he has a right to it. It may sometimes be his duty to insist on his maintenance for so doing, and whenever he forbears he parts with his right.

IV. If I do this thing willingly, I have a reward. Indeed, it is willing service only that is capable of reward from God. Leave the heart out of our duties, and God abhors them: they are but the carcasses, without the life and spirit, of religion. Ministers have a dispensation of the gospel committed to them. Christ's willing servants shall not fail of a recompence, and his slothful and unwilling servants shall all be called to an account.

V. What is my reward then? (v. 18). That when I preach the gospel I may make it without charge, that I abuse not my power in the gospel. It is an abuse of power to employ it against the very ends for which it is given. And the apostle would never use his so as to frustrate the ends of it, but would willingly and cheerfully deny himself.

I. He asserts his liberty (v. 19). He was free-born, a citizen of Rome. He was in bondage to none, yet he made himself a servant to all, that he might gain the more. He made himself a servant, that they might be made free.

II. He accommodated himself to all sorts of people. To the Jews, and those under the law, he became a Jew. He submitted to it, that he might prevail with them and win them over to Christ. To those that are without the law, as without law, that is, to the Gentiles. In innocent things he could comply with people's usages for their advantage. He behaved among them as one that was not under the bondage of the Jewish laws. He did not stand on privileges and punctilios. To the weak he became as weak, that he might gain the weak, v. 22. He did not despise nor judge them, but became as one of them. He denied himself for their sakes, that he might gain their souls. The rights of God he could not give up, but he might resign his own, and he very often did so for the good of others.

III. His reason for acting in this manner (v. 23): This I do for the gospel's sake, and that I may be partaker thereof with you. A heart warmed with zeal for God, and breathing after the salvation of men, will not plead and insist upon rights and privileges.

He had a glorious prize, an incorruptible crown, in view. "Know you not that those who run in a race run all, but one obtaineth the prize?" (v. 24).

I. It is quite otherwise in the Christian race than in your races; where only one wins the prize. You may all run so as to obtain. You cannot fail if you run well. And it is a glorious contest who shall get first to heaven.

II. He directs them in their course, by setting more fully to view his own example. 1. Those that ran in their games were kept to a set diet, v. 23. "The fighters and wrestlers in your exercises are kept to strict diet and discipline. They use a very spare diet and deny themselves much; so do I; so should you." 2. They were not only temperate, but inured themselves to hardships. Those who fought with one another prepared themselves by beating the air, as the apostle calls it. There is no room for any such exercise in the Christian warfare. Christians are ever in close combat. One enemy the apostle here mentions, namely, the body; this must be kept under, beaten black and blue.

III. The apostle presses this advice by proper arguments drawn from the same contenders. Those who conquered in these games were crowned only with the withering leaves or boughs of trees, of olive, bays, or laurel. But Christians have an incorruptible crown in view. Can they expose their bodies to so much hardship who have no more in view than the trifling huzzas of a giddy multitude, or a crown of leaves? And shall not Christians, who hope for a crown of glory, exert themselves in beating down their fleshly inclinations? All run, but one receives the prize, v. 24. But the Christian racer is at no such uncertainty. Everyone may run here so as to obtain; but then he must keep to the path of duty prescribed, which is the meaning of running not as uncertainly, v. 26. And would the Grecian racers exert themselves to the very last, when one only could win? And shall not Christians be much more vigorous when all are sure of a crown? The danger of yielding to fleshly inclinations: I keep my body under, lest by any means, when I have preached to others, I myself should be a castaway (v. 27), rejected, one to whom the judge or umpire, will not decree the crown. A preacher of salvation may yet miss it. He may show others the way to heaven, and never get thither himself. A holy fear of himself was necessary to preserve the fidelity of an apostle; and how much more necessary is it to our preservation?

CHAP. X

The apostle, I. Warns the Corinthians against security, by the example of the Jews, ver. 1–14. II. He resumes his former argument (ch. 8), about eating things offered to idols, ver. 15–22. III. They might buy such flesh in the markets, or eat it at the table of heathen acquaintances, without asking any questions. Yet liberty of this kind must be used with a due regard to weak consciences, ver. 23, to the end.

Verses 1–5

He sets before them the example of the Jews. They enjoyed great privileges, but they fell under very grievous punishments.

I. The providence of God towards them, and what happened to them ought to be warnings to us.

II. He specifies some of their privileges. 1. Their deliverance from Egypt. They were miraculously conducted through the Red Sea, where the pursuing Egyptians were drowned: it was a lane to them, but a grave to these. They were very dear to God when he would work such miracles for their deliverance. 2. They had sacraments like ours. They were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud, and in the sea (v. 2). They did all eat of the same spiritual meat, and drink of the same spiritual drink. These were great privileges. One would think that this should have saved them. Yet was it otherwise, v. 5. Men may enjoy many and great spiritual privileges in this world, and yet come short of eternal life. Let none presume upon their great privileges.

Verses 6–14

I. Several of their sins are specified as cautions to us. We should shun inordinate desires after carnal objects, v. 6. God fed them with manna, but they must have flesh, Num. xi. 4. Carnal desires get head by indulgence. If once they prevail, and bear sway in us, we know not whither they will carry us. He warns against idolatry (v. 7). The apostle is speaking to the case of the Corinthians, who were tempted to feast on the heathen sacrifices. He cautions against fornication, a sin to which the inhabitants of Corinth were in a peculiar manner addicted. How needful was a caution against fornication to those who lived in so corrupt a city! Let us fear the sins of Israel, if we would shun their plagues. He warns us against tempting Christ (as some of them tempted, and were destroyed of serpents, v. 9), or provoking him to jealousy, v. 22. For which reason God sent fiery serpents among them (Num. xxi. 5, 6). And it is but just to fear that such as tempt Christ under the present dispensation will be left by him in the power of the old serpent. He warns against murmuring (v. 10). When they met with discouragements in the way to Canaan, they were very apt to fly in the face of their leaders. Something like this seems to have been the case of the Corinthians; they murmured against Paul, and in him against Christ.

II. The apostle subjoins to these particular cautions a more general one (v. 11). Their sins against God were typical of the infidelity of many under the gospel. God's judgments on them were types of spiritual judgments now. Their history was written, to be a standing monitor to the church. Nothing in scripture is written in vain, and it is our wisdom and duty to receive instruction from it. A caution (v. 12). Others have fallen, and so may we. God has not promised to keep us from falling, if we do not look to ourselves: his protection supposes our own care.

III. He adds a word of comfort, v. 13. Though it is displeasing to God for us to presume, it is not pleasing to him for us to despair. Either our trials will be proportioned to our strength, or strength will be supplied in proportion to our temptations. Others have the like temptations; what they bear up under, and break through, we may also. Men may be false, and the world may be false; but God is faithful, and our strength and security are in him. He is wise as well as faithful. He knows what we can bear. He will take care that we be not overcome, if we rely upon him. He will make a way to escape. There is no valley so dark but he can find a way through it.

IV. "Flee idolatry; shun it." Idolatry is the most heinous affront to the true God. "Seeing you have such encouragement to trust God, be not shaken by any discouragements. God will help you in your trials, and help you out of them." We cannot fall by a temptation if we cleave fast to him.

The apostle urges the general caution against idolatry.

I. An appeal to their own reason and judgment: "I speak to wise men, judge you what I say," v. 15.

II. He lays down his argument from the Lord's supper. Is not this sacred rite a token whereby we professedly hold communion with Christ? Thus to partake of the Lord's table is to profess ourselves his guests and covenant people; and this in conjunction with all true Christians, with whom we have communion also in this ordinance (v. 17).

III. He confirms this from the Jewish worship and customs. Those who were admitted to eat of the offerings were reckoned to partake of the sacrifice itself, and therefore surely to worship God.

IV. He applies this to the argument against feasting with idolaters on their sacrifices. An idol was nothing. What was sacrificed to idols was nothing. But the eating of it as a part of a heathen sacrifice was, (1) A partaking with them in their idolatry, just as he who eats the Lord's supper is supposed to partake in the Christian sacrifice. "Therefore do not feast on their sacrifices. I would not have you be in communion with devils." (2) It was a virtual renouncing of Christianity, v. 21. Communion with Christ, and communion with devils, could never be had at once. One must be renounced, if the other was maintained. How much reason have we to look to it that every sin and idol be renounced by us, when we eat and drink at the Lord's table.

V. He warns them that God is a jealous God (v. 22). Those who have fellowship with other gods provoke him to jealousy. And, before this be done, persons should consider whether they are stronger than he. It is a dangerous thing to provoke God's anger, unless we could withstand his power. Shall we rouse almighty wrath? Are we a match for God?

Verses 23–33

In what instances Christians might lawfully eat what had been sacrificed to idols.

I. That may be lawful which is not expedient, which will not edify. He must be concerned not to hurt his neighbour, nay, he must be concerned to promote his welfare. Those who allow themselves in everything not plainly sinful in itself will often run into what is evil by accident. The welfare of others, as well as our own convenience, must be consulted in many things we do.

II. He tells them that what was sold in the shambles they might eat without asking questions. They need not be so scrupulous as to ask the butcher whether the meat he sold had been offered to an idol? It was there sold as common food, and as such might be bought and used; for the earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof (v. 26).

III. If they were invited by any heathen acquaintances to a feast, they might go, and eat what was set before them, without asking questions (v. 27). There is a civility owing even to infidels and heathens. Anything fit to be eaten, that was set before them, they might lawfully eat. It is to be understood of civil feasting, not religious. At a common feast they might expect common food.

IV. Yet, if any should say it was a thing that had been offered to idols, they should refrain. They should refrain for his sake who suggested this to them, and for conscience' sake, out of regard to conscience. Christians should be very cautious of doing what may thus prejudice the consciences of others.

V. He urges them to refrain where they will give offence. Christians should take care not to use their liberty to the hurt of others, nor their own reproach.

VI. The apostle takes occasion from this discourse to lay down a general rule for Christians' conduct (v. 31, 32). In all we do, we should aim at the glory of God. And therefore nothing should be done by us to offend any, whether Jew, or Gentile, or the church, v. 32. Our own humour and appetite must not determine our practice, but the honour of God and the good and edification of the church.

VII. He presses all upon them by his own example, v. 33. A preacher may press his advice home with boldness and authority when he can enforce it with his own example. And it is highly commendable in a minister to neglect his own advantage that he may promote the salvation of his hearers.

CHAP. XI

The apostle blames, and endeavours to rectify, some manifest disorders in the church of Corinth; as, I. The misconduct of their women in the public assembly, who laid by their veils. This behaviour he reprehends, asserts the superiority of the husband, yet so as to remind the husband that both were made for mutual help and comfort, ver. 1–16. II. He blames them for their discord, and contempt of the poor, at the Lord's supper, ver. 17–22. III. He sets before them the intentions of this holy institution, ver. 23, to the end.

Verses 1–16

Be ye followers of me, as I also am of Christ (v. 1). It is plain that Paul not only preached such doctrine as they ought to believe, but led such a life as they ought to imitate. Ministers are likely to preach most to the purpose when they can press their hearers to follow their example. Yet would not Paul be followed blindly. He would be followed himself no further than he followed Christ. Christ's pattern is a copy without a blot; so is no man's else. He passes next to reprehend an indecency among them, of which the women were more especially guilty.

I. A commendation of what was praiseworthy in them (v. 2). When we reprove what is amiss in any, it is very prudent and fit to commend what is good in them.

II. The superiority of the man over the woman. Christ is at the head of mankind. In this high office he has a superior, God being his head. And as God is the head of Christ, and Christ the head of the whole human kind, so the man is the head of the two sexes: and the woman should be in subjection and not usurp the man's place. The women of the church of Corinth prayed and prophesied even in their assemblies, v. 5. It is indeed an apostolical canon, that the women should keep silence in the churches (ch. xiv. 34; 1 Tim. ii. 12). The apostle does not in this place prohibit the thing, but reprehend the manner of doing it. The manner of doing a thing enters into the morality of it. We must not only be concerned to do good, but that the good we do be well done.

III. The thing he reprehends is the woman's praying or prophesying uncovered, or the man's doing either covered, v. 4, 5.

IV. The reasons on which he grounds his reprehension. The man that prays or prophesies with his head covered dishonoureth his head, namely, Christ, the head of every man (v. 3). The woman who prays or prophesies with her head uncovered dishonoureth her head, namely, the man, v. 3. She appears in the dress of her superior, and throws off the token of her subjection. The sexes should not affect to change places. The woman should keep to the rank God has chosen for her. The man is the image and glory of God. It is the man who is set at the head of this lower creation, and therein he bears the resemblance of God. The woman, on the other hand, is the glory of the man (v. 7). She is the image of God, inasmuch as she is the image of the man, v. 8. The woman was made for the man, and not the man for the woman. And she should do nothing that looks like an affectation of equality. She ought to have power on her head, because of the angels. Power, that is, a veil, the token that she is under the power of her husband. Jews and Christians have had an opinion that these ministering spirits are present in their assemblies.

V. A caution lest the inference be carried too far (v. 11, 12). They were made to be a mutual comfort and blessing, not one a slave and the other a tyrant. As it is the will of God that the woman know her place, so it is his will also that the man abuse not his power.

VI. The woman's hair is a natural covering; to wear it long is a glory to her; but for a man to have long hair is a token of softness and effeminacy.

VII. He sums up all by referring to the usages and customs of the churches, v. 16. The common practice of the churches is what he would have them govern themselves by.

Verses 17–22

The apostle sharply rebukes them for much greater disorders in their partaking of the Lord's supper.

I. Such scandalous disorders as they were guilty of, called for a sharp reprehension. The ordinances of Christ, if they do not make us better, will be very apt to make us worse; if they do not melt and mend, they will harden.

II. His charge against them. Upon coming together, they fell into divisions. They fell a quarrelling with one another. The apostle had heard a report of the Corinthians' divisions, and he tells them he had too much reason to believe it. There must be heresies also. No marvel there should be breaches of Christian love in the churches, when such offences will come. Such offences must come. God permits them, that those who are approved (such honest hearts as will bear the trial) may be set to view, and appear faithful. The wisdom of God can make the wickedness of others a foil to the integrity of the saints. He charges them with scandalous disorder, v. 21. They would not stay for one another. Thus some wanted, while others had more than enough. The poor were deprived of the food prepared for them, and the rich turned a feast of charity into a debauch.

III. The apostle lays the blame of this conduct closely on them. 1. Their conduct perfectly destroyed the purpose and use of such an institution, v. 20. They might as well have stayed away. 2. Their conduct carried in it a contempt of the church, v. 22. If they had a mind to feast, they might do it at home in their own houses. Religious feasts should be attended religiously.

The apostle sets the sacred institution here to view.

I. He tells us how he came by the knowledge of it. He had received from the Lord what he delivered to them, v. 23.

II. He gives us a more particular account of the institution than we meet with elsewhere.

1. The author—our Lord Jesus Christ.

2. The time of the institution: It was the very night wherein he was betrayed, just as he was entering on his sufferings which are therein to be commemorated.

3. The institution itself. Our Saviour took bread, and when he had given thanks, he broke, and said, Take, eat; this is my body, broken for you; this do in remembrance of me. And in like manner he took the cup, when he had supped, saying, This cup is the New Testament in my blood; this do, as oft as you drink it, in remembrance of me, v. 24, 25.

(1) The materials of this sacrament, [1] The visible signs; these are bread and the cup. What is eaten is called bread, though it is at the same time said to be the body of the Lord. Bread and the cup are both made use of, because it is a holy feast. The cup is put for what was in it, without once specifying what the liquor was. [2] The things signified by these outward signs: they are Christ's body and blood, his body broken, his blood shed.

(2) The sacramental actions. Our Saviour did, at the institution, deliver his body and blood, with all the benefits procured by his death, to his disciples, and continues to do the same every time the ordinance is administered to true believers. They are to take him as their Lord and life, yield themselves up to him, and live upon him.

(3) An account of the ends of this institution. It was appointed to be done in remembrance of Christ, to keep fresh in our minds his dying for us, as well as to remember an absent friend, even Christ interceding for us. The motto on this ordinance, and the very meaning of it, is, When this you see, remember me. It was to show forth Christ's death. It is not barely in remembrance of Christ, but to commemorate his glorious condescension and grace in our redemption. We own before the world, by this very service, that we are the disciples of Christ, who trust in him alone for salvation and acceptance with God.

(4) It should be frequent. Our bodily meals return often. And it is fit that this spiritual diet should be taken often too. It must be perpetual. It is to be celebrated till the Lord shall come. The Lord's supper is not a temporary, but a standing and perpetual ordinance.

III. The danger of receiving unworthily and using it to the purposes of feasting and faction. 1. They shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord (v. 27). Instead of being cleansed by his blood, they are guilty of his blood. 2. They eat and drink judgment to themselves, v. 29. They provoke God, and are likely to bring down punishment on themselves. But fearful believers should not be discouraged from attending at this holy ordinance by the sound of these words. The Holy Spirit never indited this to deter serious Christians from their duty, though the devil has often made this advantage of it, and robbed good Christians of their choicest comforts. The Corinthians came to the Lord's table not discerning the Lord's body—not making a distinction between that and common food. For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep. Even those who were thus punished were in a state of favour with God: They were chastened of the Lord, that they should not be condemned with the world, v. 32. He frequently punishes those whom he tenderly loves. It is kindness to use the rod to prevent the child's ruin. They were punished by him out of fatherly goodwill, punished now that they might not perish for ever.

IV. The duty of those who would come to the Lord's table (v. 28). Such self-examination is necessary to a right attendance at this holy ordinance. Those should have the wedding-garment on who would be welcome at this marriage-feast—grace in habit, and grace in exercise, v. 31. To be exact and severe on ourselves is the most proper way not to fall under the just severity of our heavenly Father. We must not judge others, lest we be judged (Matt. vii. 1); but we must judge ourselves, to prevent our being judged and condemned by God.

V. A caution against the irregularities of which they were guilty (v. 33, 34). They were to eat for hunger and pleasure only at home. Our holy duties, through our own abuse, may prove matter of condemnation. Holy things are to be used in a holy manner, or else they are profaned.

CHAP. XII

The apostle, I Considers the case of spiritual gifts. He considers their original, that they are from God, their variety and use, ver 1–11 II He illustrates this by an allusion to a human body, ver 12 26. III. He tells us that the church is the body of Christ, ver. 27 30. IV. Closes with an exhortation to seek somewhat more beneficial than these gifts, ver 31.

Verses 1–11

Of spiritual gifts. Where grace is given it is for the salvation of those who have it. Gifts are bestowed for the advantage and salvation of others. And there may be great gifts where there is not a dram of grace. This church was rich in gifts, but there were many things scandalously out of order in it.

I. Gifts come from God, and are to be used for him.

II. He puts them in mind of the sad state out of which they had been recovered, v. 2. Their former character: they were Gentiles. Not God's peculiar people, but of the nations whom he had in a manner abandoned. What a change was here! Christian Corinthians were once Gentiles. It is of great use to the Christian, and a proper consideration to stir him up both to duty and thankfulness, to think what once he was. The conduct they were under: Carried away to these dumb idols, even as you were led. Miserable abjectness of mind! And those who despised these gross conceptions of the vulgar yet countenanced them by their practice. Could the Spirit of God be among such stupid idolaters?

III. How they might discern those gifts that were from the Spirit of God: No man, speaking by the Spirit, calls Jesus accursed. Thus did both Jews and Gentiles: they blasphemed him as an imposter, and execrated his name. None could act under the influence, nor by the power of the Spirit of God, who disowned and blasphemed Christ: for the Spirit of God could never so far contradict itself as to declare him accursed. No man can call Christ Lord, with a believing dependence upon him, unless that faith be wrought by the Holy Ghost.

IV. The same giver may bestow various gifts, v. 4. There are different offices, and officers to discharge them (see v. 28–30), but the same Lord, who appointed all, v. 6. There are diversities of operations (v. 10), but it is the same God that worketh all in all. However different they may be in themselves, in this they agree; all are from God. And several of the kinds are here specified, v. 8–10. To one was given the word of wisdom: a knowledge of the mysteries of the gospel, and ability to explain them. To another the word of knowledge, by the same Spirit; that is, say some, the knowledge of mysteries (ch. ii. 13): say others, a skill and readiness to give advice and counsel in perplexed cases. To another faith, by the same Spirit, whereby they were enabled to trust God in any emergency. To another the gift of healing, by the same Spirit; that is, healing the sick. To another the working of miracles. To another prophecy; to explain scripture by a peculiar gift of the Spirit. To another the discerning of spirits, power to distinguish between true and false prophets. To another divers kinds of tongues, or ability to speak languages by inspiration. To another the interpretation of tongues, or ability to render foreign languages.

V. The end for which these gifts were bestowed, v. 7. They were not distributed for the advantage of those who had them, but for the benefit of the church. Whatever gifts God confers on any man, he confers them that he may do good with them. They are a trust put into his hands. They are not given for show, but for service.

VI. All these worketh one and the same Spirit, dividing to every man as he will. Shall not the Spirit of God do what he will with his own? It is not as men will, nor as they may think fit, but as the Spirit pleases.

Verses 12–26

The apostle puts the gifted men among the Corinthians in mind of their duty, by comparing the church of Christ to a human body.

I. One body may have many members, the many members of the same body make but one body (v. 12). All the members are baptized into the same body, and made to drink of the same Spirit, v. 13. Christians become members of this body by baptism: they are baptized into one body. And by communion at the other ordinance we are sustained by drinking into one Spirit. It is baptism by the Spirit, it is internal renovation and drinking into one Spirit that makes us true members of Christ's body. All who have the spirit of Christ are the members of Christ, whether Jew or Gentile, bond or free.

II. Each member has its particular form, place, and use. The meanest member makes a part of the body. The foot and ear are less useful, perhaps, than the hand and eye; shall they say, therefore, that they do not belong to the body? v. 15, 16. So every member of the body mystical cannot have the same place and office. The meanest member of his body is as much a member as the noblest. All his members are dear to him. There must be a distinction of members in the body: They are many members, and yet are but one body, v. 20. So it is in the body of Christ. Variety in the members of the body contributes to the beauty of it. So it is for the beauty and good appearance of the church that there should be diversity of gifts. The disposal of members and their situation, are as God pleases, v. 18. So is it also in the members of Christ's body. We should be doing the duties of our own place, and not quarrelling with others, that we are not in theirs. All the members of the body are useful and necessary to each other. Those members of the body which seem to be more feeble are necessary (v. 21, 22). Every member serves some good purpose or other. Nor is there a member of the body of Christ but ought to be useful to his fellow-members, and in some cases, is needful to them. Those who excel in any gift cannot say that they have no need of those who in that gift are their inferiors, while perhaps, in other gifts, they exceed them. The eye has need of the hand, and the head of the feet. Such is the man's concern for his whole body that on the less honourable members more abundant honour is bestowed, and our uncomely parts have more abundant comeliness, v. 24. So should the members of Christ's body behave towards their fellow-members. Divine wisdom has ordered things in this manner that the members of the body should not be schismatics. That there might be no schism in the body (v. 25). The members of the natural body are made to have a care and concern for each other. So should it be in Christ's body. Christian sympathy is a great branch of Christian duty.

Verses 27–31

I. Here the apostle applies this similitude to the church of Christ.

1. The relation wherein Christians stand to Christ and one another. Now you are the body of Christ, and members in particular. All have a common relation to one another.

2. The variety of offices instituted by Christ, and gifts or favours dispensed by him (v. 28). Observe, (1) The plenteous variety of these gifts and offices. He was no niggard of his benefits and favours. They had no want, but a store—all that was necessary, and even more. (2) Observe the order of these offices and gifts. Those of most value have the first place. God does, and we should, value things according to their real worth. What holds the last and lowest rank in this enumeration is diversity of tongues. It is by itself the most useless and insignificant of all these gifts. The Corinthians valued themselves exceedingly on this gift. How proper a method it is to beat down pride to let persons know the true value of what they pride themselves in! It is but too common a thing for men to value themselves most on what is least worth. (3) The various distribution of these gifts. All members and officers had not the same endowments (v. 29, 30). The Spirit distributes to everyone as he will. We must be content with our own rank and share. All are to minister to one another, and promote the good of the body in general.

II. He closes this chapter with an advice and a hint. An advice to covet the best gifts. We should desire that most which is best, and most worth. Grace is therefore to be preferred before gifts. But some read this passage, not as an advice, but a charge: You are envious at each other's gifts. You quarrel and contend about them. It was a quarrel about precedency; and it is no wonder that a quarrel about precedency should extinguish charity. When all would stand in the first rank, no wonder if they jostle. To have the heart glow with mutual love is vastly better than to glare with the most pompous titles, offices, or powers.

CHAP. XIII

The apostle goes on to show that more excellent way. I. By showing the necessity of it, ver. 1–3. II. By giving a description of its properties, ver. 4–7. III. By showing how much it excels the best of gifts and other graces, by its continuance, when they shall be no longer in being, ver. 8, to the end.

Verses 1–3

Here the apostle shows what more excellent way he meant, charity, or love: love in its fullest meaning, true love to God and man. Without this the most glorious gifts are nothing. 1. The gift of tongues (v. 1). It is the charitable heart, not the voluble tongue, that is acceptable with God. 2. Prophecy, and the understanding of mysteries, and all knowledge. This without charity is as nothing, v. 2. A clear and deep head is of no signification, without a benevolent and charitable heart. It is not great knowledge that God sets a value upon, but true and hearty devotion and love. 3. Miraculous faith. Moving mountains is a great achievement in the account of men; but one dram of charity is, in God's account, of much greater worth than all the faith of this sort in the world. Saving faith is ever in conjunction with charity, but the faith of miracles may be without it. 4. The outward acts of charity, v. 3. There may be an open and lavish hand, where there is no liberal and charitable heart. If we give away all we have, while we withhold the heart from God, it will not profit. 5. Even sufferings, v. 3. Should we sacrifice our lives for the faith of the gospel; this will stand us in no stead without charity. True charity is the very heart and spirit of religion. If we feel none of its sacred heat in our hearts, it will profit nothing, though we be burnt to ashes for the truth.

Some of the properties and effects of charity.

I. It is long suffering. It can endure evil and provocation, without being filled with resentment or revenge. It will put up with many slights from the person it loves, and wait long to see the kindly effects of such patience on him.

II. It is kind. The law of kindness is in her lips. It seeks to be useful; and not only seizes on opportunities of doing good, but searches for them.

III. It envieth not; it is not grieved at the good of others. Envy is the effect of ill-will. The mind which is bent on doing good to all can never wish ill to any.

IV. It vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up, is not bloated with self-conceit. True love will give us an esteem of our brethren, and this will limit our esteem of ourselves. The word rendered in our translation vaunteth itself bears other significations, but in every sense and meaning true charity stands in opposition to it. The Syriac renders it—does not raise tumults and disturbances. Charity calms the angry passions, instead of raising them. Others render it—It does not act insidiously, does not seek to ensnare them. It is not froward nor apt to be cross and contradictory. Some understand it of dissembling and flattery. Charity abhors such falsehood and flattery.

V. It behaveth not unseemly. It does nothing out of place or time; but behaves with courtesy and goodwill towards all men.

VI. Charity is an utter enemy to selfishness: Seeketh not its own. Indeed self-love, in some degree, is natural to all men. And a reasonable love of self is by our Saviour made the measure of our love to others. Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. But charity never seeks its own to the hurt of others. It often neglects its own for the sake of others.

VII. It is not exasperated. Where the fire of love is kept in, the flames of wrath will not easily kindle, nor long keep burning. Anger cannot rest in the bosom where love reigns. It is hard to be angry with those we love.

VIII. Charity thinks no evil. It cherishes no malice, nor gives way to revenge: so some understand it. It is not soon, nor long, angry. It does not suspect evil of others. It will hide faults that appear, instead of hunting and raking out those that lie covered and concealed.

IX. The matter of its joy and pleasure is here suggested. It rejoiceth not in iniquity. It wishes ill to none, much less will it make this the matter of its delight, or rejoice in doing harm and mischief. The sins of others stir all its compassion, but can give it no entertainment. It rejoiceth in the truth. It gives it much satisfaction to see truth and justice prevail among men, and mutual faith and trust established.

X. It beareth all things, it endureth all things. Some read the first, covers all things. It is not for blazing nor publishing the faults of a brother. Though such a man be free to tell his brother his faults in private, he is very unwilling to expose him by making them public. Thus we do by our own faults, and thus charity would teach us to do by the faults of others. Or, it beareth all things—will be patient upon provocation, and long patient. What a fortitude and firmness fervent love will give the mind! What cannot a lover endure for the beloved and for his sake!

XI. Believeth all things; hopeth all things. Indeed charity does by no means destroy prudence. Wisdom may dwell with love, and charity be cautious. But it is apt to believe well of all. All charity is apt to make the best of everything; it will judge well, and believe well. And, when in spite of inclination, it cannot believe well of others, it will yet hope well. How lovely a mind is that which is tinctured throughout with such benevolence! Happy the man who has this heavenly fire glowing in his heart!

How much it is preferable to the gifts on which the Corinthians were so apt to pride themselves.

I. Charity never faileth. It is a permanent and perpetual grace, lasting as eternity. Prophecy must fail. Tongues will cease. There will be but one language in heaven. There is no confusion of tongues in the region of perfect tranquillity. And knowledge will vanish away. Not that holy and happy souls shall be unknowing: it is a very poor happiness that can consist with utter ignorance. The apostle is here setting the grace of charity in opposition to supernatural gifts. And it is more valuable, because more durable; it shall enter into heaven, where they will have no place.

II. We know in part, and we prophesy in part, v. 9. How little a portion of God was heard even by apostles and inspired men! These gifts were fitted to the present imperfect state of the church, whereas charity was to last for ever.

III. How much better it will be with the church hereafter (v. 10). When the end is once attained, the means will of course be abolished. Then the church will be in a state of perfection, complete both in knowledge and holiness. God will be known then clearly. What confused and indistinct notions of things, have children, in comparison of grown men! And how naturally do men despise and relinquish their infant thoughts! The things to be known will be open to our eyes; and our knowledge will be free from all obscurity and error. God is to be seen face to face; and we are to know him as we are known by him. O glorious change! To pass from darkness to light, from clouds to the clear sunshine of our Saviour's face, and in God's own light to see light! It is at best but twilight while we are in this world; there it will be perfect and eternal day.

IV. Faith, hope, and love, are the three principal graces, of which charity is the chief. Faith fixes on the divine revelation, and assents to that: hope fastens on future felicity, and waits for that. But love fastens on the divine perfections themselves. These will all shine forth in the most glorious splendours in another world, and there will love be made perfect; there we shall perfectly love God. And there shall we perfectly love one another. When faith and hope are at an end, true charity will burn for ever with the brightest flame. Where God is to be seen as he is, and face to face, there charity is in its greatest height—there, and there only, will it be perfected.

CHAP. XIV

The apostle directs them about spiritua !gifts. I. Advising them of all spiritual gifts to prefer prophesying, ver. 1–5. II. How unprofitable the speaking of foreign languages is, ver. 6-14. III. Worship should be celebrated so that the most ignorant might understand, ver. 15-20. IV. Tongues were a sign for unbelievers, ver. 21-25. V. He blames them for the disorder they had brought into the assembly, ver. 26-33. VI. He forbids women speaking in the church, ver. 34, to the end.

Verses 1-5

He teaches them, among spiritual gifts, which they should prefer.

I. An exhortation to charity (v. 1). See you do not miss this, the principal of all graces.

II. He directs them which spiritual gift to prefer: "Desire spiritual gifts, but rather that you may prophesy." Gifts are fit objects of our desire and pursuit, in subordination to grace and charity.

III. The reasons of this preference. He only compares prophesying with speaking with tongues. This was more ostentatious than the plain interpretation of scripture, but less fit to pursue the purposes of Christian charity. He that spoke with tongues must wholly speak between God and himself, v. 2. What cannot be understood can never edify. But he that prophesies speaks to the advantage of his hearers. They may be exhorted and comforted by it, v. 3. He that speaks with tongues may edify himself, v. 4, others can reap no benefit from his speech. Whereas the end of speaking in the church is to edify the church (v. 4), to which prophesying is immediately adapted. That is the best gift which does most good. Every gift of God is a favour from God, but then those are to be most valued that are most useful. Greater is he who interprets scripture to edify the church than he who speaks tongues to recommend himself. That makes most for the honour of a minister which is most for the church's edification, not that which shows his gifts to most advantage.

Verses 6-14

If I come to you speaking with tongues, what will it profit you, unless I speak to you by revelation, or by knowledge, or by prophesying, or by doctrine? (v. 6). It would signify nothing to utter any of these in an unknown tongue.

I. Unintelligible language is like piping or harping without distinction of sounds: it gives no more direction than a pipe with but one stop or a harp with but one string can direct a dancer how he should order his steps, v. 7. A trumpet giving an uncertain sound. If, instead of sounding an onset, it sounded a retreat, or sounded one knew not what, who would prepare for the battle? Words without a meaning can convey no notion nor instruction to the mind; and words not understood have no meaning. He compares the speaking in an unknown tongue to the gibberish of barbarians. There are (v. 10) many kinds of voices in the world, none of which is without its proper signification. But whatever proper signification the words of any language may have to those who understand them, they are perfect gibberish to men of another language. In this case, speaker and hearers are barbarians to each other (v. 11), they talk and hear only sounds without sense. To speak in the church in an unknown tongue is to talk gibberish.

II. Be chiefly desirous of those gifts that are most for the church's edification, v. 12. "Covet those gifts most that will do the best service to men's souls." If they did speak a foreign language, they should beg of God the gift of interpreting it, v. 13. The church must understand, that it might be edified. The sum is that they should perform all religious exercises in their assemblies so that all might join in them and profit by them. He enforces this advice. His own mind might be devoutly engaged, but his understanding would be unfruitful (v. 14), he would not be understood, nor therefore would others join with him in his devotions. Language that is most obvious and easy to be understood is the most proper for public devotion.

The apostle,

I. Directs them how they should sing and pray in public (v. 15). He would have them perform both so as to be understood by others, that others might join with them. Public worship should be performed so as to be understood.

II. He enforces the argument with several reasons.

1. Otherwise the unlearned could not say Amen to their prayers or thanksgivings, could not join in the worship, for they did not understand it, v. 16. All should say Amen inwardly; and it is not improper to testify this inward concurrence in public prayers and devotions, by an audible Amen. Now, how should the people say Amen to what they did not understand? The intention of public devotions is therefore entirely destroyed if they are performed in an unknown tongue. Others are not, cannot be, edified (v. 17) by what they understand not.

2. He alleges his own example, to make the greater impression. (1) He did not come behind any of them in this spiritual gift. It was not envy that made Paul depreciate what they so highly valued and so much vaunted of; he surpassed them all in this very gift of tongues. There was more ground for them to envy him upon this head than for him to envy them. When we beat down men's unreasonable value for themselves, we should let them see that this does not proceed from an envious and grudging spirit. (2) He had rather speak five words with understanding than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue, v. 19. A truly Christian minister will value himself much more upon doing good to men's souls than upon procuring the greatest applause.

3. The fondness then discovered for this gift was but too plain an indication of the immaturity of their judgment, v. 20. Children are apt to be struck with novelty and strange appearances. Do not you act like them, and prefer noise and show to worth and substance; be like children in nothing but an innocent and inoffensive disposition. Christians should have wisdom and knowledge that are ripe and mature.

The apostle pursues the argument.

I. Tongues, as the Corinthians used them, were rather a token of judgment from God than mercy to any people (v. 21). It is an evidence that a people are abandoned of God when he gives them up to the discipline of those who speak in another language. They can never be benefited by such teaching as this; and, when they are left to it, it is a sad sign that God gives them over as past cure. Yet thus did the Corinthian preachers who would always deliver their inspirations in an unknown tongue.

II. Tongues were rather a sign to unbelievers than to believers, v. 22. The gift of tongues was necessary to spread Christianity. It was proper and intended to convince unbelievers; interpreting scripture in their own language, as most for the edification of such as did already believe. That gifts may be rightly used, it is proper to know the ends which they are intended to serve. To go about the conversion of infidels had been a vain undertaking without the gift of tongues, but, in an assembly of Christians it would be perfectly impertinent.

III. The credit and reputation of their assemblies required them to prefer prophesying before speaking with tongues. If their ministers, or all employed in public worship, should talk unintelligible language, and infidels should drop in, they would conclude them to be mad. What sort of religion is that which leaves out sense and understanding? Would not this make Christianity ridiculous to a heathen? If, instead of speaking with tongues, those who minister plainly interpret scripture, a heathen or unlearned person, coming in, will probably be convinced, and become a convert to Christianity (v. 24, 25); and so will be brought to confess his guilt, to pay his homage to God, and own that he is indeed among you. Prophesying would certainly edify the church, and might probably convert infidels. The ministry was not instituted to make ostentation of gifts and parts, but to save souls.

I. He blames them for the confusion they introduced into the assembly (v. 26). "You are apt to confound the several parts of worship"; or else, "You are apt to be confused if you do not stay for one another. Can this be edifying? Let all things be done to edifying."

II. He corrects their faults. 1. As to speaking in an unknown tongue, he orders that no more than two or three should do it at one meeting, and this one after another. And even this was not to be done unless there were someone to interpret (v. 27, 28). But, if there were none to interpret, he was to be silent in the church, and only exercise his gift between God and himself (v. 28). 2. As to prophesying he orders, (1) That two or three only should speak at one meeting (v. 29). There might be false prophets, and the true prophets were to judge of these and discover who was divinely inspired and who was not. (2) He orders that, if any assistant prophet had a revelation, while another was prophesying, the other should hold his peace, be silent (v. 30). He who had the new revelation might claim liberty of speech in his turn. The reason annexed (v. 31): That all might prophesy, one after another. Divine inspirations are not, like the diabolical possessions of heathen priests, violent and ungovernable; but are sober and calm, and capable of regular conduct. The man inspired by the Spirit of God may still observe the rules of natural order and decency in delivering his revelations.

III. The apostle gives the reasons of these regulations. They would be for the church's benefit, their instruction and consolation. Divine inspiration should by no means throw Christian assemblies into confusion. If they are managed in a tumultuous and confused manner, what a notion must this give of the God who is worshipped! Does it look as if he were the God of peace and order, and an enemy to confusion? Things were thus orderly managed in all the other churches. And it would be perfectly scandalous for them, who exceeded most churches in spiritual gifts, to be more disorderly than any in the exercise of them.

Verses 34, 35

Here the apostle, 1. Enjoins silence on their women in public assemblies, who must not ask questions for their own information in the church, but ask their husbands at home. There is indeed an intimation (ch. xi. 5) as if the women sometimes did pray and prophesy in their assemblies. But here he seems to forbid all public performances of theirs. They are not permitted to speak (v. 34) in the church. Nor must she therefore be allowed to teach in a congregation; nor so much as to ask questions in the church, but learn in silence there; and, if difficulties occurred, ask their own husbands at home. As it is the woman's duty to learn in subjection, it is the man's duty to keep up his superiority, by being able to instruct her. If it be a shame for her to speak in the church, where she should be silent, it is a shame for him to be silent when he should speak, and not be able to give an answer, when she asks him at home. 2. The apostle concludes it was a shame for women to speak in the church. Shame is the mind's uneasy reflection on having done an indecent thing. And what more indecent than for a woman to quit her rank. The woman was made subject to the man, and she should keep her station and be content with it.

Verses 36–40

A just rebuke of the Corinthians for their extravagant pride and self-conceit. Are you the only church favoured with divine revelations. How intolerably assuming is this behaviour! What he said to them was the command of God; nor durst any true prophet deny it (v. 37). "If their revelations contradict mine, they do not come from the same Spirit; either I or they must be false prophets. But if any continue after all, uncertain or ignorant whether they or I speak by the Spirit of God, they must be left under the power of this ignorance." It is just with God to leave those to the blindness of their own minds who wilfully shut out the light. Though they should not despise the gift of tongues, yet they should prefer prophesying. It was the more useful gift. He charges them to let all things be done decently and in order (v. 40). They must do nothing that was manifestly childish (v. 20), or that would give occasion to say they were mad (v. 23), nor must they act so as to breed confusion, v. 33. All parts of divine worship should be carried on in a composed and orderly manner.

CHAP. XV

I. He establishes the certainty of our Saviour's resurrection, ver. 1–11. II. He sets himself to refute those who said, There is no resurrection of the dead, ver 12–19. III From our Saviour's resurrection he establishes the resurrection of the dead, ver. 20–34. IV. He answers an objection and takes occasion thence to show what a vast change will be made in the bodies of believers at the resurrection, ver. 35–50. V. He informs us what a change will be made in those who shall be living at the sound of the last trumpet, ver. 51–57. And, VI. He sums up the argument with a very serious exhortation to Christians, ver. 58.

It is the apostle's business in this chapter to establish the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, which some of the Corinthians flatly denied, v. 12. And they disowned a future state of recompences, by denying the resurrection of the dead. He begins with an epitome of the gospel. Now concerning the gospel observe,

I. What a stress he lays upon it (v. 1, 2). It was what he constantly preached. The doctrine which Paul had heretofore taught, he still taught. It was what they had received. It was no strange doctrine. It was that very gospel in which they had hitherto stood, and must continue to stand. The doctrine of Christ's death and resurrection is at the foundation of Christianity. Remove this foundation, and the whole fabric falls. It was that alone by which they could hope for salvation (v. 2). There is no salvation in his name, but upon supposition of his death and resurrection. These are the saving truths of our holy religion. They must be retained in mind, they must be held fast. We believe in vain, unless we continue and persevere in the faith of the gospel. We shall be never the better for a temporary faith. And in vain is it to profess faith in Christ, if we deny the resurrection. Take away this, you make nothing of Christianity.

II. What this gospel is. It was that doctrine which he had received, and delivered to them, among the first, the principal. It was a doctrine of the first rank, a most necessary truth. Christ's death and resurrection are the very sum and substance of evangelical truth.

III. This truth is confirmed,

1. By Old Testament predictions. He died for our sins; he was buried, and rose from the dead, according to the scripture-prophecies. It is a great confirmation of our faith of the gospel to see how it corresponds with ancient prophecies.

2. By the testimony of many eye-witnesses, who saw Christ after he had risen from the dead. How uncontrollably evident was Christ's resurrection from the dead, when so many eyes saw him at so many different times. Even Paul himself was last of all favoured with the sight of him. The Lord Jesus appeared to him by the way to Damascus, Acts ix. 17. He was highly favoured of God, but he always endeavoured to keep up a mean opinion of himself. So he does here, by observing, (1) That he was one born out of due time (v. 8). He was not matured for the apostolic function, as the others were, who had personal converse with our Lord. He was out of time for it. (2) By owning himself inferior to the other apostles. The least and not worthy to be called an apostle, because he had been a persecutor of the church of God, v. 9. A humble spirit, in the midst of high attainments, is a great ornament to any man. What kept Paul low was the remembrance of his former wickedness, his raging zeal against Christ and his members. How easily God can bring a good out of the greatest evil! When sinners are by divine grace turned into saints, he makes the remembrance of their former sins very serviceable, to make them humble, and diligent, and faithful. (3) By ascribing all that was valuable in him to divine grace. We are nothing but what God makes us. Though he was conscious of his own zeal, and service, he thought himself so much more the debtor to divine grace. Yet not I, but the grace of God which was with me. The more he laboured, and the more good he did, the more humble he was and the more disposed to own the favour of God towards him. The apostle tells them (v. 11) that he not only preached the same gospel himself at all times, and in all places, but that all the apostles preached the same. All agreed in this that Jesus Christ, and him crucified and slain, and then rising from the dead, was the very sum and substance of Christianity. By this faith they live. In this faith they die.

Verses 12–19

If Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead? (v. 12). The apostle produces an incontestable fact, namely, the resurrection of Christ.

I. It was foretold in ancient prophecies that he should rise; and it has been proved by multitudes of eye-witnesses that he has risen.

II. This supposition decried, would destroy the principal evidence of Christianity; and so, 1. Make preaching vain. "We apostles should be found false witnesses of God. Would not our labour be wholly in vain? If Christ be not raised, the gospel is a jest; it is chaff and emptiness." 2. It would make the faith of Christians vain because it is through his death and sacrifice for sin alone that forgiveness is to be had. Had he remained under the power of death, how could he have delivered us from its power? And how vain a thing would faith in him be. There had been no justification nor salvation if Christ had not risen.

III. They took death to be the destruction and extinction of the man, and not merely of the bodily life. "Upon supposition there is no resurrection, no after-state and life, then dead Christians are quite lost. How vain a thing were our faith and religion upon this supposition!" And this,

IV. Would infer that Christ's ministers and servants were of all men most miserable, as having hope in him in this life only (v. 19). If there be no resurrection, or state of future recompence, and, if all their hopes in Christ lie within the compass of this life, they are in a much worse condition than the rest of mankind. Better be anything than a Christian upon these terms. They fare much harder than other men in this life, and yet have no further nor better hopes. The Christian is by his religion crucified to this world, and taught to live upon the hope of another.

The apostle establishes the truth of the resurrection of the dead, the dead in Christ.

I. On the resurrection of Christ. He has truly risen himself, as the first-fruits of those who sleep in him. As he has risen, they shall rise. Christ's resurrection is a pledge and earnest of ours. This is the first argument used by the apostle in confirmation of the truth: and it is illustrated by a parallel between the first and second Adam, v. 21. All who die die through the sin of Adam; all who are raised, rise through the merit and power of Christ. But the meaning is not that, as all men died in Adam, so all men, without exception, shall be made alive in Christ. Christ rose as the first-fruits: therefore those that are Christ's (v. 23) shall rise too. All who thus rise, rise in virtue of Christ's resurrection, and so, as by man came death, by man came deliverance. He states that there will be an order observed in their resurrection. What that precisely will be we are nowhere told. It is only here said that the first-fruits are supposed to rise first, and afterwards all who are Christ's, when he shall come again.

II. He argues from the continuance of the mediatorial kingdom till all Christ's enemies are destroyed, the last of which is death, v. 24–26.

1. This argument implies: (1) That our Saviour rose from the dead to have all power put into his hands. (2) That this mediatorial kingdom is to have an end, v. 24. (3) That it is not to have an end till all opposing power be put down, v. 24, 25. (4) That, among other enemies, death must be destroyed (v. 26). Therefore the saints must rise, else death and the grave would have power over them. When saints shall live again, and die no more, then, and not till then, will death be abolished.

2. Our Saviour, as man and mediator between God and man, has a delegated royalty. As man, all his authority must be delegated. As Mediator, a middle person between God and man, partaking of both natures, he was to reconcile both parties, God and man. Upon his ascension, he was made head over all things to the church, had power given him to govern and protect it against all its enemies, and in the end destroy them and complete the salvation of all that believe in him. This delegated royalty must at length be delivered up to the Father, from whom it was received (v. 24); for it is a power received for particular ends (v. 25, 26). The Redeemer must reign till his enemies be destroyed, and, when this end is attained, then will he deliver up the power. The Redeemer shall certainly reign till the last enemy of his people be destroyed, till death itself be abolished. He shall have all power in heaven and earth till then. What support should this be to his saints in every hour of distress and temptation! When this is done, and all things are put under his feet, v. 28, then the man Christ Jesus shall appear upon giving it up to be a subject of the Father. And it will appear to the divine glory, that God may be all in all, that the accomplishment of our salvation may appear altogether divine. Though the human nature must be employed in the work of our redemption, yet God was all in all in it.

III. He argues for the resurrection, from the case of those who were baptized for the dead (v. 29). But what is this baptism for the dead? Some understand the passage of the martyrs: Why do they suffer martyrdom for their religion? This is sometimes called the baptism of blood by the ancients. Some understand it of a custom that was observed among many who professed the Christian name in the first ages, of baptizing some in the name and stead of catechumens dying without baptism. But whether this be the meaning, or whatever else be, doubtless the apostle's argument was good and intelligible to the Corinthians. And his next is as plain to us.

IV. He argues from the absurdity of his own conduct and that of other Christians.

1. It would be a foolish thing for them to run so many hazards (v. 30). Christianity were a foolish profession if it proposed no hopes beyond this life, required men to risk all the blessings and comforts of this life, and to face and endure all the evils of it, without any future prospects. And must he not fix this character on it if he give up his future hopes, and deny the resurrection of the dead? "I die daily," v. 31. He was in continual danger of death, and carried his life, as we say, in his hand. He had encountered very great difficulties and fierce enemies; he had fought with beasts at Ephesus (v. 32), and was in danger of being pulled to pieces by an enraged multitude (Acts xix. 24, &c.). I take it that this fighting with beasts is a figurative expression, that the beasts intended were men of a fierce and ferine disposition. "Now," says he, "what advantage have I from such contests, if the dead rise not? If I am to perish by death, and expect nothing after it, could anything be more weak?" Was Paul so senseless? Could anything but the sure hopes of a better life after death have extinguished the love of life in him to this degree? "What advantageth it me, if the dead rise not?" It is very lawful and fit for a Christian to propose advantage to himself by his fidelity to God. Thus did Paul.

2. It would be a much wiser thing to take the comforts of this life (v. 32). Let us even live like beasts, if we must die like them. This would be a wiser course, if there were no resurrection. If there were no hopes after death, would not every wise man prefer an easy comfortable life, and endeavour to enjoy the comforts of life as fast as possible, because the continuance of it is short? Nothing but the hopes of better things hereafter can enable a man to forgo all the comforts and pleasures here.

V. The apostle closes his argument with a caution, exhortation, and reproof. 1. A caution against men of loose lives and principles, v. 33. Possibly, some of those who said that there was no resurrection of the dead were men of loose lives, and had that speech often in their mouths Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. He now warns the Corinthians how dangerous such men's conversation must prove They would probably be corrupted by them, and fall in with their course of life Those who would keep their innocence must keep good company Error and vice are infectious. 2. Here is an exhortation to break off their sins, and lead a more holy and righteous life (v. 34): "Rouse yourselves, break off your sins. Do not, by sloth and stupidity, be led away into such conversation as will sap your Christian hopes." The disbelief of a future state destroys all virtue and piety. If there will be a resurrection and a future life, we should live and act as those who believe it. 3. Here is a reproof to some at least among them. It is a shame in Christians not to have the knowledge of God. Those who profess this religion reproach themselves, by remaining without the knowledge of God; for it must be owing to their own sloth. It must be ignorance of God that leads men into the disbelief of a resurrection and future life. Those who know God know that he is not unfaithful nor unkind, to forget their labour and patience, their faithful services and cheerful sufferings, or let their labour be in vain. Those who own a God and observe how unequal the distributions of the present life are, and how frequently the best men fare worst, can hardly doubt an after state, where everything will be set to rights.

Verses 35–50

A plausible objection against doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, v. 35. The objection is plainly twofold. How are they raised up? that is, "By what means? What power is equal to this effect?" The other part of the objection is about the quality of their bodies: "With what body will they come?" The former objection is that of those who opposed the doctrine, the latter the enquiry of curious doubters.

I. To the former the apostle replies by telling them this was to be brought about by divine power, that very power which they had all observed to do something very like it, year after year, in the death and revival of the corn, v. 36. It not only sprouts after it is dead, but it must die that it may live. It is a foolish thing to question the divine power to raise the dead, when we see it every day quickening and reviving things that are dead.

II. But he is longer in replying to the second enquiry.

1. There is a change made in the grain that is sown. God gives it such a body as he will. Every seed sown has its proper body. It is certain the grain undergoes a great change, so will the dead, when they rise again.

2. There is a great deal of variety among other bodies. (1) In bodies of flesh (v. 39). (2) In bodies celestial and terrestrial there is also a difference. (3) There is a variety of glory among heavenly bodies themselves, v. 41. The bodies of the dead, when they rise, will be so far changed that there will be a variety of glories. It must be as easy to divine power to raise the dead, as out of the same materials to form so many different kinds of flesh and plants, and celestial bodies as well as terrestrial ones. And can he, out of the same materials, form such various beings, and yet not be able to raise the dead?

3. So also, says he, is the resurrection of the dead. Burying the dead is like sowing them; it is like committing the seed to the earth, that it may spring out of it again. When we rise, they will be out of the power of the grave, and never more be liable to corruption. Ours is at present a vile body, Phil. iii. 21. But at the resurrection it will be made like the glorious body of our Saviour, and shine out with a splendour resembling his. It is laid in the earth, a poor helpless thing, wholly in the power of death. But when we arise our bodies will have heavenly life and vigour infused into them. When we rise our body will rise spiritual. We shall at the resurrection have bodies made fit to be perpetual associates of spirits made perfect. And why should it not be in the power of God to raise incorruptible spiritual bodies as first to make matter out of nothing, and then produce such variety of beings, both in earth and heaven? To God all things are possible.

4. He illustrates this by a comparison of the first and second Adam. (1) As we have our natural body, from the first Adam, we expect our spiritual body from the second. (2) The first Adam was made a living soul, such a being as ourselves. The second Adam is a quickening Spirit; he is the resurrection and the life. If the first Adam could communicate to us natural and animal bodies, cannot the second Adam make our bodies spiritual ones? (3) We must first have natural bodies from the first Adam before we can have spiritual bodies from the second (v. 49). It is as certain that we shall have spiritual bodies as it is now that we have natural or animal ones. We are as certainly intended to bear the one as we have borne the other.

5. The reason of this change (v. 50). Corruption cannot inherit incorruption. The bodies of the saints, when they shall rise again, will be greatly changed from what they are now, and much for the better. They are now corruptible; they will be then incorruptible, glorious, and spiritual bodies, fitted to the celestial world, where they are ever afterwards to have their eternal inheritance.

Verses 51–57

I. He here tells them that all the saints would not die, but all would be changed. It will not be without changing from corruption to incorruption, v. 52. Changed they must be as well as the dead, because flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God. The apostle here makes known a truth unknown before, which is that the saints living at our Lord's second coming will not die, but be changed, that this change will be made in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and at the sound of the last trump. At this summons the graves shall open, the dead saints shall rise incorruptible, and the living saints be changed to the same incorruptible state, v. 52.

II. The reason of this change (v. 53). This corruptible body must be made incorruptible, this mortal body must be changed into immortal. What is sown must be quickened.

III. What will follow upon this change of the living and dead in Christ: Then shall be brought to pass that saying, Death is swallowed up in victory. Christ hinders it from swallowing his saints when they die; but, when they rise again, death shall be swallowed for ever.

1. They will glory over death as a vanquished enemy: "O death! where is thy sting? We fear no further mischiefs from thee, but defy thy power. O grave! where is thy victory? Once we were thy prisoners, but the prison-doors are burst open, and we are for ever released. Captivity is taken captive. Thy triumphs, grave, are at an end."

2. The foundation for this triumph, (1) Whence death had its power to hurt: The sting of death is sin. This gives venom to his dart. Sin is the parent of death, and gives it all its hurtful power. It is its cursed progeny and offspring. (2) The victory saints obtain over it through Jesus Christ, v. 56. The sting of death is sin; but Christ, by dying, has taken out this sting. It may hiss therefore, but it cannot hurt. The strength of sin is the law; but the curse of the law is removed by our Redeemer's becoming a curse for us, so that sin is deprived of its strength and sting, through Christ. There is a day coming when the grave shall open, the dead saints revive, and become immortal, and put out of the reach of death for ever. They often rejoice beforehand, in the hope of this victory; and, when they arise glorious from the grave, they will boldly triumph over death. It is altogether owing to the grace of God in Christ that sin is pardoned and death disarmed. This triumph of the saints over death should issue in thanksgiving to God: Thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through Christ Jesus, our Lord (v. 57). Then only do we enjoy our blessings and honours when God has his revenue of glory out of it. And this really improves and exalts our satisfaction. We are conscious at once of having done our duty and enjoyed our pleasure. Those who remain under the power of death can have no heart to praise; but such conquests and triumphs will certainly tune the tongues of the saints to thankfulness and praise. With what acclamations will saints rising from the dead applaud him! Thanks be to God will be the burden of their song; and angels will join the chorus, and declare their consent with a loud Amen, Hallelujah.

I. An exhortation, and this threefold: 1. That they should be steadfast, fixed in the faith of the gospel. "Do not let your belief of these truths be shaken. They are most certain, and of the last importance." Christians should be steadfast believers of this great article of the resurrection of the dead. A disbelief of a future life will open a way to all manner of licentiousness. It will be easy and natural to infer hence that we may live like beasts, and eat and drink, for tomorrow we die. 2. He exhorts them to be immovable in their expectation of being raised incorruptible and immortal. Christians should not be moved away from this hope of the gospel (Col. i. 23). This hope should be an anchor to their souls, firm and sure, Heb. vi. 19, 3. He exhorts them to abound in the work of the Lord, and that always. What vigour and resolution, what constancy and patience, should those hopes inspire!

II. They have the best grounds in the world to build upon. As surely as Christ is risen, they shall rise. The labour of Christians will not be lost labour; they may lose for God, but they will lose nothing by him. He will never be found unjust to forget their labour of love. Nay, he will do exceedingly abundantly above what they can now ask or think. Those who serve God have good wages; they cannot do too much nor suffer too much for so good a Master. If they serve him now, they shall see him hereafter; they shall rise again from the dead, be crowned with glory, honour, and immortality, and inherit eternal life.

CHAP. XVI

I. The apostle gives directions about some charitable collection to be made for the churches in Judæa, ver. 1-4. II He talks of paying them a visit, ver. 5-9. III. He recommends Timothy to them, and tells them Apollos intended to come to them, ver. 10-12. IV. He presses them to watchfulness, constancy, charity, and to pay a due regard to all his fellow labourers, ver. 13-19. V. After salutations from others, and his own, he closes the epistle, ver. 20, to the end.

Verses 1–4

In this chapter Paul closes this long epistle. He begins with directing them about a charitable collection on a particular occasion, the distresses and poverty of Christians in Judæa.

I. How he introduces his direction. He had given similar orders to the churches of Galatia, v. 1. He desired them only to conform to the same rules which he had given to other churches on a similar occasion. He also prudently mentions these orders of his to the churches of Galatia, to excite emulation, and stir them up to be liberal. Those who exceeded most churches in spiritual gifts, surely would not suffer themselves to come behind any in their bounty to their afflicted brethren. It is becoming a Christian not to bear to be outdone by a fellow-christian in anything virtuous and praise-worthy, provided this consideration only makes him exert himself, not envy others. The church of Corinth should not be outdone in this service of love by the churches of Galatia.

II. The direction itself.

1. The manner in which the collection was to be made: Everyone was to lay by in store (v. 2). He should lay by as he could spare from time to time. It is a good thing to lay up in store for good uses. The best way in the world for them to get a treasury for this purpose is to lay by from time to time, as they can afford. "Every little," as the proverb says, "would make a mickle." We may cheerfully give when we know that we can spare, and that we have been laying by in store that we may.

2. The measure in which they are to lay by: As God hath prospered them. All our business and labour are that to us which God is pleased to make them. It is not the diligent hand that will make rich by itself, without the divine blessing. It is his bounty and blessing to which we owe all we have. And what argument more proper to excite us to charity to the people of God than to consider all we have as his gift? When his bounty flows forth upon us we should not confine it to ourselves, but let it stream out to others. The more good we receive from God the more we should do good to others. They were to lay by as God had blessed them. God expects that our beneficence to others should hold some proportion to his bounty to us. The greater ability he gives, the more enlarged should our hearts be, and the more open our hands; but, where the ability is less, the hands cannot be as open, however willing the mind and however large the heart; nor does God expect it.

3. The time when this is to be done: The first day of the week, the Lord's day. It is a day of holy rest; and the more vacation the mind has from worldly cares and toils the more disposition has it to show mercy: and the other duties of the day should stir us up to the performance of this; works of charity should always accompany works of piety. Works of mercy are the genuine fruits of true love to God, and therefore are a proper service on his own day.

4. The apostle would have everything ready against his coming. As to the disposal of it, he would leave it much to themselves. Paul no more pretended to lord it over the purses of his hearers than over their faith; he would not meddle with their contributions without their consent. They should give letters of credence, and send messengers of their own with their liberality, v. 3. This would be a proper testimony of their respect and brotherly love to their distressed brethren. It would argue that they were very hearty in this service, when they should send some of their own body on so long and hazardous a journey to convey their liberality. We should not only charitably relieve our poor fellow-christians but do it in such a way as will best signify our compassion to them. He offers to go with their messengers, if they think proper, v. 4. Ministers are doing their proper business when they are promoting or helping in works of charity.

Verses 5–9

The apostle notifies his purpose of visiting them. 1. His purpose: he intended to pass out of Asia, and to go through Macedonia, and to stay some time with them, and perhaps the winter, v. 5, 6. He had long laboured in this church, and done much good among them. The heart of a truly Christian minister must be much towards that people among whom he has long laboured, and with remarkable success. Though some among this people made a faction against him, doubtless there were many who loved him tenderly. And is it any wonder that he should be willing to visit them, and stay with them? It is plain that he hoped for some good effect, because he says he intended to stay, that they might bring him on his journey whithersoever he went (v. 6); not that they might accompany him a little way on the road, but help and encourage him to it, and provide him for it. His stay among them, he hoped, would cure their factious humour. 2. His excuse for not seeing them now (v. 7). He would not see them because he could not stay with them. Such a visit would give neither him nor them any satisfaction. He loved them so much that he longed for an opportunity to take up his abode among them for some length of time. This would be more pleasing to himself, and more serviceable to them, than a cursory visit in his way. 3. We have the limitation of this purpose: I trust to tarry awhile with you, if the Lord permit, v. 7. Concerning all our purposes it is fit we should say, "We will execute them if the Lord permit." It is not in us to effect our own designs, without the divine leave. It is by God's power and permission. 4. We have his purpose expressed of staying at Ephesus for the present. He says he would stay there till pentecost, v. 8. It is very probably that at the time of writing this epistle he was in Ephesus, from this passage, compared with v. 19, where he says, The churches of Asia salute you. 5. We have the reason given for his staying at Ephesus for the present, v. 9. God gave him great success among them. For this reason he determined to stay awhile at Ephesus. Success, and a fair prospect of more, was a just reason to determine an apostle to stay and labour in a particular place. And there were many adversaries. Great success in the work of the gospel commonly creates many enemies. The devil opposes those most who most heartily set themselves to destroy his kingdom. There were many adversaries; and therefore the apostle determined to stay. True courage is whetted by opposition. The opposition of adversaries only animated his zeal. Adversaries and opposition do not break the spirits of faithful ministers, but only enkindle their zeal. To labour in vain is heartless and discouraging. This damps the spirits, and breaks the heart. But success will give life and vigour to a minister. It is not the opposition of enemies, but the hardness of his hearers, and the backslidings of professors, that damp a faithful minister, and break his heart.

Verses 10–12

I. He recommends Timothy to them, v. 10. Timothy was sent by the apostle to correct the abuses which had crept in among them; and not only to direct, but to reprove, those who were culpable. No doubt the mutual strife and hatred ran very high among them. Proud spirits cannot easily bear reproof. It was reasonable therefore to think young Timothy might be roughly used. It was their duty to behave themselves well towards him, and not dishearten him in his Lord's work. They should not fly out into resentment at his reproof. He warns them against despising him, v. 11. He was but a young man, and his own youthful face and years commanded but little reverence. Pride was a reigning sin among the Corinthians, and such a caution was but too necessary. Christians should be very careful not to pour contempt on any, but especially on ministers. He tells them they should use him well while he was with them; and they should send him away in friendship, and well prepared for his journey back again to Paul. This is the meaning of bringing him on his journey in peace, v. 11.

II. The reasons why they should behave thus towards Timothy. He was employed in the same work as Paul, and acted in it by the same authority, v. 10. He did not come on Paul's errand among them, nor to do his work, but the work of the Lord. Those who work the work of the Lord should be treated with all tenderness and respect. Pastors and teachers, as well as apostles and evangelists, are to be treated with honour and respect. As they were to esteem him for his work's sake, so also for Paul's sake, who had sent him to Corinth (v. 11). "I am expecting his return and shall judge by your conduct towards him what your regard and respect for me will be." They would hardly dare to send back Timothy with a report that would grieve or provoke the apostle.

III. He informs them of Apollos's purpose to see them. He himself had greatly desired him to come to them, v. 12. Though one party among them had declared for Apollos against Paul, yet Paul did not hinder Apollos from going to Corinth in his own absence. Faithful ministers are not apt to entertain jealousies of each other. True charity and brotherly love think no evil. Apollos could not be prevailed on for the present to come. He would not go to be set at the head of a party. When this had subsided he might conclude a visit would be more proper. Apostles did not vie with each other, but consulted each other's comfort and usefulness. Apollos shows his respect to Paul by declining the journey till the Corinthians were in better temper.

Verses 13–18

I. Some general advices. They should watch (v. 13). The Corinthians were in manifest danger upon many accounts: their feuds ran high, the irregularities among them were very great, there were deceivers among them. In such dangerous circumstances it was their concern to watch. If a Christian would be secure, he must be on his guard. He advises them to stand fast in the faith. A Christian should be fixed in the faith of the gospel. It is by this faith alone that he will be able to keep his ground in an hour of temptation; it is by this that we must overcome the world (1 John v. 4), both when it fawns and when it frowns. He advises them to act like men and be strong. "Show yourselves men in Christ, by your steadiness, by your sound judgment and firm resolution." Christians should be manly and firm in defending their faith. He advises them to do everything in charity, v. 14. When the apostle would have us play the man for our faith or religion, he puts in a caution against playing the devil for it. Christians should be careful that charity not only reign in their hearts, but shine out in their lives. Christianity never appears to so much advantage as when the charity of Christians is most conspicuous, when they can bear with their mistaken brethren, and oppose the open enemies of their holy faith in love.

II. Particular directions how they should behave towards some that had been eminently serviceable among them.

1. He gives us their character. (1) The household of Stephanas is mentioned by him. They were the first-fruits of Achaia. It is an honourable character to any man to be early a Christian, betimes in Christ. But they had moreover addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints, to serve the saints. It is not meant of the ministry of the word properly, but of serving them in other respects, and assisting them upon all occasions. (2) He mentions Stephanas, and Fortunatus, and Achaicus, as coming to him from the church of Corinth. They supplied the deficiencies of the church towards him, and by so doing refreshed his spirit and theirs, v. 17, 18. They gave him a more perfect account of the state of the church by word of mouth than he could acquire by their letter. Report had made their cause much worse than it was in fact; but he had been made more easy by converse with them. They came to him as peace-makers. It is a great refreshment to the spirit of a faithful minister to hear better of a people by wise and good men of their own body than by common report. It is a grief to him to hear ill of those he loves; it gladdens his heart to hear the report thereof is false.

2. He directs how they should behave towards them. He would have them acknowledged (v. 11), that is, owned and respected. They deserve it for their good offices. Those who discover so good a spirit cannot easily be over-valued, v. 16. They were persons to whom they owed peculiar respect, and whom they should have in veneration.

The apostle closes his epistle,

I. With salutations to the church of Corinth, first from those of Asia, from Priscilla and Aquila (who seem to have been at this time inhabitants of Ephesus), with the church in their house (v. 19), and from all the brethren (v. 20) at Ephesus. Paul could find room in an epistle treating of very important matters to send the salutations of friends. Religion should promote a courteous and obliging temper towards all. Those misrepresent and reproach it who would take any encouragement from it to be sour and morose. Some of these salute them much in the Lord. Christian salutations are attended with hearty recommendations to the divine grace and blessing. We read also of a church in a private family, v. 19. Every Christian family should in some respects be a Christian church. Wherever two or three are gathered together, and Christ is among them, there is a church. He subjoins, 1. An advice, that they should greet one another with a holy kiss (v. 20), or with sincere goodwill, a tacit reproof of their feuds and factions. The love of the brethren should be a powerful incentive to mutual love. 2. His own salutation: The salutation of me Paul with my own hand, v. 21. At the close it was fit that himself should sign it, that they might know it to be genuine. So he wrote in every epistle which he did not wholly pen, as he did that to the Galatians, Gal. vi. 11.

II. With a very solemn warning to them, v. 22. We sometimes need words of threatening, that we may fear. Holy fear is a very good friend both to holy faith and holy living. 1. The person described, who is liable to this doom: He that loveth not the Lord Jesus Christ. It stands here as a warning to the Corinthians and a rebuke of their criminal behaviour. Professed Christians will, by contempt of Christ, and revolt from him, bring upon themselves the most dreadful destruction. Many who have his name much in their mouths have no true love to him in their hearts. And none love him in truth who do not love his laws and keep his commandments. What, not love the most glorious lover in the world! What had we a power of loving for, if we are unmoved with such love as this, and without affection to such a Saviour? 2. The doom of the person described: "Let him be Anathema, Maran-atha, lie under the heaviest and most dreadful curse." Maran-atha is a Syriac phrase, and signifies The Lord cometh. That very Lord whom they do not love is coming to execute judgment. Those who fall under his condemning sentence must perish. True faith in Christ will evermore be productive of sincere love to him. Those who love him not cannot be believers in him.

III. With his good wishes for them and expressions of goodwill to them. 1. With his good wishes, v. 23. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ comprehends in it all that is good, for time or eternity. We can wish them nothing more, and we should wish them nothing less. The most solemn warnings are the result of the tenderest affection and the greatest goodwill. And therefore it is no wonder that the apostle should close all, 2. With the declaration of his love to them in Christ Jesus, v. 24. He parts with them in love. His heart would be with them, and he would bear them dear affection as long as their hearts were with Christ. We should be cordial lovers of all who are in Christ. Not but we should love all men, but those must have our dearest affection who are dear to Christ, and lovers of him. May our love be with all those who are in Christ Jesus! Amen.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO

THE CORINTHIANS

The apostle had signified his intentions of coming to Corinth, as he passed through Macedonia (ch. xvi. 5), but, being providentially hindered, he writes this second epistle to them. There seem to be these two urgent occasions: 1. The case of the incestuous person. This therefore he gives directions about (ch. ii), and afterwards (ch. vii) he declares the satisfaction he had upon their good behaviour in that affair. 2. There was a contribution now making for the poor saints at Jerusalem, in which he exhorts the Corinthians to join, ch. viii, ix.

Other things very observable in this epistle, I. The account the apostle gives of his labours and success in preaching the gospel in several places, ch. ii. II. The comparison he makes between the Old and New Testament dispensation, ch. iii. III. The manifold sufferings that he and his fellow-labourers met with, ch. iv, v. IV. The caution he gives the Corinthians against mingling with unbelievers, ch. vi. V. The way in which he justifies himself and his apostleship, ch. x–xii, and throughout the whole epistle.

CHAP. I

After the introduction (ver. 1, 2) the apostle begins with the narrative of his troubles and God's goodness by way of thanksgiving to God (ver. 3–6), and for the edification of the Corinthians, ver. 7–11. Then he attests his and his fellow-labourers' integrity (ver. 12–14), and afterwards vindicates himself, ver. 15–24.

Verses 1, 2

I. The inscription. The apostleship itself was ordained by Jesus Christ, according to the will of God; and Paul was called to it by Jesus Christ, according to the will of God. He joins Timotheus with himself in writing this epistle. His dignifying Timothy with the title of brother shows the humility of this great apostle, and his desire to recommend Timothy to the esteem of the Corinthians. The persons to whom this epistle was sent, the church of God at Corinth: and also to all the saints in all Achaia, that is, to all the Christians who lived in the region round about.

II. The salutation. Therein the apostle desires the two great and comprehensive blessings, grace and peace, for those Corinthians. These two benefits are fitly joined together, because there is no good and lasting peace without true grace; and both of them come from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ.

The apostle begins with the narrative of God's goodness to him and his fellow-labourers in their manifold tribulations, which he speaks of by way of thanksgiving to God (v. 3–6).

I. The object of the apostle's thanksgiving, the blessed God. 1. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. In the New Testament God is styled the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, to denote his covenant-relation to the Mediator and his spiritual seed. 2. The Father of mercies. All mercies are from God originally: mercy is his genuine offspring and his delight. 3. The God of all comfort; from him proceedeth the COMFORTER. All our comforts come from God.

II. The reasons of the apostle's thanksgivings.

1. The benefits that he himself and his companions had received from God, v. 4. In the world they had trouble, but in Christ they had peace. Their sufferings called the sufferings of Christ (v. 5), did abound, but their consolation by Christ did abound also. Then we speak best of God and his goodness when we speak from our own experience, and, in telling others, tell God also what he has done for our souls.

2. The advantage which others might receive (v. 4). What favours God bestows on us are intended not only to make us cheerful ourselves, but also that we may be useful to others.

Verses 7–11

The apostle speaks for the encouragement of the Corinthians; and tells them (v. 7) of his steadfast hope that they should receive benefit by the troubles he and his companions had met with. What their sufferings had been (v. 8). It is not certain what particular troubles in Asia are here referred to, for the apostle was in deaths often. This however is evident, that they were great tribulations. They despaired even of life (v. 8). And they were brought to this extremity in order that they should not trust in themselves but in God, v. 9. God often brings his people into great straits, that they may be induced to place their trust and hope in his all-sufficiency. Our extremity is God's opportunity. We may safely trust in God, who raiseth the dead, v. 9. He that can do this can do anything, and is worthy to be trusted in at all times. What the deliverance was that they had obtained. Their hope and trust were not in vain. God had delivered them, and did still deliver them, v. 10. What use they made of this deliverance. Past experiences are great encouragements to faith and hope. We reproach our experiences if we distrust God in future straits, who hath delivered as in former troubles. What was desired of the Corinthians upon this account (v. 11). He desires the help of others' prayers. If we thus help one another by our prayers, we may hope for an occasion of giving thanks by many for answer of prayer.

Verses 12–14

The apostle attests their integrity by the sincerity of their conversation.

I. He appeals to the testimony of conscience with rejoicing (v. 12). The witness appealed to, namely, conscience. This is God's deputy in the soul, and the voice of conscience is the voice of God. They rejoiced in the testimony of conscience. The testimony of conscience for us will be matter of rejoicing at all times and in all conditions. The testimony this witness gave. Conscience witnessed, (1) Concerning their conversation, their constant course of life: by that we may judge of ourselves, and not by this or that single act. (2) Concerning the manner of their conversation; that it was in simplicity and godly sincerity. This blessed apostle was a man of plain dealing; you might know where to have him. He was not a man who seemed to be one thing and was another, but a man of sincerity. (3) Concerning the principle they acted from in all their conversation, and that was not fleshly wisdom, but it was the grace of God.

II. He appeals to the knowledge of the Corinthians with hope and confidence, v. 13, 14. They never found anything in him unbecoming an honest man. This they had acknowledged in part already, and he doubted not but they would still do so to the end. And so there would be mutual rejoicing in one another.

Verses 15-24

The apostle here vindicates himself from the imputation of levity and inconstancy, in that he did not hold his purpose of coming to them at Corinth.

I. He avers the sincerity of his intention (v. 15–17), and he does this in confidence of their good opinion of him. He assured them he was minded to come to them that they might receive a second benefit. He tells them that he had not herein used lightness (v. 17), for his purpose was not according to the flesh. It was for some weighty reasons that he had altered his purpose; with him there was not yea yea, and nay nay, v. 17.

II. He would not have the Corinthians to infer that his gospel was false or uncertain, v. 18, 19. For God is true, and the Son of God, Jesus Christ, is true. Jesus Christ is not yea and nay, but in him was yea (v. 19), nothing but infallible truth. And the promises of God in Christ are not yea and nay, but yea and amen, v. 20. There is an inviolable constancy and certainty in all the parts of the gospel of Christ. The promises of the gospel covenant stand firm and inviolable. Bad men are false; good men are fickle; but God is true, neither fickle nor false. 1. They are the promises of the God of truth (v. 20). 2. They are made in Christ Jesus (v. 20), the Amen, the true and faithful witness. 3. They are confirmed by the Holy Spirit. He is given as an earnest in their hearts, v. 21, 22. An earnest secures the promise, and is part of the payment. And the accomplishment of them shall be to the glory of God (v. 20).

III. The apostle gives a good reason why he did not come to Corinth, v. 23. It was that he might spare them. He knew there were things amiss among them, and such as deserved censure, but was desirous to show tenderness. He assures them that this is the true reason. He adds that he did not pretend to have any dominion over their faith, v. 24. Christ only is the Lord of our faith. He reveals to us what we must believe. Paul, and Apollos, were but ministers by whom they believed (1 Cor. iii. 5), and so the helpers of their joy, even the joy of faith. Our strength and ability are owing to faith, and our comfort and joy must flow from faith.

CHAP. II

The apostle proceeds in the account of the reasons why he did not come to Corinth, ver. 1–4. Then he writes concerning the incestuous person (ver. 5–11), and afterwards informs them of his labours and success in preaching the gospel, ver. 12–17.

Verses 1–4

An account of the reason why he did not come to Corinth. He was unwilling to grieve them, or be grieved by them, v. 1, 2. If he had made them sorry, that would have been a sorrow to himself, for there would have been none to have made him glad. He tells them it was to the same intent that he wrote his former epistle, v. 3, 4. The particular thing referred to was the case of the incestuous person. He assures them that he did not design to grieve them. He wrote to them with much anguish and affliction in his own heart, and with great affection to them.

Verses 5–11

The apostle treats concerning the incestuous person. He tells them that the punishment which had been inflicted upon this offender was sufficient, v. 6. The desired effect was obtained. He therefore directs them, with all speed, to receive him again to their communion, v. 7, 8. He beseeches them to forgive him. They must also confirm their love to him; show that their reproofs proceeded from love to his person, as well as hatred to his sin. He was in danger of being swallowed up with over-much sorrow, v. 7. He was in danger of falling into despair. When sorrow is excessive it does hurt; and even sorrow for sin is too great when it drives men to despair. He would have them comply with his desire to restore him, v. 9. He mentions his readiness to concur with them in this matter, v. 10. And this he would do for their sakes, and for Christ's sake, in conformity to his doctrine and example, which are so full of kindness and tender mercy towards all those who truly repent. Not only was there danger lest Satan should get an advantage against the penitent, by driving him to despair; but against the apostles or ministers of Christ, by representing them as too rigid and severe. Satan is a subtle enemy, and we should not be ignorant of his devices: he is also a watchful adversary, ready to take all advantages against us.

Verses 12–17

The apostle makes a long digression, to give the Corinthians an account of his travels and labours, declaring at the same time how he had no rest in his spirit, when he found not Titus at Troas (v. 13). And we find afterwards (ch. vii. 5–7) that when the apostle had come into Macedonia he was comforted by the coming of Titus.

I. Paul's unwearied labour and diligence in his work, v. 12, 13. He went to Troas from Philippi by sea (Acts xx. 6), and thence he went to Macedonia. He was prevented in his design as to the place of working, yet he was unwearied in his work.

II. His success in his work, v. 12. God made manifest the savour of his knowledge by him in every place where he came. The apostle speaks of this as a matter of thankfulness to God. In ourselves we are weak, and have neither joy nor victory; but in Christ we may rejoice and triumph.

III. The comfort that the apostle found, even when the gospel was not successful to the salvation of some who heard it, v. 15–17.

1. The success is different; for some are saved by it, while others perish under it. (1) Unto some it is a savour of death unto death, as men dislike an ill savour, and therefore they are blinded and hardened by it. They reject the gospel, to their ruin, even to spiritual death. (2) Unto others the gospel is a savour of life unto life. To humble and gracious souls the preaching of the word is most delightful and profitable. As it quickened them at first, when they were dead in trespasses and sins, so it will end in eternal life.

2. The awful impressions this matter made upon the apostle, v. 16. Who is worthy to be employed in such weighty work? Who is able to perform such a difficult work? The work is great and our strength is small; all our sufficiency is of God.

3. The comfort which the apostle had. (1) Because faithful ministers shall be accepted of God, whatever their success be (v. 15), in those who are saved and in those also who perish. Ministers shall be accepted, and recompensed, not according to their success, but according to their fidelity. (2) Because his conscience witnessed to his faithfulness, v. 17. Though many did corrupt the word of God, yet the apostle's conscience witnessed to his fidelity. His aim was to approve himself to God; he therefore spoke and acted always as in the sight of God, and therefore in sincerity.

CHAP. III

The apostle makes an apology for his seeming to commend himself, ver. 1–5. He then draws a comparison between the Old Testament and the New (ver. 6–11), whence he infers what is the duty of gospel ministers, and the advantage of those who live under the gospel, ver. 12, to the end.

Verses 1–5

I. The apostle makes an apology for seeming to commend himself. He neither needed nor desired any verbal commendation to them, nor letters testimonial from them, as some others did, meaning the false apostles or teachers, v. 1. The Corinthians themselves were his real commendation, v. 2. They were written in his heart; known and read of all men.

II. The apostle is careful to ascribe all the praise to God. He says they were the epistle of Christ, v. 3. The apostle and others were but instruments. This epistle was not written with ink, but with the Spirit of the living God; nor was it written in tables of stone, but on the heart, upon the fleshy (not fleshly, as fleshliness denotes sensuality) tables of the heart, that is, upon hearts that are softened by divine grace. He utterly disclaims the taking of any praise to themselves, and ascribes all the glory to God, v. 5. All our sufficiency is of God; to him therefore are owing all the praise and glory of that good which is done. The best are no more than what the grace of God makes them.

Verses 6–11

The apostle makes a comparison between the Old Testament and the New and values himself and his fellow-labourers by this, that they were able ministers of the New Testament, that God had made them so, v. 6.

I. He distinguishes between the letter and the spirit even of the New Testament, v. 6. They were ministers not merely of the letter, but they were ministers of the Spirit also. The letter killeth, but the Spirit of the gospel giveth life eternal.

II. He shows the excellency of the gospel above the law. The Old Testament dispensation was the ministration of death (v. 7), whereas that of the New Testament is the ministration of life. The law was the ministration of condemnation, but the gospel is the ministration of righteousness. This reveals the grace and mercy of God through Jesus Christ, for obtaining the remission of sins and eternal life. The gospel therefore so much exceeds in glory that in a manner it eclipses the glory of the legal dispensation, v. 10. The law is done away, but the gospel does and shall remain, v. 11. That dispensation was only to continue for a time; whereas the gospel shall remain to the end of the world.

I. The duty of the ministers of the gospel to use great clearness of speech. The gospel is a more clear dispensation than the law. Though the Israelites could not look steadfastly to the end of what was commanded, yet we may.

II. The privilege of those who enjoy the gospel, above those who lived under the law. Those who lived under the legal dispensation had their minds blinded (v. 14), and there was a veil upon their hearts, v. 15. There is a time coming when this veil also shall be taken away, and when it (the body of that people) shall turn to the Lord, v. 16. The condition of those who believe the gospel is much more happy. They have liberty (v. 17). They have light; for with open face we behold the glory of the Lord, v. 18. It was the peculiar privilege of Moses for God to converse with him face to face; but now all true Christians see him with open face. This light and liberty are transforming (v. 18), till grace here be consummated in glory for ever.

CHAP. IV

I. Of the constancy of the apostle and his fellow-labourers in their work. II. Of their courage and patience under their sufferings.

Verses 1–7

In this chapter his design is to vindicate their ministry from the accusation of false teachers. He tells them how they believed, and how they showed their value for their office as ministers of the gospel.

I. Their constancy and perseverance in their work are declared (v. 1). And this their steadfastness was owing to the mercy of God. The best men in the world would faint in their work, and under their burdens, if they did not receive mercy from God. Their sincerity in their work is avouched (v. 2). They had no base and wicked designs covered with fair and specious pretences of something that was good. Nor did they in their preaching handle the word of God deceitfully; but they used great plainness of speech. They manifested the truth to every man's conscience, declaring nothing but what in their own conscience they believed to be true. And all this they did as in the sight of God, desirous thus to commend themselves to God, and to the consciences of men.

II. An objection is obviated. "How then does it come to pass, that the gospel is hid, as to some who hear it?" The true reasons of this are, 1. Those are lost souls to whom the gospel is hid, v. 3. 2. The god of this world hath blinded their minds, v. 4. They are under the influence of the devil, who is here called the god of this world, because of the great interest he has in this world. And as he is the prince of darkness, and ruler of the darkness of this world, so he darkens the understandings of men. Christ's design by his gospel is to make a glorious discovery of God to the minds of men. The design of the devil is to keep men in ignorance.

III. A proof of their integrity is given, v. 5. They made it their business to preach Christ and not themselves. But they preached Christ Jesus the Lord, as being Christ's servants. All the lines of Christian doctrine centre in Christ; and in preaching Christ we preach all we should preach. Ministers should not be of proud spirits who are servants to the souls of men: yet, at the same time, they must avoid becoming the servants of the humours or the lusts of men. Why they should preach Christ. For by gospel light we have the knowledge of the glory of God, which shines in the face of Jesus Christ, v. 6. It is a pleasant thing for the eye to behold the sun in the firmament; but it is more pleasant and profitable when the gospel shines in the heart. Why they should not preach themselves: because they were but earthen vessels. The ministers of the gospel are weak and frail creatures; they are mortal, and soon broken in pieces. And God has so ordered it that the weaker the vessels are the stronger his power may appear to be, that the treasure itself should be valued the more.

Verses 8–18

I. How their sufferings, and patience under them, are declared, v. 8–12. "We are troubled on every side, yet not distressed," v. 8. We can see help in God, and help from God. "We are perplexed, yet not in despair (v. 8), knowing that God is able to support us, and to deliver us. We are persecuted; yet not forsaken of God," v. 9. "We are cast down; yet we are not destroyed," v. 9. Still they were preserved, and kept their heads above water. Whatever condition the children of God may be in, in this world they have a "but not" to comfort themselves with. The apostle speaks of their sufferings as a counterpart of the sufferings of Christ, v. 10. Thus did they bear about the dying of the Lord Jesus in their body, that the life of Jesus might also be made manifest, though they were always delivered to death (v. 11), and though death worked in them (v. 12). Death worketh in us; but life in you, v. 12.

II. What it was that kept them from sinking and fainting under their sufferings, v. 13–18.

1. Faith kept them from fainting (v. 13). The grace of faith is a sovereign cordial against fainting-fits in troublous times. As the apostle had David's example to imitate, who said (Ps. cxvi. 10), I have believed, and therefore have I spoken, so he leaves us his example to imitate: We also believe, says he, and therefore speak.

2. Hope of the resurrection kept them from sinking, v. 14. Their hope was firm, being well grounded, that he who raised up Christ the head will also raise up all his members. What reason has a good Christian to fear death, that dies in hope of a joyful resurrection?

3. The consideration of the benefit of the church kept them from fainting, v. 15. We may well afford to bear sufferings patiently when we see others are the better for them.

4. The thoughts of the advantage their souls would reap kept them from fainting, v. 16. It is our happiness if when the body is sick the soul is vigorous. The best of men have need of further renewing of the inward man, even day by day. As in wicked men things grow every day worse and worse, so in godly men they grow better and better.

5. The prospect of eternal life and happiness kept them from fainting. The apostle and his fellow-sufferers saw their afflictions working towards heaven, and that they would end at last (v. 17), whereupon they weighed things aright in the balance of the sanctuary. They found afflictions to be light, and the glory of heaven to be a far more exceeding weight. That which sense was ready to pronounce heavy and long, faith perceived to be light and short, and but for a moment. Their faith enabled them to make this right judgment of things, v. 18. Unseen things are eternal, seen things but temporal. By faith we not only discern these things, and the great difference between them, but by this also we take our aim at unseen things.

CHAP. V

The reasons why they did not faint under their afflictions, namely, their assurance of happiness after death (ver. 1–5). An inference for the comfort of believers (ver. 6–8), and another to quicken them in their duty, ver. 9–11. An apology for seeming to commend himself (ver. 12–15). Two things that are necessary in order to our living to Christ, ver. 16, to the end.

I. He mentions their expectation, and desire, and assurance, of eternal happiness, v. 1–5.

1. The believer's expectation of eternal happiness after death, v. 1. "We know that we have a building of God, we have a firm expectation of the future felicity." (1) What heaven is in the eye and hope of a believer. He looks upon it as a house, or habitation, our Father's house, and our everlasting home. It is a house in the heavens. It is a building of God. It is eternal in the heavens, not like the earthly tabernacles, the poor cottages of clay in which our souls now dwell. (2) When it is expected this happiness shall be enjoyed—so soon as our house of this earthly tabernacle is dissolved. Then comes the house not made with hands. Such as have walked with God here shall dwell with God for ever.

2. The believer's earnest desire after this future blessedness—we groan. (1) A groaning of sorrow under a heavy load, v. 2. We that are in this tabernacle groan, being burdened, v. 4. Believers groan because burdened with a body of sin. (2) There is a groaning of desire after the happiness of another life; and thus believers groan. The believer is willing rather to be absent from the body, that he may be present with the Lord (v. 8), to put off these rags of mortality that he may put on the robes of glory. Gracious souls are not found naked in the other world; no, they are clothed with garments of praise.

3. The believer's assurance of this future blessedness, from the experience of the grace of God, making him meet for this blessedness, v. 5. All who are designed for heaven hereafter are wrought or prepared for heaven while they are here; the stones of that spiritual building above are squared and fashioned here below. No hand less than the hand of God can work us for this thing. The earnest of the Spirit gave them this assurance.

II. An inference for the comfort of believers in their present state in this world, v. 6–8. What their present state is: they are absent from the Lord (v. 6). God is with us here, yet we are not with him as we hope to be: For we walk by faith, not by sight, v. 7. Faith is for this world, and sight is reserved for the other world. How comfortable and courageous we ought to be in the hour of death (v. 6) and again (v. 8). They should be willing rather to die than live, when it is the will of God that they should put off this tabernacle, to close their eyes to all things in this world, and open them in a world of glory. Faith will be turned into sight.

III. An inference to quicken himself and others to duty, v. 9–11. Well-grounded hopes of heaven will be far from giving the least encouragement to sloth, v. 9. We are ambitious. The apostle was thus ambitious to be accepted of him, the Lord (v. 9). It was the summit of ambition. Further quickening motives from the consideration of the judgment to come, v. 10, 11. The certainty of this judgment, for we must appear; the universality of it, for we must all appear; the great Judge before whose judgment-seat we must appear, the Lord Jesus Christ; the recompence to be then received, for things done in the body. The apostle calls this awful judgment the terror of the Lord (v. 11), and was excited to persuade men to repent, and live a holy life, that, when Christ shall appear terribly, they may appear before him comfortably.

I. The apostle makes an apology for seeming to commend himself and his fellow-labourers (v. 13). The true reason was this, to put an argument in their mouths wherewith to answer his accusers.

II. He gives good reasons for their great zeal and diligence. The apostle tells them, 1. It was for the glory of God, and the good of the church, that he was thus zealous and industrious, v. 13. 2. The love of Christ constrained them, v. 14. Love has a constraining virtue to excite ministers and private Christians in their duty. Our love to Christ will have this virtue; and Christ's love to us will have this effect upon us. (1) What we must have continued to be, had not Christ died for us, v. 14. If one died for all, then were all dead; dead in sins and trespasses, spiritually dead. (2) What such should do, for whom Christ died; they should live to him. They should not live to themselves, v. 15. Then do we live as we ought to live when we live to Christ, who died for us.

Verses 16–21

Two things that are necessary in order to our living to Christ: regeneration and reconciliation.

I. Regeneration. 1. Weanedness from the world, v. 16. The love of Christ is in our hearts, and the world is under our feet. Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet, says the apostle, we know him no more. We must live upon his spiritual presence and the comfort it affords. 2. A thorough change of the heart: He is a new creature, v. 17. Some read it, Let him be a new creature, not only that they wear a new livery, but that they have a new heart and new nature. Old things are passed away, and all these things must become new.

II. Reconciliation.

1. An unquestionable privilege, v. 18, 19. Reconciliation supposes a quarrel, or breach of friendship. Yet, behold, there may be a reconciliation. He has reconciled us to himself by Jesus Christ, v. 18. All things relating to our reconciliation by Jesus Christ are of God, who by the mediation of Jesus Christ has reconciled the world to himself. He has appointed the ministry of reconciliation, v. 18. He has appointed the office of the ministry, which is a ministry of reconciliation.

2. Our indispensable duty, v. 20. As God is willing to be reconciled to us, we ought to be reconciled to God. Though God can be no loser by the quarrel, nor gainer by the peace, yet by his ministers he beseeches sinners that they would be reconciled to him. And for our encouragement so to do the apostle subjoins what should be well known by us (v. 21). The purity of the Mediator: He knew no sin. The sacrifice he offered: He was made sin; that is, a sin-offering, a sacrifice for sin. That we might be made the righteousness of God in him. As Christ, who knew no sin of his own, was made sin for us, so we, who have no righteousness of our own, are made the righteousness of God in him.

CHAP. VI

An account of his general errand to all to whom he preached, ver. 1–10. Then he addresses himself particularly to the Corinthians, with great affection, ver. 11–18.

Verses 1–10

An account of the apostle's general errand and exhortation to all to whom he preached.

I. The errand or exhortation itself, v. 1. As it is the duty of the ministers of the gospel to exhort their hearers to accept of grace and mercy, so they are honoured with this high title of co-workers with God. They are workers with God, yet under him. If they be faithful, they may hope to find God working with them, and their labour will be effectual. Observe the way of the gospel: it is not with roughness and severity, but with all mildness and gentleness, to beseech and entreat.

II. The arguments and method which the apostle used.

1. The present time is the only proper season to accept of the grace that is offered: NOW is the accepted time, NOW is the day of salvation, v. 2. The morrow is none of ours: we know not what will be on the morrow.

2. What caution they used not to give offence that might hinder the success of their preaching, v. 3. When others are too apt to take offence, we should be cautious lest we give offence; and ministers especially should be careful.

3. Their constant aim in all things to approve themselves faithful, as became the ministers of God, v. 4. His great desire was to be the servant of God, and to approve himself so. (1) By much patience in afflictions. He was a great sufferer, and met with many afflictions, but he exercised much patience in all, v. 4, 5. Those who would approve themselves to God must approve themselves faithful in trouble as well as in peace, not only in doing the work of God diligently, but also in bearing the will of God patiently. (2) By acting from good principles. What his principles were (v. 6, 7); namely, pureness; and there is no piety without purity. Knowledge was another principle; and zeal without this is but madness. He also acted with long-suffering and kindness, bearing with the hardness of men's hearts, and hard treatment from their hands. He acted under the influence of the Holy Ghost, from the noble principle of unfeigned love, according to the rule of the word of truth, under the power of God, having on the armour of righteousness, which is the best defence against the temptations of prosperity on the right hand, and of adversity on the left. (3) By a due temper and behaviour under all the variety of conditions, v. 8–10. The apostles met with honour and dishonour, good report and evil report. We stand in need of the grace of God to arm us against the temptations of honour on the one hand, so as to bear good report without pride, and of dishonour on the other hand, so as to bear reproaches without recrimination. Some represented them as the best, and others as the worst, of men: by some they were counted deceivers, by others as true. They were slighted by the men of the world as unknown, not worth taking notice of; yet in all the churches of Christ they were well known, and of great account: they were looked upon as dying, "and yet behold, we live." They were chastened, and often fell under the lash of the law, yet not killed: and though it was thought that they were sorrowful, a company of mopish and melancholy men, yet they were always rejoicing in God. They were despised as poor, and yet they made many rich, by preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ. They were thought to have nothing, yet they possessed all things. They had nothing in themselves, but possessed all things in Christ. Such a paradox is a Christian's life.

The apostle cautions them against mingling with unbelievers.

I. The caution is introduced with a profession of the most tender affection to them, v. 11–13. He seemed to want words to express the warm affections he had for these Corinthians. Our mouth is open unto you, and our heart is enlarged unto you. "You are not," says he, "straitened in us; we would gladly do you all the service we can, and if it be otherwise, the fault is in yourselves; it is because you are straitened in yourselves. All we desire as a recompence is only that you would be proportionably affected towards us, as children should love their father."

II. The caution itself, not to mingle with unbelievers, not to be unequally yoked with them, v. 14. It is wrong for good people to join in affinity with the wicked and profane. There is more danger that the bad will damage the good than hope that the good will benefit the bad. We should not yoke ourselves in friendship with wicked men and unbelievers. We should never choose them for our bosom-friends. Much less should we join in religious communion with them. It is a very great absurdity, v. 14, 15. Believers are righteous; but unbelievers are unrighteous. Believers are made light in the Lord, but unbelievers are in darkness; and what comfortable communion can these have together? Christ and Belial are contrary one to the other. It is a dishonour to the Christian's profession (v. 16); for Christians are the temples of the living God. Now there can be no agreement between the temple of God and idols. There is a great deal of danger in communicating with unbelievers, danger of being defiled and of being rejected; therefore the exhortation is (v. 17) to come out from among them, to be separate, as one would avoid the society of those who have the leprosy or the plague, and not to touch the unclean thing. Who can touch pitch, and not be defiled by it? We must take care not to defile ourselves by converse with those who defile themselves with sin. It is base ingratitude to God for all the favours he has bestowed upon believers and promised to them, v. 18. God has promised to be a Father to them, and that they shall be his sons and his daughters; and is there a greater honour or happiness than this?

CHAP. VII

An exhortation to progressive holiness, ver. 1–4. Then the apostle returns to speak further of the incestuous person, and tells them what comfort he received upon his meeting with Titus (ver. 5–7), and how he rejoiced in their repentance, ver. 8–11. He concludes with endeavouring to comfort the Corinthians, ver. 12–16.

These verses contain a double exhortation:

I. To make a progress in holiness, v. 1. 1. The dying unto sin. We must cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit. There are sins of the flesh, that are committed with the body, and sins of the spirit; and we must cleanse ourselves from the filthiness of both. 2. The living unto righteousness and holiness. We must be still perfecting holiness, and not be contented with sincerity (which is our gospel perfection), without aiming at sinless perfection. This we must do in the fear of God; there is no holiness without it.

II. To show a due regard to the ministers of the gospel: Receive us, v. 2. If the ministers of the gospel are thought contemptible because of their office, there is danger lest the gospel itself be contemned also. He had done nothing to forfeit their esteem (v. 2). He did not herein reflect upon them for want of affection to him, v. 3. He assures them again of his great affection to them, insomuch that he could spend his last breath at Corinth, and live and die with them. It was his great affection to them that made him use such boldness of speech towards them, and caused him to glory, or make his boast of them.

I. How he was distressed, v. 5. He was troubled when he did not meet with Titus at Troas, and afterwards when for some time he did not meet with him in Macedonia. There were fightings without and there were fears within.

II. How he was comforted, v. 6, 7. The very coming of Titus was some comfort to him. The good news which Titus brought concerning the Corinthians was matter of greater consolation. He found Titus to be comforted in them; and this filled the apostle with comfort. He ascribes all his comfort to God as the author. It was God who comforted him by the coming of Titus, v. 6.

III. How greatly he rejoiced at their repentance. The apostle was sorry that it was needful he should make those sorry whom he would rather have made glad, v. 8. But now he rejoiced, when he found they had sorrowed to repentance, v. 9. The effect of it (repentance unto salvation, v. 10), made him rejoice.

1. The antecedent of true repentance is godly sorrow. It was a godly sorrow, because a sorrow for sin. Godly sorrow will end in salvation; but worldly sorrow worketh death. The sorrows of worldly men for worldly things will bring down grey hairs the sooner to the grave. Humiliation and godly sorrow are previously necessary in order to repentance, and both of them are from God, the giver of all grace.

2. The happy fruits and consequences of true repentance are mentioned (v. 11). Where the heart is changed, the life and actions will be changed too. It wrought indignation at sin; it wrought fear, a fear of reverence, an awful fear of God, a cautious fear of sin, and a jealous fear of themselves. It wrought vehement desires after a thorough reformation of what had been amiss. It wrought zeal, a mixture of love and anger, a zeal for duty, and against sin. And thus in all things had they approved themselves to be clear in that matter. They were penitent, and therefore clear of guilt before God, who would pardon and not punish them.

Verses 12–16

The apostle endeavours to comfort the Corinthians. He had a good design in his former epistle, which might be thought severe, v. 12. It was not chiefly for his cause that did the wrong, nor was it merely for his cause that suffered wrong, but it was also to manifest his sincere concern and care for them. Titus was rejoiced, and his spirit refreshed, with their comfort, and this comforted and rejoiced the apostle also (v. 13); and, as Titus was comforted while he was with them, so when he remembered his reception among them, the thought of these things increased his affections to them, v. 15. Great comfort and joy follow upon godly sorrow. Paul was glad, and Titus was glad, and the Corinthians were comforted. Well may all this joy be on earth, when there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth. He was not ashamed of his boasting concerning them to Titus (v. 14); for he was not disappointed in his expectation concerning them, and he could now with great joy declare what confidence he still had in them as to all things.

CHAP. VIII

Paul is exhorting and directing the Corinthians about a particular work of charity—to relieve the necessities of the poor saints at Jerusalem and in Judæa. The apostle stirred them up to contribute liberally for their relief. He acquaints the Corinthians with the good example of the Macedonians. Titus was sent to Corinth to collect their bounty, ver. 1–6. He then proceeds to urge this duty (ver 7–15), and commends the persons who were employed in this affair, ver. 16–24.

Verses 1–6

I. The apostle takes occasion from the good example of the churches of Macedonia to exhort the Corinthians to the good work of charity.

1. He acquaints them with their great liberality, v. 1. It is great grace and favour from God, if we are made useful to others.

2. He commends the charity of the Macedonians. They were themselves in distress, yet they contributed to the relief of others, v. 2. As they had abundance of joy in the midst of tribulation, they abounded in their liberality; they gave out of a little, trusting in God to provide for them. They gave very largely, with the riches of liberality (v. 2); it was according to, yea beyond, their power (v. 3), as much as could well be expected from them, if not more. They were willing of themselves (v. 3), and were so far from needing that Paul should urge and press them that they prayed him with much entreaty to receive the gift, v. 4. Their charity was founded in true piety (v. 5). They solemnly made a fresh surrender of themselves, and all they had, unto the Lord Jesus Christ, sanctifying their contributions to God's honour, by first giving themselves to the Lord. We should give ourselves to God; we cannot bestow ourselves better. What we give or bestow for charitable uses will not be accepted of God, unless we first give ourselves to the Lord.

II. The apostle tells them that Titus was desired to go and make a collection among them (v. 6). Titus had already begun this work among them, therefore he was desired to finish it. When so good a work had already prospered in so good a hand, it would be a pity if it should not proceed and be finished. The work of charity will often succeed the best when the most proper persons are employed to solicit contributions and dispose of them.

world is under our feet. Yea, though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet, says the apostle, we know him no more. We must live upon his spiritual presence and the comfort it affords. 2. A thorough change of the heart: He is a new creature, v. 17. Some read it, Let him be a new creature, not only that they wear a new livery, but that they have a new heart and new nature. Old things are passed away, and all these things must become new.

II. Reconciliation.

1. An unquestionable privilege, v. 18, 19. Reconciliation supposes a quarrel, or breach of friendship. Yet, behold, there may be a reconciliation. He has appointed the ministry of reconciliation, v. 18. He has appointed the office of the ministry, which is a ministry of reconciliation.

2. Our indispensable duty, v. 20. As God is willing to be reconciled to us, we ought to be reconciled to God. Though God can be no loser by the quarrel, nor gainer by the peace, yet by his ministers he beseeches sinners that they would be reconciled to him. And for our encouragement so to do the apostle subjoins what should be well known by us (v. 21). The purity of the Mediator: He knew no sin. The sacrifice he offered: He was made sin; that is, a sin-offering, a sacrifice for sin. That we might be made the righteousness of God in him. As Christ, who knew no sin of his own, was made sin for us, so we, who have no righteousness of our own, are made the righteousness of God in him.

CHAP. VI

An account of his general errand to all to whom he preached, ver. 1–10. Then he addresses himself particularly to the Corinthians, with great affection, ver. 11–18.

Verses 1–10

An account of the apostle's general errand and exhortation to all to whom he preached.

(2) By acting from good principles. What his principles were (v. 6, 7); namely, pureness; and there is no piety without purity. Knowledge was another principle; and zeal without this is but madness. He also acted with long-suffering and kindness, bearing with the hardness of men's hearts, and hard treatment from their hands. He acted under the influence of the Holy Ghost, from the noble principle of unfeigned love, according to the rule of the word of truth, under the power of God, having on the armour of righteousness, which is the best defence against the temptations of prosperity on the right hand, and of adversity on the left. (3) By a due temper and behaviour under all the variety of conditions, v. 8–10. The apostles met with honour and dishonour, good report and evil report. We stand in need of the grace of God to arm us against the temptations of honour on the one hand, so as to bear good report without pride, and of dishonour on the other hand, so as to bear reproaches without recrimination. Some represented them as the best, and others as the worst, of men: by some they were counted deceivers, by others as true. They were slighted by the men of the world as unknown, not worth taking notice of; yet in all the churches of Christ they were well known, and of great account: they were looked upon as dying, "and yet behold, we live." They were chastened, and often fell under the lash of the law, yet not killed: and though it was thought that they were sorrowful, a company of mopish and melancholy men, yet they were always rejoicing in God. They were despised as poor, and yet they made many rich, by preaching the unsearchable riches of Christ. They were thought to have nothing, yet they possessed all things. They had nothing in themselves, but possessed all things in Christ. Such a paradox is a Christian's life.

Verses 11–18

The apostle cautions them against mingling with unbelievers.

I. The caution is introduced with a profession of the most tender affection to them, v. 11–13. He seemed to want words to express the warm affections he had for these Corinthians. Our mouth is open unto you, and our heart is enlarged unto you. "You are not," says he, "straitened in us; we would gladly do you all the service we can, and if it be otherwise, the fault is in yourselves; it is because you are straitened in yourselves. All we desire as a recompence is only that you would be proportionably affected towards us, as children should love their father."

II. The caution itself, not to mingle with unbelievers, not to be unequally yoked with them, v. 14. It is wrong for good people to join in affinity with the wicked and profane. There is more danger that the bad will damage the good than hope that the good will benefit the bad. We should not yoke ourselves in friendship with wicked men and unbelievers. We should never choose them for our bosom-friends. Much less should we join in religious communion with them. It is a very great absurdity, v. 14, 15. Believers are righteous; but unbelievers are unrighteous. Believers are made light in the Lord, but unbelievers are in darkness; and what comfortable communion can these have together? Christ and Belial are contrary one to the other. It is a dishonour to the Christian's profession (v. 16); for Christians are the temples of the living God. Now there can be no agreement between the temple of God and idols. There is a great deal of danger in communicating with unbelievers, danger of being defiled and of being rejected; therefore the exhortation is (v. 17) to come out from among them, to be separate, as one would avoid the society of those who have the leprosy or the plague, and not to touch the unclean thing. Who can touch pitch, and not be defiled by it? We must take care not to defile ourselves by converse with those who defile themselves with sin. It is base ingratitude to God for all the favours he has bestowed upon believers and promised to them, v. 18. God has promised to be a Father to them, and that they shall be his sons and his daughters; and is there a greater honour or happiness than this?

CHAP. VII

An exhortation to progressive holiness, ver. 1–4. Then the apostle returns to speak further of the incestuous person, and tells them what comfort he received upon his meeting with Titus (ver. 5–7), and how he rejoiced in their repentance, ver. 8–11. He concludes with endeavouring to comfort the Corinthians, ver. 12–16.

These verses contain a double exhortation:

I. To make a progress in holiness, v. 1. 1. The dying unto sin. We must cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit. There are sins of the flesh, that are committed with the body, and sins of the spirit; and we must cleanse ourselves from the filthiness of both. 2. The living unto righteousness and holiness. We must be still perfecting holiness, and not be contented with sincerity (which is our gospel perfection), without aiming at sinless perfection. This we must do in the fear of God; there is no holiness without it.

II. To show a due regard to the ministers of the gospel: Receive us, v. 2. If the ministers of the gospel are thought contemptible because of their office, there is danger lest the gospel itself be contemned also. He had done nothing to forfeit their esteem (v. 2). He did not herein reflect upon them for want of affection to him, v. 3. He assures them again of his great affection to them, insomuch that he could spend his last breath at Corinth, and live and die with them. It was his great affection to them that made him use such boldness of speech towards them, and caused him to glory, or make his boast of them.

I. How he was distressed, v. 5. He was troubled when he did not meet with Titus at Troas, and afterwards when for some time he did not meet with him in Macedonia. There were fightings without and there were fears within.

II. How he was comforted, v. 6, 7. The very coming of Titus was some comfort to him. The good news which Titus brought concerning the Corinthians was matter of greater consolation. He found Titus to be comforted in them; and this filled the apostle with comfort. He ascribes all his comfort to God as the author. It was God who comforted him by the coming of Titus, v. 6.

III. How greatly he rejoiced at their repentance. The apostle was sorry that it was needful he should make those sorry whom he would rather have made glad, v. 8. But now he rejoiced, when he found they had sorrowed to repentance, v. 9. The effect of it (repentance unto salvation, v. 10), made him rejoice.

1. The antecedent of true repentance is godly sorrow. It was a godly sorrow, because a sorrow for sin. Godly sorrow will end in salvation; but worldly sorrow worketh death. The sorrows of worldly men for worldly things will bring down grey hairs the sooner to the grave. Humiliation and godly sorrow are previously necessary in order to repentance, and both of them are from God, the giver of all grace.

2. The happy fruits and consequences of true repentance are mentioned (v. 11). Where the heart is changed, the life and actions will be changed too. It wrought indignation at sin; it wrought fear, a fear of reverence, an awful fear of God, a cautious fear of sin, and a jealous fear of themselves. It wrought vehement desires after a thorough reformation of what had been amiss. It wrought zeal, a mixture of love and anger, a zeal for duty, and against sin. And thus in all things had they approved themselves to be clear in that matter. They were penitent, and therefore clear of guilt before God, who would pardon and not punish them.

Verses 12–16

The apostle endeavours to comfort the Corinthians. He had a good design in his former epistle, which might be thought severe, v. 12. It was not chiefly for his cause that did the wrong, nor was it merely for his cause that suffered wrong, but it was also to manifest his sincere concern and care for them. Titus was rejoiced, and his spirit refreshed, with their comfort, and this comforted and rejoiced the apostle also (v. 13); and, as Titus was comforted while he was with them, so when he remembered his reception among them, the thought of these things increased his affections to them, v. 15. Great comfort and joy follow upon godly sorrow. Paul was glad, and Titus was glad, and the Corinthians were comforted. Well may all this joy be on earth, when there is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth. He was not ashamed of his boasting concerning them to Titus (v. 14); for he was not disappointed in his expectation concerning them, and he could now with great joy declare what confidence he still had in them as to all things.

CHAP. VIII

Paul is exhorting and directing the Corinthians about a particular work of charity—to relieve the necessities of the poor saints at Jerusalem and in Judæa. The apostle stirred them up to contribute liberally for their relief. He acquaints the Corinthians with the good example of the Macedonians. Titus was sent to Corinth to collect their bounty, ver. 1–6. He then proceeds to urge this duty (ver. 7–15), and commends the persons who were employed in this affair, ver. 16–24.

Verses 1–6

I. The apostle takes occasion from the good example of the churches of Macedonia to exhort the Corinthians to the good work of charity.

1. He acquaints them with their great liberality, v. 1. It is great grace and favour from God, if we are made useful to others.

2. He commends the charity of the Macedonians. They were themselves in distress, yet they contributed to the relief of others, v. 2. As they had abundance of joy in the midst of tribulation, they abounded in their liberality; they gave out of a little, trusting in God to provide for them. They gave very largely, with the riches of liberality (v. 2); it was according to, yea beyond, their power (v. 3), as much as could well be expected from them, if not more. They were willing of themselves (v. 3), and were so far from needing that Paul should urge and press them that they prayed him with much entreaty to receive the gift, v. 4. Their charity was founded in true piety (v. 5). They solemnly made a fresh surrender of themselves, and all they had, unto the Lord Jesus Christ, sanctifying their contributions to God's honour, by first giving themselves to the Lord. We should give ourselves to God; we cannot bestow ourselves better. What we give or bestow for charitable uses will not be accepted of God, unless we first give ourselves to the Lord.

II. The apostle tells them that Titus was desired to go and make a collection among them (v. 6). Titus had already begun this work among them, therefore he was desired to finish it. When so good a work had already prospered in so good a hand, it would be a pity if it should not proceed and be finished. The work of charity will often succeed the best when the most proper persons are employed to solicit contributions and dispose of them.

I. He urges upon them the consideration of their eminence in other gifts and graces, and would have them excel in this of charity also, v. 7. When he would persuade the Corinthians to this good thing, he commends them for other good things. Most people love to be complimented, especially when we ask a gift of them; and it is a justice we owe to those in whom God's grace shines to give them their due commendation. What it was that the Corinthians abounded in. Faith is mentioned first, for that is the root. Those who abound in faith will abound in other graces and good works also. To their faith was added utterance. Many have faith who want utterance. With their utterance there appeared knowledge. They abounded also in all diligence. Those who have great knowledge and ready utterance are not always the most diligent Christians. Great talkers are not always the best doers. And further, they had abundant love to their ministers. Now to all these good things the apostle desires them to add this grace also, to abound in charity to the poor. He takes care to prevent any misapprehensions, and tells them (v. 8) he does not speak by commandment. I give my advice, v. 10. Many a thing which is good for us to do, yet cannot be said to be, by express and indispensable commandment, our duty at this or that time.

II. Another argument is taken from the consideration of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. And you know, saith the apostle, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ (v. 9), that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor; that ye thereby might be made rich, rich in the love of God, rich in the blessings of the new covenant, rich in the hopes of eternal life. We should be charitable to the poor out of what we have, because we ourselves live upon the charity of the Lord Jesus Christ.

III. Another argument is taken from their forwardness to begin this good work. It was expedient for them to finish what they had begun, v. 10, 11. Good purposes, indeed, are good things; they are like buds and blossoms, pleasant to behold, and give hopes of good fruit; but they are lost, and signify nothing, without performances which would be acceptable to God (v. 12). When men purpose that which is good, and endeavour to perform also, God will accept of what they can do, and not reject them for what is not in their power to do. This scripture will by no means justify those who think good meanings are enough.

IV. Another argument is taken from the distribution of the things of this world, and the mutability of human affairs, v. 13–15. Those who have a greater abundance may supply those who are in want, that there may be room for charity. It is the will of God that, by our mutually supplying one another, there should be some sort of equality. All should think themselves concerned to supply those who are in want. This is illustrated by the instance of gathering and distributing manna in the wilderness: he that had gathered much had nothing over.

I. He commends Titus for his earnest care for them. This is mentioned with thankfulness to God (v. 16), and it is cause of thankfulness if God hath put it into the hearts of any to do us or others any good. He commends him for his readiness to this present service, v. 17. Asking charity for the relief of others is looked upon as a thankless office; yet it is a good office.

II. He commends another brother, who was sent with Titus. It is generally thought that this was Luke. He is commended as a man whose praise was in the gospel through all the churches, v. 18. As one chosen of the churches (v. 19). This was done, it is most likely, at the request of Paul himself; that no man might blame him in that abundance which was administered by him (v. 20). He would not give occasion to any to accuse him of partiality, and thought it to be his duty, to provide for things honest, not only in the sight of the Lord, but also in the sight of men. We live in a censorious world, and should cut off occasion from those who seek occasion to speak reproachfully.

III. He commends also another brother. This brother is thought to be Apollos. Whoever he was, he had approved himself diligent in many things; and therefore was fit to be employed in this affair.

IV. He concludes with a general good character of them all (v. 23). Wherefore, he exhorts them to show their liberality that these messengers of the churches, and the churches themselves, might see a full proof of their love, and that it was with good reason the apostle had even boasted on their behalf, v. 24.

CHAP. IX

The apostle seems to excuse his earnestness in pressing the Corinthians to the duty of charity (ver. 1–5), and proceeds to give directions about the acceptable manner of performing it, ver. 6, to the end.

Verses 1–5

I. It was needless to press them with further arguments to afford relief to their poor brethren (v. 1). He knew their forwardness to every good work, and how they had begun this good work a year ago. He had boasted of their zeal to the Macedonians, and this had provoked many of them to do as they had done. As they had begun well, they would go on well.

II. He sends Titus and the other brethren to them, that, having this timely notice, they might be fully ready (v. 3), when he should come to them. When we would have others to do that which is good we must give them time. Another reason was that he might not be ashamed of his boasting concerning them, if they should be found unready, v. 3, 4. Some from Macedonia might haply come with him: and, if the collection should not then be made, this would make him, not to say them, ashamed.

Verses 6–16

I. Proper directions to be observed about the right manner of bestowing charity. It should be bountifully. Men who expect a good return at harvest are not wont to pinch and spare in sowing their seed. It should be deliberately: Every man, according as he purposes in his heart, v. 7. Works of charity, like other good works, should be done with thought and design. It should be freely given: Not grudgingly, nor of necessity, but cheerfully, v. 7. Persons sometimes will give merely to satisfy the importunity of those who ask their charity, and what they give is in a manner squeezed or forced from them, and this unwillingness spoils all they do.

II. Good encouragement to perform this work of charity.

1. They themselves would be no losers by what they gave in charity. What is given to the poor is far from being lost; as the precious seed which is cast into the ground is not lost, for it will spring up, and bear fruit; the sower shall receive it again with increase, v. 6. God loveth a cheerful giver (v. 7). Can a man be a loser by doing that with which God is pleased? God is able to make our charity redound to our advantage, v. 8. We have no reason to distrust the goodness of God; he is able to make all grace abound. The honour of it is lasting, the reward of it eternal. A prayer to God that they might be gainers, and not losers, v. 10, 11. To whom the prayer is made —to God, who ministereth seed to the sower, who giveth such an increase of the fruits of the earth that we have not only bread sufficient to eat for one year, but enough to sow again for a future supply. For what he prayeth. That they may have bread for their food, always a competency for themselves—that God will multiply their seed sown, that they may still be able to do more good—and that there may be an increase of the fruits of righteousness, so as to be enriched in everything to all bountifulness (v. 11). Works of charity are so far from impoverishing us that they are the proper means truly to enrich us, or make us truly rich.

2. While they would be no losers, the poor would be gainers, v. 12.

3. This would redound to the praise and glory of God. All who wished well to the gospel would glorify God for this proof of subjection to the gospel of Christ, and true love to all men, v. 13.

4. Those whose wants were supplied would make the best return they were able, by sending up many prayers to God for those who had relieved them, v. 14. As this is the only recompence the poor can make, so it is often greatly for the advantage of the rich.

Lastly, The apostle concludes this whole matter with this doxology, Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift, v. 15. He means Jesus Christ, who is indeed the unspeakable gift of God unto this world.

CHAP. X

The apostle asserts the power of his preaching, and his power to punish offenders, ver. 1–6, asserting his relation to Christ, and his authority as an apostle of Christ (ver 7–11), and refuses to justify himself, or to act by such rules as the false teachers did, ver. 12, to the end.

Verses 1–6

I. He addresses them in a very mild and humble manner, v. 1. In the midst of the greatest provocations he shows mildness. How humbly also does this great apostle speak of himself, as one in presence base among them! So his enemies spoke of him with contempt. He is desirous that no occasion may be given to use severity, v. 2. He beseeches them to give no occasion for him to be bold, or to exercise his authority against them in general.

II. He asserts the power of his preaching and his power to punish offenders.

1. The power of his preaching, v. 3, 5. The work of the ministry is a warfare, not after the flesh indeed, for it is a spiritual warfare, with spiritual enemies and for spiritual purposes. The doctrines of the gospel are the weapons. Outward force, therefore, is not the method of the gospel, but strong persuasions. People must be persuaded to God and their duty, not driven by force of arms. What opposition is made against the gospel by the powers of sin and Satan in the hearts of men, but these strongholds are pulled down by the gospel, through the grace and power of God.

2. The apostle's power to punish offenders is asserted in v. 6. Though the apostle showed meekness and gentleness, yet he would not betray his authority.

"Do you," says he, "look on things after the outward appearance? (v. 7). Is this a fit rule to make an estimate of things or persons by?" In outward appearance, Paul was mean and despicable with some. But there are often false appearances.

I. His relation to Christ, v. 7. Now the apostle reasons thus with the Corinthians: "Suppose it to be so, allowing what they say to be true, yet they ought also to allow this to us, that we also are Christ's." There is room in Christ for many; and those who differ much from one another may yet be one in him. It would help to heal the differences that are among us if we would remember that those who differ from us may belong to Christ too. We must not think that we are the people, and that none belong to Christ but ourselves. This we may plead for ourselves, against those who judge us and despise us that, how weak soever we are, yet, as they are Christ's, so are we.

II. His authority from Christ as an apostle. The Lord had given it to him, and it was more than his adversaries could justly pretend to. It was certainly what he should not be ashamed of, v. 8. The nature of his authority: it was for edification, and not for destruction. The caution with which he speaks of his authority, professing that his design was not to terrify them with big words, nor by angry letters, v. 9. The apostle declares he did not intend to frighten those who were obedient. He would have his adversaries know this (v. 11), that he would, by the exercise of his apostolical power make it appear to have a real efficacy.

I. The apostle refuses to justify himself as the false apostles did, v. 12. He plainly intimates that they took a wrong method to commend themselves. They were pleased, and did pride themselves, in their own attainments. We should be pleased and thankful for what we have of gifts or graces, but never pride ourselves therein, as if there were none to be compared with us. The apostle would not be of the number of such vain men.

II. He fixes a better rule for his conduct, v. 13. He would not go beyond the line prescribed to him, which the false apostles did, while they boasted of other men's labours.

III. He acted according to this rule, v. 14. He acted according to this rule in preaching at Corinth, for he came thither by divine direction. In boasting of them as his charge, he boasted not of other men's labours, v. 15.

IV. He declares his success in observing this rule. His hope was that their faith was increased, and that others would embrace the gospel also.

V. He seems to check himself as if he had spoken too much in his own praise. He is afraid of boasting, or taking any praise to himself, v. 17. Ministers in particular must be careful not to glory in their performances, but must give God the glory of their work, and the success thereof, v. 18. Of all flattery, self-flattery is the worst. Instead of praising or commending ourselves, we should strive to approve ourselves to God, and his approbation will be our best commendation.

CHAP. XI

The apostle goes on with his discourse, in opposition to the false apostles. I. He apologizes for going about to commend himself, ver. 1–4. II. His equality with the other apostles, and with the false apostles in this particular of preaching the gospel to the Corinthians freely, without wages, ver. 5–15. III. He makes another preface to what he was about further to say in his own justification, ver. 16–21. And, IV. He gives a large account of his labours, and sufferings, in which he exceeded the false apostles, ver. 22, to the end.

Verses 1–4

1. The apology the apostle makes for going about to commend himself, v. 1. As much against the grain as it is with a proud man to acknowledge his infirmities, so much is it against the grain with a humble man to speak in his own praise. 2. The reasons for what the apostle did. To preserve the Corinthians from being corrupted by the insinuations of the false apostles, v. 2, 3. He was jealous over them with godly jealousy. He had espoused them to one husband, and he was desirous to present them as a chaste virgin—pure, and spotless, and faithful, not having their minds corrupted

Verses 7–15

I. He urges upon them the consideration of their eminence in other gifts and graces, and would have them excel in this of charity also, v. 7. When he would persuade the Corinthians to this good thing, he commends them for other good things. Most people love to be complimented, especially when we ask a gift of them; and it is a justice we owe to those in whom God's grace shines to give them their due commendation. Many a thing which is good for us to do, yet cannot be said to be, by express and indispensable commandment, our duty at this or that time.

II. Another argument is taken from the consideration of the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. And you know, saith the apostle, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ (v. 9), that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor; that ye thereby might be made rich, rich in the love of God, rich in the blessings of the new covenant, rich in the hopes of eternal life. To whom the prayer is made —to God, who ministereth seed to the sower, who giveth such an increase of the fruits of the earth that we have not only bread sufficient to eat for one year, but enough to sow again for a future supply. For what he prayeth. That they may have bread for their food, always a competency for themselves—that God will multiply their seed sown, that they may still be able to do more good—and that there may be an increase of the fruits of righteousness, so as to be enriched in everything to all bountifulness (v. 11). Works of charity are so far from impoverishing us that they are the proper means truly to enrich us, or make us truly rich.

2. While they would be no losers, the poor would be gainers, v. 12.

3. This would redound to the praise and glory of God. All who wished well to the gospel would glorify God for this proof of subjection to the gospel of Christ, and true love to all men, v. 13.

4. Those whose wants were supplied would make the best return they were able, by sending up many prayers to God for those who had relieved them, v. 14. As this is the only recompence the poor can make, so it is often greatly for the advantage of the rich.

Lastly, The apostle concludes this whole matter with this doxology, Thanks be to God for his unspeakable gift, v. 15. He means Jesus Christ, who is indeed the unspeakable gift of God unto this world.

CHAP. X

The apostle asserts the power of his preaching, and his power to punish offenders, ver. 1–6, asserting his relation to Christ, and his authority as an apostle of Christ (ver. 7–11), and refuses to justify himself, or to act by such rules as the false teachers did, ver. 12, to the end.

Verses 1–6

I. He addresses them in a very mild and humble manner, v. 1. In the midst of the greatest provocations he shows mildness. How humbly also does this great apostle speak of himself, as one in presence base among them! So his enemies spoke of him with contempt. He is desirous that no occasion may be given to use severity, v. 2. He beseeches them to give no occasion for him to be bold, or to exercise his authority against them in general.

II. He asserts the power of his preaching and his power to punish offenders.

1. The power of his preaching, v. 3, 5. The work of the ministry is a warfare, not after the flesh indeed, for it is a spiritual warfare, with spiritual enemies and for spiritual purposes. The doctrines of the gospel are the weapons. Outward force, therefore, is not the method of the gospel, but strong persuasions. People must be persuaded to God and their duty, not driven by force of arms. What opposition is made against the gospel by the powers of sin and Satan in the hearts of men, but these strongholds are pulled down by the gospel, through the grace and power of God.

2. The apostle's power to punish offenders is asserted in v. 6. Though the apostle showed meekness and gentleness, yet he would not betray his authority.

"Do you," says he, "look on things after the outward appearance? (v. 7). Is this a fit rule to make an estimate of things or persons by?" In outward appearance, Paul was mean and despicable with some. But there are often false appearances.

I. His relation to Christ, v. 7. Now the apostle reasons thus with the Corinthians: "Suppose it to be so, allowing what they say to be true, yet they ought also to allow this to us, that we also are Christ's." There is room in Christ for many; and those who differ much from one another may yet be one in him. It would help to heal the differences that are among us if we would remember that those who differ from us may belong to Christ too. We must not think that we are the people, and that none belong to Christ but ourselves. This we may plead for ourselves, against those who judge us and despise us that, how weak soever we are, yet, as they are Christ's, so are we.

II. His authority from Christ as an apostle. The Lord had given it to him, and it was more than his adversaries could justly pretend to. It was certainly what he should not be ashamed of, v. 8. The nature of his authority: it was for edification, and not for destruction. The caution with which he speaks of his authority, professing that his design was not to terrify them with big words, nor by angry letters, v. 9. The apostle declares he did not intend to frighten those who were obedient. He would have his adversaries know this (v. 11), that he would, by the exercise of his apostolical power make it appear to have a real efficacy.

I. The apostle refuses to justify himself as the false apostles did, v. 12. He plainly intimates that they took a wrong method to commend themselves. They were pleased, and did pride themselves, in their own attainments. We should be pleased and thankful for what we have of gifts or graces, but never pride ourselves therein, as if there were none to be compared with us. The apostle would not be of the number of such vain men.

II. He fixes a better rule for his conduct, v. 13. He would not go beyond the line prescribed to him, which the false apostles did, while they boasted of other men's labours.

III. He acted according to this rule, v. 14. He acted according to this rule in preaching at Corinth, for he came thither by divine direction. In boasting of them as his charge, he boasted not of other men's labours, v. 15.

IV. He declares his success in observing this rule. His hope was that their faith was increased, and that others would embrace the gospel also.

V. He seems to check himself as if he had spoken too much in his own praise. He is afraid of boasting, or taking any praise to himself, v. 17. Ministers in particular must be careful not to glory in their performances, but must give God the glory of their work, and the success thereof, v. 18. Of all flattery, self-flattery is the worst. Instead of praising or commending ourselves, we should strive to approve ourselves to God, and his approbation will be our best commendation.

CHAP. XI

The apostle goes on with his discourse, in opposition to the false apostles. I. He apologizes for going about to commend himself, ver. 1–4. II. His equality with the other apostles, and with the false apostles in this particular of preaching the gospel to the Corinthians freely, without wages, ver. 5–15. III. He makes another preface to what he was about further to say in his own justification, ver. 16–21. And, IV. He gives a large account of his labours, and sufferings, in which he exceeded the false apostles, ver. 22, to the end.

1. The apology the apostle makes for going about to commend himself, v. 1. As much against the grain as it is with a proud man to acknowledge his infirmities, so much is it against the grain with a humble man to speak in his own praise. 2. The reasons for what the apostle did. To preserve the Corinthians from being corrupted by the insinuations of the false apostles, v. 2, 3. He was jealous over them with godly jealousy. He had espoused them to one husband, and he was desirous to present them as a chaste virgin—pure, and spotless, and faithful, not having their minds corrupted by false teachers. To vindicate himself against the false apostles. They could not pretend they had another Jesus, or another Spirit, or another gospel, to preach to them, v. 4. But seeing there is but one Jesus, one Spirit, and one gospel preached to them and received by them, what reason could there be why the Corinthians should be prejudiced against him, who first converted them to the faith?

I. His equality with the other apostles, v. 5. This he expresses very modestly: I suppose so. He might have spoken very positively. He speaks modestly of himself, and humbly owns his personal infirmity, that he was rude in speech. However, he was not rude in knowledge; much less was he ignorant of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven.

II. His equality with the false apostles in this particular. They ought to acknowledge he had been a good friend to them. He had preached the gospel to them freely, v. 7–10. He says he himself had taken wages of other churches (v. 8), so that he had a right to have asked and received from them: yet he waived his right, and chose rather to abase himself. He chose rather to be supplied from Macedonia than to be chargeable unto them. He informs them of the reason. It was not because he did not love them (v. 11), but it was to avoid offence. He would not give occasion for any to accuse him of worldly designs in preaching the gospel, or that he intended to enrich himself, v. 12.

III. The false apostles are charged as deceitful workers (v. 13), and though they were the ministers of Satan, would seem to be the ministers of righteousness. Hypocrisy is a thing not to be much wondered at in this world, especially when we consider the great influence Satan has. As he can turn himself into any shape, and look sometimes like an angel of light, in order to promote his kingdom of darkness, so he will teach his instruments to do the same. But it follows, Their end is according to their works (v. 15).

Let no man think me a fool, v. 16. Boasting of ourselves is usually not only a sign of a proud mind, but a mark of folly also, v. 17. He would not have them think that boasting of ourselves is a thing commanded by the Lord in general unto Christians. It is the duty and practice of Christians rather to humble and abase themselves; yet prudence must direct in what circumstances it is needful to speak of what God has wrought for us, and in us, and by us too, v. 18. But he gloried in his infirmities, as he tells them afterwards. These words, You suffer fools gladly seeing you yourselves are wise (v. 19), may be ironical. "Notwithstanding all your wisdom, you willingly suffer yourselves to be brought into bondage, or suffer others to lord it over you; nay, even to smite you on the face, or impose upon you to your very faces" (v. 20). The circumstances of the case were such as made it needful that whereinsoever any were bold he should be bold also, v. 21.

Verses 22–33

I. The privilege of his birth (v. 22). He was a Hebrew of the Hebrews; of a family among the Jews that never intermarried with the Gentiles. He was also an Israelite, and was also of the seed of Abraham.

II. He makes mention also of his apostleship, v. 23. They had found full proofs of his ministry: Are they ministers of Christ? I am more so.

III. He chiefly insists upon this, that he had been an extraordinary sufferer for Christ, v. 23. When the apostle would prove himself an extraordinary minister, he proves that he had been an extraordinary sufferer. Bonds and imprisonments were familiar to him. He says that thrice he suffered shipwreck. A night and a day he had been in the deep (v. 25). Wherever he went, he went in perils. If he journeyed by land, or voyaged by sea, he was in perils of robbers; his own countrymen sought to kill him; the heathen were not more kind to him, for among them he was in peril. If he was in the city, or in the wilderness, still he was in peril. He was in peril not only among avowed enemies, but among those also who called themselves brethren, but were false brethren, v. 26. He was in watchings often, and exposed to hunger and thirst; in fastings often; and endured cold and nakedness, v. 27. Thus he was used as if he had been the burden of the earth, and the plague of his generation. As an apostle, the care of all the churches lay on him, v. 28. He mentions this last, as if this lay the heaviest upon him, v. 29. There was not a weak Christian with whom he did not sympathize, nor any one scandalized, but he was affected therewith. Nor was he ashamed of all this; it was what he accounted his honour, v. 30.

He mentions one particular part of his sufferings out of its place, as if he had forgotten it before, namely, the danger he was in at Damascus, soon after he was converted. This was his first great danger and difficulty, and the rest of his life was of a piece with this. The apostle confirms this narrative with a solemn oath, v. 31. It is a great comfort to a good man that the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ knows the truth of all he says, and knows all he does and all he suffers for his sake.

CHAP. XII

The apostle proceeds in maintaining the honour of his apostleship. He makes mention of the favour God had shown him, and the use he made of this dispensation, ver. 1–10 Then he addresses himself to the Corinthians, giving a large account of his behaviour and kind intentions towards them, ver. 11, to the end.

Verses 1–10

I. The narrative the apostle gives of the favours God had shown him, for doubtless he himself is the man in Christ of whom he speaks. He was caught up into the third heaven, v. 2. When this was we cannot say, much less can we pretend to say how this was. In some sense he was caught up into the third heaven. This third heaven is called paradise (v. 4). The apostle does not mention what he saw in the third heaven or paradise, but tells us that he heard unspeakable words: nor was it lawful to utter those words. The modest manner in which the apostle mentions this matter, v. 1. He therefore did not mention this till above fourteen years after, v. 2. Again, his humility appears by the check he seems to put upon himself (v. 6). It is an excellent thing to have a lowly spirit in the midst of high advancements; and those who abase themselves shall be exalted.

II. The methods God took to prevent his being lifted up above measure. When God's people communicate their experiences, let them always remember to take notice of what God has done to keep them humble.

1. The apostle was pained with a thorn in the flesh, and buffeted with a messenger of Satan, v. 7. We are much in the dark what this was. Some think it was an acute bodily pain or sickness. This is certain, that what the apostle calls a thorn in his flesh was for a time very grievous to him: but the thorns Christ wore for us, sanctify and make easy all the thorns in the flesh we may at any time be afflicted with.

2. The design of this was to keep the apostle humble, v. 7. If God loves us, he will hide pride from us, and keep us from being exalted above measure. This thorn in the flesh is said to be a messenger of Satan, which he did not send with a good design, but with ill intentions. But God overruled it for good.

3. The apostle prayed earnestly to God for the removal of this sore grievance. If an answer be not given to the first prayer, nor to the second, we must hold on, and hold out, till we receive an answer. As troubles are sent to teach us to pray, so they are continued to teach us to continue instant in prayer.

4. My grace is sufficient for thee. Though God accepts the prayer of faith, yet he does not always answer it in the letter; as he sometimes grants in wrath, so he sometimes denies in love. It is a great comfort to us, whatever thorns in the flesh we are pained with, that God's grace is sufficient for us. Grace signifies two things: (1) The goodwill of God towards us, and this is sufficient to strengthen and comfort us. (2) The good work of God in us. Christ Jesus will proportion the remedy to our malady.

III. The use which the apostle makes of this dispensation: He gloried in his infirmities (v. 9), and took pleasure in them for Christ's sake, v. 10. They were fair opportunities for Christ to manifest the power and sufficiency of his grace resting upon him. When we are weak in ourselves, then we are strong in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ.

I. He blames them that they had not stood up in his defence. They compelled him to commend himself, v. 11. They in particular had good reason to speak well of him. It is a debt we owe to good men to stand up in the defence of their reputation. How much soever we are esteemed by others, we ought always to think humbly of ourselves. See an example of this in this great apostle, who thought himself to be nothing, though in truth he was not behind the greatest apostles.

II. His behaviour and kind intentions towards them. He says (v. 13) he had not been burdensome to them, for the time past, and tells them (v. 14) he would not be burdensome to them when he should come to them. He spared their purses to save their souls. Those who aim at clothing themselves with the fleece of the flock, and take no care of the sheep, are hirelings, and not good shepherds. He would gladly spend and be spent for them (v. 15); so spend as to be spent, and be like a candle, which consumes itself to give light to others. He did not abate in his love to them, v. 15. He was careful not only that he himself should not be burdensome, but that none he employed should. He was a man who did all things for edifying, v. 19. He would not shrink from his duty. Therefore he was resolved to be faithful in reproving sin, v. 20. Faithful ministers must not fear offending the guilty by sharp reproofs as they are needful, in public and in private. He was grieved at the apprehension that he should find scandalous sins among them not duly repented of. This would be the cause of great humiliation and lamentation. We have reason to bewail many that have sinned, and have not repented, v. 21. Those who love God, and love them, should mourn for them.

CHAP. XIII

The apostle threatens to be severe against obstinate sinners (ver. 1–6); then he makes a suitable prayer to God on the behalf of the Corinthians (ver. 7–10), and concludes his epistle, ver. 11–14.

I. The apostle threatens to be severe against obstinate sinners when he should come. He was not hasty in using severity, but gave a first and second admonition (v. 1), referring to his first and second epistles, by which he admonished them, as if he were present with them, though in person he was absent, v. 2. We should go, or send, to our brother, once and again, to tell him of his fault. Now he tells them to exercise severity. The threatening itself: That he would not spare such as were impenitent. Though it is God's gracious method to bear long with sinners, yet he will not bear always.

II. Why he would be thus severe, v. 3. It was the design of the false teachers to make the Corinthians call this matter into question, of which yet they had not weak, but strong and mighty proofs (v. 3). Even as Christ himself was crucified through weakness but liveth by the power of God (v. 4), so the apostles did yet manifest the power of God, and particularly the power of his grace, in converting the world to Christianity. He puts them upon proving their Christianity (v. 5). If Jesus Christ was in them, this was a proof that Christ spoke in him. If therefore they could prove themselves not to be reprobates, he trusted they would know that he was not a reprobate (v. 6). We should examine whether we be in the faith; prove our own selves whether Christ be in us, or not.

I. The apostle's prayer to God on the behalf of the Corinthians, v. 7. We are more concerned to pray that we may not do evil than that we may not suffer evil.

II. The reasons why the apostle put up this prayer to God, v. 7. The best way to adorn our holy religion is to do that which is honest, and of good report. Further that they might be free from all blame when he should come to them. This is intimated in v. 8. If therefore they did not do evil the apostle had no power to punish them (v. 9), "Though we are weak through persecutions and contempt, we bear it joyfully, while we see that you are strong and persevering in well-doing." He desired their perfection (v. 9). He not only desired that they might be kept from sin, but also that they might grow in grace. This was the great end of his writing this epistle.

I. A valediction.

1. He gives them several good exhortations. To be perfect, or to be knit together in love. To be of good comfort. To be of one mind, for the more easy we are with our brethren the more ease we shall have in our own souls. He exhorts them to live in peace, that difference in opinion should not cause an alienation of affections.

2. He encourages them with the promise of God's presence among them, v. 11. God is the God of love and peace. God will be with those who live in love and peace. He will love those who love peace.

3. He gives directions to them to salute each other, and sends kind salutations to them from those who were with him, v. 12, 13.

II. The apostolical benediction (v. 14). Thus the apostle concludes his epistle. This is a very solemn benediction, and we should give all diligence to inherit this blessing.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO

THE GALATIANS

While he was with them, they had expressed the greatest esteem and affection both for his person and ministry. Some judaizing teachers got in among them. That which these false teachers chiefly aimed at was to draw them off from the truth as it is in Jesus, particularly in the great doctrine of justification, asserting the necessity of joining the observance of the law of Moses with faith in Christ in order to it. They did all they could to lessen the character and reputation of the apostle, representing him as one who, if he was to be owned as an apostle, yet was much inferior to others, and particularly who deserved not such a regard as Peter, James, and John. In both these attempts they had but too great success. This was the occasion of his writing this epistle, wherein he expresses his great concern that they had suffered themselves to be so soon turned aside, vindicates his own character and authority as an apostle, and shows he was not behind the very chief of the apostles. He then sets himself to assert and maintain the great gospel doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, and he exhorts them to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ had made them free, gives them several very needful counsels and directions and then concludes the epistle.

CHAP. I

After the preface or introduction (v. 1 5), the apostle severely reproves these churches (ver. 6–9), and then proves his own apostleship, I. From his preaching the gospel, ver 10. II. From his having received it by immediate revelation, ver. 11, 12. For the proof of which he acquaints them, 1. What his former conversation was, ver. 13, 14. 2. How he was converted, ver. 15, 16. 3. How he behaved himself afterwards, ver. 16, to the end.

Verses 1–5

I. The person or persons from whom this epistle is sent—from Paul an apostle, &c., and all the brethren that were with him. 1. He gives a general account both of his office and of the manner in which he was called to it. As to his office, he was an apostle. He acquaints them how he was called to this office, and assures them that his commission to it was wholly divine. He was an apostle by Jesus Christ, he had his commission immediately from him, and consequently from God the Father. Furthermore his call to the apostleship was after Christ's resurrection from the dead. He had his call from him when in heaven. 2. He joins all the brethren that were with him in the inscription of the epistle. Hereby it would appear that he had their concurrence with him in the doctrine which he had preached, and was now about to confirm.

II. To whom this epistle is sent. It should seem that all of them were more or less corrupted through the arts of those seducers who had crept in among them.

III. The apostolical benediction, v. 3. Grace includes God's goodwill towards us and his good work upon us; and peace implies in it all that inward comfort or outward prosperity which is really needful for us. Both these the apostle wishes for these Christians. First grace, and then peace, for there can be no true peace without grace. Having mentioned the Lord Jesus Christ, he cannot pass without enlarging upon his love (v. 4). This present world is an evil world: it has become so by the sin of man. Jesus Christ has died to deliver us from this present evil world, not to remove his people out of it, but to rescue them from the power of it. This, the apostle informs us, he has done according to the will of God and our Father. Hence we have encouragement to look upon God as our Father. As he is the Father of our Lord Jesus, so in and through him he is also the Father of all true believers.

The apostle concludes this preface with a solemn ascription of praise and glory to him (v. 5).

Verses 6–9

I. How much he was concerned at their defection. There were several things by which their defection was greatly aggravated: 1. That they were removed from him that had called them; not only from the apostle, but from God himself. They had been guilty of a great abuse of his kindness and mercy towards them. 2. They had been called to partake of the greatest blessings and benefits. In proportion to the greatness of the privilege they enjoyed, such were their sin and folly in deserting it. 3. That they were so soon removed. In a very little time they lost that esteem of this grace of Christ which they seemed to have. This, as it was an instance of their weakness, so it was a further aggravation of their guilt. 4. That they were removed to another gospel, which yet was not another. You will find it to be no gospel at all, but the perverting of the gospel of Christ. Those who go about to establish any other way to heaven than what the gospel of Christ has revealed will find themselves wretchedly mistaken.

II. The gospel he had preached to them was the only true gospel. He pronounced an anathema upon those who pretended to preach any other gospel (v. 8). "If you have any other gospel preached to you under our name, or under colour of having it from an angel himself, you must conclude that you are imposed upon: and whoever preaches another gospel lays himself under a curse."

What Paul had said in the preface of this epistle he now proceeds to enlarge upon. There he had declared himself to be an apostle of Christ; and here he comes more directly to support his claim to that character and office.

I. From the scope and design of his ministry. As he professed to act by a commission from God, so that which he chiefly aimed at was to promote his glory, by recovering sinners into a state of subjection to him. He did not accommodate himself to the humours of persons, but his great care was to approve himself to God. No man could serve two such masters, and therefore he dare not allow himself to gratify men at the expense of his faithfulness to Christ. Thus, he proves that he was truly an apostle of Christ. The great end which ministers of the gospel should aim at is to bring men to God. They must not be solicitous to please men, if they would approve themselves faithful servants to Christ.

II. From the manner wherein he received the gospel which he preached to them (v. 11, 12). One thing peculiar in the character of an apostle was that he had been called to, and instructed for, this office immediately by Christ himself. He had his knowledge of the gospel, as well as his authority to preach it, directly from the Lord Jesus.

1. He tells them what his conversation in time past had been, v. 13, 14. It must be something very extraordinary which had made so great a change in him, and brought him not only to profess, but to preach, that doctrine, which he had before so vehemently opposed.

2. In how wonderful a manner he was brought to the knowledge and faith of Christ, and appointed to the office of an apostle, v. 15, 16. There was something peculiar in the case of Paul, both in the suddenness and in the greatness of the change wrought in him, and also in the manner wherein it was effected. He had Christ revealed in him. It will but little avail us to have Christ revealed to us if he is not also revealed in us. It pleased God to reveal his Son in him that he should preach him among the heathen. So that he was both a Christian and an apostle by revelation.

3. How he behaved himself hereupon, from v. 16. He conferred not with flesh and blood. So that it could not well be pretended that he was indebted to any other either for his knowledge of the gospel or his authority to preach it. This account being of importance, to establish his claim to this office, he confirms it by a solemn oath (v. 20), which, though it will not justify us in solemn appeals to God upon every occasion, yet shows that, in matters of weight and moment, this may sometimes not only be lawful, but duty. He had no communication at that time with the churches of Christ in Judæa, they had not so much as seen his face. The very report of this mighty change in him, as it filled them with joy, so it excited them to give glory to God on the account of it.

CHAP. II

The apostle makes it appear that he was not beholden to them either for his knowledge of the gospel or his authority as an apostle; he was owned and approved even by them, as having an equal commission with them to this office. I. He particularly informs them of another journey which he took to Jerusalem, ver. 1–10. And, II. Gives them an account of another interview he had with the apostle Peter at Antioch, and how he was obliged to behave himself towards him there. He proceeds to discourse on the great doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, without the works of the law, which it was the main design of this epistle to establish.

Verses 1–10

From the very first preaching of Christianity there was a difference of apprehension between those Christians who had first been Jews and those who had first been Gentiles. Peter was the apostle of the circumcision. But Paul was the apostle of the Gentiles. He informs us of another journey which he took to Jerusalem, v. 1–10.

I. It was not till fourteen years after the former (mentioned ch. i. 18). It was some evidence that he had no dependence upon the other apostles, that he had been so long absent from them, and was all the while employed in preaching pure Christianity, without being called into question by them for it. He went up with Barnabas, and took with him Titus also. If the journey here spoken of was the same with that recorded Acts xv, then we have a plain reason why Barnabas went along with him; for he was chosen by the Christians at Antioch to be his companion and associate. Though Titus had now become not only a convert to the Christian faith, but a preacher of it too, yet he was by birth a Gentile and uncircumcised, and therefore, by making him his companion, it appeared that their doctrine and practice were of a piece. He went up by revelation. It was a privilege with which this apostle was often favoured to be under a special divine direction. It should teach us to endeavour to see our way made plain before us, and to commit ourselves to the guidance of Providence.

II. An account of his behaviour while he was at Jerusalem.

1. He there communicated the gospel to them, which he preached among the Gentiles, but privately, &c. Observe both the faithfulness and prudence of our great apostle. (1) His faithfulness in giving them a fair account of the doctrine which he had all along preached among the Gentiles, and was still resolved to preach. (2) He uses prudence and caution herein. He chooses rather to do it in a more private than in a public way. The reason of this his caution was lest he should stir up opposition against himself and thereby either the success of his past labours should be lessened, or his future usefulness be obstructed. It was enough to his purpose to have his doctrine owned by those who were of greatest authority, whether it was approved by others or not.

2. In his practice he firmly adhered to the doctrine which he had preached. Though he had Titus with him, who was a Greek, yet he would not suffer him to be circumcised. It does not appear that the apostles at all insisted upon this; they were not for imposing it upon the Gentiles. But there were others who did, false brethren, unawares brought in, to spy out their liberty which they had in Christ Jesus. Their design herein was to bring them into bondage. Had they prevailed with Paul to have circumcised Titus, they would easily have imposed circumcision upon other Gentiles, and so have brought them under the bondage of the Law of Moses. But Paul would not give place by subjection, no, not for an hour, that the truth of the gospel might continue with them. He would not yield to those who were for the Mosaic rites and ceremonies, but would stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free.

3. Though he conversed with the other apostles, yet he did not receive any addition to his knowledge or authority from them, v. 6. That they were apostles first was no prejudice to his being equally an apostle with them. They told him nothing but what he before knew by revelation, nor could they except against the doctrine which he communicated to them.

4. The other apostles were fully convinced of his divine mission and authority, and accordingly acknowledged him as their fellow-apostle, v. 7–10. They justly concluded that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed to Paul, as the gospel of the circumcision was to Peter. They gave unto him and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship, and agreed that these should go to the heathen, while they continued to preach to the circumcision. And thus this meeting ended in an entire harmony and agreement; they approved both Paul's doctrine and conduct, and had nothing further to add, only that they would remember the poor, which of his own accord he was very forward to do. Herein he has given us an excellent pattern of Christian charity and we should by no means confine it to those who are just of the same sentiments with us, but be ready to extend it to all whom we have reason to look upon as the disciples of Christ.

I. He acquaints them with another interview which he had with the apostle Peter at Antioch, and what passed between them there, v. 11–14. In their other meeting, there had been good harmony and agreement. But in this Paul finds himself obliged to oppose Peter.

1. Peter's fault. When he came among the Gentile churches, he complied with them, and did eat with them. But, when there came some Jewish Christians from Jerusalem, he withdrew, and separated himself. His fault herein had a bad influence upon others. Barnabas himself, one of the apostles of the Gentiles, was carried away with their dissimulation. Here note, (1) The weakness and inconstancy of the best of men, and how apt they are to falter in their duty to God, out of an undue regard to the pleasing of men. (2) The great force of bad examples, especially the examples of great men and good men.

2. The rebuke which Paul gave him. When he observes him thus behaving he is not afraid to reprove him for it. Paul adhered resolutely to his principles, when others faltered in theirs. He was as good a Jew as any and the Gentiles must comply with the Jews, or else not be admitted into Christian communion.

II. He takes occasion to speak of that great fundamental doctrine of the gospel—That justification is only by faith in Christ, and not by the works of the law. This was the doctrine which Paul had preached among the Galatians, to which he still adhered, and which it is his great business in this epistle to confirm.

1. The practice of the Jewish Christians themselves: "What did we believe in Christ for? Was it not that we might be justified by the faith of Christ? And, if so, is it not folly to go back to the law?" To give the greater weight to this he adds (v. 17), "But if, while we seek to be justified by Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is Christ the minister of sin? Will it not follow that he is so, if he engage us to receive a doctrine by which we are so far from being justified that we remain impure sinners?" But he rejects it with abhorrence: "God forbid," says he, "that thereby he should direct us into a way of justification that is defective and ineffectual. For," says he (v. 18), "if I build again the things which I destroyed I make myself a transgressor; I own myself to remain under the guilt of sin, notwithstanding my faith in Christ."

2. What his own judgment and practice were. (1) He was dead to the law, through the law itself. He saw that justification was not to be expected by the works of it and that there was now no further need of the sacrifices since they were done away in Christ, by his offering up himself a sacrifice for us. But, though he was thus dead to the law, yet he did not look upon himself as without law. He was dead to the law, that he might live unto God. The doctrine of the gospel, instead of weakening the bond of duty, did but the more strengthen and confirm it; and therefore, though he was dead to the law, yet it was only in order to his living a new and better life to God. (2) As he was dead to the law, so he was alive unto God through Jesus Christ (v. 20). He is crucified, and yet he lives; the old man is crucified, but the new man is living. Sin is mortified, and grace quickened. I live, and yet not I. He has the comforts and the triumphs of grace; and yet that grace is not from himself, but from another. He is crucified with Christ, and yet Christ lives in him. He is interested in the death of Christ, so as to die unto sin; and yet interested in the life of Christ, so as to live unto God. He lives in the flesh, and yet lives by faith; to outward appearance he lives as other people do, yet he has a higher and nobler principle that supports him, that of faith in Christ. Those who have true faith live by that faith.

Lastly, By the doctrine of justification by faith in Christ, without the works of the law, he avoided two great difficulties. 1. He did not frustrate the grace of God. If it be of works, it is no more of grace. 2. He did not frustrate the death of Christ; for, if we look for salvation by the law of Moses, then we render the death of Christ needless.

CHAP. III

The apostle, I. Reproves the Galatians for their folly, in suffering themselves to be drawn away from the faith of the gospel. II. He proves the doctrine of justification by faith without the works of the law, 1. From the example of Abraham's justification. 2. From the nature of the law. 3. From the express testimony of the Old Testament; and, 4. From the covenant of God with Abraham. Lest any should hereupon say, "Wherefore than serveth the law?" he answers, (1) It was added because of transgressions. (2) It was given to convince the world of the necessity of a Saviour. (3) It was designed as a schoolmaster, to bring us to Christ. He concludes the chapter by acquainting us with the privilege of Christians.

Verses 1–5

The apostle is here dealing with those who, having embraced the faith of Christ, still continued to seek for justification by the works of the law.

He reproves them, v. 1. He asks, Who hath bewitched you? They did not adhere to the gospel way of justification, wherein they had been taught. It is not enough to know the truth, and to say we believe it, but we must obey it too. Several things proved the folly of these Christians.

1. Jesus Christ had been evidently set forth as crucified among them; they had had the doctrine of the cross preached to them, and the sacrament of the Lord's supper administered among them, in both which Christ crucified had been set before them.

2. He appeals to the experiences they had had of the working of the Spirit upon their souls (v. 2). He desires to know how they came by these gifts and graces: Was it by the works of the law? Or was it by the hearing of faith. The latter, if they would say the truth, they were obliged to own.

3. He calls upon them to consider their past and present conduct (v. 3, 4). They had begun well; but now they were turning to the law, and expected to be advanced to higher degrees of perfection by adding the observance of it to faith in Christ, in order to their justification. This, instead of being an improvement upon the gospel, was really a perversion of it; they were so far from being more perfect Christians that they were more in danger of becoming no Christians at all. They had not only embraced the Christian doctrine, but suffered for it too; and therefore their folly would be the more aggravated, if now they should desert it.

4. They had ministered the Spirit to them, and wrought miracles among them: and he appeals to them whether they did it by the works of the law or by the hearing of faith. They very well knew that it was not the former, but the latter; and therefore must needs be inexcusable in forsaking a doctrine which had been so signally owned and attested.

He largely proves the doctrine which he had reproved them for rejecting.

1. From the example of Abraham's justification (v. 6). His faith fastened upon the promise of God, and upon his believing he was owned and accepted of God as a righteous man. Those who are of faith are the children of Abraham (v. 7). Abraham was justified by faith, and so are they (v. 8). God would justify the heathen world in the way of faith; and therefore in Abraham, that is, in the seed of Abraham, which is Christ, not the Jews only, but the Gentiles also, should be blessed as Abraham was, being justified as he was. It was through faith in the promise of God that he was blessed, and it is only in the same way that others obtain this privilege.

II. We cannot be justified but by faith fastening on the gospel, because the law condemns us. If we put ourselves upon trial in that court, we are certainly lost and undone, v. 10. The condition of life, by the law, is perfect, personal, and perpetual obedience; the language of it is as v. 12. Unless our obedience be universal, and unless it be perpetual too, we fall under the curse of the law. If, as transgressors of the law, we are under the curse of it, it must be a vain thing to look for justification by it. Yet the apostle afterwards acquaints us that there is a way open to our escaping this curse, through faith in Christ (as he says, v. 13). A strange method it was which Christ took to redeem us from the curse of the law; it was by his being himself made a curse for us. The design of this was that the blessing of Abraham might come on the Gentiles through Jesus Christ—that all who believed on Christ might become heirs of Abraham's blessing, and particularly of that great promise of the Spirit. Hence it appeared that it was not by putting themselves under the law, but by faith in Christ, that they became the people of God and heirs of the promise.

III. The apostle alleges the express testimony of the Old Testament, v. 11. The just shall live by faith. It is only through faith that persons become righteous, and as such obtain this life and happiness. The law is not of faith, but the language of it is, The man that doeth them shall live in them. It requires perfect obedience as the condition of life, and therefore now can by no means be the rule of our justification.

IV. The apostle urges the stability of the covenant which God made with Abraham, which was not disannulled by the giving of the law to Moses, v. 15, &c. Faith had the precedence of the law, for Abraham was justified by faith. God entered into covenant with Abraham (v. 8). The original word signifies both a covenant and a testament. If it should be said that a testament may be defeated for want of persons to claim the benefit of it (v. 16), he shows that there is no danger of that. Abraham is dead, and the prophets are dead, but the covenant is made with Abraham and his seed. Says the apostle, "It points at a single person—that seed is Christ." So that the covenant is still in force; for Christ abideth for ever. The subsequent law could not disannul the previous covenant or promise (v. 18). If the inheritance was given to Abraham by promise, we may be sure that God would not retract that promise; for he is not a man that he should repent.

Why did God give the law by Moses?

I. The law was added because of transgressions, v. 19. The Israelites were sinners as well as others, and therefore the law was given to convince them of their sin. And it was also intended to restrain them from the commission of sin. The law was given for this purpose till the seed should come to whom the promise was made. The law was added because of transgressions, till this fulness of time should come. But when a fuller discovery of divine grace in the promise was made, then the law, as given by Moses, was to cease. And though the law, considered as the law of nature, is always in force, yet we are now no longer under the bondage and terror of that legal covenant. The law then was only to lead men to see their need of the promise, by showing them the sinfulness of sin, and to point them to Christ. Whereas the promise was given immediately by God himself, the law was given by the ministry of angels, and the hand of a mediator. Hence it appeared that the law could not be designed to set aside the promise; for (v. 20), God is one, and therefore it is not to be supposed that he should make void a promise which he had long before made to Abraham. This would not have been consistent with his truth and faithfulness. Moses was only a mediator, and therefore the law that was given by him could not affect the promise.

II. The law was given to convince men of the necessity of a Saviour (v. 21). The law is by no means inconsistent with the promise. The design of it is to discover men's transgressions, and to show them the need they have of a better righteousness than that of the law. The scripture hath concluded all under sin (v. 22). The law discovered their wounds, but could not afford them a remedy. The great design of it was that the promise by faith of Jesus Christ might be given to those that believe, that being convinced of the insufficiency of the law to effect a righteousness for them, they might be persuaded to believe on Christ, and so obtain the benefit of the promise.

III. The law was designed for a schoolmaster, to bring men to Christ, v. 24. They were shut up, held under the terror and discipline of it, as prisoners in a state of confinement. Hereby they might be disposed more readily to accept Christ when he came into the world. It was proper to convince them of their lost and undone condition in themselves, and to let them see the weakness and insufficiency of their own righteousness. And thus it was their schoolmaster, to instruct and govern them in their state of minority, their servant, to lead and conduct them to Christ (as children were wont to be led to school by those servants who had the care of them); that they might be more fully instructed by him as their schoolmaster, in the true way of justification and salvation, which is only by faith in him. The apostle adds (v. 25) after faith has come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster —we have no such need of the law to direct us to him as there was then.

1. The goodness of God to his people of old, in giving the law to them. It furnished them with sufficient helps both to direct them in their duty to God and to encourage their hopes in him.

2. The great fault and folly of the Jews, in mistaking the design of the law. They expected to be justified by the works of it, whereas it was never designed to be the rule of their justification, but only a means of convincing them of their guilt and of their need of a Saviour.

3. The great advantage of the gospel state above the legal. We are not now treated as children in a state of minority, but as sons grown up to a full age.

(1) We are the children of God by faith in Christ Jesus, v. 26. The great privilege which real Christians enjoy under the gospel: They are no longer accounted servants, but sons. They are admitted into the number, and have a right to all the privileges of his children. How they come to obtain this privilege by faith in Christ Jesus. This faith in Christ, whereby they became the children of God (v. 27), was what they professed in baptism. Having thus become the members of Christ, they were owned as the children of God. Baptism is now the solemn rite of our admission into the Christian church. Those who are baptized into Christ have put on Christ; under the gospel baptism comes in the room of circumcision. Being baptized into Christ, we are baptized into his death, that as he died and rose again, so we should die unto sin, and walk in newness of life; it would be of great advantage to us did we oftener remember this.

(2) This privilege of being the children of God is now enjoyed in common by all real Christians. The law indeed made a difference between Jew and Greek, between bond and free, and between male and female. But it is not so now; they all stand on the same level, and are all one in Christ Jesus. All who sincerely believe on Christ, of what nation, or sex, or condition, soever they be, are accepted of him, and become the children of God through faith in him.

(3) Being Christ's, we are Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise. "You therefore become the true seed of Abraham, and as such are heirs according to the promise, and consequently are entitled to the great blessings and privileges of it." They were very unreasonable and unwise, in hearkening to those who at once endeavoured to deprive them of the truth and liberty of the gospel.

CHAP. IV

The apostle is still carrying on the same general design. For this purpose he makes use of various considerations, I. The great excellence of the gospel state above the legal, ver. 1–7. II. The happy change that was made in them at their conversion, ver. 8–11. III. The affection they had had for him, ver. 12–16. IV. The character of the false teachers, ver. 17, 18. V. The very tender affection he had for them, ver. 19, 20. VI. The history of Isaac and Ishmael.

Verses 1–7

The apostle deals plainly with those who hearkened to the judaizing teachers.

I. He acquaints us with the state of the Old Testament church: it was like a child under age. That was indeed a dispensation of grace, and yet it was comparatively a dispensation of darkness; for as the heir, in his minority, is under tutors and governors till the time appointed of his father, so it was with the Old Testament church. And as that was a dispensation of darkness, so of bondage too. The church then lay more under the character of a servant. The time appointed of the Father having come, we are under a dispensation of greater light and liberty.

II. He acquaints us with the much happier state under the gospel-dispensation, v. 4–7. When the fulness of time had come he sent forth his Son, &c. He, in pursuance of the great design he had undertaken, submitted to be made of a woman—there is his incarnation; and to be made under the law—there is his subjection. One great end of all this was to redeem those that were under the law. He was sent to redeem us, that we might receive the adoption of sons—that we might no longer be accounted as servants, but as sons grown up to maturity. Under the gospel, particular believers receive the adoption. They have together therewith the Spirit of adoption, enabling them in prayer to eye God as a Father (v. 6): Because you are sons, God hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying Abba, Father. And hereupon (v. 7) the apostle concludes this argument: Wherefore thou art no more a servant, but a son; and, if a son, then an heir of God through Christ; we are no longer under the servitude of the law, but, upon our believing in Christ, become the sons of God, and, being the sons, we are also heirs of God.

1. The wonders of divine love and mercy towards us, particularly of God the Father, in sending his Son into the world to redeem and save us—of the Son of God, in suffering so much, for us—and of the Holy Spirit, in condescending to dwell in the hearts of believers for such gracious purposes.

2. The great and invaluable advantages which Christians enjoy under the gospel. We receive the adoption of sons. We who by nature are children of wrath and disobedience have become by grace children of love. We receive the Spirit of adoption. All who are received into the number partake of the nature of the children of God; for he will have all his children to resemble him. Those who have the nature of sons shall have the inheritance of sons.

Verses 8–11

I. He reminds them what they were before the gospel was preached to them. Then they knew not God. They were under the worst of slaveries, for they did service to those which by nature were no gods, and therefore were utterly unable to hear and help them. Those who are ignorant of the true God cannot but be inclined to false gods.

II. He calls upon them to consider the happy change made in them by the preaching of the gospel. They had known God or rather were known of God; this happy change in their state was not owing to themselves, but to him. All our acquaintance with God begins with him; we know him, because we are known of him.

III. The unreasonableness of their suffering themselves to be brought again into a state of bondage. How turn you again, &c., says he, v. 9. "How is it that you, who have been taught to worship God in the gospel way, should now be persuaded to comply with the ceremonial way of worship? They were more inexcusable than the Jews themselves, who might be supposed to have some fondness for that which had been of such long standing among them. Besides, what they suffered themselves to be brought into bondage to were but weak and beggarly elements, such things as had no power in them to cleanse the soul. Their weakness and folly were the more aggravated, in submitting to them, and in observing their various festivals, days, and months, and times, and years. It is possible for those who have made great professions of religion to be afterwards drawn into very great defections from the purity and simplicity of it. This the apostle lays a special stress upon, that after they had known God, or rather were known of him, they desired to be in bondage under the weak and beggarly elements of the law.

IV. He expresses his fears concerning them, lest he had bestowed on them labour in vain. He had been at a great deal of pains about them, but now they were rendering his labour among them fruitless, and with the thoughts of this he could not but be deeply affected.

I. How affectionately he addresses himself to them. He styles them brethren, though he knew their hearts were in a great measure alienated from him. He would have them to be as he was, for he was as they were, they had not injured him at all. He had no quarrel with them upon his own account. Thus he endeavours to mollify their spirits towards him, that so they might receive the admonitions he was giving them. In reproving others we should take care to convince them that our reproofs do not proceed from any private pique but from a sincere regard to the honour of God and their truest welfare.

II. He magnifies their former affection. He puts them in mind of the difficulty under which he laboured when he came first among them: I knew how, through infirmity of the flesh, I preached the gospel unto you at the first. When this infirmity of the flesh was, which in the following words he expresses by his temptation that was in his flesh, we can now have no certain knowledge of. It seems it made no impression on them to his disadvantage. They did not despise him on the account of it, but on the contrary, received him as an angel of God, even as Christ Jesus. He was a welcome messenger to them; yea, so great was their esteem of him, that they could have plucked out their own eyes, and have given them to him. How uncertain the respects of people are, how apt they are to change their minds, so that they are ready to pluck out the eyes of those for whom they would before have plucked out their own!

III. He expostulates with them hereupon: Where is then, the blessedness you spoke of? "You once thought yourselves happy in receiving the gospel; have you now any reason to think otherwise?" Those who have left their first love would do well to consider, Where is now the blessedness they once spoke of? He again asks (v. 16), "Am I become your enemy, because I tell you the truth? How is it that I, who was heretofore your favourite, am now accounted your enemy? It is no uncommon thing for men to account those their enemies who are really their best friends; for so, undoubtedly, those are who tell them the truth.

Ministers sometimes create enemies to themselves by the faithful discharge of their duty. Yet ministers must not forbear speaking the truth, for fear of offending others. If others have become their enemies, it is only for telling them the truth.

Verses 17, 18

He here gives them the character of those false teachers. He tells them they were designing men, who were aiming to set up themselves. "They zealously affect you," says he; "and pretend a great deal of affection to you, but not well; for they would exclude you, that you might affect them. That which they are chiefly aiming at is to engage your affections to them." There may appear to be a great deal of zeal where yet there is but little truth and sincerity. The apostle gives us that excellent rule which we have, v. 18, It is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing. What our translation renders in a good thing some choose to render to a good man, and so consider the apostle as pointing to himself; and not only when I am present with you. It is a very good rule that zeal be exercised only upon that which is good; for zeal is then only good when it is in a good thing. It is good to be zealous always in a good thing; not for a time only, or now and then, like the heat of an ague-fit, but, like the natural heat of the body, constant. Happy would it be for the church of Christ if this rule were better observed among Christians!

Verses 19, 20

He here expresses his great affection to them. He was not like them—one thing when among them and another when absent from them. Nor was he like their false teachers, who pretended a great deal of affection to them, when at the same time they were only consulting their own interest. He calls them his children, as he justly might, yea, he styles them his little children, which may possibly have a respect to their present behaviour, whereby they showed themselves too much like little children. He expresses his concern for them. He travailed in birth for them that Christ might be formed in them, that they might become Christians indeed. From this we may note, 1. The very tender affection which faithful ministers bear towards those among whom they are employed; it is like that of the most affectionate parents to their little children. 2. That the chief thing they are longing for, on their account, is that Christ may be formed in them. How unreasonably must those people act who suffer themselves to be prevailed upon to desert or dislike such ministers! He adds (v. 20) that he desired to be then present with them, that thereupon he might find occasion to change his voice towards them; for at present he stood in doubt of them. He knew not well what to think of them. But he would be glad to find that matters were better with them than he feared, and that he might have occasion to commend them, instead of thus reproving and chiding them.

Verses 21–31

The apostle illustrates the difference between believers who rested in Christ only and those judaizers who trusted in the law, by a comparison taken from the story of Isaac and Ishmael. Tell me, says he, you that desire to be under the law, do you not hear the law? He sets before them the history itself (v. 22, 23): For it is written, Abraham had two sons, &c. The one, Ishmael, was by a bond-maid, and the other, Isaac, by a free-woman; the former was born after the flesh, or by the ordinary course of nature, the other was by promise, when in the course of nature there was no reason to expect that Sarah should have a son. He acquaints them with the meaning of this history (v. 24–27): These things, says he, are an allegory. These two, Agar and Sarah, are the two covenants. The former, Agar, represented that which was given from mount Sinai, and which gendereth to bondage. For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia and it answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children; it justly represents the present state of the Jews, who adhering to that covenant, are still in bondage with their children. But the other, Sarah, was intended to prefigure Jerusalem which is above, which is free both from the curse of the moral and the bondage of the ceremonial law, and is the mother of us all—a state into which all, both Jews and Gentiles, are admitted, upon their believing in Christ. And to this greater freedom the apostle refers that of the prophet, Isa. liv. 1, where it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not: for the desolate hath many more children than she who hath a husband. He applies the history to the present case (v. 28): Now we, brethren, as Isaac was, are the children of the promise. We Christians, who have accepted Christ and look for justification and salvation by him alone, are entitled to the promised inheritance. He tells them that as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, they must expect it would be so now. But, he desires them to consider what the scripture saith (Gen. xxi. 10), Cast out the bond-woman and her son, for the son of the bond-woman shall not be heir with the son of the free-woman. He concludes (v. 31), So then, brethren, we are not children of the bond-woman, but of the free.

CHAP. V

He begins it with a general exhortation (ver. 1), which he afterwards enforces by several considerations, ver 2–12 He then presses them to serious practical godliness. I. That they should not strive with one another, ver. 13 15. II. That they would strive against sin, 1. There is in everyone a struggle between flesh and spirit, ver. 17. 2. It is our duty to side with the better part, ver 16, 18. 3 He specifies the works of the flesh and the fruits of the Spirit, ver. 19–24. And then concludes the chapter with a caution against pride and envy.

Verses 1–12

Since it appeared by what had been said that we can be justified only by faith in Jesus Christ, and that the law of Moses was no longer in force, he would have them to stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free, and not to be again entangled with the yoke of bondage. Under the gospel we are enfranchised, we are brought into a state of liberty. We owe this liberty to Jesus Christ. It is he who has made us free. It is therefore our duty to stand fast in this liberty, and not to suffer ourselves to be again entangled in the yoke of bondage.

I. Their submitting to circumcision, and depending on the works of the law for righteousness, were a forfeiture of all their advantages by Jesus Christ, v. 2–4. 1. With what solemnity the apostle declares this: Behold, I Paul say unto you (v. 2), and he repeats it (v. 3), I testify unto you that if you be circumcised Christ shall profit you nothing, &c. He looked upon it as a matter of the greatest consequence that they did not submit to it. That this is his meaning appears from v. 4, where he expresses the same thing by their being justified by the law. Christ would profit them nothing, that were debtors to do the whole law; Christ had become of no effect to them, they were fallen from grace. Thereby they renounced that way of justification which God had established. They became debtors to do the whole law, which required such an obedience as they were not capable of performing. Having thus revolted from Christ, and built their hopes upon the law, Christ would profit them nothing. He will not be the Saviour of any who will not own and rely upon him as their only Saviour.

II. To persuade them to steadfastness he sets before them his own example, and acquaints them what their hopes were; through the Spirit they were waiting for the hope of righteousness by faith. 1. What it is that Christians are waiting for: it is the hope of righteousness, by which we are chiefly to understand the happiness of the other world. It is the great object of their hope, which they are above everything else desiring and pursuing. It is the righteousness of Christ alone which has procured it for us, and on account of which we can expect to be brought to the possession of it. 2. How they hope to obtain this happiness, namely, by faith in our Lord Jesus Christ, not by the works of the law. 3. Whence it is that they are thus waiting for the hope of righteousness: it is through the Spirit. It is under his conduct, and by his assistance, that they are enabled to believe on Christ, and to look for the hope of righteousness through him.

III. He tells them (v. 6) that in Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth anything nor uncircumcision. Christ, who is the end of the law, having come, now it was neither here nor there whether a man were circumcised or uncircumcised; he was neither the better for the one nor the worse for the other, nor would either the one or the other recommend him to God. Yet he informs them what would do so; faith, which worketh by love. Without it nothing else would stand them in any stead. Faith, where it is true, is a working grace: it works by love, love to God and love to our brethren; and faith, thus working by love, is all in all in our Christianity.

IV. To recover them from their backslidings he puts them in mind of their good beginnings.

1. They did run well. The life of a Christian is a race, wherein he must run, and hold on, if he would obtain the prize. It is not enough that we run in this race, but we must run well. Thus these Christians had done for awhile, but they were either turned out of the way or at least made to flag and falter in it.

2. He asks them, and calls upon them to ask themselves, Who did hinder you? He very well knew who they were, and what it was that hindered them; but he would have them to put the question to themselves. Many who set out fair in religion, and run well for awhile—are yet by some means or other hindered in their progress, or turned out of the way. It concerns those who have run well, but now begin either to turn out of the way or to tire in it, to enquire what it is that hinders them. Young converts must expect that Satan will be doing all he can to divert them from the course they are in. The apostle tells them that by hearkening to them they were kept from obeying the truth. The gospel which he had preached to them was the truth. It was necessary that they should obey it, that they should continue to govern their lives and hopes according to the directions of it. The truth is not only to be believed, but to be obeyed, to be received not only in the light of it, but in the love and power of it. Those do not rightly obey the truth, who do not steadfastly adhere to it.

V. He argues from the ill rise of that persuasion whereby they were drawn away (v. 8): This persuasion, says he, cometh not of him that calleth you. That is, either of God, or of the apostle himself. It could not come from God, for it was contrary to that way of justification and salvation which he had established; nor from Paul himself, for he had all along been an opposer and not a preacher of circumcision, he had never pressed the use of it upon Christians, much less imposed it upon them as necessary to salvation. He leaves them to judge whence it must arise; it could be owing to none but Satan and his instruments. The Galatians had every reason to reject it, and to continue steadfast in the truth which they had before embraced.

VI. The danger there was of the spreading of this infection, is a further argument which the apostle urges against their complying with false teachers. To convince them that there was more danger in it than they were aware of, he tells them (v. 9) that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. The whole lump of the Christian society may be infected by one member of it, and therefore they were greatly concerned, to purge out the infection from among them. The doctrine which the false teachers were industrious to spread, and which some in these churches had been drawn into, was subversive of Christianity itself, and therefore considering the fatal tendency of it, he would not have them to be easy and unconcerned.

VII. He expresses the hopes he had concerning them (v. 10): I have confidence in you, through the Lord, that you will be none otherwise minded. He hoped that they might be brought to be of the same mind with him, and to own and abide by that truth and that liberty of the gospel which he had preached to them. We ought to hope the best even of those concerning whom we have cause to fear the worst. He lays the blame of it more upon others than themselves; for he adds, But he that troubleth you shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be. In reproving sin and error, we should always distinguish between the leaders and the led. Thus the apostle softens and alleviates the fault of these Christians, even while he is reproving them. But as for him or those that troubled them, he declares they should bear their judgment. He did not doubt but God would deal with them according to their deserts. He wishes that they were even cut off—not cut off from Christ and all hopes of salvation by him, but cut off by the censures of the church, which ought to witness against those teachers who thus corrupted the purity of the gospel.

VIII. To dissuade these Christians from hearkening to their judaizing teachers, he represents them as men who had used very base methods to compass their designs: for they had misrepresented him. They had given out among them that Paul himself was a preacher of circumcision: for when he says (v. 11), And I brethren, if I yet preach circumcision, it plainly appears that they had reported him to have done so. Yet that he was a preacher of it he utterly denies. If he would have preached circumcision, he might have avoided persecution. If I yet preach circumcision, says he, why do I yet suffer persecution? If he had fallen in with them herein, instead of being exposed to their rage he might have been received into their favour. He was so far from preaching the doctrine he was charged with, that, rather than do so, he was willing to expose himself to the greatest hazards. If he had yielded to the Jews herein, then would the offence of the cross have ceased. He rather chose to hazard his ease and credit, yea his very life itself, than thus to corrupt the truth and give up the liberty of the gospel.

The apostle comes to exhort these Christians to serious practical godliness.

I. They should not strive with one another, but love one another. He tells them (v. 13) that they had been called unto liberty, but yet he would have them be very careful that they did not use this liberty as an occasion to the flesh. On the contrary, he would have them by love to serve one another. The liberty we enjoy as Christians is not a licentious liberty: though Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law, yet he has not freed us from the obligation of it. Though we ought to stand fast in our Christian liberty, yet we should not insist upon it to the breach of Christian charity, but should always maintain such a temper towards each other as may dispose us by love to serve one another. Two considerations for this purpose: (1) That all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this, Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself, v. 14. Love is the sum of the whole law. It will appear that we are the disciples of Christ indeed when we have love one to another (John xiii. 35); and, if it do not wholly extinguish those unhappy discords that are among Christians, yet at least the fatal consequences of them will be prevented. (2) The dangerous tendency of a contrary behaviour (v. 15): But, says he, if you bite and devour one another, take heed that you be not consumed one of another. Mutual strifes among brethren, if persisted in, are likely to prove a common ruin. Christian churches can only be ruined by their own hands; if Christians be as brute beasts, biting and devouring each other, what can be expected but that the God of love should deny his grace to them, and the Spirit of love should depart from them, and that the evil spirit should prevail?

II. They should all strive against sin; and happy would it be for the church if Christians would let all their quarrels be swallowed up of this, even a quarrel against sin. This is what we are chiefly concerned to fight against.

1. That there is in everyone a struggle between the flesh and the spirit (v. 17): The flesh lusts against the spirit. On the other hand, the spirit (the renewed part of us) strives against the flesh, hence it comes to pass that we cannot do the things that we would. Even as in a natural man there is something of this struggle (the convictions of his conscience and the corruption of his own heart strive with one another) so in a renewed man, there is a struggle between the old nature and the new nature, the remainders of sin and the beginnings of grace; and this Christians must expect as long as they continue in this world.

2. That it is our duty and interest in this struggle to side with the better part and with our graces against our lusts. He gives us this one general rule, to walk in the Spirit (v. 16): This I say, then, Walk in the Spirit, and you shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh. The duty here recommended to us is that we set ourselves to act under the guidance and influence of the blessed Spirit. We may depend upon it that, though we may not be freed from the stirrings of our corrupt nature, though it remain in us, yet it shall not obtain a dominion over us. The best antidote against the poison of sin is to walk in the Spirit. So it would be a good evidence that they were Christians indeed; for, says the apostle (v. 18), If you be led by the Spirit, you are not under the law. If, in the prevailing bent and tenor of your lives, you be led by the Spirit, it will hence appear that you are not under the law, not under the condemning, though you are still under the commanding, power of it.

3. The apostle specifies the works of the flesh and the fruits of the Spirit, which must be cherished and brought forth (v. 19), &c. He begins with the works of the flesh, which, as they are many, so they are manifest. Some are sins against the seventh commandment, such as adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness. Some are sins against the first and second commandments, as idolatry and witchcraft. Others are sins against our neighbour, such as hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, and sometimes break out into murders, not only of the names and reputation, but even of the very lives of our fellow-creatures. Others are sins against ourselves, such as drunkenness and revellings. Of these and such like, says he, I tell you before, as I have also told you in times past, that those who do such things, shall not inherit the kingdom of God. These are sins which will undoubtedly shut men out of heaven. He specifies the fruits of the Spirit, which as Christians we are concerned to bring forth, v. 22, 23. As sin is called the work of the flesh, because the flesh is the principle that moves men to it, so grace is said to be the fruit of the Spirit, because it wholly proceeds from the Spirit, as the fruit does from the root. He particularly commends to us, love and joy, by which may be understood constant delight in God,—peace, with God, or a peaceableness towards others,—long-suffering,—gentleness,—a sweetness of temper, easy to be entreated when any have wronged us,—goodness, readiness to do good to all as we have opportunity,—faith, in what we profess and promise to others,—meekness, not to be easily provoked, and, when we are so, to be soon pacified,—and temperance. Concerning those in whom these fruits of the Spirit are found, the apostle says, There is no law against them. They are not under the law, but under grace; for these fruits of the Spirit, in whomsoever they are found, plainly show that such are led by the Spirit. So (v. 24) he informs us that this is the sincere care and endeavour of all real Christians: And those that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts. They are now sincerely endeavouring to die unto sin, as he had died for it. They have not yet obtained a complete victory over it; they have still flesh as well as Spirit in them, and that has its affections and lusts, which continue to give them no little disturbance, but they are seeking the utter ruin and destruction of it. If we would approve ourselves to be Christ's, we must make it our constant care to crucify the flesh. Christ will never own those as his who yield themselves the servants of sin. It is not enough that we cease to do evil, but we must learn to do well. Our Christianity obliges us not only to oppose the works of the flesh, but to bring forth the fruits of the Spirit too. This must be our sincere care and endeavour as well as the other; and that it was the design of the apostle to represent both of these as our duty may be gathered from what follows (v. 25): If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit. He had before told us that the Spirit of Christ is a privilege bestowed on all the children of God, ch. iv. 6. Let us show it by behaviour agreeable hereunto; let us evidence our good principles by good practices. It must be by our walking not after the flesh, but after the spirit. We must set ourselves in good earnest both to mortify the deeds of the body, and to walk in newness of life.

4. The apostle concludes this chapter with a caution against pride and envy, v. 26. He here cautions them against being desirous of vainglory, because this would certainly lead them to provoke one another and to envy one another. Thus a foundation is laid for those quarrels and contentions which are inconsistent with that love which Christians ought to maintain towards each other. This therefore the apostle would have us by all means to watch against. (1) The glory which comes from men is vain-glory, which, instead of being desirous of, we should be dead to. (2) An undue regard to the applause of men is one great ground of the unhappy strifes and contentions that exist among Christians.

CHAP. VI

This chapter chiefly consists of two parts. In the former the apostle gives us several practical directions, which more especially tend to instruct Christians in their duty to one another, ver. 1–10. In the latter he revives the main design of the epistle, which was to fortify the Galatians against the arts of their judaizing teachers. I. The true character of these teachers, ver. 11–14. II. He acquaints them with his own temper and behaviour. And then he concludes the epistle with a solemn benediction.

Verses 1–10

I. We are here taught to deal tenderly with those who are overtaken in a fault, v. 1; if a man be overtaken in a fault, brought to sin by the surprise of temptation. It is one thing to overtake a fault by contrivance and deliberation, and another thing to be overtaken in a fault. Great tenderness should be used. Those who are spiritual must restore such a one with the spirit of meekness. 1. The duty we are directed to—to restore such. The original word signifies to set in joint, as a dislocated bone. We should endeavour to set them in joint again, comforting them in a sense of pardoning mercy, confirming our love to them. 2. The manner wherein this is to be done: With the spirit of meekness; not in wrath and passion, as those who triumph in a brother's falls. Many needful reproofs lose their efficacy by being given in wrath; but when they are managed with tenderness, and from sincere concern for the welfare of those to whom they are given, they are likely to make a due impression. 3. A very good reason why this should be done with meekness: Considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. We ought to deal very tenderly with those who are overtaken in sin, it may some time or other be our own case. This will dispose us to do by others as we desire to be done by in such a case.

II. We are here directed to bear one another's burdens, v. 2. This may be considered either as referring to what goes before, and so may teach us to exercise forbearance and compassion towards one another, or a more general precept it directs us to sympathize with one another under the various trials and troubles that we may meet with. So we shall fulfil the law of Christ. This is to act agreeably to the law of his precept, which is the law of love, and it would also be agreeable to his pattern and example, which have the force of a law to us. Though as Christians we are freed from the law of Moses, yet we are under the law of Christ; and therefore, instead of laying unnecessary burdens upon others, it much more becomes us to fulfil the law of Christ by bearing one another's burdens. The apostle being aware how great a hindrance pride would be to the mutual condescension which he had been recommending (v. 3) takes care to caution us against this; he supposes it as a very possible thing for a man to think himself to be something—when in truth he is nothing. Such a one does but deceive himself; while he imposes upon others, by pretending to what he has not, he puts the greatest cheat upon himself. He is neither the freer from mistakes nor will he be the more secure against temptations for the good opinion he has of his own sufficiency, but rather the more liable to fall into them; for he that thinks he stands has need to take heed lest he fall. Self-conceit is but self-deceit. There is not a more dangerous cheat in the world than self-deceit.

III. We are advised everyone to prove his own work, v. 4. By our own work is chiefly meant our own actions or behaviour. These the apostle directs us to prove, that is, seriously to examine them by the rule of God's word. Instead of being forward to judge and censure others, it would much more become us to search and try our own ways; our business lies more at home than abroad, with ourselves than with other men. The best way to keep us from being proud of ourselves is to prove our ownselves: the better we are acquainted with our own hearts and ways, the less liable shall we be to despise and the more disposed to compassionate and help others.

1. This is the way to have rejoicing in ourselves alone. If we set ourselves in good earnest to prove our own work, this, he intimates, would be a much better ground of joy and satisfaction than to be able to rejoice in another, either in the good opinion which others may have of us, or by comparing ourselves with others. The joy that results thence is nothing to that which arises from trial of ourselves by the rule of God's word, and our being able thereupon to approve ourselves to him. Though we have nothing in ourselves to boast of, yet we may have the matter of rejoicing in ourselves. If our consciences can witness for us we may upon good ground rejoice therein. The true way to have rejoicing in ourselves is to be much in proving our own works. If we have the testimony of our consciences that we are accepted of God, we need not much concern ourselves about what others think or say of us.

2. The other argument which the apostle uses is that every man shall bear his own burden (v. 5). There is a day come when we must all give an account of ourselves to God; and he declares that then the judgment will proceed, and the sentence pass, according as our state and behaviour have really been in the sight of God. If we must certainly be called to an account hereafter, surely we ought to be often calling ourselves to an account here, to see whether or no we are such as God will own and approve then. If it were more our practice instead of bearing hard upon one another, we should be more ready to fulfil that law of Christ by which we must be judged in bearing one another's burdens.

IV. Christians are here exhorted to be free and liberal in maintaining their ministers (v. 6): Let him that is taught in the word communicate to him that teacheth, in all good things. As there are some to be taught, so there are others who are appointed to teach them. Reason itself directs us to put a difference between the teachers and the taught, and the scriptures sufficiently declare that it is the will of God we should do so. It is the word of God wherein ministers are to teach and instruct others. It is the word of God which is the only rule of faith and life. They are no further to be regarded than as they speak according to this rule. It is the duty of those who are taught in the word to support those who are appointed to teach them; for they are to communicate to them in all good things. It is but fit and equitable that, while they are sowing to others spiritual things, they should reap their carnal things.

V. A caution to take heed of mocking God, or of deceiving ourselves, by imagining that he can be imposed upon by mere professions (v. 7): Be not deceived, God is not mocked. Many are apt to excuse themselves from the work of religion, though at the same time they may make a show of it. Hereby they may possibly impose upon others, yet they do but deceive themselves if they think to impose upon God. As he cannot be deceived, so he will not be mocked. Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. Our present time is seed-time: in the other world there will be a great harvest. We shall reap then as we sow now. And he further informs us (v. 8) that, as there are two sorts of seedness, so accordingly will the reckoning be hereafter: If we sow to the flesh, we shall of the flesh reap corruption; a mean and short-lived satisfaction at present, and ruin and misery at the end of it. But, on the other hand, those who sow to the Spirit, may depend upon it that of the Spirit they shall reap life everlasting—they shall have the truest comfort in their present course, and an eternal life and happiness at the end of it. The God we have to do with will certainly deal with us hereafter, not according to our professions, but our practices.

VI. A further caution, not to be weary in well doing, v. 9. There is in all of us too great a proneness to this; we are very apt to flag and tire in duty. In due season we shall reap, if we faint not. There is a recompence of reward in reserve for all who sincerely employ themselves in well doing. Though our reward may be delayed, yet it will surely come.

VII. An exhortation to all Christians to do good in their places (v. 10): As we have therefore an opportunity, &c. It is not enough that we be good ourselves, but we must do good to others. 1. The objects of this duty are more generally all men. We are not to confine our charity and beneficence within too narrow bounds, but should be ready to extend it to all as far as we are capable. We are to have a special regard to the household of faith. Though others are not to be excluded, yet these are to be preferred. 2. The rule which we are to observe in doing good as we have opportunity. (1) We should be sure to do it while we have opportunity, or while our life lasts. We must not, as too many do, neglect it in our lifetime, and defer it till we come to die, under a pretence of doing something of this nature then: by leaving something behind us for the good of others, when we can no longer keep it ourselves. But we should take care to do good in our lifetime, yea, to make this the business of our lives. (2) We should be ready to improve every opportunity for it. Whenever God gives us an opportunity of being useful to others, he expects we should improve it, according to our capacity and ability. None who stand in need of us are to be wholly overlooked, yet there is a difference to be made between some and others.

The apostle seems as if he intended here to have put an end to the epistle. As a particular mark of his respect for them, he had written this large letter with his own hand, and had not made use of another as his amanuenis. But such is his affection to them that he cannot break off till he has once again given them the true character of those teachers.

I. False teachers were men who desired to make a fair show in the flesh, v. 12. They were very zealous for the externals of religion, though they had little or no regard to real piety, for, neither do they themselves keep the law. Frequently those have least of the substance of religion who are most solicitous to make a show of it. They constrained the Gentile Christians to be circumcised, only lest they should suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. They were willing to sleep in a whole skin, and to save their worldly cargo, and cared not though they made shipwreck of faith and a good conscience. They were men who had no further zeal for the law than as it subserved their carnal designs; for they desired to have these Christians circumcised, that they might glory in their flesh (v. 13), that they might say they had gained them over to their side.

II. He acquaints us, on the other hand, with his own temper and behaviour.

1. His principal glory was in the cross of Christ: God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 14. This was what the Jews stumbled at and the Greeks accounted foolishness; and the judaizing teachers themselves were for mixing the observance of the law of Moses with faith in Christ, as necessary to salvation. But Paul was so far from being offended at the cross of Christ that he gloried in it, and rejected the thought of setting up anything in competition with it, with the utmost abhorrence. God forbid, &c. This was the ground of all his hope as a Christian, and whatever trials his firm adherence to it might bring upon him, he was ready not only to submit to them, but to rejoice in them. There is the greatest reason why we should glory in it, for to it we owe all our joys and hopes.

2. He was dead to the world. By Christ the world was crucified to him, and he to the world. He had got above both the smiles and the frowns of it, and had become as indifferent to it as one who is dying out of it. The more we contemplate the sufferings our dear Redeemer met with from the world the less likely shall we be to be in love with it.

3. He did not lay the stress of his religion on one side or the other of the contesting interests, but on sound Christianity, v. 15. What they laid so great a stress upon Paul made very little account of. He very well knew that in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availed anything nor uncircumcision, as to men's acceptance with God, but a new creature. Here he instructs us both wherein real religion does not and wherein it does consist. It does not consist in our being in this or the other denomination of Christians; but it consists in our being new creatures; in our being renewed in the spirit of our minds and having Christ formed in us. It is a change of mind and heart, whereby we are enabled to believe in the Lord Jesus and to live a life of devotedness to God. No outward professions, nor particular names, will ever be sufficient to recommend us to him. Were Christians duly concerned to experience this in themselves, and to promote it in others, if it did not make them lay aside their distinguishing names, yet it would at least take them off from laying so great a stress upon them as they too often do. And as many as walk according to this rule peace be upon them, and mercy upon the Israel of God. The blessings which he desires or which he gives them the hope and prospect of (for the words may be taken either as a prayer or a promise), are peace and mercy. A foundation is laid for these in that gracious change which is wrought in them. These, he declares, shall be the portion of all the Israel of God, all sincere Christians, whether Jews or Gentiles, all who are Israelites indeed. The Jews and judaizing teachers were for confining these blessings to such as were circumcised. Real Christians are such as walk by rule; not a rule of their own devising, but that which God himself has prescribed to them. Even those who walk according to this rule do yet stand in need of the mercy of God. All who sincerely endeavour to walk according to this rule may be assured that peace and mercy will be upon them: this is the best way to have peace with God. As we may be sure of the favour of God now, so we may be sure that we shall find mercy with him hereafter.

4. He had cheerfully suffered persecution for the sake of Christ and Christianity, v. 17. He had already suffered much in the cause of Christ, for he bore in his body the marks of the Lord Jesus, the scars of those wounds which he had sustained from persecuting enemies, for his steady adherence to him. With a becoming warmth and vehemence, suitable to his authority as an apostle and to the deep concern of mind he was under, he insists upon it that no man should henceforth trouble him, by opposing his doctrine or authority, or by any such reproaches as had been cast upon him. It may justly be presumed that men are fully persuaded of those truths in the defence of which they are willing to suffer. It is very unjust to charge those things upon others which are contrary not only to their profession, but their sufferings too.

III. The apostle concludes the epistle with his apostolical benediction, v. 18. He calls them his brethren, and takes his leave of them with this very affectionate prayer, that the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ may be with their spirit. This was a usual farewell wish of the apostle's. And herein he prays that they might enjoy the favour of Christ, all that grace which was needful to establish them in their Christian course, and to encourage and comfort them under all the trials of life and the prospect of death itself. Though these churches had done enough to forfeit it, yet, out of his great concern for them, he earnestly desires it on their behalf; yea, that it might be with their spirit, that they might continually experience the influence of it upon their souls. We need desire no more to make us happy than the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. And, both for their and our encouragement to hope for it, he adds his Amen.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO

THE EPHESIANS

Some think that this epistle to the Ephesians was a circular letter sent to several churches. It is the only one of all Paul's epistles that has nothing in it peculiarly adapted to the case of that particular church; but it has much of common concernment to all Christians. It is an epistle that bears date out of a prison: and some have observed that what this apostle wrote when he was a prisoner had the greatest relish and savour in it of the things of God. When his tribulations did abound, his consolations did much more abound. The apostle's design is to settle and establish the Ephesians in the truth, and further to acquaint them with the mystery of the gospel. In the former part he represents the great privilege of the Ephesians, who were now converted to Christianity and received into covenant with God, ch. i–iii. In the latter part he instructs them in the principal duties of religion.

CHAP. I

I. The introduction to the whole epistle, ver. 1, 2. II. The apostle's thanksgiving and praises to God for his inestimable blessings bestowed on the believing Ephesians, ver. 3–14. III. His earnest prayers to God in their behalf, ver. 15–23.

Verses 1, 2

1. The title St. Paul takes to himself—Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ, &c. Such a one Paul was by the will of God. Every faithful minister of Christ may, with our apostle, reflect on it as an honour that he is what he is by the will of God. 2. The persons to whom this epistle is sent: To the saints who are at Ephesus. He calls them saints, for such they were in profession, and many of them were such. All Christians must be saints. He calls them the faithful in Christ Jesus. Those are not saints who are not faithful; in Christ Jesus, from whom they derive all their grace and spiritual strength. 3. The apostolical benediction: Grace be to you, &c. By grace we are to understand the free and undeserved love and favour of God, and those graces of the Spirit which proceed from it; by peace all other blessings, the fruits and product of the former. No peace without grace. No peace, nor grace, but from God the Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. These peculiar blessings proceed from God not as a Creator, but as a Father, and they come from our Lord Jesus Christ, who has a right to bestow them. The saints, and the faithful in Christ Jesus, had already received grace and peace. The best saints stand in need of fresh supplies of the graces of the Spirit: and therefore they should pray, each one for himself and all for one another, that such blessings may still abound unto them. The Spirit of God saw fit that his discourse of divine things in this chapter should be cast into prayers and praises. Prayer may preach; and praise may do so too.

Verses 3–14

He begins with thanksgivings and praise, and enlarges upon the exceedingly great and precious benefits which we enjoy by Jesus Christ.

I. He blesses God for spiritual blessings, v. 3, where he styles him the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. All blessings come from God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. He hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings. Spiritual blessings are the best blessings. He blesses us by bestowing such things upon us as make us really blessed. We cannot thus bless God in return; but by praising. Those whom God blesses with some he blesses with all spiritual blessings. It is not so with temporal blessings. They are spiritual blessings in heavenly places. Or it may be read, in heavenly things, such as come from heaven, and are designed to prepare men for it. We should hence learn to mind spiritual and heavenly blessings as the best blessings with which we cannot be miserable, and without which we cannot but be so.

II. Particular spiritual blessings enlarged upon. 1. Election and predestination, v. 4, 5, 11. Election, or choice, respects that lump or mass of mankind from which they are separated. Predestination has respect to the blessings they are designed for; particularly the adoption of children, that in due time we should become his adopted children, and so have a right to all the privileges of children. Before the foundation of the world they were chosen in the counsel of God from all eternity. The alms which you give to beggars at your doors proceed from a sudden resolve; but the provision which a parent makes for his children is the result of many thoughts. He acts in pursuance of his eternal purpose in bestowing spiritual blessings upon his people. He hath blessed us—according as he hath chosen us in him, in Christ the great head of the election. One great end and design of this choice: chosen—that we should be holy. All who are chosen to happiness as the end are chosen to holiness as the means. And without blame before him—that their holiness might not be merely external and in outward appearance, but internal and real, such holiness as proceeds from love to God and to our fellow-creatures, this charity being the principle of all true holiness. Here is also the rule and the fontal cause of God's election: it is according to the good pleasure of his will (v. 5), because it was his sovereign will. It is according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will (v. 11). The last and great end is his own glory: To the praise of the glory of his grace (v. 6), that we should be to the praise of his glory (v. 12). The glory of God is his own end, and it should be ours in all that we do. 2. The next is acceptance with God through Jesus Christ: Wherein he hath made us accepted in the beloved, v. 6. We cannot be thus accepted of God, but in and through Jesus Christ. He loves his people for the sake of the beloved. 3. Remission of sins, and redemption through the blood of Jesus, v. 7. No remission without redemption. The guilt and the stain of sin could be no otherwise removed than by the blood of Jesus. All our spiritual blessings flow down to us in that stream. It is according to the riches of God's grace. It was rich grace to provide such a surety as his own Son, when nothing of that nature could have entered into our thoughts, nor have been otherwise found out for us. He has not only manifested riches of grace, but has abounded towards us in all wisdom and prudence (v. 8). 4. Another privilege is divine revelation—that God hath made known to us the mystery of his will (v. 9). This we owe to Christ, who came to declare his will to the children of men: According to his good pleasure which he had purposed. It is described (v. 13) as the word of truth, and the gospel of our salvation. O, how ought we to prize this glorious gospel and to bless God for it! 5. Union in and with Christ is a great privilege. He gathers together in one all things in Christ, v. 10. All the lines of divine revelation meet in Christ; all religion centres in him. Jews and Gentiles were united to each other by being both united to Christ. Things in heaven and things on earth are gathered together in him; peace made between heaven and earth through him. The innumerable company of angels become one with the church through Christ: this God purposed in himself. 6. The eternal inheritance is the great blessing with which we are blessed in Christ: In whom also we have obtained an inheritance, v. 11. Heaven is the inheritance. If children, then heirs. All the blessings that we have in hand are but small if compared with the inheritance. What is laid out upon an heir in his minority is nothing to what is reserved for him when he comes to age. 7. The seal and earnest of the Spirit. We are said to be sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, v. 13. He makes us holy. He is the promised Spirit. By him believers are sealed and set apart for God. The Spirit is the earnest of our inheritance, v. 14. The earnest is part of payment, and it secures the full sum. All his influences are heaven begun, glory in the seed and bud. His comforts are earnests of everlasting joys. He is said to be the earnest, until the redemption of the purchased possession. This earnest makes it as sure to the heirs as though they were already possessed of it; and it is purchased for them by the blood of Christ. The great end and design of God in bestowing all these spiritual privileges is that we should be to the praise of his glory who first trusted in Christ. Seniority in grace is a preferment: those who have for a longer time experienced the grace of Christ are under more special obligations to glorify God. This is the great design of God in all that he has done for us: it is unto the praise of his glory, v. 14.

Paul's earnest prayer to God in behalf of these Ephesians. He has laid up these spiritual blessings for us in the hands of his Son. He has appointed us to draw them out, and fetch them in, by prayer. We have no part nor lot in the matter, any further than we claim it by faith and prayer. Note, the good account he had of them, of their faith in the Lord Jesus and love to all the saints, v. 15. Those who love saints, as such, love all saints, how weak in grace, how mean in the world, how fretful and peevish soever, some of them may be. Another inducement to pray for them was because they had received the earnest of the inheritance. Wherefore—I cease not to give thanks for you, making mention of you in my prayers, v. 16. While he blessed God for giving them the Spirit, he ceases not to pray (v. 17), that he would give greater measures of the Spirit. The great thing he prays for is the illumination of their understandings, and that their knowledge might increase and abound; he means it of a practical and experimental knowledge. The graces and comforts of the Spirit are communicated to the soul by the enlightening of the understanding. Satan takes a contrary way: he gets possession by the senses and passions, Christ by the understanding.

I. Whence this knowledge must come; from the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, v. 17. The Lord is a God of knowledge, and there is no sound saving knowledge but what comes from him. He gives knowledge by giving the Spirit of knowledge; for the Spirit of God is the teacher of the saints, the Spirit of wisdom and revelation. We have the revelation of the Spirit in the word: but will that avail us, if we have not the wisdom of the Spirit in the heart? In the knowledge of him. This knowledge is first in the understanding. He prays that the eyes of their understanding may be enlightened, v. 18. Christians should not think it enough to have warm affections, but they should labour to have clear understandings; they should be ambitious of being knowing Christians, and judicious Christians.

II. What it is that he more particularly desires they should grow in the knowledge of. 1. The hope of his calling, v. 18. There is a hope in this calling; for those who deal with God deal upon trust. We ought to labour after, and pray earnestly for, a clearer insight into, and a fuller acquaintance with, the great objects of a Christian's hopes. 2. The riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints. There is a present inheritance in the saints; for grace is glory begun, and holiness is happiness in the bud. There is a glory in this inheritance, and it is desirable to know this experimentally. It may be understood of the glorious inheritance in heaven, where God does, as it were, lay forth all his riches. Let us endeavour then, by reading, contemplation, and prayer, to know as much of heaven as we can, that we may be desiring and longing to be there. 3. The exceeding greatness of God's power towards those who believe, v. 19. It is a difficult thing to bring a soul to believe in Christ. It is nothing less than an almighty power that will work this in us. The apostle speaks as if he wanted words to express the exceeding greatness of God's almighty power, that power which God exerts towards his people, and by which he raised Christ from the dead, v. 20. That indeed was the great proof of the truth of the gospel to the world: but the transcript of that in ourselves is the great proof to us. Many understand the apostle here as speaking of that exceeding greatness of power which God will exert for raising believers to eternal life, even the same mighty power which he wrought in Christ when he raised him, &c. And how desirable a thing must it be to become at length acquainted with that power, by being raised thereby unto eternal life!

The apostle digresses a little to make mention of the Lord Jesus and his exaltation. He sits at the Father's right hand in the heavenly places, &c., v. 20, 21. The Father hath put all things under his feet (v. 22). God GAVE him to be head over all things. It was a gift to Christ, and it was a gift to the church, to be provided with a head endued with so much power and authority. He gave him all power both in heaven and in earth. The Father loves the Son, and hath given ALL things into his hands. But that which completes the comfort of this is that he is the head over all things to the church. The same power that supports the world supports the church; and we are sure he loves his church, for it is his body (v. 23), and he will care for it. It is the fulness of him that filleth all in all. Jesus Christ filleth all in all. Christ as Mediator would not be complete if he had not a church. How could he be a king if he had not a kingdom?

CHAP. II

An account, I. Of the miserable condition of these Ephesians by nature (ver. 1–3) and again, ver. 11, 12. II. Of the glorious change that was wrought in them (ver. 4–10) and again, ver. 13. III. Of the great privileges that both converted Jews and Gentiles receive from Christ, ver. 14–22. We have here a lively picture both of the misery of unregenerate men and of the happy condition of converted souls.

Unregenerate souls are dead in trespasses and sins. All those who are in their sins, are dead in sins.

Sin is the death of the soul. Wherever that prevails there is a privation of all spiritual life. A state of sin is a state of conformity to this world, v. 2. Wherein in time past you walked; you lived and behaved yourselves in such a manner as the men of the world are used to do. We are by nature bond-slaves to sin and Satan. Those who walk according to the course of this world, walk according to the prince of the power of the air. Wicked men are slaves to Satan. The course and tenor of their lives are according to his suggestions; they are subject to him, and are led captive by him at his will, whereupon he is called the god of this world, and the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience. As the good Spirit works that which is good in obedient souls, so this evil spirit works that which is evil in wicked men; and he now works, not only heretofore. Among whom also we all had our conversation in times past. We are by nature drudges to the flesh, and to our corrupt affections, v. 3, fulfilling the desires of the flesh and of the mind. We lived in the actual commission of all those sins to which corrupt nature inclined us. The carnal mind makes a man a perfect slave to his vicious appetite.—The fulfilling of the wills of the flesh, so the words may be rendered. We are by nature the children of wrath, even as others. One man is as much so as another by nature, not only by custom and imitation, but by reason of our natural inclinations and appetites. Our state and course are such as deserve wrath, and would end in eternal wrath, if divine grace did not interpose. What reason have sinners then to be looking out for that grace that will make them children of God and heirs of glory!

Verses 4–10

The glorious change that was wrought in them by converting grace.

I. By whom, and in what manner, it was brought about. Not of yourselves, v. 8. Not of works, lest any man should boast, v. 9. These things are not brought to pass by anything done by us. There is no room for any man's boasting of his own abilities and power; or as though he had done anything that might deserve such immense favours from God. But God, who is rich in mercy, &c., v. 4. God himself is the author of this great and happy change. Love is his inclination to do us good considered simply as creatures: mercy respects us as apostate and as miserable creatures. That love of God is great love, and that mercy of his is rich mercy. By grace you are saved (v. 5), and by grace are you saved through faith—it is the gift of God, v. 8. Every converted sinner is a saved sinner. The grace that saves them is the free undeserved goodness and favour of God; and he saves them, not by the works of the law, but through faith in Christ Jesus. Both that faith and that salvation are the gift of God. God has ordered all so that the whole shall appear to be of grace.

II. Wherein this change consists. 1. We who were dead are quickened (v. 5). Grace in the soul is a new life in the soul. As death seals up all the powers and faculties, so does a state of sin, as to anything that is good. Grace unlocks and opens all, and enlarges the soul. A regenerate sinner becomes a living soul, being born of God: He hath quickened us together with Christ. It is in him that we live: Because I live, you shall live also. 2. We who were buried are raised up, v. 6. When he raised Christ from the dead, he did in effect raise up all believers together with him, and when he placed him at his right hand in heavenly places, he advanced and glorified them in and with him.—And made us sit together in heavenly places in Christ Jesus. Sinners roll themselves in the dust; sanctified souls sit in heavenly places; the world is as nothing to them, compared with what it has been, and compared with what the other world is. They are exalted to reign with him; they sit upon the throne with Christ.

III. The great design of God in producing and effecting this change. 1. With respect to others: That in the ages to come he might show, &c. (v. 7), that he might give a proof of his great goodness and mercy, for the encouragement of sinners in future time. The goodness of God in saving sinners heretofore is a proper encouragement to others in after-time to hope in his grace and mercy. God having this in his design, poor sinners should take great encouragement from it. 2. With respect to the regenerated sinners themselves: For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus unto good works, &c., v. 10. We are his workmanship; not only as men, but as saints. The new man is a new creature; and God is its Creator. In Christ Jesus, that is, on the account of what he has done and suffered. Unto good works, &c. Lest he should seem to discourage good works, he here observes that God, in his new creation, has designed us for good works: Created unto good works; which God hath before ordained, that we should walk in them, or glorify God by an exemplary conversation and by our perseverance in holiness.

The miserable condition of these Ephesians by nature. Wherefore remember, &c., v. 11. Converted sinners ought frequently to reflect upon the sinfulness and misery of the state they were in by nature. Gentiles in the flesh, that is, living in the corruption of their natures. Who are called uncircumcision by that, &c., "You were reproached and upbraided for it by the formal Jews." The misery of their case, v. 12. "At that time you were," 1. "In a Christless condition without any saving relation to him." It must be a sad and deplorable thing for a soul to be without a Christ. Being without Christ, they were, 2. Aliens from the commonwealth of Israel; they did not belong to Christ's church. It is no small privilege to be placed in the church of Christ, and to share in the advantages peculiar to it. 3. They are strangers from the covenants of promise; the covenants of promise, because it is made up of promises. The Ephesians, in their gentilism, were strangers to this covenant, and all unregenerate sinners are strangers to it. 4. They had no hope. Those who are without Christ, and strangers from the covenant, can have no good hope. They were in a state of estrangement from God: Without God in the world. The words are, atheists in the world; for, though they worshipped many gods, yet they were without the true God.

The happy change that was made in their state: But now, in Christ Jesus, you who sometimes were far off, &c. They were far off from Christ, and from God himself; and therefore from all good. "But now in Christ Jesus, &c., you are made nigh." They were brought home to God. God is a help at hand to his people; and this is by the blood of Christ. Every believing sinner owes his nearness to God, to the death and sacrifice of Christ.

The great privileges that converted Jews and Gentiles both receive from Christ. Those who were in a state of enmity are reconciled. Jesus Christ is our peace, v. 14. He made peace and came to reconcile, 1. Jews and Gentiles to each other. He made both one. He broke down the middle wall of partition, the ceremonial law, called the partition-wall by way of allusion to the partition in the temple, which separated the court of the Gentiles from that into which the Jews only had liberty to enter. Thus he abolished in his flesh the enmity, v. 15. By his sufferings in the flesh, he took away the binding power of the ceremonial law, the law of commandments contained in ordinances. By taking these out of the way, he formed one church of believers, whether they had been Jews or Gentiles. Thus he made in himself of twain one new man. He framed both these parties into one new society, so making peace. 2. God and sinners, whether Jews or Gentiles. Christ came to slay that enmity, and to reconcile them both to God, v. 16. Sin breeds a quarrel between God and men. Christ came to take up the quarrel, and to bring it to an end, and this by the cross, having slain the enmity thereby. The great advantages which both parties gain, v. 17. Christ came, partly in his own person, as to the Jews, who are here said to have been nigh, and partly in his apostles to the Gentiles, who are said to have been afar off. And preached peace, reconciliation with God. Now the effect of this peace is the free access which both Jews and Gentiles have unto God (v. 18): For through him we both have access. The throne of grace is erected for us to come to, and liberty of approach to that throne is allowed us. Christ purchased for us leave to come to God, and the Spirit gives us a heart to come. Now therefore you are no more strangers and foreigners, v. 19. They were now no longer aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. The church is compared to a city, and every converted sinner is free of it. It is also compared to a house, and every converted sinner is one of the family, a servant and a child in God's house. In v. 20 the church is compared to a building. The apostles and prophets are the foundation of that building. Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone. Christ supports the building by his strength: In whom all the building, fitly framed together, &c., v. 21. All believers being united to Christ by faith, and among themselves by Christian charity, grow unto a holy temple, in which there is much communion between God and his people. The church is the place which God hath chosen to put his name there, and it becomes such a temple by grace and strength derived from himself—in the Lord. In whom you also are built together, &c., v. 22. Every true believer is a living temple, is a habitation of God through the Spirit. God dwells in all believers now, an earnest of their dwelling together with him to eternity.

CHAP. III

This chapter consists of two parts. I. Of the account which Paul gives the Ephesians concerning himself, ver. 1–13 II. Of his devout and affectionate prayer to God for the Ephesians, ver. 14 21. We may observe it to have been very much the practice of this apostle to intermix, with his instructions and counsels, intercessions and prayers to God. All his instructions and teachings would be useless and vain, except God did co-operate with them, and render them effectual.

I. The tribulations and sufferings which he endured, v. 1. "For this cause,—for asserting that the great privileges of the gospel belong not only to the Jews, but to believing Gentiles also,—for this I am now a prisoner, but a prisoner of Jesus Christ." Christ's servants, if they come to be prisoners, are his prisoners. Paul adhered to Christ, and Christ owned him, when he was in prison. For you, Gentiles the faithful ministers of Christ are to dispense his sacred truths whatever they themselves may suffer for doing so. He speaks again of his sufferings: Wherefore I desire that you faint not at my tribulation for you, which is your glory, v. 13. While he was in prison, he suffered much there; yet he would not have them discouraged nor dismayed at this. The apostle seems to have been more solicitous lest they should be discouraged and faint upon his tribulations than about what he himself endured. His sufferings, he says, were their glory. God not only sent his apostles to preach the gospel to them, but even to suffer for them.

II. The apostle informs them of God's appointing him to the office by a special revelation that he made unto him. 1. God appointed him to the office: If you have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God, which is given me to you-ward, v. 2. He styles the gospel the grace of God because it is the gift of divine grace to sinful men; and it is also the great instrument in the hands of the Spirit by which God works grace in the souls of men. Whereof I was made a minister, &c., v. 7. He was MADE a minister—he did not make himself such—according to the gift of the grace of God unto him. God supplied and furnished him for his work by the effectual working of his power, in himself more especially, and also in great numbers of those to whom he preached. What God calls men to he fits them for, and does it with an almighty power. 2. God eminently qualified him for it, by a special revelation. (1) The mystery revealed is that the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of his promise in Christ, by the gospel (v. 6). And this in Christ, being united to Christ, in whom all the promises are yea and amen; and by the gospel. This was the great truth revealed to the apostles. (2) Of the revelation of this truth he speaks, v. 3–5. The coalition of Jews and Gentiles in the gospel church was a mystery. It is called a mystery because the several circumstances of it were concealed and kept secret in God's own breast. And it is called the mystery of Christ because it was revealed by him, and because it relates so very much to him. Of this the apostle has given some hints afore in the preceding chapters. Whereby, when you read; or, as those words may be read, unto which attending (and it is not enough for us barely to read the scriptures, unless we attend to them) you may understand my knowledge in the mystery of Christ. This mystery in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit (v. 5). Who would have imagined that those who had been so long in the dark, and at so great a distance, would be enlightened with the marvellous light, and be made nigh? Let us learn hence not to despair of the worst, of the worst of persons, and the worst of nations. None so unworthy but God may please to confer great grace upon them.

III. How he was employed in this office with respect to the Gentiles, and to all men.

1. With respect to the Gentiles, he preached to them the unsearchable riches of Christ, v. 8. (1) How humbly he speaks of himself: I am less than the least of all saints. St. Paul, who was the chief of the apostles, calls himself less than the least of all saints. What can be less than the least? To speak himself as little as could be, he speaks himself less than could be. Where God gives grace to be humble, there he gives all other grace. While he magnifies his office, he debases himself. (2) How highly he speaks of Jesus Christ: The unsearchable riches of Christ. There is a mighty treasury of mercy, grace, and love, laid up in Christ Jesus, and that both for Jews and Gentiles. And they are unsearchable riches, which we cannot find the bottom of. It was the apostle's business and employment to preach these unsearchable riches of Christ among the Gentiles. "Unto me is this grace given; this special favour God has granted to such an unworthy creature as I am." And it is an unspeakable favour to the Gentile world that to them the unsearchable riches of Christ are preached. Though many remain poor, and are not enriched with these riches, yet if we are not enriched with them, it is our own fault.

2. With respect to all men, v. 9. To make all men see what is the fellowship of the mystery which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God who created all things by Jesus Christ. No wonder that he saves the Gentiles as well as the Jews; for he is the common Creator of them both. To the intent that now unto the principalities and powers in heavenly places might be known, by the church, the manifold wisdom of God, v. 10. Of the manifold wisdom of God; that is, of the great variety with which God wisely dispenses things, or of the many ways he takes in ordering his church, and especially in receiving the Gentiles into it. And this is according to the eternal purpose which he purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord, v. 11. The apostle, having mentioned our Lord Jesus Christ, subjoins concerning him, In whom we have boldness and access with confidence by the faith of him (v. 12). We have liberty to open our minds freely to God, as to a Father. We may come with humble boldness to hear from God, and we may expect to hear from him good words and comfortable.

Paul's affectionate prayer to God for his beloved Ephesians.—For this cause. This may be referred either to the immediately foregoing verse, That you faint not, &c., or, rather, the apostle is here resuming what he began at the first verse.

I. To whom he prays—to God, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

II. I bow my knees. When we draw nigh to God, we should reverence him in our hearts, and express our reverence in the most becoming behaviour. The universal church has a dependence upon the Lord Jesus Christ: Of whom the whole family in heaven and earth is named. Understand it of the saints in heaven, who wear the crown of glory, and of saints on earth who are going on in the work of grace here. Both the one and the other make but one family; and from him they are named CHRISTIANS.

III. What the apostle asks of God for these his friends—spiritual blessings. 1. Spiritual strength for the work to which they were called. That he would grant you, according to the riches of his grace, to be strengthened, &c. And the apostle prays that this may be according to the riches of his glory, or according to his glorious riches, and this by his Spirit. Strength from the Spirit of God in the inner man is the best and most desirable strength. 2. The indwelling of Christ in their hearts, v. 17. Christ is an inhabitant in the soul of every good Christian. Where his Spirit dwells, there he dwells; and he dwells in the heart by faith. Faith opens the door of the soul, to receive Christ, faith admits him, and submits to him. By faith we are united to Christ. 3. The fixing of devout affections in the soul: That you being rooted and grounded in love. Many have some love to God and to his servants, but it is a flash, like the crackling of thorns under a pot, it makes a great noise, but is gone presently. We should earnestly desire that good affections may be fixed in us. Some understand it of their being settled and established in the sense of God's love to them. And how very desirable it is to have a settled fixed sense of the love of God and Christ to our souls, so as to be able to say with the apostle at all times, He has loved me! Now the best way to attain this is to be careful that we maintain a constant love to God in our souls. 4. For their experimental acquaintance with the love of Jesus Christ. That you may be able to comprehend with all saints, &c. (v. 18, 19). Christians should not aim to comprehend above all saints; we should desire to comprehend with all saints, to have so much knowledge as the saints are allowed to have in this world. How magnificently the apostle speaks of the love of Christ. The dimensions of redeeming love are admirable: The breadth, and length, and depth, and height. By enumerating these dimensions, the apostle designs to signify the exceeding greatness of the love of Christ, the unsearchable riches of his love. We should desire to comprehend this love: it is the character of all the saints that they do so. And to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge, v. 19. If it passeth knowledge, how can we know it? We must pray and endeavour to know something, and should still covet to know more and more of it, though none can fully comprehend it: in its full extent it surpasses knowledge. 5. He prays that they may be filled with all the fulness of God. It is a high expression: we should not dare to use it if we did not find it in the scriptures. Such a fulness as God is ready to bestow, who is willing to fill them all to the utmost of their capacity, and that with all those gifts and graces which he sees they need. Those who receive grace for grace from Christ's fulness may be said to be filled with the fulness of God, according to their capacity.

The apostle closes the chapter with a doxology, v. 20, 21. How he describes God, and how he ascribes glory to him. He describes him as a God that is able to do exceedingly abundantly above all that we ask or think. There is an inexhaustible fulness of grace and mercy in God, which the prayers of all the saints can never draw dry. We should encourage our faith by a consideration of his all-sufficiency and almighty power. According to the power which worketh in us. We have already had a proof of this power of God, in what he hath wrought in us and done for us. The power that still worketh for the saints is according to that power that hath wrought in them. He ascribes glory to him. Unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus. The seat of God's praises is in the church. That little rent of praise which God receives from this world is from the church, every particular member of which, both Jew and Gentile, concurs in this work of praising God. The Mediator of these praises is Jesus Christ. All God's gifts come from him to us through the hand of Christ; and all our praises pass from us to him through the same hand. And God should and will be praised thus throughout all ages, world without end. Amen. So be it; and so it will certainly be.

CHAP. IV

In what has gone before we have heard of Christian privileges. In what follows we shall hear of Christian duties. Christian faith and Christian practice mutually befriend each other. In this chapter we have divers exhortations to important duties. I. One that is more general, ver. 1. II. An exhortation to mutual love, ver. 2–16. III. An exhortation to Christian purity and holiness of life; and that both more general (ver. 17–24) and in several particular instances, ver. 25, to the end.

Verse 1

This is a general exhortation to walk as becomes our Christian profession. Paul was now a prisoner at Rome; and he was the prisoner of the Lord. He mentions this once and again, to show that he was not ashamed of his bonds. We have here the petition of a poor prisoner: "I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you, &c. Considering what God has done for you I now come with an earnest request to you not to send me relief, nor to use your interest for the obtaining of my liberty, but, that you would approve yourselves good Christians: That you walk worthily." We are called Christians; we must answer that name, and live like Christians. We are called to God's kingdom and glory; we must walk as becomes the heirs of them.

Verses 2–16

Exhortation to mutual love. Love is the law of Christ's kingdom, the lesson of his school, the livery of his family.

I. The means of unity: Lowliness and meekness, long-suffering, and forbearing one another in love, v. 2. By lowliness we are to understand humility opposed to pride, by meekness, that excellent disposition of soul which makes men unwilling to provoke others, and not easily to be provoked. Long-suffering implies a patient bearing of injuries, without seeking revenge. Forbearing one another in love. The best Christians have need to make the best one of another, to provoke one another's graces and not their passions. We find much in ourselves which it is hard to forgive ourselves; and therefore we must not think it much if we find that in others which we think hard to forgive them, and yet we must forgive them. Now without these things unity cannot be preserved. The first step towards unity is humility. Pride and passion break the peace, and make all the mischief. Humility and meekness restore the peace. The more lowly-mindedness the more like-mindedness.

II The nature of that unity: it is the unity of the Spirit, v. 3. The seat of Christian unity is in the heart or spirit: it does not lie in one set of thoughts, nor in one form and mode of worship, but in one heart and one soul. This we should endeavour to keep. Endeavouring is a gospel word. We must do our utmost. If others will quarrel with us, we must take all possible care not to quarrel with them. In the bond of peace. Peace is a bond. Many slender twigs, bound together, become strong. The bond of peace is the strength of society. Not that it can be imagined that all good people, should be in everything just of the same length, and the same sentiments. As in a bundle of rods, they may be of different lengths and different strength; but, when they are tied together by one bond, they are stronger than any, even than the thickest and strongest was of itself.

III. The motives proper to promote this Christian unity and concord.

1. Consider how many unities there are. There should be one heart; for there is one body, and one Spirit, v. 4. Two hearts in one body would be monstrous. If there be but one body, all that belong to that body should have one heart. If we belong to Christ, we are all actuated by one and the same Spirit, and therefore should be one. Even as you are called in one hope of your calling. There is one Christ that they all hope in, and one heaven that they are all hoping for; and therefore they should be of one heart. One Lord (v. 5), that is, Christ. One faith, that is, the gospel, or, it is the same grace of faith whereby all Christians are saved. One baptism, by by which we profess our faith. One God and Father of all, v. 6. One God, who owns all the true members of the church for his children; and he is above all, and through all, by his providence upholding them: and in you all, in all believers, by his Spirit. If then there be so many ones, it is a pity but there should be one more—one heart, or one soul.

2. Consider the variety of gifts that Christ has bestowed among Christians: But unto everyone of us is given grace according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Though the members of Christ's church agree in so many things, yet there are some things wherein they differ: but this should breed no difference of affection among them, since they are all derived from the same bountiful author. They had no reason to quarrel about them because all was given according to the measure of the gift of Christ. All the ministers, and all the members of Christ, owe all the gifts and graces that they are possessed of to him; and this is a good reason why we should love one another, because to everyone of us is given grace. All to whom Christ has given grace, and on whom he has bestowed his gifts ought to love one another. The apostle takes this occasion to specify some of the gifts. And that they were bestowed by Christ he makes appear by those words of David (Ps. lxviii. 18), Wherefore he saith (v. 8), When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. Let us set ourselves to think of the ascension of Jesus Christ: that our blessed Redeemer, having risen from the dead, is gone to heaven, where he sits at the right hand of the majesty on high. Christ, when he ascended into heaven, as a triumphant conqueror, led captivity captive. It is a phrase used in the Old Testament to signify a conquest over enemies, especially over such as formerly had led others captive. He conquered those who had conquered us; such as sin, the devil, and death. Indeed, he triumphed over these on the cross; but the triumph was completed at his ascension, when he became Lord over all. And he gave gifts unto men: in the psalm it is, He received gifts for men. He received for them, that he might give to them. The apostle takes notice that he descended first, v. 9, into the lower parts of the earth. He descended to the earth in his incarnation. He descended into the earth in his burial. He that descended is the same also that ascended up far above all heavens (v. 10) into the heaven of heavens that he might fill all things, all the members of his church, with gifts and graces. The apostle next tells us what were Christ's gifts at his ascension: He gave some apostles, &c., v. 11. The great gift that Christ gave to the church at his ascension was that of the ministry of peace and reconciliation. The gift of the ministry is the fruit of Christ's ascension. The officers which Christ gave to his church were of two sorts—extraordinary ones: such were apostles, prophets, and evangelists. The apostles were chief. They having been the witnesses of his miracles and doctrine, he sent them forth to spread the gospel. The prophets seem to have been such as expounded the writings of the Old Testament. The evangelists were ordained persons whom the apostles took for their companions in travel. And then there are ordinary ministers, as pastors and teachers. Some take these two names to signify one office. Others think they design two distinct offices, and then pastors are such as are fixed at the head of particular churches; and they are frequently called bishops and elders: and the teachers were those whose work it was to instruct the people by way of exhortation. How rich is the church that has still such a variety of gifts! How kind is Christ to his church!

3. Christ's great end and design in giving gifts unto men. The gifts of Christ were intended for the good of his church. All are for the perfecting of the saints (v. 12); to bring into an orderly spiritual state those who had been dislocated and disjointed by sin, and then to advance them therein, that so each might contribute to the good of the whole.—For the work of the ministry. For the edifying of the body of Christ; that is, to build up the church, which is Christ's mystical body, by an increase of their graces, and an addition of new members. All are designed to prepare us for heaven: Till we all come, &c., v. 13. Till they all come in the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, not a bare speculative knowledge, but such as is attended with appropriation and affection.—Unto a perfect man, to our full growth of gifts and graces, free from those childish infirmities that we are subject to in the present world.—Unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ, so as to be Christians of a full maturity in all the graces derived from Christ's fulness. We shall never come to the perfect man, till we come to the perfect world. God's children, as long as they are in this world, are growing. Now see God's design in his sacred institutions, and what effect they ought to have upon us. (1) We henceforth be no more children, &c. (v. 14); no longer children in knowledge, weak in the faith, and inconstant in our judgments, easily yielding to every temptation, and being at everyone's beck. Children are easily imposed upon. We must take care of this, and of being tossed to and fro, like ships without ballast, and carried about, like clouds in the air, with such doctrines as have no truth nor solidity in them, and are therefore compared to wind. By the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive, as in an ambush, in order to circumvent the weak. The best method we can take to fortify ourselves against such is to study the sacred oracles, and to pray for the illumination and grace of the Spirit of Christ. (2) We should speak the truth in love (v. 15). Love is an excellent thing; but we must be careful to preserve truth together with it. Truth is an excellent thing; yet it is requisite that we speak it in love, and not in contention. These two should go together—truth and peace. (3) We should grow up into Christ in all things. Into Christ, so as to be more deeply rooted in him. In all things; in knowledge, love, faith. We should grow up towards maturity, which is opposed to being children. The more we grow into an acquaintance with Christ, faith in him, love to him, dependence upon him, the more we shall flourish in every grace. (4) We should be helpful one to another, as members of the same body, v. 16. Here the apostle makes a comparison between the natural body and Christ's mystical body. As there must be communion of the members of the body among themselves, so there must be mutual love and unity among Christians, in order to their spiritual improvement and growth in grace. Particular Christians receive their gifts and graces from Christ for the sake and benefit of the whole body. Unto the edifying of itself in love. Mutual love among Christians is a great friend to spiritual growth: it is in love that the body edifies itself.

Verses 17–32

There follows an exhortation to Christian purity and holiness of heart and life, and that both more general (v. 17–24) and in several particular instances, v. 25–32. This is solemnly introduced: "This I say therefore, and testify in the Lord."

I. The more general exhortation to purity and holiness of heart and life.

1. "That you henceforth walk not as other Gentiles walk." Converted Gentiles must not live as unconverted Gentiles do. Though they live among them, they must not live like them.

(1) The wickedness of the Gentile world. [1] Their understandings were darkened, v. 18. They were void of all saving knowledge. They sat in darkness, and they loved it rather than light: and by their ignorance they were alienated from the life of God. They were estranged from a life of holiness. Their wilful ignorance was the cause of their estrangement from this life of God. And what was the cause of their being thus ignorant? It was because of the blindness or the hardness of their heart. It was not because God did not make himself known to them by his works. They were ignorant because they would be so. Their ignorance proceeded from their obstinacy. [2] Their consciences were debauched and seared: Who being past feeling, v. 19. They had no sense of their sin, nor of the danger of their case. They gave themselves over unto lasciviousness. They indulged themselves in their filthy lusts. They became the slaves and drudges of sin and the devil, working all uncleanness with greediness. When men's consciences are once seared, there are no bounds to their sins.

(2) These Christians must distinguish themselves from such Gentiles: You have not so learned Christ, v. 20. It may be read, But you not so; you have learned Christ. Those who have learned Christ are saved from the darkness which others lie under; and, as they know more, they are obliged to live in a better manner than others. Learn Christ! Is Christ a book, a lesson, a way, a trade? "If so be that you have heard him (v. 21), and have been taught by him." Christ is the lesson; we must learn Christ: and Christ is the teacher; we are taught by him. As the truth is in Jesus. "You have been taught the real truth, as held forth by Christ himself, both in his doctrine and in his life." The truth of Christ then appears in its beauty and power, when it appears as in Jesus.

2. Another branch of the general exhortation follows. That you put off, concerning the former conversation, the old man, &c., v. 22–24. Here the apostle expresses himself in metaphors taken from garments. There must be sanctification, which consists of these two things: (1) The old man must be put off. The corrupt nature is called a man. It is the old man, as old Adam, from whom we derive it. It is bred in the bone, and we brought it into the world with us. It is said to be corrupt; for sin in the soul is the corruption of its faculties: and where it is not mortified, it grows daily worse and worse. According to the deceitful lusts. They promise men happiness, but render them more miserable. These therefore must be put off as an old garment that we should be ashamed to be seen in. These lusts prevailed in their former conversation. (2) The new man must be put on. It is not enough to shake off corrupt principles, but we must be actuated by gracious ones. "Be renewed in the spirit of your mind (v. 23), And that you put on the new man," v. 24. By the new man is meant the new nature, the new creature. This new man is created, or produced out of confusion and emptiness, by God's almighty power. After God: The loss of God's image upon the soul was both the sinfulness and misery of man's fallen state; and that resemblance which it bears to God is the glory, and the happiness, of the new creature. In righteousness towards men and in holiness towards God. True holiness in opposition to the ceremonial holiness of the Jews. We are said to put on this new man when we are endeavouring after this divine nature.

II. Those particular limbs of the old man that must be mortified, those filthy rags of the old nature that must be put off, and what are the peculiar ornaments of the new man. 1. Take heed of lying, and be ever careful to speak the truth (v. 25): "Wherefore, putting away lying." Of this sin the heathen were very guilty, affirming that a profitable lie was better than a hurtful truth. That branch of the new man that must be put on in opposition to it is speaking the truth in all our converse with others. All who have grace make conscience of speaking the truth. We are members one of another. Truth is a debt we owe to one another; and, if we love one another, we shall not deceive one another. We belong to the same society or body, which falsehood or lying tends to dissolve; and therefore we should avoid it, and speak truth. Lying is a very great sin. 2. "Take heed of anger and ungoverned passions. Be you angry, and sin not," v. 26. Here is an easy concession; for as such we should consider it. Be you angry. This we are apt enough to be, God knows: but we find it difficult enough to observe the restriction, and sin not. If we would be angry and not sin (says one), we must be angry at nothing but sin. One great and common sin in anger is to suffer it to burn into wrath, and then to let it rest. Before night calm and quiet your spirits, be reconciled to the offender: Let not the sun go down upon your wrath. Though anger in itself is not sinful, yet there is the utmost danger of its becoming so if it be not carefully watched. Neither give place to the devil, v. 27. Those who persevere in sinful anger and in wrath let the devil into their hearts. "Neither give place to the calumniator, or the false accuser" (so some read the words); "let your ears be deaf to whisperers, tale-bearers, and slanderers." 3. We are here warned against the sin of stealing, and advised to honest industry and to beneficence: Let him that stole steal no more, v. 28. But we must not only take heed of the sin, but conscientiously abound in the opposite duty: not only not steal, but rather let him labour, working with his hands the thing that is good. Idleness makes thieves. Men should therefore be diligent and industrious, not in any unlawful way, but in some honest calling: Working the thing which is good. Industry will keep people out of temptation of doing wrong. But there is another reason that they may be capable of doing some good. That he may have to give to him that needeth. They must labour not only that they may live themselves. Those who have but little for themselves, must cast their mite into the treasury. God must have his dues and the poor are his receivers. 4. We are here warned against corrupt communication; and directed to that which is useful and edifying, v. 29. Filthy and unclean words and discourse are poisonous and infectious, as putrid rotten meat. Christians should beware of all such discourse. We must not only put off corrupt communication, but put on that which is good to the use of edifying. Christians should endeavour to promote a useful conversation: that it may minister grace unto the hearers. It is the great duty of Christians to take care that they offend not with their lips, and that they improve discourse for the good of others. 5. Another caution against wrath and anger, with further advice to mutual love, v. 31, 32. By bitterness, wrath, and anger, are meant violent inward resentment against others: and, by clamour, intemperate speeches, by which bitterness, wrath, and anger, vent themselves. Christians should not be clamorous with their tongues. Evil speaking signifies all railing against such as we are angry with. Malice, that rooted anger which prompts men to design mischief to others. The contrary to all this follows: Be you kind one to another. This implies the principle of love in the heart, and the outward expression of it. Tender-hearted; that is, merciful, so as to be quickly moved to compassion and pity. Forgiving one another. Occasions of difference will happen among Christ's disciples; and therefore they must be ready to forgive, therein resembling God himself, who for Christ's sake hath forgiven them. Those who are forgiven of God should be of a forgiving spirit, and should forgive even as God forgives. All these particulars that the apostle has insisted on belong to the second table. He who does not conscientiously discharge them can never fear nor love God in truth and in sincerity, whatever he may pretend to.

And grieve not the Holy Spirit of God, v. 30. We must not do that which is contrary to his holy nature and his will; we must not refuse to hearken to his counsels, nor rebel against his government. Provoke not the blessed Spirit of God to withdraw his presence and his gracious influences from you! By him we are sealed unto the day of redemption. The body is to be redeemed from the power of the grave at the resurrection-day; then our full and complete happiness commences. All true believers are sealed to that day. God has distinguished them from others, and the Spirit of God is the seal. We should be undone should God take away his Holy Spirit from us.

CHAP. V

I. We have here an exhortation to mutual love and charity, ver. 1, 2. II. Against all manner of uncleanness, and some further cautions are added, and other duties recommended, ver. 3-20. III. The conscientious discharge of relative duties, from ver. 21, throughout this, and in the beginning of the next chapter.

Verses 1, 2

Exhortation to mutual love. "Because God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven you, therefore be you followers of God, or imitators of him"; for so the word signifies. This puts a great honour upon practical religion, that it is the imitating of God. We must be holy as God is holy, merciful as he is merciful, perfect as he is perfect. But there is no one attribute of God more recommended to our imitation than that of his goodness. Be you imitators of God, especially in his love. As dear children, as children (who are wont to be greatly beloved by their parents) usually resemble them in the features of their faces, and in the dispositions of their minds. Children are obliged to imitate their parents in what is good, especially when dearly beloved by them. The character that we bear of God's children obliges us to resemble him. And those only are God's dear children who imitate him. And walk in love, v. 2. It should be the principle from which we act; it should direct the ends at which we aim. As Christ also hath loved us. We are all joint sharers in that love and therefore should love one another, Christ having loved us all, he hath given himself for us. An offering and a sacrifice to God; or an offering, even a sacrifice, for a sweet-smelling savour. As he offered himself with a design to be accepted of God, so God did accept, was pleased with, that sacrifice. His example should be prevailing with us, and we should carefully copy it.

Verses 3–20

Filthy lusts must be suppressed, in order to the supporting of holy love. Walk in love, and shun fornication and all uncleanness. Now these sins must be dreaded and detested in the highest degree: Let it not be once named among you as becometh saints. The apostle not only cautions against the gross acts of sin, but against what some may be apt to make light of, and think to be excusable. Neither filthiness (v. 4), nor foolish talking, such vain discourse as betrays much folly and indiscretion, nor jesting. There is no doubt an innocent and inoffensive jesting, which we cannot suppose the apostle here forbids. But the context seems to restrain it to such pleasantry of discourse as is filthy and obscene. They are not convenient. Indeed there is more than inconvenience, even a great deal of mischief, in them. Those things do not become Christians. Christians are allowed to be cheerful and pleasant; but they must be merry and wise. But rather giving of thanks: that he may delight his mind, and make himself cheerful, by a grateful remembrance of God's goodness and mercy to him, and by blessing and praising him on account of these. A reflection on the grace and goodness of God to us, to excite our thankfulness to him, is proper to delight the Christian's mind, and to make him cheerful. If men abounded more in good and pious expressions, they would not be so apt to utter ill and unbecoming words.

I. To fortify us against the sins of uncleanness, &c., the apostle urges several arguments, and prescribes several remedies.

1. He urges several arguments, (1) Consider that these are sins which shut persons out of heaven: For this you know, &c., v. 5. There is spiritual idolatry in the love of this world. As the epicure makes a god of his belly, so the covetous man makes a god of his money. He serves mammon instead of God. Of these persons it is said that they have no inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God. In this kingdom the saints and servants of God have an inheritance. But those who allow themselves either in the lusts of the flesh or the love of the world, belong not to the kingdom of grace, nor shall they ever come to the kingdom of glory. Let us then be on our guard against those sins which would shut us out of heaven. (2) These sins bring the wrath of God upon those who are guilty of them: "Let no man deceive you with vain words," &c., v. 6. Those who flatter themselves with hopes of impunity in sin do but put a cheat upon themselves. They are vain words indeed, for because of these things cometh the wrath of God upon the children of disobedience. Disobedience is the very malignity of sin. The wrath of God comes upon such, sometimes in this world, but more especially in the next. And dare we make light of that which will lay us under the wrath of God? Be not you therefore partakers with them, v. 7. "Do not partake with them in their sins, that you may not share in their punishment." (3) Consider what obligations Christians are under to live at another rate, For you were sometimes darkness, but now, &c., v. 8. The apostles call their former condition darkness. A state of sin is a state of darkness. Sinners, like men in the dark, are going they know not whither, and doing they know not what. Now are you light in the Lord. Walk as children of light. "Now, being such, live up to the obligation you are under by that knowledge and those advantages you enjoy".—Proving what is acceptable unto the Lord (v. 10), searching diligently what God has revealed to be his will. We must not only dread and avoid that which is displeasing to God, but enquire and consider what will be acceptable to him.

2. Some remedies against them. (1) We must bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, v. 9. This is expected from the children of light, that they be also sanctified by the Spirit, and thereupon bring forth his fruit, which is in all goodness and righteousness. All religion is goodness and righteousness. With these must be truth. (2) We must have no fellowship with sin nor sinners, v. 11. Sinful works are works of darkness. These works of darkness are unfruitful works; there is nothing got by them in the long run, whatever profit is pretended by sin, it will by no means balance the loss. We must therefore have no fellowship with these unfruitful works. If we share with others in their sin, we must expect to share with them in their plagues. Rather than have fellowship with them, we must reprove them. We must witness against the sins of others, and endeavour to convince them of their sinfulness in our words; but especially by the holiness of our lives. Reprove their sins by abounding in the contrary duties. For it is a shame even to speak of those things, &c., v. 12; much more must it be a shame to have any fellowship with them. The things which are done of them in secret. A good man is ashamed to speak that which many wicked people are not ashamed to act. But all things that are reproved are made manifest by the light, v. 13. By that instructive light which is diffused by the holiness of your lives and by your exemplary walk. For whatsoever doth make manifest is light, and accordingly it becomes those who are children of light, who are light in the Lord, to discover to others their sins, thus shining as lights in the world. The apostle further urges this duty from the example of God or Christ: Wherefore he saith, &c. (v. 14). Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead. They would break off their sins by repentance, and he encourages them to do their utmost that way, by that gracious promise, And Christ shall give thee light. When we are endeavouring to convince sinners, and to reform them from their sins, we are imitating God and Christ in that which is their great design throughout the gospel. (3) Another remedy against sin is circumspection, (v. 15): See then, &c. "If you are to reprove others for their sins you must look well to yourselves, and to your own behaviour and conduct." We have here another preservative from the before-mentioned sins; it being impossible to maintain purity and holiness of heart and life without great circumspection and care. Walk circumspectly, exactly in the right way, in order to which we must be frequently consulting our rule. Not as fools, who walk at all adventures, and who through neglect, and want of care, fall into sin, and destroy themselves; but as wise, as persons taught of God. Circumspect walking is the effect of true wisdom, but the contrary is the effect of folly. Redeeming the time (v. 16), literally, buying the opportunity. It is a metaphor taken from merchants and traders who diligently observe and improve the seasons for merchandise and trade. Good Christians must be good husbands of their time. They should make the best use they can of the present seasons of grace. Our time is a talent given us by God for some good end, and it is misspent and lost when it is not employed according to his design. If we have lost our time heretofore, we must endeavour to redeem it by doubling our diligence for the future. Because the days are evil. Those were times of persecution wherein the apostle wrote this: the Christians were in jeopardy every hour. When the days are evil we know not how soon they may be worse. People are very apt to complain of bad times; it were well if that would stir them up to redeem time. "Wherefore (v. 17), be you not unwise, but understanding what the will of the Lord is." Acquaintance with the will of God, and a care to comply with it, bespeak the best and truest wisdom.

II. The apostle warns against some other particular sins, and urges some other duties. 1. He warns against the sin of drunkenness: And be not drunk with wine, v. 18. The apostle adds, wherein is excess. Drunkenness is a sin that seldom goes alone, but often involves men in other instances of guilt: it is a great hindrance to the spiritual life. 2. Instead of being filled with wine, he exhorts them to be filled with the Spirit. Those who are full of drink are not likely to be full of the Spirit. Men should labour for a plentiful measure of the graces of the Spirit, that would fill their souls with great joy, and courage, which things sensual men expect their wine should inspire them with. We ought not to be satisfied with a little of the Spirit, but to be filled with the Spirit. Now by this means we shall come to understand what the will of the Lord is. The apostle exhorts, 3. To sing unto the Lord, v. 19. Drunkards are wont to sing obscene and profane songs. The joy of Christians should express itself in songs of praise to their God. In these they should speak to themselves in their assemblies. Though Christianity is an enemy to profane mirth, yet it encourages joy and gladness. God's people have reason to rejoice, and to sing for joy. They are to sing and to make melody in their hearts; not only with their voices, but with inward affection, and then it will be done to the Lord. 4. Thanksgiving is another duty, v. 20. We should be always giving thanks; and we should give thanks for all things. It is our duty in everything to give thanks unto God and the Father.

Verses 21–33

The discharge of relative duties. As a general foundation for these duties, he lays down that rule, v. 21. There is a mutual submission that Christians owe one to another. In the fear of God, for his sake, that hereby we may give proof that we truly fear him. Where there is this mutual submission, the duties of all relations will be the better performed.

I. The duty prescribed to wives is submission to their husbands in the Lord (v. 22). The reason of this submission from wives: For the husband is the head of the wife, v. 23. God has given the man the pre-eminence and a right to direct and govern by creation. Generally, too, the man has (what he ought to have) a superiority in wisdom and knowledge. He is therefore the head, even as Christ is the head of the church, and he is the Saviour of the body. Christ's authority is exercised over the church for the saving of her from evil, and the supplying of her with everything good for her. In like manner should the husband be employed for the protection and comfort of his spouse. Therefore as the church is subject unto Christ (v. 24), with cheerfulness, with fidelity, with humility, so let the wives be to their own husbands in everything.

II. The duty of husbands is to love their wives (v. 25); for without this they would abuse their superiority, it being a special and peculiar affection that is required in her behalf. The love of Christ to the church is proposed as an example of this, which love of his is a constant affection, and that notwithstanding the imperfections and failures that she is guilty of. The greatness of his love to the church appeared in his giving himself unto the death for it. The love which God requires from the husband in behalf of his wife will make amends for the subjection which he demands from her to her husband; and the prescribed subjection of the wife will be an abundant return for that love of the husband which God has made her due. The reason why he gave himself for it: That he might sanctify and cleanse it, with the washing of water by the word (v. 26). That he might present it to himself, a glorious church, not having spot, nor wrinkle, nor any such thing, holy and without blemish, free from the least remains of sin. The church in general, and particular believers, will not be without spot or wrinkle till they come to glory. Those, and those only, who are sanctified now, will be glorified hereafter.—So ought men to love their wives as their own bodies, &c., v. 28. The wife being made one with her husband this is an argument why he should love her with as ardent an affection as that with which he loves himself. For no man ever yet hated his own flesh, v. 29—he nourishes and cherishes it: even as the Lord the church. For we are members of his body, of his flesh and of his bones, v. 30. For this cause (because they are one, as Christ and his church are one) shall a man leave his father and mother. This relation is to be preferred to all others, there being a nearer union between these two than between any others.—And they two shall be one flesh. This is a great mystery, v. 32. Those words have also a hidden mystical sense in them, relating to the union between Christ and his church. I speak concerning Christ and the church.

A brief summary of the duty of husbands and wives, v. 33. "Nevertheless let everyone of you in particular so love his wife even as himself. And the wife see that she reverence her husband." Reverence consists of love and esteem. That the wife thus reverence her husband is the will of God and the law of the relation.

CHAP. VI

I. The apostle proceeds in the exhortation to relative duties, particularly he insists on the duties of children and parents, and of servants and masters, ver. 1–9. II. He directs Christians how to behave themselves in the spiritual warfare with the enemies of their souls; and to the exercise of several Christian graces, which he proposes to them as so many pieces of spiritual armour, ver. 10–18. III. The conclusion of the epistle, ver. 19–24.

Verses 1–9

I. The duty of children to their parents: to obey their parents (v. 1). That obedience which God demands from their children includes an inward reverence, as well as the outward expressions and acts. Obey in the Lord. "Obey your parents, especially in those things which relate to the Lord. Your parents teach you good manners, and therein you must obey them. They teach you what is for your health, and in this you must obey them: but the chief things in which you are to do it are the things pertaining to the Lord." In these things especially they must see that they be obedient. For this is right, there is a natural equity in it, God has enjoined it. It is the order of nature that parents command and children obey. The apostle quotes the law of the fifth commandment. Honour thy father and mother (v. 2), which is the first commandment with promise. The promise is, That it may be well with thee, &c., v. 3. Outward prosperity and long life are blessings promised to those who keep this commandment. Obedient children are often rewarded with outward prosperity. Not indeed that it is always so; but ordinarily obedience is thus rewarded. The gospel has its temporal promises, as well as spiritual ones. We are allowed to have respect to the promised reward. This may be considered as a motive and encouragement to our obedience.

II. The duty of parents: And you fathers, v. 4. 1. "Do not provoke your children to wrath. Your children are pieces of yourselves, and therefore ought to be governed with great tenderness and love. When you caution them, when you counsel them, when you reprove them, do it in such a manner as not to provoke them to wrath, endeavouring to convince their judgments and to work upon their reason." 2. "Bring them up well, in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. Give them a good education." It is the great duty of parents to be careful in the education of their children. Not only bring them up as men, but as Christians, in the admonition of the Lord. Let them have a religious education.

III. The duty of servants. This also is summed up in one word, obedience. These servants were generally slaves. Civil servitude is not inconsistent with Christian liberty. Those may be the Lord's freemen who are slaves to men. "Your masters according to the flesh (v. 5), who have the command of your bodies, but not of your souls and consciences." 1. That they obey with fear and trembling. They are to reverence those who are over them. 2. That they be sincere in their obedience: In singleness of heart: serving them with faithfulness. 3. They should have an eye to Jesus Christ in all the service that they perform to their masters (v. 5–7), doing service as to the Lord, and not to men. Service done to their earthly masters, with an eye to him, becomes acceptable service to him also. 4. They must not serve their masters with eye-service (v. 6)—that is, only when their master's eye is upon them. Their Master in heaven beholds them: and therefore they must not act as men-pleasers. A steady regard to the Lord Jesus Christ will make men faithful and sincere in every station of life. 5. What they do they must do cheerfully: Doing the will of God from the heart, serving their masters as God wills they should. This is doing it with goodwill (v. 7). Service, performed with conscience, and from a regard to God, though it be to unrighteous masters, will be accounted by Christ as service done to himself. 6. Let faithful servants trust God for their wages, while they do their duty in his fear: Knowing that whatsoever good thing (v. 8)—the same shall he receive of the Lord. Though his master on earth should neglect or abuse him, instead of rewarding him, he shall certainly be rewarded by the Lord Christ, whether he be bond or free. Christ regards not these differences of men at present; nor will he in the great and final judgment.

IV. The duty of masters: And you masters, do the same things unto them (v. 9). Masters are under as strict obligations to discharge their duty to their servants as servants are to be obedient and dutiful to them. "Forbearing threatening. Be not tyrannical and imperious over them, knowing that your Master also is in heaven; you and they are but fellow-servants in respect of Christ. You are therefore to show favour to others, as ever you expect to find favour with him; and you will never be a match for him, though you may be too hard for your servants." Neither is there respect of persons with him. He will call masters and servants to an impartial account for their conduct one to another. If both masters and servants would consider their relation to God and the account they must shortly give to him, they would be more careful of their duty to each other.

Is not our life a warfare? It is so; for we struggle with the common calamities of human life. Is not our religion much more a warfare? It is so; for we struggle with the opposition of the powers of darkness. "Finally, my brethren (v. 10), it yet remains that you apply yourselves to your work and duty as Christian soldiers."

I. They must see that they be stout-hearted. Be strong in the Lord, &c. Those who have so many battles to fight, and who, in their way to heaven, must dispute every pass, with dint of sword, have need of a great deal of courage. Be strong therefore. Let a soldier be ever so well armed without, if he have not within a good heart, his armour will stand him in little stead. Spiritual strength and courage are very necessary for our spiritual warfare. We have no sufficient strength of our own. All our sufficiency is of God. In his strength we must go forth and go on. We must fetch in grace and help from heaven to enable us to do that which of ourselves we cannot do in our Christian work and warfare.

II. They must be well armed: "Put on the whole armour of God (v. 11). Get and exercise all the Christian graces, the whole armour, that no part be naked and exposed to the enemy." Those who would have true grace must aim at all grace, the whole armour. We have no armour of our own that will be armour of proof in a trying time. Nothing will stand us in stead but the armour of God. This armour is prepared for us, but we must put it on. The Christian should be completely armed that he may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil—that he may be able to hold out, and to overcome.

1. What our danger is, and what need we have to put on this whole armour. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, &c., v. 12. The combat is not against ordinary human enemies, not barely against men compounded of flesh and blood. (1) We have to do with an enemy who uses wiles and stratagems, as v. 11. He has a thousand ways of beguiling unstable souls. (2) He is a powerful enemy: Principalities, and powers, and rulers. They are numerous, they are vigorous, and rule in those heathen nations which are yet in darkness. Satan's is a kingdom of darkness; whereas Christ's is a kingdom of light. (3) They are spiritual enemies: Spiritual wickedness in high places, or wicked spirits, as some translate it. Our danger is the greater from our enemies because they are unseen, and assault us ere we are aware of them. These enemies are said to be in high places, or in heavenly places, so the word is. Our enemies strive to prevent our ascent to heaven. They assault us in the things that belong to our souls. We have need of faith in our Christian warfare, because we have spiritual enemies to grapple with, as well as of faith in our Christian work, because we have spiritual strength to fetch in.

2. What our duty is: to put on the whole armour of God, and then to stand our ground, and withstand our enemies.

(1) We must withstand, v. 13. We must not yield to the devil's allurements and assaults, but oppose them. If he stand up against us, we must stand against him. To stand against Satan is to strive against sin. That you may be able to withstand in the evil day, in the day of temptation, or of any sore affliction.

(2) We must stand our ground: And, having done all, to stand. Resist him, and he will flee. If we give back, he will get ground. Our present business is to withstand the assaults of the devil, and to stand it out; and then our warfare will be accomplished, and we shall be finally victorious.

(3) We must stand armed. Here is a Christian in complete armour: and the armour is divine: Armour of God. The apostle specifies the particulars of this armour, both offensive and defensive. The military girdle or belt, the breast-plate, the greaves (or soldier's shoes), the shield, the helmet, and the sword. It is observable that, among them all, there is none for the back; if we turn our back upon the enemy, we lie exposed. [1] Truth is our girdle, v. 14. This is the strength of our loins; and it girds on all other pieces of our armour, and therefore is first mentioned. I know no religion without sincerity. [2] Righteousness must be our breast-plate. The breast-plate secures the vitals, shelters the heart. The righteousness of Christ implanted in us is our breast-plate to fortify the heart against the attacks which Satan makes against us. [3] Resolution must be as the greaves to our legs: And their feet shod with the preparation of the gospel of peace, v. 15. Shoes, or greaves of brass, were formerly part of the military armour to defend the feet against the gall-traps, and sharp sticks, which were wont to be laid to obstruct the marching of the enemy, those who fell upon them being unfit to march. The preparation of the gospel of peace signifies a resolved frame of heart which will enable us to walk with a steady pace in the way of religion. It is styled the gospel of peace because it brings all sorts of peace. This will certainly preserve you from many great temptations and persecutions, as did those shoes of brass the soldiers from those gall-traps. [4] Faith must be our shield: Above all, taking the shield of faith, v. 16. This is more necessary than any of them. Faith is all in all to us in an hour of temptation. The breast-plate secures the vitals; but with the shield we turn every way. Faith is like a shield, a sort of universal defence. Our enemy the devil is here called the wicked one. He is wicked himself, and he endeavours to make us wicked. His temptations are called fiery darts, by way of allusion to the poisonous darts which were wont to inflame the parts which were wounded. Violent temptations, by which the soul is set on fire of hell, are the darts which Satan shoots at us. Faith is the shield with which we must quench these fiery darts, that they may not hit us, or at least that they may not hurt us. [5] Salvation must be our helmet (v. 17); that is, hope, which has salvation for its object. He would tempt us to despair; but good hope keeps us trusting in God, and rejoicing in him. [6] The word of God is the sword of the Spirit. It is called the sword of the Spirit, because he renders it efficacious and powerful. This, being hid in the heart, will preserve from sin. [7] Prayer must buckle on all the other parts of our Christian armour, v. 18. We must join prayer with all these graces, and we must pray always. Not as though we were to do nothing else but pray, for there are other duties that are to be done in their place and season; but we should keep up constant times of prayer. We must pray upon all occasions. We must intermix ejaculatory prayers with other duties, and with common business. Though set and solemn prayer may sometimes be unseasonable, yet pious ejaculations can never be so. We must pray with all prayer and supplications, with all kinds of prayer. We must pray in the Spirit. We must do it by the grace of God's good Spirit. We must watch thereunto, endeavouring to keep our hearts in a praying frame, and taking all occasions for the duty. This we must do with all perseverance. We must continue in it as long as we live in the world. And we must pray with supplication, not for ourselves only, but for all saints. None are so much saints, and in so good a condition in this world, but they need our prayers, and they ought to have them.

I. He desires their prayers for him, v. 19. Having mentioned supplication for all saints, he puts himself into the number. We must pray for all saints, and particularly for God's faithful ministers. "That utterance may be given unto me; and that I may open my mouth boldly. To make known the mystery of the gospel." The whole gospel was a mystery, till made known by divine revelation. Paul had a great command of language; they called him Mercury, because he was the chief speaker (Acts xiv. 12), and yet he would have his friends ask of God the gift of utterance for him. He was a man of great courage, yet he would have them pray that God would give him boldness. He knew as well what to say as any man; yet he desires them to pray for him, that he may speak as he ought to speak. For the sake of the gospel he was an ambassador in bonds, v. 20. He was persecuted and imprisoned for preaching the gospel; though, notwithstanding, he continued in the embassy committed to him by Christ. The best ministers may receive advantage by the prayers of good Christians; and therefore should earnestly desire them.

II. He recommends Tychicus unto them, v. 21, 22. He sent him with this epistle, that he might acquaint them how he did, and what he did. It is desirable to good ministers both that their Christian friends should know their state and that they should be acquainted with the condition of their friends; for by this means they may the better help each other in their prayers.—And that he might comfort their hearts, by giving such an account of his sufferings, as might prevent their fainting at his tribulations and even minister matter of joy and thanksgiving unto them. Tychicus was a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord. He was very dear to Paul, which makes Paul's love to these Christian Ephesians the more observable, in that he should now part with so good and dear a friend for their sakes. But the faithful servants of Jesus Christ are wont to prefer the public good to their own personal interests.

III. He concludes with his good wishes and prayers for them, and not for them only, but for all the brethren, v. 23, 24. Peace be to the brethren, and love with faith; faith and love including all the rest. It is the continuance and increase of these that he desires for them, in whom they were already begun. From God the Father, &c. The closing benediction is more extensive than the former; for in this he prays for all true believers at Ephesus, and everywhere else. Our love to Christ is not acceptable, unless it be in sincerity: indeed there is no such thing as love to Christ, whatever men may pretend, where there is not sincerity. Grace, that is, the favour of God, and all good, the product of it, are and shall be with all those who thus love our Lord Jesus Christ. And it is, or ought to be, the prayer of every lover of Christ that it may be so with all his fellow-christians. Amen, so be it.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO

THE PHILIPPIANS

Philippi was a chief city of the western part of Macedonia. It is most remarkable among Christians for this epistle, which was written when Paul was a prisoner at Rome. Paul seems to have had a very particular kindness for the church at Philippi, which he himself had been instrumental in planting; he had, upon that account, a particular fatherly tender care of this. He looked upon them as his children, and, having begotten them by the gospel, he was desirous by the same gospel to nourish and nurse them up. I. He was called in an extraordinary manner to preach the gospel at Philippi. A vision appeared to Paul in the night: There stood a man of Macedonia, and prayed him, saying, Come over into Macedonia, and help us. He saw God going before him. II. At Philippi he suffered hard things; yet he had not the less kindness for the place. We must never love our friends the less for the ill treatment which our enemies give us. III. The beginnings of that church were very small; yet that did not discourage him. If good be not done at first, it may be done afterwards and the last works may be more abundant. IV. It seems that this church at Philippi grew into a flourishing church, and particularly that the brethren were very kind to Paul. He acknowledges the receipt of a present they had sent him (ch. iv. 18), and this when no other church communicated with him as concerning giving and receiving (v. 15).

CHAP. I

The inscription and benediction, ver. 1, 2. He gives thanks for the saints at Philippi, ver. 3–6. He speaks of his great affection (ver. 7, 8), his prayers for them (ver. 9–11), his care to prevent their offence at his sufferings (ver. 12–20), his readiness to glorify Christ by life or death (ver. 21–26), and then concludes with a double exhortation to strictness and constancy, ver. 27–30.

I. The persons writing the epistle—Paul and Timotheus, the servants of Jesus Christ. The highest honour of the greatest apostle, and most eminent ministers, is to be the servants of Jesus Christ; not the masters of the churches, but the servants of Christ.

II. The persons to whom it is directed. 1. To all the saints in Christ who are at Philippi. He mentions the church before the ministers, because the ministers are for the church, not the churches for the ministers. They are not only the servants of Christ, but the servants of the church for his sake. It is directed to all the saints, one as well as another, even the meanest, the poorest, and those of the least gifts. Christ makes no difference; the rich and the poor meet together in him: Saints in Christ Jesus. Out of Christ the best saints will appear sinners, and unable to stand before God. 2. With the bishops and deacons, the bishops or elders, whose office it was to teach and rule, and the deacons, or overseers of the poor, who took care of the outward business of the house of God. These were all the offices which were then known in the church, and which were of divine appointment.

III. The apostolical benediction: Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ, v. 2. This is the same, almost word for word, in all the epistles, we must not be shy of forms, though we are not to be tied down to them. Grace and peace—the free favour and goodwill of God, and all the blessed fruits and effects of it, and that from God our Father, and from the Lord Jesus Christ. No peace without grace. Inward peace springs from a sense of divine favour. No grace and peace but from God our Father, the fountain and original of all blessings. No grace and peace from God our Father, but in and through our Lord Jesus Christ.

The apostle proceeds to thanksgiving for the saints at Philippi.

I. Paul remembered them: he bore them much in his thoughts. Upon every mention of you. As he often thought of them, so he often spoke of them, and delighted to hear them spoken of. It is a pleasure to hear of the welfare of an absent friend.

II. He remembered them with joy. At Philippi he was maltreated; and yet he remembers Philippi with joy. So far was he from being ashamed of them, or loth to hear of the scene of his sufferings, that he remembered it with joy.

III. He remembered them in prayer: Always in every prayer of mine for you all, v. 4. The best remembrance of our friends is to remember them at the throne of grace. He had seasons of prayer for the church at Philippi. God gives us leave to be thus free with him, though, for our comfort, he knows whom we mean when we do not name them.

IV. He thanked God upon every joyful remembrance of them. Thanksgiving must have a part in every prayer. What we have the comfort of, God must have the glory of. He thanked God, as well as made requests with joy.

V. I thank my God. It encourages us in prayer, and enlarges the heart in praise, to see every mercy coming from the hand of God as our God.—I thank my God upon every remembrance of you. He gives thanks to God. 1. For the comfort he had in them: for your fellowship in the gospel, from the first day until now, v. 5. Gospel fellowship is a good fellowship. Those who sincerely receive the gospel have fellowship in it from the very first day: a new-born Christian, if he is true-born, is interested in all the promises of the gospel from the first day of his becoming such. —Until now. It is a great comfort to ministers when those who begin well hold on and persevere. 2. For the confidence he had concerning them (v. 6): Being confident of this very thing, &c. The confidence of Christians is the great comfort of Christians, and we may fetch matter of praise from our hopes as well as from our joys. Paul speaks with much confidence. That he who has begun a good work in you will perform it unto the day of Jesus Christ. A good work among you—he who hath planted Christianity in the world will preserve it as long as the world stands. But it is rather to be applied to particular persons, and then it speaks of the certain accomplishment of the work of grace wherever it is begun. (1) The work of grace is a good work. It makes us like God, and fits us for the enjoyment of God.

(2) Wherever this good work is begun it is of God's beginning: He has begun a good work in you. We could not begin it ourselves, for we are by nature dead in trespasses and sins: and what can dead men do towards raising themselves to life? It is God who quickens those who are thus dead. (3) The work of grace is but begun in this life; it is not finished here. (4) If the same God who begins the good work did not undertake the carrying on and finishing of it, it would lie for ever unfinished. (5) We may be confident that God will finish the work of his own hands. (6) The work of grace will never be perfected till the day of Jesus Christ. When he shall come to judge the world, then this work will be complete.

Verses 7, 8

The ardent affection he had for them: I have you in my heart, v. 7. 1. Why he had them in his heart: Inasmuch as both in my bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel, you are all partakers of my grace; they were partakers of that grace of God which by him was communicated to them. This makes people dear to their ministers—their receiving benefit by their ministry. Or, "You are partakers of my grace, you have joined with me in doing and suffering." They were partakers of his affliction by sympathy and concern, and readiness to assist him. Those shall share in the reward, who bear their part of the burden. He loved them because they adhered to him in his bonds, and in the defence and confirmation of the gospel: they were as ready to appear in their places for the defence of the gospel, as the apostle was in his. Fellow sufferers should be dear one to another. 2. The evidence of it: It is meet for me to think this of you all, because I have you in my heart. By this it appeared that he had them in his heart, because he had a good opinion of them. It is very proper to think the best of other people, and as well as we can of them. 3. An appeal to God concerning the truth of this (v. 8): For God is my record how greatly I long after you all in the bowels of Jesus Christ. Having them in his heart, he longed after them. He had joy in them (v. 4), because of the good he saw and heard of among them. He longed after them all, not only those among them who were witty and wealthy, but even the meanest and poorest; and he longed greatly after them. And this in the bowels of Jesus Christ, with that tender concern which Christ himself has and has shown to precious souls. Paul was herein a follower of Christ, and all good ministers should aim to be so. Shall not we pity and love those souls whom Christ had such a love and pity for? For this he appeals to God: God is my record. "Whether you know it or not, God, who knows the heart, knows it."

Verses 9–11

The prayers he put up for them. Paul often let his friends know what it was he begged of God for them, that they might know what to beg for themselves, and that they might be encouraged to hope they should receive from God the comforting grace which Paul asked of God for them. He prayed, 1. That they might be a loving people: That your love might abound yet more and more. Those who abound much in any grace have still need to abound more and more, because we are imperfect in our best attainments. 2. That they might be a knowing and judicious people: that love might abound in knowledge and in all judgment. It is not a blind love that will recommend us to God. Strong passions, without knowledge and a settled judgment, will not make us complete in the will of God, and sometimes do more hurt than good. 3. That they might be a discerning people. That you may approve the things which are excellent (v. 10); or, as it is in the margin, Try the things which differ; that we may approve the things which are excellent upon the trial of them, and discern their difference from other things. The truths and laws of Christ are excellent things. We only need to try them, to approve of them. 4. That they might be an honest upright-hearted people: That you may be sincere. Sincerity is our gospel perfection. When we are really what we appear to be, and mean honestly, then we are sincere. 5. That they might be an inoffensive people: that you may be without offence until the day of Christ; not apt to take offence; and very careful not to give offence to God or their brethren. And we must continue to the end blameless, that we may be presented so at the day of Christ. 6. That they might be a fruitful useful people (v. 11): Being filled with the fruits of righteousness, &c. From God is our fruit found, and therefore from him it must be asked. Being filled with them. Fear not being emptied by bringing forth the fruits of righteousness, for you will be filled with them. These fruits are by Jesus Christ, and they are unto the glory and praise of God. We must not aim at our own glory in our fruitfulness. It is much for the honour of God, when Christians not only are good, but do good, and abound in good works.

Verses 12–20

He was now a prisoner at Rome; this might be a stumbling-block to those who had received the gospel by his ministry. They might be shy of owning this doctrine, lest they should be involved in the same trouble themselves. Now to take off the offence of the cross, he expounds this dark and hard chapter of his sufferings.

I. He suffered by the sworn enemies of the gospel; but they should not be stumbled at this, for good was brought out of it, and it tended to the furtherance of the gospel (v. 12): The things which happened unto me have fallen out rather unto the furtherance of the gospel.

A strange chemistry of Providence this, to extract so great a good as the enlargement of the gospel out of so great an evil as the confinement of the apostle.

1. It alarmed those who were without (v. 13): My bonds in Christ are manifest in all the palace and in all other places. Paul's sufferings made him known at court, and this might lead some of them to enquire after the gospel for which he suffered, which they might otherwise have never heard of. When his bonds were manifest in the palace, they were manifest in all other places.

2. It emboldened those who were within. As his enemies were startled at his sufferings, so his friends were encouraged by them. Many of the brethren in the Lord waxing confident by my bonds, v. 14. When they saw Paul imprisoned for Christ, they were so far from being deterred from preaching Christ and praising his name, that it made them the more bold. If they should be hurried from the pulpit to the prison, they could be reconciled to it, because they would be there in such good company. Besides, the comfort which Paul had in his sufferings greatly encouraged them. They saw that those who served Christ served a good Master, who could both bear them up and bear them out. Waxing confident by my bonds. That which was intended by the enemy to discourage the preachers of the gospel was overruled for their encouragement. And are much more bold to speak the word without fear: they see the worst of it, and therefore are not afraid to venture.

II. He suffered from false friends as well as from enemies (v. 15, 16): Some preach Christ even of envy and strife. The one preach Christ of contention, not sincerely. There were those who envied Paul's reputation in the churches, and endeavoured to supplant and undermine him. Supposing to add affliction to my bonds. However, there were others who were animated by Paul's sufferings to preach Christ the more vigorously: Some also of goodwill, and love.—Knowing that I am set for the defence of the gospel. This made them the more bold to preach the word.

III. How easy he was in the midst of all: Notwithstanding every way, whether in pretence or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice, yea, and I will rejoice, v. 18. It is God's prerogative to judge of the principles men act upon; this is out of our line. Paul was so far from envying those who had liberty to preach the gospel that he rejoiced in the preaching of it even by those who do it in pretence, and not in truth.

1. It tended to the salvation of the souls of men: I know that this shall turn to my salvation, v. 19. God can bring good out of evil. What reward can those expect who preach Christ out of strife, and envy, and contention, and to add affliction to a faithful minister's bonds? who preach in pretence, and not in truth? And yet even this may turn to the salvation of others; and Paul's rejoicing in it turned to his salvation too. Through your prayers, and the supply of the Spirit of Christ. The prayers of the people may bring a supply of the Spirit to their ministers, to support them in suffering, as well as in preaching the gospel.

2. It would turn to the glory of Christ, v. 20. According to my earnest expectation and hope, that in nothing I shall be ashamed, &c. The great desire of every true Christian is that Christ may be magnified and glorified. Those who truly desire that Christ may be magnified desire that he may be magnified in their body. They are willing to serve his designs with every member of their body, as well as faculty of their soul. That in nothing I shall be ashamed, but that with all boldness Christ may be magnified. The boldness of Christians is the honour of Christ. Those who make Christ's glory their desire may make it their expectation and hope. If it be truly aimed at, it shall certainly be attained. Those who desire that Christ may be magnified in their bodies have a holy indifference whether it be by life or by death. They refer it to him which way he will make them serviceable to his glory, whether by their living to his honour in working for him or dying to his honour in suffering for him.

We have here an account of the life and death of blessed Paul: his life was Christ, and his death was gain. It is the undoubted character of every good Christian that to him to live is Christ. The glory of Christ ought to be the end of our life. All those to whom to live is Christ to them to die will be gain. Death is a great loss to a carnal worldly man; but to a good Christian it is gain. It delivers him from all the evils of life, and brings him to the possession of the chief good. Some read the whole expression thus: To me, living and dying, Christ is gain. "I desire no more, neither while I live nor when I die, but to win Christ and be found in him."

I. If I live in the flesh, this is the fruit of my labour (v. 22), that is, Christ is. He reckoned his labour well bestowed, if he could be instrumental to advance the kingdom of Christ in the world. It is worth while for a good Christian and a good minister to live in the world as long as he can glorify God and do good to his church. Yet what I shall choose I wot not; for I am in a strait betwixt two. It was a blessed strait which Paul was in, not between two evil things, but between two good things. Paul was in a strait between two blessings—living to Christ, and being with him.

1. His inclination was for death. We have naturally an aversion to death, but he had an inclination to it (v. 23); Having a desire to depart, and to be with Christ. It is being with Christ which makes a departure desirable to a good man. If I cannot be with Christ without departing, I shall reckon it desirable on that account to depart. Which is far better. Those who know the value of Christ and heaven will readily acknowledge it far better to be in heaven than to be in this world, to be with Christ. If we come to be with Christ, farewell sin and temptation, farewell sorrow and death, for ever.

2. His judgment was rather to live awhile longer in this world, for the service of the church (v. 24): Nevertheless to abide in the flesh is more needful for you. Paul's strait was not between living in this world and living in heaven; between these two there is no comparison: but his strait was between serving Christ in this world and enjoying him in another. To advance the interest of Christ and his church, he chose rather to tarry here, where he met with oppositions and difficulties, and to deny himself for awhile the satisfaction of his reward.

II. And, having this confidence, I know that I shall abide and continue with you all for your furtherance and joy of faith, v. 25. What a great confidence Paul had in the divine Providence, that it would order all for the best to him. Whatsoever is best for the church, we may be sure God will do. What ministers are continued for: For our furtherance and joy of faith, our further advancement in holiness and comfort. What promotes our faith and joy of faith is very much for our furtherance in the way to heaven. The more faith the more joy, and the more faith and joy the more we are furthered in our Christian course.

III. That your rejoicing may be more abundant in Jesus Christ for me, by my coming to you again, v. 26. They rejoiced in the hope of seeing him, and enjoying his further labours among them. All our joys should terminate in Christ. Our joy in good ministers should be our joy in Christ Jesus for them.

Verses 27–30

I. He exhorts them to strictness of conversation (v. 27): Only let your conversation be as becometh the gospel of Christ. Let it be in all respects as those who belong to the kingdom of God among men. It is an ornament to our profession when our conversation is of a piece with it.—That whether I come and see you, or else be absent, I may hear of your affairs. Our religion must not be bound up in the hands of our ministers. Whether ministers come or no, Christ is always at hand. Let me hear of you that you stand fast in one spirit, with one mind striving together for the faith of the gospel. It becomes those who profess the gospel to strive for it. There is much opposition, and there is need of striving. A man may sleep and go to hell; but he who will go to heaven must look about him and be diligent. The unity and unanimity of Christians become the gospel: Strive together, not strive one with another. One spirit and one mind become the gospel. Steadfastness becomes the gospel: Stand fast in one spirit, with one mind. It is a shame to religion when the professors of it are off and on, unfixed in their minds, and unstable as water. Those who would strive for the faith of the gospel must stand firm to it.

II. He exhorts them to courage and constancy in suffering: And in nothing terrified by your adversaries, v. 28. Whatever oppositions we meet with, we must not be frightened at them. Persecuting is an evident token of perdition. Those who oppose the gospel of Christ are marked out for ruin. But being persecuted is a token of salvation. Not that it is a certain mark; many hypocrites have suffered for their religion; but it is a good sign that we are in good earnest in religion, when we are enabled in a right manner to suffer for the cause of Christ.—For to you it is given on the behalf of Christ not only to believe, but also to suffer for his name, v. 29. To believe in him. Faith is God's gift on the behalf of Christ. To suffer for the sake of Christ is a valuable gift too. If we suffer reproach and loss for Christ, we are to reckon it a great gift, always provided we behave under our sufferings with the genuine temper of martyrs (v. 30): "Having the same conflict which you saw in me, and now hear to be in me; suffering in the same manner as you saw and now hear of me that I suffer." It is not simply the suffering, but the cause, and not only the cause, but the spirit, which makes the martyr.

CHAP. II

Further exhortations to be like-minded, and lowly-minded, which he presses from the example of Christ (ver. 1–11), to be diligent and serious (ver. 12, 13), and to adorn their Christian profession, ver. 14–18. Particular notice and commendation of Timothy and Epaphroditus, whom he designed to send to them, ver. 19–30.

Verses 1–11

Further exhortations to Christian duties.

I. The great gospel precept pressed upon us; to love one another. This he represents (v. 2) by being like-minded, having the same love, being of one accord, of one mind. Christians should be one in affection, whether they can be one in apprehension or no. Having the same love. Christian love ought to be mutual love. Love, and you shall be loved. Being of one accord, and of one mind; unanimously agreeing in the great things of God and keeping the unity of the Spirit in other differences.

1. The pathetic pressing of the duty. The inducements to brotherly love are these: (1) "If there is any consolation in Christ. Have you experienced consolation in Christ? Evidence that experience by loving one another." Do we expect consolation in Christ? If we would not be disappointed, we must love one another. (2) "Comfort of love. If there is any comfort in God's love to you, in your love to God, or in your brethren's love to us, be you like-minded." (3) "Fellowship of the Spirit. If there is such a thing as communion with God and Christ by the Spirit, such a thing as the communion of saints, be you like-minded." (4) "Any bowels and mercies, in God and Christ, towards you. If you expect the benefit of God's compassions to yourselves, be you compassionate one to another." (5) Another argument is the comfort it would be to him: Fulfil you my joy. It is the joy of ministers to see people like-minded and living in love. He had been instrumental in bringing them to the grace of Christ and the love of God. "Now," says he, "fulfil the joy of your poor minister, who preached the gospel to you."

2. Some means to promote it. (1) Do nothing through strife and vain glory, v. 3. Christ came to slay all enmities; therefore let there not be among Christians a spirit of opposition. Christ came to humble us, and therefore let there not be among us a spirit of pride. (2) We must esteem others in lowliness of mind better than ourselves, be severe upon our own faults and charitable in our judgment of others. We must esteem the good which is in others above that which is in ourselves; for we best know our own unworthiness and imperfections. (3) We must interest ourselves in the concerns of others, in Christian love and sympathy: Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others, v. 4. A selfish spirit is destructive of Christian love. We must love our neighbour as ourselves, and make his case our own.

II. A gospel pattern proposed is the example of our Lord Jesus Christ: Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus, v. 5. Christians must be of Christ's mind. We must bear a resemblance to his life, if we would have the benefit of his death. He was eminently humble, and this is what we are peculiarly to learn of him. If we were lowly-minded, we should be like-minded; and, if we were like Christ, we should be lowly-minded. Walk in the same spirit with the Lord Jesus, who humbled himself to sufferings and death for us.

1. Here are the two natures of Christ. His divine nature: Who being in the form of God (v. 6), partaking of the divine nature, as the eternal Son of God. He thought it no robbery to be equal with God; did not think himself guilty of any invasion of what did not belong to him. It is the highest degree of robbery for any mere man or mere creature to pretend to be equal with God. His human nature: He was made in the likeness of men, and found in fashion as a man. He was really and truly man. And he voluntarily assumed human nature; it was his own act. We cannot say that our participation of the human nature is so. Herein he emptied himself, to clothe himself with the rags of human nature. Here are,

2. His two estates, of humiliation and exaltation. (1) His humiliation. The form of a servant. He was not only God's servant, but he came to minister to men, and was among them as one who serveth. One would think that the Lord Jesus, if he would be a man, should have been a prince. But quite the contrary: He took upon him the form of a servant. He was brought up meanly, probably working with his supposed father at his trade. His whole life was a life of humiliation. But the lowest step of his humiliation was his dying the death of the cross. He became obedient to death, even the death of the cross. He not only suffered, but was voluntarily obedient. There is an emphasis laid upon the manner of his dying, which had in it all the circumstances possible which are humbling: Even the death of the cross, a cursed, shameful death,—full of pain,—and the death of a malefactor and a slave, not of a freeman,—exposed as a public spectacle. (2) His exaltation: Wherefore God also hath highly exalted him. Because he humbled himself, God exalted him; and he highly exalted him. He exalted his whole person, the human nature as well as the divine. His exaltation here is made to consist in honour and power. He had a name above every name. Every knee must bow to him. The whole creation must be in subjection to him: things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth, the inhabitants of heaven and earth, the living and the dead. At the name of Jesus all should pay a solemn homage. Every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord. The kingdom of Christ reaches to heaven and earth, and to all the creatures in each, and to the dead as well as the living.—To the glory of God the Father. Whatever respect is paid to Christ redounds to the honour of the Father.

I. He exhorts them to diligence and seriousness in the Christian course: Work out your own salvation. It concerns us above all things to secure the welfare of our souls: whatever becomes of other things, let us take care of our best interests. It is our own salvation. It is not for us to judge other people; we have enough to do to look to ourselves. We are required to work out our salvation. The word signifies working thoroughly and taking true pains. We must not only work at our salvation, by doing something now and then about it; but we must work out our salvation, by doing all that is to be done, and persevering therein to the end. We cannot attain salvation without the utmost care and diligence. With fear and trembling, that is, with great care and circumspection. Fear is a great guard and preservative from evil.

II. He urges this from the consideration of their readiness always to obey the gospel: "As you have always obeyed, not as in my presence only, but now much more in my absence," v. 12. They were not merely awed by the apostle's presence, but did it even much more in his absence. "And because it is God who worketh in you, do you work out your salvation. Work, for he worketh." God is ready to concur with his grace, and assist our faithful endeavours. The operations of God's grace in us are so far from excusing, that they are intended to quicken our endeavours. "And work out our salvation with fear and trembling, for he worketh in you. Work with fear, for he works of his good pleasure."—To will and to do. It is the grace of God which inclines the will to that which is good: and then enables us to perform it. Of his good pleasure. As we cannot act without God's grace, so we cannot pretend to deserve it.

Verses 14–18

The apostle exhorts them to adorn their Christian profession by a suitable temper and behaviour. 1. By a cheerful obedience to the commands of God (v. 14): "Do all things without murmurings. Mind your work, and do not quarrel with it." God's commands were given to be obeyed, not to be disputed. 2. By peaceableness and love one to another. "Do all things without disputing. The light of truth and the life of religion are often lost in the heats and mists of disputation." 3. By a blameless conversation towards all men (v. 15): "That you may be blameless and harmless, the sons of God, without rebuke." We should endeavour not only not to do hurt, but not to come under the just suspicion of it. The sons of God. The children of God should differ from the sons of men. Without rebuke. We should endeavour, not only to get to heaven, but to get thither without a blot. In the midst of a crooked and perverse generation. Where there is no true religion, little is to be expected but crookedness and perverseness; and the more crooked and perverse others are among whom we live, the more careful we should be to keep ourselves blameless and harmless. Among whom you shine as lights in the world. Good Christians are lights in the world. When God raises up a good man in any place, he sets up a light in that place. They must shine as well as be sincere.—Holding forth the word of life, v. 16. It is our duty not only to hold fast, but to hold forth the word of life; to hold it forth for the benefit of others, to hold it forth as the candlestick holds forth the candle. "That I may rejoice in the day of Christ; not only rejoice in your steadfastness, but in your usefulness." He would have them think that he had not run in vain, nor laboured in vain. Running denotes vehemence and vigour; labour denotes constancy and close application. It is a great joy to ministers when they perceive that they have not run in vain, nor laboured in vain; and it will be their rejoicing in the day of Christ, when their converts will be their crown. The apostle not only ran and laboured for them with satisfaction, he was ready to suffer for their good (v. 17): Yea, and if I be offered upon the sacrifice and service of your faith, I joy and rejoice with you all. He could willingly be a sacrifice at their altars, to serve the faith of God's elect. Could Paul think it worth while to shed his blood for the service of the church, and shall we think it much to take a little pains? He could rejoice to seal his doctrine with his blood (v. 18): For the same cause also do you joy and rejoice with me. It is the will of God that good Christians should be much in rejoicing; and those who are happy in good ministers have a great deal of reason to joy and rejoice with them.

Verses 19–30

I. He speaks of Timothy, whom he intended to send to the Philippians. For I have no man like-minded, who will naturally care for your state. Timothy was a non-such. None comparable to Timothy, a man of an excellent spirit and tender heart. Who will naturally care for your state. It is best with us when our duty becomes in a manner natural to us. Naturally, that is, sincerely, and not in pretence only. It is the duty of ministers to care for the state of their people and be concerned for their welfare. It is a rare thing to find one who does it naturally. All seek their own, not the things which are Jesus Christ's, v. 21. Did Paul say this in haste, as David said, All men are liars? He means the generality; all, either the most, or all in comparison of Timothy. Many prefer their own credit, ease, and safety, before truth, holiness, and duty, but Timothy was none of these.—You know the proof of him, v. 22. Timothy was a man who had been tried, and was faithful in all that befell him. All the churches with whom he had acquaintance knew the proof of him. He was a man as good as he seemed to be. As a son with a father, he hath served with me in the gospel. He was Paul's assistant in many places. Their ministrations together were with great respect on the one side and great tenderness and kindness on the other—an admirable example to elder and younger ministers united in the same service. Him therefore I hope to send presently, as soon as I shall see how it will go with me, v. 23. He was now a prisoner, and did not know what would be the issue. He hoped to come himself (v. 24): But I trust in the Lord that I also myself shall come shortly. Paul desired his liberty, not that he might take his pleasure, but that he might do good.—I trust in the Lord. He expresses his hope of seeing them, with a humble submission to the divine will.

II. Concerning Epaphroditus, whom he calls his brother, and companion in labour, and fellow-soldier, who ministered to my wants. He had an earnest desire to come to them, and Paul was willing he should. 1. Epaphroditus had been sick: They had heard that he had been sick, v. 26. And indeed he was sick, nigh unto death, v. 27. 2. The Philippians were exceedingly sorry to hear of his sickness. He was one for whom they had a particular respect and affection, and thought fit to choose out to send to the apostle. 3. It pleased God to recover and spare him: But God had mercy on him, v. 27. The apostle owns it is a great mercy to himself, as well as to Epaphroditus and others. He was sensibly touched with the thoughts of so great a loss: Lest I should have sorrow upon sorrow. "Lest, besides the sorrow of my own imprisonment, I should have the sorrow of his death." 4. Epaphroditus was willing to pay a visit to the Philippians, that he might be comforted with those who had sorrowed for him when he was sick: "That when you see him again you may rejoice" (v. 28). He gave himself the pleasure of comforting them by the sight of so dear a friend. "Receive him therefore in the Lord with all gladness, and hold such in reputation: account such men valuable, who are zealous and faithful, and let them be highly loved and regarded." It seems he had caught his illness in the work of God: It was for the work of Christ that he was nigh to death, and to supply their lack of service to him. The apostle reckons they ought to love him the more upon that account. What is given us in answer to prayer should be received with great thankfulness and joy.

CHAP. III

He cautions them against judaizing seducers (ver. 1–3) and proposes his own example (ver. 4–8), describes the matter of his own choice (ver. 9–16), and closes with an exhortation to beware of wicked men, and to follow his example ver. 17–21.

Verses 1–3

It seems the church of the Philippians, though a faithful and flourishing church, was disturbed by the judaizing teachers.

I. He exhorts them to rejoice in the Lord (v. 1). The more we take of the comfort of our religion the more closely we shall cleave to it: the more we rejoice in Christ the more willing we shall be to suffer for him, and the less danger of being drawn away from him.

II. He cautions them to take heed of those false teachers: To write the same thing to you to me indeed is not grievous, but for you it is safe. Ministers must not think anything grievous to themselves which they have reason to believe is safe and edifying to the people. It is good for us often to hear the same truths. It is a wanton curiosity to desire always to hear some new thing. Beware of dogs, v. 2. Dogs, for their malice against the faithful professors of the gospel of Christ, barking at them and biting them. They cried up good works in opposition to the faith of Christ; but Paul calls them evil workers: they boasted themselves to be of the circumcision; but he calls them the concision.

III. He describes true Christians. We are the circumcision, who worship God in the spirit, and rejoice in Christ Jesus, and have no confidence in the flesh. Here are three characters: 1. They worshipped in the spirit, in opposition to the carnal ordinances of the Old Testament. Christianity teaches us to be inward with God in all the duties of religious worship. The work of religion is to no purpose any further than the heart is employed in it. 2. They rejoice in Christ Jesus. Now that the substance has come the shadows are done away, and we are to rejoice in Christ Jesus only. 3. They have no confidence in the flesh, in those carnal ordinances and outward performances. Our confidence, as well as our joy, is proper to him.

Verses 4–8

The apostle here proposes himself for an example of trusting in Christ only.

I. He shows what he had to boast of as a Jew and a Pharisee. If any other man thinketh that he hath whereof to trust in the flesh, I more, v. 4. He had as much to boast of as any Jew of them all. 1. His birth-right privileges. He was not a proselyte, but a native Israelite: of the stock of Israel. And he was of the tribe of Benjamin. A Hebrew of the Hebrews, an Israelite on both sides, and from one generation to another; none of his ancestors had matched with Gentiles. 2. He could boast of his relations to the covenant, for he was circumcised the eighth day. 3. For learning, he was a Pharisee, brought up at the feet of Gamaliel. He was a Pharisee, the son of a Pharisee (Acts xxiii. 6). 4. He had a blameless conversation: Touching the righteousness which is of the law, blameless. As to the mere letter of the law and outward observance of it, he could acquit himself from the breach of it and could not be accused by any. 5. He had been an active man for his religion. Concerning zeal, persecuting the church. He showed that he was in good earnest, though he had a zeal without knowledge. All this was stock sufficient to set up with for his justification.

II. How little account he made of these: But what things were gain to me those have I counted loss for Christ (v. 7). "I should have reckoned myself an unspeakable loser if, to adhere to them, I had lost Jesus Christ." The apostle did not persuade them to quit anything but what he had himself quitted.—Yea doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord, v. 8. 1. He tells us what it was that he reached after: it was the knowledge of Christ Jesus his Lord, a believing experimental acquaintance with Christ as Lord; not a speculative, but a practical knowledge of him. And it is the excellency of knowledge. There is an abundant and transcendent excellency in the doctrine of Christ, above all the knowledge of nature, and improvements of human wisdom. 2. He shows how he had quitted his privileges as a Jew and a Pharisee: Yea doubtless; his expression rises with a holy triumph and elevation. But indeed even also do I count all things but loss. He had spoken before of those things, his Jewish privileges: here he speaks of all things. There he had said that he did count them but loss; but it might be asked, "Did he continue still in the same mind?" Now he speaks in the present tense: Yea doubtless, I do count them but loss. He tells us that he had himself practised according to this estimate of the case: For whom I have suffered the loss of all things. When he embarked in the bottom of the Christian religion, he ventured all in it, and suffered the loss of all for the privileges of a Christian. He not only counted them loss, but dung—offals thrown to dogs; they are not only less valuable than Christ, but in the highest degree contemptible, when they come in competition with him.

What he laid hold on: Christ and heaven.

I. The apostle had his heart upon Christ. 1. He desired to win Christ. That I may win him; as the runner wins the prize, as the sailor makes the port he is bound for. 2. That he might be found in him (v. 9). We are undone without a righteousness wherein to appear before God. There is a righteousness provided for us in Jesus Christ. "Not having my own righteousness, which is of the law; not thinking that my outward observances and good deeds are able to atone for my bad ones. The righteousness is that which is through the faith of Christ, not a legal, but evangelical righteousness: The righteousness which is of God by faith, ordained and appointed of God." Faith is the ordained means of saving benefit in all the purchase of his blood. 3. That he might know Christ (v. 10): That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings. Knowing him here is believing in him: it is an experimental knowledge. The apostle was as ambitious of being sanctified as he was of being justified. 4. That he might be conformable unto him. We are then made conformable to his death when we die to sin, as Christ died for sin, when we are crucified with Christ, and the world is crucified to us.

II. The apostle had his heart upon heaven as his happiness: If by any means I might attain to the resurrection of the dead, v. 11.

1. The happiness of heaven is here called the resurrection of the dead. This the apostle had his eye upon; this he would attain. There will be a resurrection of the unjust, and our care must be to escape that: but the joyful and glorious resurrection of saints is called the resurrection by eminence. To the saints it will be indeed a resurrection, while the resurrection of the wicked is a rising from the grave, but a return to a second death.

2. This joyful resurrection the apostle pressed towards. He speaks as if they were in danger of missing it, and coming short of it. A holy fear of coming short is an excellent means of perseverance. Paul himself did not hope to attain it through his own merit, but through the merit of Jesus Christ.

(1) He looks upon himself to be in a state of imperfection and trial: Not as though I had already attained, or were already perfect, v. 12. The best men in the world will readily own their imperfection in the present state. If Paul had not attained to perfection, much less have we. Brethren, I count not myself to have apprehended (v. 13). Those who think they have grace enough give proof that they have little enough, or rather that they have none at all; because, wherever there is true grace, there is a desire of more grace.

(2) What the apostle's actings were under this conviction. "I follow after (v. 12), I pursue with vigour. If that I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended of Christ Jesus." It is not our laying hold of Christ first, but his laying hold of us, which is our happiness and salvation. Not our keeping hold of Christ, but his keeping hold of us, is our safety. To apprehend that for which we are apprehended of Christ. To apprehend that for which he apprehended us is to attain the perfection of our bliss. He adds further (v. 13): This one thing I do, forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth to those things which are before. Paul forgot the things which were behind, he was still for having more and more. So he reached forth.

(3) The apostle's aim. I press towards the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus, v. 14. The fitter we grow for heaven the faster we must press towards it. Heaven is the prize of the high calling; what we aim at in all we do, and what will reward all our pains. It is of God, from whom we are to expect it. But it is in Christ Jesus; through his hand it must come to us. There is no getting to heaven as our home but by Christ as our way.

Verses 15, 16

This was the thing wherein all good Christians were agreed, to make Christ all in all, and set their hearts upon another world. This is that whereto we have all attained. Therefore let us walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing. Having made Christ our all, to us to live must be Christ. Christians who differ in smaller matters should yet bear with one another, because they are agreed in the main matter: "If in anything you be otherwise minded, you must not judge one another, while you all meet now in Christ as your centre, and hope to meet shortly in heaven as your home. God shall reveal even this unto you. Whatever it is wherein you differ, you must wait till God give you a better understanding. As far as you have attained, you must go together in the ways of God, and wait for further light in the minor things wherein you differ."

Verses 17–21

I. He warns them against following the examples of evil teachers (v. 18, 19): Many walk, of whom I have told you often, and now tell you weeping, that they are the enemies of the cross of Christ.

1. There are many called by Christ's name who are enemies to Christ's cross. Their walk is a surer evidence what they are than their profession. I have told you often. We so little heed the warnings given us that we have need to have them repeated. I now tell you weeping. What we say often we may say again, if we say it affectionately.

2. The characters of those who were the enemies of the cross of Christ. (1) Whose God is their belly. They minded nothing but their sensual appetites. The same observance which good people give to God epicures give to their appetites. (2) They glory in their shame. "They value themselves for what is their blemish and reproach." (3) They mind earthly things. Those who mind earthly things act directly contrary to the cross of Christ. They set their hearts and affections on earthly things. How absurd it would be for Christians to follow the example of such! To deter us all from so doing, he reads their doom. (4) Whose end is destruction. Their way seems pleasant, but death and hell are at the end of it. If we choose their way, we have reason to fear their end.

II. He proposes himself and his brethren for an example: Brethren, be followers together of me, and mark those who walk as you have us for an example, v. 17. He explains himself (v. 20) by their regard to Christ and heaven: For our conversation is in heaven. Good Christians, even while they are here on earth, have their conversation in heaven. This world is not our home, but that is. The life of a Christian is in heaven, where his home is, and where he hopes to be shortly. It is good having fellowship with those who have fellowship with Christ, and conversation with those whose conversation is in heaven.

1. We look for the Saviour from heaven (v. 20): Whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ. We expect his second coming thence.

2. At the second coming of Christ we expect to be happy and glorified there. Who shall change our vile bodies, that they may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, v. 21. There is a glory reserved for the saints, which they will be instated in at the resurrection. The body is now at the best a vile body, the body of our humiliation. But it will be made a glorious body. According to the working whereby he is able even to subdue all things unto himself. It is matter of comfort to us that he can subdue all things to himself. And the resurrection will be wrought by this power. Let this confirm our faith of the resurrection, that we not only have the scriptures, which assure us it shall be, but we know the power of God, which can effect it. As Christ's resurrection was a glorious instance of the divine power, so will our resurrection be. And then all the enemies of the Redeemer's kingdom will be completely conquered.

CHAP. IV

Exhortations to several Christian duties, ver 1–9. The apostle's grateful acknowledgments of the Philippians' kindness to him, ver. 10–19. He concludes the epistle with praise, salutations, and blessing, ver. 20–23.

Verses 1–9

I. Steadfastness in our Christian profession, v. 1. Seeing our conversation is in heaven, and we look for the Saviour to come thence and fetch us thither, therefore let us stand fast. The believing prospect of eternal life should engage us to be constant, in our Christian course. My brethren, dearly beloved and longed for, my joy and crown; and again, My dearly beloved. Thus he expresses the pleasure he took in them to convey his exhortations to them with so much the greater advantage. Being brethren he loved them, and loved them dearly: Dearly beloved, and again, My dearly beloved. Brotherly love must always go along with the brotherly relation. He loved them and longed for them. He loved them and rejoiced in them. They were his joy. He loved them and gloried in them. They were his crown as well as his joy. So stand fast in the Lord. Being in Christ, they must stand fast in him, close and constant unto the end. Or, To stand fast in the Lord is to stand fast in his strength and by his grace; not trusting in ourselves.

II. He exhorts them to unanimity and mutual assistance (v. 2, 3): I beseech Euodias and Syntyche that they be of the same mind in the Lord. This is directed to some particular persons. Sometimes there is need of applying the general precepts of the gospel to particular persons and cases. Euodias and Syntyche, it seems, were at variance, either one with the other or with the church. "Desire them from me to be of the same mind in the Lord, to keep the peace and live in love, to be of the same mind with the rest of the church." Then he exhorts to mutual assistance (v. 3), and this exhortation he directs to particular persons: I entreat thee also, true yoke-fellow. Who this person was whom he calls true yoke-fellow is uncertain. He exhorts his yoke-fellow to help the women who laboured with him. Whoever was the yoke-fellow with the apostle must be a yoke-fellow too with his friends. It seems, there were women who laboured with Paul in the gospel. Women may be helpful to ministers in the work of the gospel. Do thou help them. Those who help others should be helped themselves when there is occasion.—With Clement also, and other my fellow-labourers. Paul had a kindness for all his fellow-labourers, Whose names are in the book of life. There is a book of life; there are names in that book and not characters and conditions only. We cannot search into that book, or know whose names are written there; but we may conclude that those who labour in the gospel have their names in the book of life.

III. Rejoice in the Lord always, and again I say, Rejoice, v. 4. All our joy must terminate in God; and our thoughts of God must be delightful thoughts. It is our duty and privilege to rejoice in God, and to rejoice in him always; at all times, in all conditions. There is enough in God to furnish us with matter of joy in the worst circumstance on earth. Rejoice in the Lord always; and again I say, Rejoice. If good men have not a continual feast, it is their own fault.

IV. We are here exhorted to gentleness, and good temper towards our brethren: "Let your moderation be known to all men, v. 5. In things indifferent do not run into extremes; judge charitably concerning one another." Some understand it of the patient bearing of afflictions, or the sober enjoyment of worldly good. The Lord is at hand. "He will take vengeance on your enemies, and reward your patience."

V. A caution against disquieting perplexing care (v. 6): Be careful for nothing. Avoid anxious care and distracting thought in the wants and difficulties of life. It is the duty and interest of Christians to live without care. There is a care of diligence which is our duty, but there is a care of distrust which is our sin and folly.

VI. He recommends to us constant prayer: In everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God. We must pray upon every particular emergency: In everything by prayer. When anything burdens our spirits, we must ease our minds by prayer; when our affairs are perplexed or distressed, we must seek direction and support. We must join thanksgiving with our prayers and supplications. We must not only seek supplies of good, but own receipts of mercy. Prayer is the offering up of our desires to God: Let your requests be made known to God. Not that God needs to be told either our wants or desires; but he will know them from us. The effect of this will be the peace of God keeping our hearts, v. 7. The peace of God which passeth all understanding is a greater good than can be sufficiently valued or duly expressed. This peace will keep our hearts and minds through Christ Jesus; it will keep us from sinning under our troubles, and from sinking under them.

VII. We are exhorted to get and keep a good name: Whatsoever things are true and honest (v. 8), a regard to truth and to becomingness in our behaviour. Whatsoever things are just and pure, without the impurity or mixture of sin. Whatsoever things are lovely and of good report, that will render us beloved, and make us well spoken of. If there is any virtue, if there is any praise. The apostle would have the Christians learn anything which was good of their heathen neighbours: "If there be any virtue, think of these things—imitate them in what is truly excellent among them." We should not be ashamed to learn any good thing of bad men. Virtue has its praise, and will have. Those things which you have learned, and received, and heard and seen in me, do. Paul's doctrine and life were of a piece. He could propose himself as well as his doctrine to their imitation. It gives a great force to what we say to others when we can appeal to what they have seen in us.

Grateful acknowledgment of the kindness of the Philippians.

I. He takes occasion to acknowledge their former kindnesses to him, v. 15, 16. Paul had a grateful spirit. Wherever this epistle shall be read there shall this which they did to Paul be told for a memorial of them. Surely never was present so well repaid. In the beginning of the gospel no church communicated with me as to giving and receiving but ye only, v. 15, not only while he was with them, but when he departed from Macedonia; and this when no other church did so. They were the only church who were thus just and generous. Even in Thessalonica you sent once and again to my necessity, v. 16. Just such things as he had need of; he did not desire superfluities nor dainties. You sent once and again. Many people make it an excuse for their charity that they have given once; why should the charge come upon them again? But the Philippians sent once and again.

II. He excuses their neglect of late. Now at the last their care of him flourished again (v. 10), like a tree in the spring, which seemed all the winter to be quite dead. He makes an excuse for them: Wherein you were also careful, but you lacked opportunity. They would have done it if a fair opportunity had offered.

III. He commends their present liberality: Notwithstanding, you have well done that you did communicate with my affliction, v. 14. Here see Christian sympathy; not only to be concerned for our friends in their troubles, but to do what we can to help them. He rejoiced greatly in it (v. 10), because it was an evidence of their affection to him and the success of his ministry among them.

IV. Not that I speak in respect of want (v. 11); not in respect of any want he felt, nor of any want he feared. As to the former, he was content with the little he had, and that satisfied him; as to the latter, he depended upon the providence of God to provide for him from day to day, and that satisfied him. For I have learned, in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content. That was the lesson he had as much need to learn as most men, considering the hardships and sufferings with which he was exercised.—I know both how to be abased and I know how to abound, v. 12. This is a special act of grace, to accommodate ourselves to every condition of life. To accommodate ourselves to an afflicted condition—to know how to be abased. To a prosperous condition—to know how to abound, how to be full, so as not to be proud, or secure. And this is as hard a lesson as the other; for the temptations of fulness and prosperity are not less than those of affliction and want. I can do all things through Christ who strengthens me, v. 13. We need his strength to teach us to be content in every condition. The apostle had seemed to boast of himself, and of his own strength: I know how to be abased (v. 12); but here he transfers all the praise to Christ. It is by his constant and renewed strength I am enabled to act in everything. "Not because I desired a gift (v. 17). I welcome your kindness because it adds to your account. I desire fruit that may abound to your account. I have all, and abound, v. 18. What can a man desire more than enough?" I am full, having received from Epaphroditus the things which were sent by you. A covetous worldling, if he has ever so much, would still have more; but a heavenly Christian, though he has little, has enough.

V. The apostle assures them that God did accept, and would recompense, their kindness to him. He did accept it: It is an odour of a sweet smell, a sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God. A sacrifice of acknowledgment, and well-pleasing to God. It was more acceptable to God as it was the fruit of their grace than it was to Paul as it was the supply of his want. He would recompense it: But my God shall supply all your wants according to his riches in glory by Christ Jesus, v. 19. He does as it were draw a bill upon the exchequer in heaven, and leaves it to God. "You have supplied my needs, according to your poverty; and he shall supply yours, according to his riches." But still it is by Christ Jesus. Not of debt, but of grace.

Verses 20–23

1. Praises to God: Now unto God and our Father be glory for ever and ever, Amen, v. 20. God is to be considered by us as our Father. It is a title peculiar to the gospel dispensation. We should look upon God, under all our weaknesses and fears, not as a tyrant, but as a Father, who is disposed to pity us and help us. We must thankfully own the receipt of all from him, and give the praise of all to him. And our praise must be constant and perpetual; it must be glory for ever and ever.

2. Salutations to his friends at Philippi: Salute every saint in Christ Jesus (v. 21). Paul had a kind affection to all good Christians.

3. Salutations from those who were at Rome: "The brethren who are with me salute you; all the saints here. Chiefly those who are of Cæsar's household; the Christian converts who belonged to the emperor's court." There were saints in Cæsar's household. The gospel early obtained among some of the rich and great.

4. The apostolical benediction, as usual: "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all, Amen."

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO

THE COLOSSIANS

Colosse was a considerable city of Phrygia, and probably not far from Laodicea and Hierapolis; we find these mentioned together, ch. iv. 13. It is now buried in ruins, and the memory of it chiefly preserved in this epistle. The design of the epistle is to warn them of the danger of the Jewish zealots. He professes a great satisfaction in their steadfastness and constancy. It was written while he was now a prisoner at Rome. He was not idle in his confinement, and the word of God was not bound.

The epistle, like that to the Romans, was written to those he had never seen. The church planted at Colosse was not by Paul's ministry, but by the ministry of Epaphras, whom he delegated to preach the gospel among the Gentiles; and yet, I. There was a flourishing church at Colosse, and one which was eminent and famous among the churches. God is sometimes pleased to make use of the ministry of those who are of less note, and lower gifts, for doing great service to his church. God uses what hands he pleases, and is not tied to those of note. II. Though Paul had not the planting of this church, yet he did not therefore neglect it. The Colossians were as dear to him as the Philippians, or any others who were converted by his ministry.

CHAP. I

I. The inscription, ver. 1, 2. II. His thanksgiving to God for their faith, love, and hope, ver. 3–8. III. His prayer for their knowledge, fruitfulness, and strength, ver 9–11. IV. The operation of the Spirit, the person of the Redeemer, the work of redemption, and the preaching of it in the gospel, ver 12–29.

Verses 1, 2

I. He calls himself an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God. He thought himself engaged to do his utmost, as an apostle, because he was made so by the will of God. He joins Timothy in commission with himself, and, though he elsewhere calls him his son, yet here he calls him his brother. He calls the Christians at Colosse saints, and faithful brethren in Christ. All good Christians are brethren one to another. Towards God they must be saints. And in both these, as saints to God and as brethren to one another, they must be faithful. Faithfulness runs through every character and relation of the Christian life, and is the crown and glory of them all.

II. Grace be unto you, and peace, from God our Father, and the Lord Jesus Christ. He wishes them grace and peace, the free favour of God and all the blessed fruits of it.

Verses 3–8

I. He gave thanks to God for them. In his prayers for them he gave thanks for them. Thanksgiving ought to be a part of every prayer. 1. Whom he gives thanks to: To God, even the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. In our thanksgiving we must have an eye to God as God, and as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, in and through whom all good comes to us. 2. What he gives thanks to God for—for the graces of God in them. Since we heard of your faith in Christ Jesus, and of the love you have to all the saints; for the hope which is laid up for you in heaven, v. 4, 5. Faith, hope, and love, are the three principal graces in the Christian life. (1) He gives thanks for their faith in Christ Jesus, that they were brought to believe in him. (2) For their love. Besides the general love which is due to all men, there is a particular love owing to the saints. We must love all the saints, notwithstanding smaller points of difference, and many real weaknesses. (3) For their hope: The hope which is laid up for you in heaven, v. 5. What is laid out upon believers in this world is much; but what is laid up for them in heaven is much more. The more we fix our hopes on the recompence of reward in the other world, the more free shall we be of our earthly treasure upon all occasions of doing good.

II. He blesses God for the means of grace which they enjoyed: Wherein you heard before in the word of the truth of the gospel. The gospel is the word of truth, and what we may safely venture our immortal souls upon. He calls it the grace of God in truth, v. 6. It is a great mercy to hear this word of truth. "Which has come unto you, as it hath to all the world, and bringeth forth fruit, as it doth also in you," v. 6. All who hear the word of the gospel ought to bring forth the fruit of the gospel. Wherever the gospel comes, it will bring forth fruit to the honour and glory of God. We mistake, if we think to monopolise the comforts and benefits of the gospel to ourselves.

III. The minister by whom they believed (v. 7, 8): As you also learned of Epaphras, our dear fellow-servant, who is for you a faithful minister of Christ. He calls him his fellow-servant. They were fellow-labourers in the work of the Lord. He calls him his dear fellow-servant: it is an endearing consideration that they are engaged in the same service. He represents him as one who was a faithful minister of Christ to them. He does not say who is your minister; but who is the minister of Christ for you. It is by his authority and appointment. He represents him as one who gave them a good word: Who also declared unto us your love in the Spirit, v. 8. He recommends him to their affection, from the good report he made of their sincere love, which was wrought in them by the Spirit. Faithful ministers are glad to be able to speak well of their people.

He heard that they were good, and he prayed that they might be better. We do not cease to pray for you. It may be he could hear of them but seldom, but he constantly prayed for them.

I. Filled with the knowledge of his will, in all wisdom and spiritual understanding. A mere empty notion of the greatest truths is insignificant. Our knowledge of the will of God must be always practical: we must know it, in order to do it. Our knowledge is then a blessing indeed when it is in wisdom, when we know how to apply our general knowledge to our particular occasions. Christians should endeavour to be filled with knowledge; not only to know the will of God, but to know more of it, and to increase in the knowledge of God (as it is v. 10).

II. Good knowledge without a good life will not profit. That you may walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing (v. 10). The agreeableness of our conversation to our religion is pleasing to God as well as to good men. Being fruitful in every good work. Good words will not do without good works. We must abound in good works, and in every good work. There must be a regular uniform regard to all the will of God. And the more fruitful we are in good works the more we shall increase in the knowledge of God.

III. Strengthened with all might, according to his glorious power (v. 11). Where there is spiritual life there is still need of spiritual strength. To be strengthened is to be furnished by the grace of God for every good work, and fortified by that grace against every evil one. In the praying for spiritual strength we are not straitened in the promises, and therefore should not be straitened in our own hopes and desires. He prayed that they might be strengthened with might: that they might be mightily strengthened. It is with all might. With all that might which we have occasion for, to enable us to discharge our duty or preserve our innocence, that grace which is sufficient for us in all the trials of life. It is according to his glorious power. The grace of God in the hearts of believers is the power of God; and there is a glory in this power. The communications of strength are not according to our weakness, but according to his power. That you may be strengthened unto all patience and long-suffering with joyfulness. He prays not only that they may be supported under their troubles, but strengthened for them. Strengthened according to his glorious power. 1. To all patience. Then we are strengthened to all patience—when we not only bear our troubles patiently, but receive them as gifts from God, and are thankful for them. 2. This is even unto long-suffering, not only to bear trouble awhile, but to bear it as long as God pleases to continue it. 3. It is with joyfulness, to rejoice in tribulation, to rejoice that we are counted worthy to suffer for his name, to have joy as well as patience in the troubles of life. This we could never do by any strength of our own, but as we are strengthened by the grace of God.

Verses 12–29

Here is a summary of the doctrine of the gospel concerning the great work of our redemption by Christ. It comes in here as the matter of a thanksgiving: Giving thanks unto the Father, v. 12.

I. The operations of the Spirit of grace. We must give thanks for them: Giving thanks to the Father, &c., v. 12, 13. Those in whom the work of grace is wrought must give thanks unto the Father. 1. "He hath delivered us from the power of darkness, v. 13. He hath saved us from the dominion of sin, which is darkness." 2. "He hath translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son, made us members of the church of Christ, which is a state of light and purity." The conversion of a sinner is the translation of a soul into the kingdom of Christ out of the kingdom of the devil. It is the kingdom of his dear Son. 3. "He hath made us meet to partake of the inheritance of the saints in light, v. 12." God gives grace and glory. (1) What that glory is. It is the inheritance of the saints in light. It is an inheritance, and belongs to them as children. And it is an inheritance of the saints. Those who are not saints on earth will never be saints in heaven. And it is an inheritance in light; by communion with God, who is light. (2) What this grace is. It is a meetness for the inheritance: "He hath made us meet to be partakers." All who are designed for heaven hereafter are prepared for heaven now. Those who are sanctified and renewed go out of the world with their heaven about them. Those who have the inheritance of sons have the education of sons. This meetness for heaven is the earnest of the Spirit in our heart, which is part of payment, and assures the full payment.

II. The Redeemer. Glorious things are here said of him; for blessed Paul was full of Christ. He speaks of him distinctly as God, and as Mediator. 1. As God he speaks of him, v. 15–17. (1) He is the image of the invisible God. He is so the image of God as the son is the image of his father, who has a natural likeness to him. (2) He is the first-born of every creature. Born or begotten before all the creation, which is the scripture-way of representing eternity. It signifies his dominion over all things, as the first-born in a family is heir and lord of all. (3) He is so far from being himself a creature that he is the Creator: For by him were all things created, which are in heaven and earth, visible and invisible, v. 16. He speaks here as if there were several orders of angels: Whether thrones, or dominions, or principalities, or powers. All things are created by him and for him. He is the end, as well as the cause of all things. (4) He was before all things. He had a being before the world was made, and therefore from all eternity. He not only had a being before he was born of the virgin, but he had a being before all time. (5) By him all things consist. The whole creation is kept together by the power of the Son of God, and made to consist in its proper frame.

2. What he is as Mediator, v. 18, 19. (1) He is the head of the body the church: not only a head of government and direction, but a head of vital influence, as the head in the natural body: for all grace and strength are derived from him. (2) He is the beginning, the first-born from the dead, the principle of our resurrection. The first and only one who rose by his own power, and has given us evidence of our resurrection from the dead. (3) He hath in all things the pre-eminence, preferred above angels and all the powers in heaven. Among men he should have the pre-eminence. (4) All fulness dwells in him, and it pleased the Father it should do so (v. 19), not only a fulness of abundance for himself, but abundance for us.

III. The work of redemption.

1. Wherein it consists. (1) In the remission of sin: In whom we have redemption, even the forgiveness of sins, v. 14. If we are redeemed, we must be redeemed from sin; and this is by forgiveness. (2) In reconciliation to God. God by him reconciled all things to himself, v. 20. He is the Mediator of reconciliation, who procures peace as well as pardon for sinners, and will bring all holy creatures into one blessed society at last: things in earth, or things in heaven. The Gentiles, who were alienated, and enemies in their minds by wicked works, yet now hath he reconciled, v. 21. This enmity is slain, and we are now reconciled. The greatest enemies to God may be reconciled, if it be not their own fault.

2. How the redemption is procured: it is through his blood (v. 14); he has made peace through the blood of his cross (v. 20), and it is in the body of his flesh through death, v. 22. There was such a value in the blood of Christ that, on account of Christ's shedding it, God was willing to deal with men upon new terms, to pardon and accept to favour all who comply with them.

IV. The preaching of this redemption.

1. To whom it was preached: To every creature under heaven (v. 23). The gospel excludes none who do not exclude themselves.

2. By whom it was preached: Whereof I Paul am made a minister. He looks upon it as the highest of his titles of honour to be a minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

(1) Whence Paul had his ministry: it was according to the dispensation of God which was given to him

(v. 25). He received it from God as a gift, and took it as a favour.

(2) For whose sake he had his ministry: It is for you. We are Christ's ministers for the good of his people, to fulfil the word of God (that is, fully to preach it).

(3) What kind of preacher Paul was.

[1] He was a suffering preacher: Who now rejoice in my sufferings for you, v. 24. He suffered for preaching the gospel to them. And, while he suffered in so good a cause, he could rejoice in his sufferings. And fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh. The suffering of Paul and other good ministers made them conformable to Christ. They are said to fill up what was behind of the sufferings of Christ, as the wax fills up the vacuities of the seal, when it receives the impression of it. Or it may be meant of his suffering for Christ. He filled that which was behind. He was still filling up more and more what was behind, or remained of them to his share.

[2] He was a close preacher. Whom we preach, warning every man, and teaching every man in all wisdom, v. 28. When we warn people of what they do amiss, we must teach them to do better: warning and teaching must go together. Men must be warned and taught in all wisdom. We must choose the fittest seasons, and accommodate ourselves to the different capacities of those we have to do with. That which he aimed at was to present every men perfect in Christ Jesus. Ministers ought to aim at the improvement and salvation of every particular person who hears them. He was a laborious preacher (v. 29): Whereunto I also labour, striving according to his working, which worketh in me mightily. As Paul laid out himself to do much good, so he had this favour, that the power of God wrought in him the more effectually.

3. The gospel which was preached. Even the mystery which hath been hid from ages, and from generations, but is now made manifest to his saints, v. 26, 27. The mystery of the gospel was long hidden. This mystery now is made manifest to the saints. And what is this mystery? It is the riches of God's glory among the Gentiles. This mystery, thus made known, is Christ in you, the hope of glory. Christ is the hope of glory. The ground of our hope is Christ in the world. The evidence of our hope is Christ in the heart.

4. The duty of those who are interested in this redemption: If you continue in the faith, grounded and settled, and be not moved away from the hope of the gospel which you have heard, v. 23. We can expect the happy end of our faith only when we continue in the faith, and are so far grounded and settled in it as not to be moved from it.

CHAP. II

I The apostle expresses concern for the Colossians, ver. 1-3. II. He repeats it again, ver. 5. III. He cautions them against false teachers among the Jews (ver. 4, 6, 7), and against the Gentile philosophy, ver. 8-12. IV. He represents the privileges of Christians, ver 13-15. And, V. Concludes with a caution against those who would introduce the worship of angels, ver. 16-23.

Verses 1-3

The apostle had never been at Colosse, and yet he had as tender a care of it as if it had been the only people of his charge (v. 1): For I would that you knew what great conflict I have for you, and for those at Laodicea, and for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh. Paul's care of the church was such as amounted to a conflict. He was in a sort of agony. We may keep up a communion by faith, hope, and holy love, even with those of whom we have no personal knowledge. Those we never saw in the flesh we may hope to meet in heaven.

I. What was it that the apostle desired for them? That their hearts may be comforted, being knit together in love, &c., v. 2. It was their spiritual welfare about which he was solicitous, that their hearts may be comforted. The prosperity of the soul is the best prosperity. A description of soul-prosperity.

1. When our knowledge grows to an understanding of the mystery of God, and of the Father, and of Christ. To understand the mystery. Not barely to speak of it by rote, but to enter into the meaning and design of it.

2. When our faith grows to a full assurance and bold acknowledgment of this mystery. To a full assurance, or a well-settled judgment. To a free acknowledgment, and we not only believe with the heart, but are ready to make confession with our mouth. This is called the riches of the full assurance of understanding. Great knowledge and strong faith make a soul rich.

3. That their hearts might be comforted. The soul prospers when it is filled with joy and peace.

4. Being knit together in love. The stronger our faith is, and the warmer our love, the greater will our comfort be. Having occasion to mention Christ (v. 2), he makes this remark to his honour (v. 3): In whom are hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. The treasures of wisdom are hidden not from us, but for us, in Christ. We must spend upon the stock which is laid up for us in him, and draw from the treasures which are hidden in him.

II. His concern for them is repeated (v. 5): Though I am absent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit, joying, and beholding your order, and the steadfastness of your faith in Christ. We may be present in spirit with those from whom we are absent in body. Though he had never seen them he tells them he could easily think himself among them, and look with pleasure upon their good behaviour. The more steadfast our faith in Christ is, the better order there will be in our whole conversation.

Verses 4-12

The apostle cautions the Colossians against deceivers (v. 4): And this I say lest any man beguile you with enticing words; and v. 8, Lest any man spoil you. Satan spoils souls by beguiling them. He deceives them, and by this means slays them. He could not ruin us if he did not cheat us; and he could not cheat us but by our own folly. Satan's agents beguile them with enticing words. How many are ruined by the flattery of those who lie in wait to deceive! "That which they aim at is to spoil you."

I. A sovereign antidote against seducers (v. 6, 7): As you have therefore received Christ Jesus the Lord, so walk you in him, rooted and built up, &c. All Christians have, in profession at least, received Jesus Christ the Lord, consented to him, taken him for theirs in every relation and every capacity. The great concern of those who have received Christ is to walk in him. We must walk with him in our daily course and keep up our communion with him. The more closely we walk with Christ the more we are rooted and established in the faith. If we walk in him, we shall be rooted in him; and the more firmly we are rooted in him the more closely we shall walk in him: Rooted and built up.—As you have been taught. A good education has a good influence upon our establishment. We must be established in the faith, as we have been taught, abounding therein. And this with thanksgiving.

II. The fair warning given us of our danger: Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world, and not after Christ, v. 8. There is a philosophy which is a noble exercise of our reasonable faculties. But there is a philosophy which is vain and deceitful. After the tradition of men, after the rudiments of the world. The Jews governed themselves by the traditions of their elders. The Gentiles mixed their maxims of philosophy with their Christian principles; and both alienated their minds from Christ. Those who pin their faith on other men's sleeves have turned away from following after Christ.

1. We have in Christ the substance of all the shadows of the ceremonial law. Had they then the Shechinah, or special presence of God? So have we now in Jesus Christ (v. 9): For in him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. It dwells in him bodily; not as the body is opposed to the spirit, but as the body is opposed to the shadow. The fulness of the Godhead dwells in Christ really, and not figuratively. Had they circumcision, which was the seal of the covenant? In Christ we are circumcised with the circumcision made without hands (v. 11). It is made without hands; not by the power of any creature, but by the power of the blessed Spirit of God. Again, The Jews thought themselves complete in the ceremonial law; but we are complete in Christ, v. 10. That was imperfect and defective. But all the defects of it are made up in the gospel of Christ. Which is the head of all principality and power. As the Old Testament priesthood had its perfection in Christ, so likewise had the kingdom of David. He is the Lord and head of all the powers in heaven and earth.

2. We have communion with Christ in his whole undertaking (v. 12): Buried with him in baptism, wherein also you have risen with him. We are both buried and rise with him, and both are signified by our baptism. He is speaking of the circumcision made without hands; and says it is through the faith of the operation of God. God in baptism engages to be to us a God, and we become engaged to be his people, and by his grace to die to sin and to live to righteousness.

The privileges we Christians have above the Jews.

I. Christ's death is our life: And you, being dead in your sins and the uncircumcision of your flesh, hath he quickened together with him, v. 13. A state of sin is a state of spiritual death. Those who are in sin are dead in sin. As the death of the body is the corruption of it, so sin is the corruption of the soul. As a man who is dead is unable to help himself by any power of his own, so an habitual sinner is morally impotent. This is our state. Now through Christ we, who were dead in sins, are quickened. Quickened together with him. Christ's death was the death of our sins; Christ's resurrection is the quickening of our souls.

II. Through him we have the remission of sin: Having forgiven you all trespasses. The pardon of the crime is the life of the criminal.

III. Whatever was in force against us is taken out of the way. He has obtained for us a legal discharge from the hand-writing of ordinances, which was against us (v. 14). Cursed is everyone who continues not in everything. This was a hand-writing which was against us, and contrary to us. When he was nailed to the cross, the curse was as it were nailed to the cross. It must be understood of the ceremonial law, the hand-writing of ordinances. The Lord Jesus took it out of the way, nailed it to his cross; disannulled the obligation of it. When the substance came, the shadows fled away.

IV. He has obtained a glorious victory for us over the powers of darkness: And, having spoiled principalities and powers, he made a show of them openly, triumphing over them in it, v. 15. As the curse of the law was against us, so the power of Satan was against us. Out of the hands of Satan the executioner he redeemed us by power and with a high hand. The devil and all the powers of hell were conquered and disarmed by the dying Redeemer. The Redeemer conquered by dying. See his crown of thorns turned into a crown of laurels. He spoiled them and made a show of them openly. Never had the devil's kingdom such a mortal blow given to it as was given by the Lord Jesus. Triumphing over them in it; in His Cross and by His death.

I. A caution to take heed of judaizing teachers. Let no man therefore judge you in meat nor in drink, &c., v. 16. "Let no man impose those things upon you, for God has not imposed them." These things were shadows of things to come (v. 17): they are now done away. But the body is of Christ: the body, of which they were shadows, has come. They had the shadows, we have the substance.

II. He cautions them to take heed of those who would introduce the worship of angels as the Gentile philosophers did: Let no man beguile you of your reward, in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, v. 18. Though it has a show of humility, it is a voluntary, not a commanded humility; and therefore it is not acceptable, yea, it is not warrantable. Besides, the notions upon which this practice was grounded were merely the inventions of men—the proud conceits of human reason: Intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind. Though there was a show of humility in the practice, there was a real pride in the principle. Pride is at the bottom of a great many errors and corruptions, and even of many evil practices, which have a great show and appearance of humility. Those who do so do not hold the head, v. 19. When men let go their hold of Christ, they catch at that which is next them and will stand them in no stead.—From which all the body, by joints and bands, having nourishment ministered, and knit together, increaseth with the increase of God. Jesus Christ is not only a head of government over the church, but a head of vital influence to it. The body of Christ is a growing body: it increaseth with the increase of God, with a large and abundant increase.

III. He takes occasion hence to warn them again: "Wherefore, if you be dead with Christ from the rudiments of the world, why, as though living in the world, are you subject to ordinances? (v. 20). Such observances as, Touch not, taste not, handle not," v. 21, 22, which all are to perish with the using, having no other authority than the traditions and injunctions of men. Which things have indeed a show of wisdom in will-worship and humility. They thought themselves wiser than their neighbours. There is nothing of true devotion in these things, for the gospel teaches us to worship God in spirit and truth and not by ritual observances, and through the mediation of Christ alone and not of any angels. Such things have only a show of wisdom, but are really folly. It is true wisdom to keep close to the appointments of the gospel, and an entire subjection to Christ, the only head of the church.

CHAP. III

I. The apostle exhorts us to set our hearts upon heaven, ver. 1–4. II. The mortification of sin, ver. 5–11. III. Mutual love and compassion, ver. 12–17. Exhortations to relative duties, ver. 18–25.

Verses 1–4

Though we are made free from the ceremonial law, it does not therefore follow that we may live as we list. We must walk the more closely with God. If you then have risen with Christ, seek those things which are above. We must mind the concerns of another world more than the concerns of this. Christ sits at the right hand of God. He who is our best friend has gone before to secure to us the heavenly happiness; and therefore we should seek what he has purchased at so vast an expense.

I. He explains this duty (v. 2): Set your affections on things above, not on things on the earth. Upon the wings of affection the heart soars upwards. Things on earth are here set in opposition to things above. Heaven and earth are contrary one to the other, and the prevalence of our affection to one will proportionably weaken our affection to the other.

II. He assigns three reasons for this, v. 3, 4.

1. We are dead to present things. And if we are dead to the earth, and have renounced it as our happiness, it is absurd for us to set our affections upon it, and seek it.

2. Our true life lies in the other world: You are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God, v. 3. The new man has its livelihood thence. It is hid with Christ: not hid from us only, in point of secrecy, but hid for us, denoting security. This is our comfort, that our life is hid with him, and laid up safely with him.

3. At the second coming of Christ we hope for the perfection of our happiness. When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, we shall also appear with him in glory, v. 4. Christ is a believer's life. He is the principle and end of the Christian's life. Christ will appear again. He is now hid, but he will appear in his own glory and his Father's glory. We shall then appear with him in glory. It will be his glory to have his redeemed with him, and it will be their glory to come with him. Do we look for such a happiness, and should we not set our affections upon that world, and live above this? Our head is there, our home is there, our treasure is there, and we hope to be there for ever.

Verses 5–7

It is our duty to mortify our members which are upon the earth, and which naturally incline us to the things of the world.

I. The lusts of the flesh: Fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence—which were so contrary to the Christian state and the heavenly hope.

II. The love of the world: And covetousness, which is idolatry; that is, an inordinate love of present good and outward enjoyments. Covetousness is spiritual idolatry: it is the giving of that love and regard to worldly wealth which are due to God only. Among all the instances of sin which good men are recorded in the scripture to have fallen into there is no instance of any good man charged with covetousness. How necessary it is to mortify sins, v. 6, 7. If we do not kill them, they will kill us: For which things' sake the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience, v. 6. See what we are all by nature more or less: we are children of disobedience. The wrath of God comes upon all the children of disobedience. Those who do not obey the precepts of the law incur the penalties of it. We should mortify these sins because they have lived in us: In which you also walked some time, when you lived in them, v. 7. The consideration that we have formerly lived in sin is a good argument why we should now forsake it. We have walked in by-paths, therefore let us walk in them no more. When you lived among those who did such things (so some understand it), then you walked in those evil practices. Let us keep out of the way of evil-doers.

Verses 8–11

We are to mortify inordinate passions (v. 8): But now you also put off all these, anger, wrath, malice. Anger and wrath are bad, but malice is worse; it is anger heightened and settled. So the product of them in the tongue; as blasphemy, which seems there to mean, not so much speaking ill of God as speaking ill of men,—filthy communication, all lewd and wanton discourse, which propagates the same defilements in the hearers. Lie not one to another (v. 9). Lying makes us like the devil (who is the father of lies). Seeing you have put off the old man with his deeds, and have put on the new man, v. 10. Those who have put off the old man have put it off with its deeds; and those who have put on the new man must put on all its deeds, renewed in knowedge, because an ignorant soul cannot be a good soul. Light is the first thing in the new creation, as it was in the first: after the image of him who created him. It was the honour of man in innocence that he was made after the image of God. In the privilege of sanctification there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, v. 11. It is as much the duty of the one as of the other to be holy, and as much the privilege of the one as of the other to receive from God the grace to be so. Christ is all in all. Christ is a Christian's all, all his hope and happiness.

Verses 12–17

Put on therefore bowels of mercy, v. 12. We must not only put off anger and wrath (as v. 8), but we must put on compassion and kindness.

I. Put on, as the elect of God, holy and beloved. Those who are the elect of God, are beloved, and ought to conduct themselves in everything as becomes them. What we must put on. 1. Compassion towards the miserable: Bowels of mercy. Those who owe so much to mercy ought to be merciful. 2. Kindness. The design of the gospel is not only to soften the minds of men, but to sweeten them, and to promote friendship among men as well as reconciliation with God. 3. Humbleness of mind. There must not only be a humble demeanour, but a humble mind. 4. Meekness. Prudently bridle our own anger, and patiently bear the anger of others. 5. Long-suffering. Many can bear a short provocation who are weary of bearing when it grows long. If God is long-suffering to us we should exercise long-suffering to others. 6. Mutual forbearance: Forbearing one another. We have all of us something which needs to be borne with. We need the same good turn from others which we are bound to show them. 7. Forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any. Quarrels will sometimes happen, even among the elect of God, who are holy and beloved. But it is our duty to forgive one another in such cases. Even as Christ forgave you, so also do you. It is a branch of his example which we are obliged to follow, if we ourselves would be forgiven.

II. In order to all this, we are exhorted: 1. To clothe ourselves with love (v. 14): Above all things put on charity. He lays the foundation in faith, and the top-stone in charity, which is the bond of perfectness. Christian unity consists of unanimity and mutual love. 2. To submit ourselves to the government of the peace of God (v. 15): Let the peace of God rule in your hearts, prevail and govern there, or as an umpire decide all matters of difference among you—To which you are called in one body. Being united in one body, we are called to be at peace one with another. We must be thankful. The work of thanksgiving to God is such a sweet and pleasant work that it will help to make us sweet and pleasant towards all men. 3. To let the word of Christ dwell in us richly, v. 16. It must dwell in us, or keep house, not as a servant but as a master. It must dwell in us; that is, be always ready and at hand to us in everything. It must dwell in us richly: not only keep house in our hearts, but keep a good house. Many have the word of Christ dwelling in them, but it dwells in them but poorly. The soul prospers when the word of God dwells in us richly. And this in all wisdom. The word of Christ must dwell in us, not in all notion and speculation, to make us doctors, but in all wisdom, to make us good Christians. 4. To teach and admonish one another. We sharpen ourselves by quickening others. We must admonish one another in psalms and hymns. Religious poesy seems countenanced by these expressions and is capable of great edification. But, when we sing psalms, we make no melody unless we sing with grace in our hearts. And we are not only to quicken and encourage ourselves, but to teach and admonish one another. 5. That all must be done in the name of Christ (v. 17): And whatsoever you do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus. Giving thanks to God and the Father by him. Those who do all things in Christ's name will never want matter of thanksgiving to God, even the Father.

Exhortations to relative duties. We must never separate the privileges and duties of the gospel religion.

I. The duties of wives and husbands (v. 18): Wives, submit yourselves unto your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord. Submission is the duty of wives. It is agreecable to the order of nature and the reason of things, as well as the appointment and will of God. It is submission to a husband, and to her own husband, who stands in the nearest relation, and is under strict engagements to proper duty too. And this is fit in the Lord. Husbands must love their wives, and not be bitter against them, v. 19. They must love them with tender and faithful affection, as Christ loved the church. And they must not be bitter against them, but be kind and obliging to them in all things.

II. The duties of children and parents: Children, obey your parents in all things, for this is well-pleasing unto the Lord, v. 20. They must be willing to do all their lawful commands, as those who have a natural right and are fitter to direct them than themselves. And this is well-pleasing to God. And parents must be tender, as well as children obedient (v. 21): "Fathers, provoke not your children to anger, lest they be discouraged. Let not your authority over them be exercised with rigour and severity, but with kindness and gentleness, lest you, by holding the reins too tight make them fly out with the greater fierceness."

III. Servants and masters: Servants, obey your masters in all things according to the flesh, v. 22. Servants must do the duty of the relation in which they stand in all things—not only when their master's eye is upon them. In singleness of heart, fearing God. The fear of God ruling in the heart will make people good in every relation. "And whatsoever you do, do it heartily (v. 23), with diligence, not idly and slothfully."—As to the Lord, and not as to men. It sanctifies a servant's work when it is done as unto God, and not merely as unto men. We are really doing our duty to God when we are faithful in our duty to men. A good and faithful servant is never the further from heaven for his being a servant: "Knowing that of the Lord you shall receive the reward of the inheritance, for you serve the Lord Christ, v. 24. Serving your masters according to the command of Christ, you serve Christ, and he will be your paymaster. Though you are now servants, you will receive the inheritance of sons." He who does wrong will receive for the wrong which he has done, v. 25. He will be sure to punish the unjust as well as reward the faithful servant: as well if masters wrong their servants.—And there is no respect of persons with him. The righteous Judge of the earth will be impartial, and carry it with an equal hand towards master and servant. How happy would the gospel religion make the world, if it everywhere prevailed; and how much would it influence every state of things and every relation of life!

CHAP. IV

I. He continues his account of the duty of masters, ver. 1. II. He exhorts to the duty of prayer (ver. 2–4), and to a prudent conduct towards those with whom we converse, ver. 5, 6. III. He closes the epistle with the mention of several of his friends, ver. 7–18.

Verse 1

The apostle proceeds with the duty of masters to their servants. Justice is required of them: Give unto your servants that which is just and equal (v. 1), not only strict justice, but equity and kindness. "Knowing that you also have a Master in heaven. You who are masters of others have a Master yourself, and are accountable to one above you. Deal with your servants as you expect God should deal with you. You are both servants of the same Lord and are equally accountable to him at last."

Verses 2–4

This is the duty of everyone—to continue in prayer. Watching in the same. Christians should lay hold of all opportunities for prayer, and choose the fittest seasons, and keep their minds lively in the duty.—With thanksgiving. Thanksgiving must have a part in every prayer.—Withal praying also for us, v. 3. The people must pray particularly for their ministers, and bear them upon their hearts at all times at the throne of grace. As if he had said, "Do not forget us, whenever you pray for yourselves." That God would open to us a door of utterance, that is, either afford opportunity to preach the gospel, or else give me ability and courage. And for me, that utterance may be given to me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds. He would have them pray for him, that he might not be discouraged in his work, nor driven from it by his sufferings: That I may make it manifest, as I ought to speak, v. 4. He had been particular in telling them what he prayed for on their behalf, ch. i. Here he tells them particularly what he would have them pray for on his behalf. Paul knew as well as any man how to speak; and yet he begged their prayers for him, that he might be taught to speak.

Verses 5, 6

The apostle exhorts them further to a prudent conduct towards the heathen world, or those out of the Christian church among whom they lived (v. 5): Walk in wisdom towards those who are without. Be careful to get no hurt by them, and to do no hurt to them, or increase their prejudices against religion. Do them all the good you can, and by all the fittest means recommend religion to them.—Redeeming the time; either "improving every opportunity of doing them good," or else "walking with circumspection, to give them no advantage against you. Let your speech be always with grace v. 6. Let all your discourse be as becomes Christians—savoury, discreet, seasonable." Though it be not always of grace, it must be always with grace. It must be in a Christian manner: seasoned with salt. Grace is the salt which seasons our discourse, makes it savoury, and keeps it from corrupting. That you may know how to answer every man. We have need of a great deal of wisdom and grace to give proper answers to every man, particularly in answering the questions and objections of adversaries against our religion, giving the reasons of our faith.

Verses 7–18

I. Concerning Tychicus, v. 7. By him this epistle was sent. He knew they would be glad to hear how it fared with him. The churches cannot but be concerned for good ministers and desirous to know their state. A beloved brother and faithful minister. Faithfulness in any one is truly lovely, and renders him worthy our affection and esteem. And a fellow-servant in the Lord. It adds much to the beauty and strength of the gospel ministry when ministers are thus loving one to another. Whom I have sent unto you for the same purpose, that he might know your estate, and comfort your hearts, v. 8. He was as willing to hear from them as they could be to hear from him. It is a great comfort to have the mutual concern of fellow-christians.

II. Concerning Onesimus (v. 9): With Onesimus, a faithful and beloved brother, who is one of you. This was he whom Paul had begotten in his bonds, Philem. 10. He was converted at Rome, whither he had fled from his master's service. Though he was a poor servant, and had been a bad man, yet, being now a convert, Paul calls him a faithful and beloved brother. The meanest circumstance of life, and greatest wickedness of former life, make no difference in the spiritual relation among sincere Christians.

III. Aristarchus, a fellow-prisoner. Those who join in services and sufferings should be thereby engaged to one another in holy love.

IV. Marcus, sister's son to Barnabas, who wrote the gospel which bears his name. If he come unto you receive him. Paul had a quarrel with Barnabas upon the account of this Mark, yet Paul is not only reconciled to him himself, but recommends him to the respect of the churches. If men have been guilty of a fault, it must not be always remembered against them. We must forget as well as forgive.

V. Here is one who is called Jesus, which is the Greek name for the Hebrew Joshua. Who is called Justus. These are my fellow-labourers unto the kingdom of God, who have been a comfort unto me. One is his fellow-servant, another his fellow-prisoner, and all his fellow-workers.

VI. Epaphras (v. 12). He is one of you; he salutes you. Always labouring fervently for you in prayers. Epaphras has learned of Paul to be much in prayer for his friends. We must be earnest in prayer, not only for ourselves, but for others also. That you may stand perfect and complete in all the will of God. To stand perfect and complete in the will of God is what we should earnestly desire both for ourselves and others. He had a great zeal for them: "I bear him record." And his zeal extended to all about them: to those who are in Laodicea and Hierapolis.

VII. Luke is another here mentioned, whom he calls the beloved physician. This is he who wrote the Gospel and Acts, and was Paul's companion.

VIII. Demas. We read (2 Tim. iv. 10), Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world. Many who have made a great figure in profession, and gained a great name among Christians, have yet shamefully apostatized.

IX. The brethren in Laodicea living in the neighbourhood of Colosse: and Paul sends salutations to them, and orders that this epistle should be read in the church of the Laodiceans (v. 16). And some think Paul sent another epistle at this time to Laodicea: And that you likewise read the epistle from Laodicea. If so, that epistle is now lost.

X. Nymphas is mentioned (v. 15) as one who lived at Colosse, and had a church in his house.

XI. Concerning Archippus. They are bidden to admonish him to mind his work as a minister, to take heed to it, and to fulfil it. The ministry we have received is a great honour; for it is received in the Lord, and is by his appointment. The people may put their ministers in mind of their duty, and excite them to it: Say to Archippus, Take heed to the ministry.

XII. Concerning himself (v. 18): The salutation of me Paul. Remember my bonds. These words he wrote with his own hand. "Grace be with you. The favour of God, and all good, be with you, and be your portion."

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO

THE THESSALONIANS

Thessalonica was formerly the metropolis of Macedonia. The apostle Paul, being directed after an extraordinary manner to preach the gospel in Macedonia (Acts xvi. 9, 10), went from Troas to Samothracia, thence to Neapolis, and then to Philippi, where he had good success in his ministry, but met with hard usage, being cast into prison with Silas, from which being wonderfully delivered, they comforted the brethren there, and departed. Passing through Amphipolis and Apollonia, they came to Thessalonica, where the apostle planted a church. But a tumult being raised in the city, Paul and Silas, for their safety, were sent away by night unto Berea, and afterwards Paul was conducted to Athens, leaving Silas and Timotheus behind him. When they came, Timotheus was sent to Thessalonica, to enquire after their welfare and to establish them in the faith (1 Thess. iii. 2), and, was sent again, together with Silas, to visit the churches in Macedonia. So that Paul, being left at Athens alone (1 Thess. iii. 1), departed thence to Corinth, where he continued a year and a half, and then he wrote this epistle to the church of Christ at Thessalonica, which, though it is placed after the other epistles of this apostle, is supposed to be first in time of all Paul's epistles.

CHAP. I

After the introduction (ver. 1) the apostle begins with a thanksgiving to God, ver. 2–5. And then mentions the good success of the gospel among them, ver. 6–10.

Verse 1

I. The inscription. The persons from whom this epistle came. Paul was the writer of this epistle. He joins Silvanus (or Silas) and Timotheus with himself. The persons to whom this epistle is written, the church of the Thessalonians, the converted Jews and Gentiles. This church is said to be in God the Father and in the Lord Jesus Christ. The Gentiles among them were turned to God from idols, and the Jews among them believed Jesus to be the promised Messias. All of them were devoted and dedicated to God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

II. The salutation. Grace be with you, and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. The free grace or favour of God is the spring of all the peace and prosperity we can enjoy. As all good comes from God, so no good can be hoped for by sinners but from God in Christ. And the best good may be expected from God as our Father for the sake of Christ.

I. The apostle begins with thanksgiving to God. Being about to mention the things that were matter of joy to him, and highly praiseworthy in them, he chooses to do this by way of thanksgiving to God. Even when we do not actually give thanks to God by our words, we should have a grateful sense of God's goodness upon our minds.

II. He joined prayer with his praise or thanksgiving. When we give thanks for any benefit we receive we should join prayer. As there is much that we ought to be thankful for, so there is much occasion of constant prayer for further supplies of good.

III. The particulars for which he was so thankful to God.

1. The saving benefits bestowed on them. (1) Their faith and their work of faith. Their faith was a true and living faith, because a working faith. Wherever there is a true faith, it will work. (2) Their love and the labour of love. Love will show itself by labour. (3) Their hope and the patience of hope. Wherever there is a well-grounded hope of eternal life, it will appear by the exercise of patience.

2. The apostle not only mentions these three cardinal graces, faith, hope, and love, but also takes notice of the sincerity of them: being in the sight of God even our Father. Then is the work of faith, or labour of love, or patience of hope, sincere, when it is done as under the eye of God. He mentions the fountain whence these graces flow, God's electing love: Knowing, brethren beloved, your election of God, v. 4. Thus he runs up these streams to the fountain, and that was God's eternal election. He calls them, brethren beloved. It is a good reason why we should love one another, because we are all beloved of God. The election of God is of his own good pleasure and mere grace, not for the sake of any merit in those who are chosen. The election of God may be known by the fruits thereof.

3. Another ground of the apostle's thanksgiving is the success of his ministry among them. He was thankful on his own account as well as theirs, that he had not laboured in vain. Their ready entertainment of the gospel he preached to them was an evidence of their being elected and beloved of God. The gospel came to them also not in word only, but in power. It did not merely tickle the ear and please the fancy, but it affected their hearts: a divine power went along with it. By this we may know our election, if we not only speak of the things of God by rote as parrots, but feel the influence of these things in our hearts. It came in the Holy Ghost. Unless the Spirit of God accompany the word of God it will be to us but as a dead letter; and the letter killeth, it is the Spirit that giveth life. The gospel came to them in much assurance. They were fully convinced of the truth of it. They were willing to leave all for Christ, and to venture their souls upon the verity of the gospel revelation. The Thessalonians thus knew what manner of men the apostle and his fellow-labourers were among them, and what they did for their sake.

Verses 6–10

The evidence of the apostle's success among the Thessalonians.

I. They were careful to imitate the good examples of the apostles and ministers of Christ, v. 6. The Thessalonians showed a conscientious care to be followers of them. Herein they became also followers of the Lord, who is the perfect example we must strive to imitate. The Thessalonians acted thus, notwithstanding their affliction. They were willing to share in the sufferings that attended the embracing of Christianity. Perhaps this made the word more precious, being dear-bought. With joy in the Holy Ghost, who, when our afflictions abound, makes our consolations much more to abound.

II. They were themselves examples to all about them, v. 7, 8.

1. Their example was very effectual to make good impressions upon many others. They were stamps, or instruments to make impression with. They had themselves received good impressions, and they made good impressions. Christians should be so good as by their example to influence others.

2. It was very extensive, and reached beyond the confines of Thessalonica, even to the believers of all Macedonia, and further in Achaia.

3. It was very famous. The word of the Lord was famous and well known, in the regions round about that city, and in every place; so that, from the good success of the gospel among them, many others were encouraged to entertain it, and to be willing, when called, to suffer for it. The readiness of their faith was famed abroad. These Thessalonians embraced the gospel as soon as it was preached to them. The effects of their faith were famous. They quitted their idolatry. They gave themselves up to God, to the living and true God. They set themselves to wait for the Son of God from heaven, v. 10. And this is one of the peculiarities of our holy religion, to wait for Christ's second coming, as those who believe he will come and hope he will come to our joy.

CHAP. II

The apostle puts the Thessalonians in mind of the manner of his preaching among them, ver. 1–6. Then of the manner of his conversation among them, ver. 7–12. Afterwards of the success of his ministry (ver. 13–16), and then apologizes for his absence, ver. 17–20.

Verses 1–6

He could appeal to the Thessalonians how faithfully he, and Silas, and Timotheus, had discharged their office: You yourselves, brethren, know our entrance in unto you. His preaching was not in vain, or, as some read it, was not vain. It was not fruitless or in vain (according to our translation), or, as others think, it was not vain and empty. The subject-matter of the apostle's preaching was sound and solid truth. He had no worldly design in his preaching, which he puts them in mind to have been,

I. With courage and resolution: We were bold in our God to speak unto you the gospel of God, v. 2. The apostle was inspired with a holy boldness, nor was he discouraged at the afflictions he met with. He had met with ill usage at Philippi, as these Thessalonians well know. There it was that he and Silas were put in the stocks; yet no sooner were they set at liberty than they went to Thessalonica, and preached the gospel with as much boldness as ever. Suffering in a good cause should rather sharpen than blunt the edge of holy resolution. Those who preached it preached it with contention, which denoted either the apostles' striving in their preaching or their striving against the opposition they met with. Paul was neither daunted in his work, nor driven from it.

II. With great simplicity and godly sincerity: Our exhortation was not of deceit, nor of uncleanness, nor in guile, v. 3. This, no doubt, was matter of the greatest comfort to the apostle—the consciousness of his own incerity; and was one reason of his success. The gospel he preached was without deceit, it was true and faithful. Nor was it of uncleanness. His gospel was pure and holy, and, as the matter of the apostle's exhortation was thus true and pure, the manner of his speaking was without guile. The apostle not only asserts his sincerity, but subjoins the reasons and evidences thereof.

1. They were stewards, put in trust with the gospel. The gospel which Paul preached was not his own, but the gospel of God. Ministers have a great favour shown them, and honour put upon them, and trust committed to them.

2. Their design was to please God and not men. If sincerity be wanting, all that we do cannot please God. The gospel of Christ is not accommodated to the vain fancies and lusts of men, but, on the contrary, it was designed for the mortifying of their corrupt affections, that they might be brought under the power of faith.

3. They acted as in the sight of him who tries our hearts. He is well acquainted with all our aims and designs, as well as our actions. And it is from this God who trieth our hearts that we must receive our reward. The evidences of the apostles' sincerity: (1) He avoided flattery: Neither at any time used we flattering words, as you know, v. 5. He and his fellow-labourers preached Christ and him crucified, and did not aim to gain an interest in men's affections for themselves, nor did he flatter men in their sins. He did not flatter them with vain hopes. (2) He avoided covetousness. He did not make the ministry a cloak, or a covering, for covetousness, as God was witness, v. 5. His design was not to enrich himself by preaching the gospel: so far from this, he did not stipulate with them for bread. (3) He avoided ambition and vain-glory: Nor of men sought we glory, neither of you nor yet of others, v. 6. They expected neither people's purses nor their caps.

I. He mentions the gentleness of their behaviour: We were gentle among you, v. 7. He showed the kindness and care of a nurse that cherishes her children. This is the way to win people, rather than to rule with rigour. As a nursing mother bears with frowardness in a child, and condescends to mean offices for its good, cherishing it in her bosom, so in like manner should the ministers of Christ behave towards their people. This gentleness the apostle expressed several ways. 1. By the most affectionate desire of their welfare: Being affectionately desirous of you, v. 8. It was their spiritual and eternal welfare that he was earnestly desirous of. 2. By great readiness to do them good, willingly imparting to them, not the gospel of God only, but also our own souls, v. 8. He was willing to spend and be spent in the service of men's souls. 3. By bodily labour that his ministry might not be burdensome to them: You remember our labour and travail; for, labouring night and day, &c., v. 9. To the labour of the ministry he added that of his calling, as a tent-maker, that he might get his own bread. He spent part of the night, as well as the day, in this work; that he might have an opportunity to do good to the souls of men in the day time. 4. By the holiness of their conversation, concerning which he appeals not only to them, but to God also (v. 10): You are witnesses, and God also. They were observers of their outward conversation in public before men, and God was witness not only of their behaviour in secret, but of the inward principles from which they acted.

II. He mentions their faithful discharge of the work of the ministry, v. 11, 12. Paul and his fellow-labourers were not only good Christians, but faithful ministers. Paul exhorted the Thessalonians, and he comforted them also, and charged every one of them by personal addresses: this is intended by the similitude of a father's charging his children. He was their spiritual father; and, as he cherished them like a nursing mother, so he charged them as a father, with a father's affection rather than a father's authority. That they would walk worthy of God, who hath called them to his kingdom and glory, v. 12. 1. What is our great gospel privilege—that God has called us to his kingdom and glory. 2. What is our great gospel duty—that we walk worthy of God.

Verses 13–16

I. The success of his ministry among these Thessalonians (v. 13).

1. The manner of their receiving the word of God: When you received the word of God, which you heard of us, you received it, not as the word of men, but (as it is in truth) the word of God. The word of the gospel is preached by men like ourselves, men of like passions and infirmities with others. However, it is in truth the word of God. Such was the word the apostles preached by divine inspiration, and such is that which is left upon record, and such is that word which in our days is preached. Those are greatly to blame who give out their own fancies or injunctions for the word of God. Those are also to blame who, in hearing the word, look no further than to the ministry of men, or the words of men. We should receive the word of God as the word of God. The words of men are frail and perishing, like themselves, and sometimes false, foolish, and fickle: but God's word is holy, wise, just, and faithful, and abides for ever.

2. The wonderful operation of this word they received: It effectually worketh in those that believe, v. 13. Such as have this inward testimony of the truth of the scriptures have the best evidence of their divine original, though this is not sufficient to convince others who are strangers thereto.

II. The good effects which his successful preaching had,

1. Upon himself and fellow-labourers. It was a constant cause of thankfulness: For this cause thank we God without ceasing, v. 13. He never could be sufficiently thankful that God had counted him faithful, and made his ministrations successful.

2. Upon them. The word wrought effectually in them. In constancy and patience under sufferings: You became followers of the churches of God, and have suffered like things as they have done (v. 14). The cross is the Christian's mark. It is a good effect of the gospel when we are enabled to suffer for its sake. The sufferings of the churches of God, which in Judæa were in Christ Jesus. Those in Judæa first heard the gospel, and they first suffered for it: for the Jews were the most bitter enemies Christianity had. Bitter zeal and fiery persecution will set countrymen at variance. They were the ringleaders of persecution in all places; so in particular it was at Thessalonica. Upon this occasion, the apostle gives a character of the unbelieving Jews (v. 15). They killed the Lord Jesus. They killed their own prophets. They hated the apostles, and did them all the mischief they could. No marvel, if they killed the Lord Jesus, that they persecuted his followers. They pleased not God. They had quite lost all sense of religion. They were contrary to all men. Their persecuting spirit was a perverse spirit. Forbidding the apostles to speak to the Gentiles, that they might be saved. They were envious against the Gentiles, and angry that they should be admitted to share in the means of salvation. Thus did the Jews fill up their sins. For the sake of these things wrath has come upon them to the uttermost; wrath was determined against them, and would soon overtake them. It was not many years after this that Jerusalem was destroyed, and the Jewish nation cut off by the Romans.

The apostle apologizes for his absence: We, brethren, were taken from you, v. 17. He was unwillingly sent away by night to Berea. Though he was absent in body, yet he was present in heart. Even his bodily absence was but for a short time. This world is not a place where we are always, or long, to be together. It is in heaven that holy souls shall meet, and never part more. He earnestly desired and endeavoured to see them again: We endeavoured more abundantly to see your face with great desire, v. 17. But men of business are not masters of their own time. Paul did his endeavour, and he could do no more, v. 18. Satan hindered his return (v. 18). Satan is a constant enemy to the work of God, and does all he can to obstruct it. He assures them of his affection and high esteem for them. They were his hope, and joy, and crown of rejoicing; his glory and joy. Those that sow and those that reap shall rejoice together, in the presence of our Lord Jesus Christ at his coming. Though he should never be able to come to them, yet our Lord Jesus Christ will come.

CHAP. III

The apostle gives further evidence of his love to the Thessalonians, ver. 1–5. The return of Timothy, with good tidings concerning them, ver. 6–10. He concludes with fervent prayer for them, ver. 11, to the end.

Verses 1–5

An account of his sending Timothy to the Thessalonians. Paul was content, for their good, to be left alone at Athens.

I. The character he gives of Timothy (v. 2): We sent Timotheus, our brother. Elsewhere he calls him his son; here he calls him brother. He calls him also a minister of God. He calls him also his fellow-labourer in the gospel of Christ. Ministers should strengthen one another's hands, not strive and contend one with another (which will hinder their work), but strive together to carry on the great work they are engaged in.

II. The end why Paul sent Timothy: To establish you and to comfort you concerning your faith, v. 2. He was desirous that they might be confirmed and comforted. The more we are comforted, the more we shall be confirmed. The apostle's design was to establish and comfort the Thessalonians concerning their faith,—concerning the object of their faith,—concerning the recompence of faith.

III. The motive, a godly fear lest they should be moved from the faith of Christ, v. 3.

1. He apprehended there was danger, and feared the consequence.

(1) There was danger by reason of affliction and persecution for the sake of the gospel, v. 3. Those who made profession of the gospel were persecuted, and without doubt these Thessalonians themselves were afflicted. The apostle was afraid lest by any means the tempter had tempted him, v. 5. The devil is a subtle and unwearied tempter. He has often been successful in his attacks upon persons under afflictions.

(2) The consequence the apostle feared was lest his labour should be in vain. It is the devil's design to hinder the good fruit and effect of the preaching of the gospel. If he cannot hinder ministers from labouring he will, if he be able, hinder them of the success of their labours.

2. The apostle tells them what care he took in sending Timothy, (1) To put them in mind of what he had told them before concerning suffering tribulation (v. 4), he says (v. 3), We are appointed thereunto. Their troubles and persecutions did not come merely from the malice of the enemies of religion, but by the appointment of God. Being fore-warned, they should be fore-armed. Besides, it might prove a confirmation of their faith, when they perceived that it only happened to them as was predicted before. (2) To know their faith, whether they remained steadfast. If their faith did not fail, they would be able to stand their ground against the tempter and all his temptations.

Paul's great satisfaction upon the return of Timothy with good tidings.

I. The good report Timothy made concerning them, v. 6. Concerning their faith, that they were not shaken in mind, nor turned aside. Their love also continued; their love to the gospel, and the ministers of the gospel. They desired greatly to see them again, and there was no love lost for the apostle was as desirous to see them.

II. The great comfort the apostle had in this good report (v. 7, 8): Therefore, brethren, we were comforted in all our affliction and distress. The apostle thought this good news of them was sufficient to balance all the troubles he met with. This put new life and spirit into the apostle. Thus he was not only comforted, but greatly rejoiced also: Now we live, if you stand fast in the Lord, v. 8. It would have been a killing thing if the professors of religion had been unsteady, whereas nothing was more encouraging than their constancy.

III. The effects of this were thankfulness and prayer to God on their behalf. 1. How thankful the apostle was, v. 9. When we are most cheerful we should be most thankful. Paul speaks as if he could not tell how to express his thankfulness to God, or his joy and rejoicing for their sakes. His heart was enlarged with love to them and with thanksgiving to God. 2. He prayed for them night and day (v. 10), in the midst of the business of the day or slumber of the night lifting up his heart to God in prayer. He prayed exceedingly. When we are most thankful we should always give ourselves to prayer. There was something still lacking in their faith; Paul desired that this might be perfected, and to see their face in order thereunto. The best of men have something wanting in their faith, if not as to the matter of it, yet as to the clearness and certainty of their faith.

He desired to be instrumental in the further benefit of the Thessalonians; and the only way to be so while at a distance was by prayer for them, together with his writing or sending to them.

I. Whom he prays to, namely, God and Christ. Prayer is not only to be offered in the name of Christ, but offered up to Christ himself, as our Lord and our Saviour.

II. What he prays for.

1. He prays that their way might be directed to them, v. 11. The taking of a journey to this or that place, one would think, is a thing depending on a man's own will, and lies in his own power. But the apostle knew that God our Father directs and orders his children whither they shall go and what they shall do. Let us acknowledge God in all our ways, and he will direct our paths.

2. He prays for the prosperity of the Thessalonians. (1) That they might increase and abound in love (v. 12), in love to one another and in love to all men. Love is of God, and is the fulfilling of the gospel as well as of the law. Timothy brought good tidings of their faith, yet something was lacking therein; and of their charity, yet the apostle prays that this might increase and abound. We are beholden to God not only for the stock put into our hands at first, but for the improvement of it also. And to our prayer we must add endeavour. The apostle again mentions his abounding love, towards them. The more we are beloved, the more affectionate we should be. (2) That they might be established unblameable in holiness, v. 13. To the end that he (the Lord) may establish your hearts. Holiness is required of all those who would go to heaven, and therein we must be unblameable. Our desire should be to have our hearts established in holiness before God, and that we may be unblameable before God, even the Father, now, and be presented blameless when the Lord Jesus shall come with all his saints.

CHAP. IV

The apostle gives earnest exhortations to abound in holiness, ver. 1–8. The great duties of brotherly love, and quietness with industry in our callings, ver. 9–12. He concludes with comforting those who mourned for their relations and friends that died in the Lord, ver. 13–18.

Verses 1–8

I. An exhortation to abound more and more in that which is good, v. 1, 2.

1. The manner in which the exhortation is given—very affectionately. The apostle entreats them as brethren; he exhorts them very earnestly: We beseech and exhort you.

2. The matter of his exhortation—that they would abound more and more in holy walking. The apostle would have them further to excel others. Those who most excel others fall short of perfection. We must not only persevere to the end, but we should grow better.

3. The arguments with which the apostle enforces his exhortation. They had been informed of their duty. They had received or been taught, how they ought to walk. The design of the gospel is to teach men not only what they should believe, but also how they ought to live. The apostle taught them how to walk, not how to talk. To talk well without living well will never bring us to heaven. The apostle taught and exhorted them in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Herein they would please God. We should not be men-pleasers, but should walk so as to please God. The rule according to which they ought to walk and act—the commandments they had given them by the Lord Jesus Christ. Though they had great authority from Christ, yet that was to teach men what Christ had commanded, not to give forth commandments of their own. The Thessalonians knew what commandments he gave them, that they were no other than what he had received from the Lord Jesus.

II. A caution against uncleanness.

1. That you should abstain from fornication (v. 3), by which we are to understand all uncleanness whatsoever. All that is contrary to chastity in heart, speech, and behaviour, is contrary to the command of God and contrary to that holiness which the gospel requires.

2. This branch of sanctification in particular is the will of God, v. 3. Not only does God require holiness in the heart, but also purity in our bodies. This will be greatly for our honour: so much is plainly implied, v. 4. The body is here called the vessel of the soul, which dwells therein, and it must be kept pure from defiling lusts. What can be more dishonourable than for a rational soul to be enslaved by bodily affections and brutal appetites? To indulge the lust of concupiscence is to live and act like heathens. Even as the Gentiles who know not God, v. 5. Christians should not walk as unconverted Gentiles. The sin of uncleanness, especially adultery, is a great piece of injustice that God will be the avenger of; so we may understand those words, That no man go beyond or defraud his brother (v. 6) in any matter. Some understand these words as a further warning and caution against injustice and oppression, which are certainly contrary to the gospel. But the meaning may rather be to show the injustice and wrong that are done by the sin of uncleanness. And, as this sin is of such a heinous nature, so it follows that God will be the avenger of it. The sin of uncleanness is contrary to the design of our Christian calling: For God hath called us not unto uncleanness, but unto holiness, v. 7.

The contempt therefore of God's law and gospel is the contempt of God himself: He that despises, despises God, not man only. God hath given Christians his Spirit. The Holy Ghost is given unto us to arm us against these sins.

I. Of brotherly love. This he exhorts them to increase in yet more and more. They were remarkable in the exercise of it, which made it less needful that he should write to them about it, v. 9. Thus by his good opinion of them he insinuated himself into their affections, and so made way for his exhortation to them.

1. What it is that the apostle commends in them. It was not so much their own virtue as God's grace. God had taught them this good lesson: You yourselves are taught of God to love one another, v. 9. Whoever does that which is good is taught of God to do it. All who are savingly taught of God are taught this lesson, to love one another. This is the livery of Christ's family. The Thessalonians gave good evidence of their being taught of God by their love to the brethren in all Macedonia, v. 10. Their love was extensive. And a true Christian's is so to all the saints.

2. The exhortation itself is to increase more and more in brotherly love, v. 10. They must be exhorted to pray for more, and labour for more. There are none on this side heaven who love in perfection.

II. Of quietness and industry in their callings. Study to be quiet, v. 11. It is the most desirable thing to have a calm and quiet temper, and to be of a peaceable and quiet behaviour. Satan is very busy to disquiet us; and we have that in our own hearts that disposes us to be disquiet; therefore let us study to be quiet. Do your own business. Those who are busy-bodies, meddling in other men's matters, generally have but little quiet in their own minds and cause great disturbances among their neighbours; at least they seldom mind the other exhortation, to be diligent in their own calling, to work with their own hands. Christianity does not discharge us from the work of our particular callings, but teaches us to be diligent therein. Thus we shall walk honestly, or decently and creditably, towards those that are without, v. 12. This will be to act as becomes the gospel, and will gain a good report from those that are strangers, yea, enemies to it. We shall live comfortably, and have lack of nothing, v. 12. Such as are diligent in their own business live comfortably and have lack of nothing. They earn their own bread, and have the greatest pleasure in so doing.

Verses 13–18

The apostle comforts the Thessalonians who mourned for the death of their relations and friends that died in the Lord. His design is to dissuade them from excessive grief. All grief for the death of friends is far from being unlawful; we may weep for our own loss, though it may be their gain. Yet we must not be immoderate in our sorrows.

I. This looks as if we had no hope, v. 13. It is to act too much like the Gentiles, who had no hope of a better life after this. This hope is more than enough to balance all our griefs.

II. This is an effect of ignorance concerning those who are dead, v. 13. There are some things which we cannot but be ignorant of concerning those that are asleep. Yet there are some things concerning those especially who die in the Lord that we need not to be ignorant of. They will be sufficient to allay our sorrow concerning them.

1. They sleep in Jesus. They are asleep, v. 13. They have retired out of this troublesome world, to rest from all their labours and sorrows, and they sleep in Jesus, v. 14. They are not lost, nor are they losers, but great gainers by death, and their removal out of this world is into a better.

2. They shall be raised up from the dead, and awakened out of their sleep, for God will bring them with him, v. 14. They then are with God, and are better where they are than when they were here; and when God comes he will bring them with him. The doctrine of the resurrection and the second coming of Christ is a great antidote against the fear of death and inordinate sorrow for the death of our Christian friends; and this doctrine we have a full assurance of, because we believe that Jesus died and rose again, v. 14.

3. Their state and condition shall be glorious and happy at the second coming of Christ. This the apostle informs the Thessalonians of by the word of the Lord (v. 15). The Lord Jesus will come down from heaven in all the pomp and power of the upper world (v. 16): The Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout. He will descend from heaven into this our air, v. 17. The appearance will be with pomp and power, with a shout—with the voice of the archangel. The glorious appearance of this great Redeemer and Judge will be proclaimed and ushered in by the trump of God. The dead shall be raised: The dead in Christ shall rise first (v. 16). Those who shall then be found alive shall not prevent those that are asleep, v. 15. Those that shall be found alive will then be changed. They shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, v. 17. Those who are raised, and thus changed, shall meet together in the clouds, and there meet with their Lord. Here is the bliss of the saints at that day: they shall be ever with the Lord, v. 17. The principal happiness of heaven is this, to be with the Lord, to see him, live with him, and enjoy him, for ever. This should comfort the saints upon the death of their friends. We and they with all the saints shall meet our Lord, and be with him for ever, no more to be separated either from him or from one another for ever. And the apostle would have us comfort one another with these words, v. 18.

CHAP. V

The apostle, having spoken in the end of the foregoing chapter concerning the resurrection, and the second coming of Christ, proceeds to speak concerning the uselessness of enquiring after the particular time of Christ's coming, which would be sudden and terrible to the wicked, but comfortable to the saints, ver. 1–5. He then exhorts them to the duties of watchfulness, sobriety, and the exercise of faith, love, and hope, as being suitable to their state, ver. 6–10. In the next words he exhorts them to several duties they owed to others, or to one another (ver. 11–15), afterwards to several other Christian duties of great importance (ver. 16–22), and then concludes this epistle, ver. 23–28.

Verses 1–5

I. The apostle tells the Thessalonians it was needless or useless to enquire about the particular time of Christ's coming: Of the times and seasons you need not that I write unto you, v. 1. There is a certain time appointed for his coming; but he had no revelation given him; nor should they or we enquire into this secret. There are times and seasons for us to do our work in: these it is our duty and interest to know and observe; but the time and season when we must give up our account we know not. There are many things which our vain curiosity desires to know which there is no necessity at all of our knowing, nor would our knowledge of them do us good.

II. He tells them that the coming of Christ would be a great surprise to most men, v. 2. As a thief in the night. As the thief usually cometh in the dead time of the night, when he is least expected, such a surprise will the day of the Lord be.

III. He tells them how terrible Christ's coming would be to the ungodly, v. 3. It will be to their destruction in that day of the Lord. It will be sudden. It will overtake them in the midst of their carnal security and jollity, when they say in their hearts, Peace and safety, and think not of it,—as travail cometh upon a woman with child, at the set time indeed, but not perhaps just then expected. It will be unavoidable destruction too: They shall not escape.

IV. He tells them how comfortable this day will be to the righteous, v. 4, 5. Their character and privilege. They are the children of the light, &c. This was the happy condition of the Thessalonians as it is of all true Christians. They were not in a state of sin and ignorance as the heathen world. They were the children of the day, for the day-star had risen upon them. They were no longer under the darkness of heathenism, but under the gospel, which brings life and immortality to light. Their great advantage on this account: that that day should not overtake them as a thief, v. 4. They had fair warning, and might hope to stand with comfort and confidence before the Son of man, as a friend in the day, not as a thief in the night.

Exhortations to several needful duties.

I. To watchfulness and sobriety, v. 6. These duties are distinct, yet they mutually befriend one another. We shall not keep sober, unless we be upon our guard, and, unless we keep sober, we shall not long watch. 1. Then let us not sleep as do others, but let us watch; we must not be secure and careless, nor indulge spiritual sloth and idleness. The generality of men are too careless of their duty and regardless of their spiritual enemies. Either they do not consider the things of another world at all, because they are asleep; or they do not consider them aright, because they dream. But let us watch, and act like men that are awake, and that stand upon their guard. 2. Let us also be sober. Let us keep our natural desires and appetites after the things of this world within due bounds. Watchfulness and sobriety are most suitable to the Christian's character and privilege, as being children of the day; because those that sleep, sleep in the night, and those that are drunken are drunken in the night, v. 7. They were not sensible of their danger, therefore they slept; they were not sensible of their duty, therefore they were drunk: but it ill becomes Christians to do thus.

II. To be well armed as well as watchful. Our spiritual enemies are many, and mighty, and malicious. We have need to arm ourselves against their attempts, and this spiritual armour consists of the three great graces of Christians, faith, love, and hope, v. 8. 1. We must live by faith, and this will keep us watchful and sober. Faith will be our best defence against the assaults of our enemies. 2. We must get a heart inflamed with love. True and fervent love to God, and the things of God, will keep us watchful and sober. 3. We must make salvation our hope. This good hope of eternal life, will be as a helmet to defend the head, and hinder our being intoxicated with the pleasures of sin, which are but for a season. The apostle shows what grounds Christians have to hope for this salvation. He says nothing of their meriting it. No, the doctrine of our merits is altogether unscriptural and antiscriptural. But our hopes are to be grounded, (1) Upon God's appointment: because God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain salvation, v. 9. If we would trace our salvation to the first cause, that is God's appointment. On this we build unshaken hope, especially when we consider, (2) Christ's merit and grace, and that salvation is by our Lord Jesus Christ, who died for us. Our salvation therefore is owing to, and our hopes of it are grounded on, Christ's atonement as well as God's appointment. That whether we wake or sleep we should live together with Christ, live in union and in glory with him for ever. Christ died for us, that, living and dying, we might be his; that we might live to him while we are here, and live with him when we go hence.

Several duties.

I. Towards those who were nearly related one to another. Such should comfort themselves, or exhort one another, and edify one another, v. 11. They must comfort or exhort themselves and one another. We should not only be careful about our own comfort and welfare, but of others also. They must edify one another. We should communicate our knowledge and experiences one to another. We should join in prayer and praise one with another. We should set a good example one before another. This the Thessalonians did (which also you do). Those who do that which is good have need of further exhortations to excite them to do more good, as well as continue in doing what they do.

II. Towards their ministers, v. 12, 13.

1. How the ministers of the gospel are described by the work of their office. Ministers must labour among their people, labour with diligence, and unto weariness (so the word in the original imports). They are called labourers, and should not be loiterers. Ministers are to rule their people also. They must rule, not with rigour, but with love. They must rule as spiritual guides, by setting a good example to the flock. They are over the people in the Lord, and must rule the people by Christ's laws. They must also admonish the people. They must instruct them to do well, and should reprove when they do ill.

2. What the duty of the people is towards their ministers. The people must know them. As the shepherd should know his flock, so the sheep must know their shepherd. They must esteem their ministers highly in love; and this for their work's sake, because their business is to promote the honour of Christ and the welfare of men's souls. Faithful ministers ought to be so far from being lightly esteemed because of their work that they should be highly esteemed on account of it.

III. Touching the duty Christians owe to one another. To be at peace among themselves, v. 13. The people should be at peace among themselves, doing all they can to hinder any differences from rising or continuing among them, and using all proper means to preserve peace and harmony. To warn the unruly, v. 14. There will be in all societies some who walk disorderly. Such should be reproved and told plainly of the injury they do their own souls, and the hurt they may do to others. To comfort the feeble-minded, v. 14, the timorous and faint-hearted, or such as are dejected and of a sorrowful spirit. Such should be encouraged; we should not despise them, but comfort them; and who knows what good a kind and comfortable word may do them? To support the weak, v. 15. Some are not well able to perform their work, nor bear up under their burdens; we should therefore help their infirmities, and lift at one end of the burden, and so help to bear it. To be patient towards all men, v. 14. We must bear and forbear. And this duty must be exercised towards all men, good and bad, high and low. We must endeavour to make the best we can of everything, and think the best we can of everybody. Not to render evil for evil to any man, v. 15. We must by all means forbear to avenge ourselves. It becomes us to forgive, as those that are, and that hope to be, forgiven of God. Ever to follow that which is good, v. 15. We must study to do what is pleasing to God. Whatever men do to us, we must do good to others, both among ourselves and then, as we have opportunity, unto all men.

Here we have divers short exhortations. The duties are of great importance, and we may observe how they are connected together. 1. Rejoice evermore, v. 16. If we do rejoice in God we may do that evermore. A religious life is a pleasant life, it is a life of constant joy. 2. Pray without ceasing, v. 17. The way to rejoice evermore is to pray without ceasing. We should rejoice more if we prayed more. The meaning is not that men should do nothing but pray, but that nothing else we do should hinder prayer in its proper season. Prayer will help forward and not hinder all other lawful business, and every good work. 3. In everything give thanks, v. 18. If we pray without ceasing, we shall not want matter for thanksgiving in everything. We should be thankful in every condition, even in adversity as well as prosperity. It is never so bad with us but it might be worse. We never can have any reason to complain of God, and have always much reason to praise and give thanks. This is the will of God in Christ Jesus concerning us, that we give thanks. He allows us to rejoice evermore, and appoints us in everything to give thanks. 4. Quench not the Spirit (v. 19). Christians are said to be baptized with the Holy Ghost and with fire. We must be careful not to quench this holy fire. As fire is put out by withdrawing fuel, so we quench the Spirit if we do not stir up our spirits. And as fire is quenched by pouring water, or putting a great quantity of dirt upon it, so we must be careful not to quench the Holy Spirit by indulging carnal lusts and affections, or minding only earthly things. 5. Despise not prophesyings (v. 20). By prophesyings here we are to understand the preaching of the word. We must not despise preaching, though it be plain, and though we be told no more than what we knew before. It is useful, and many times needful, to have our affections and resolutions excited, to those things that we knew before to be our interest and our duty. 6. Prove all things, but hold fast that which is good, v. 21. We must not take things upon trust from the preacher. We must search the scriptures, whether what they say be true or not. But we must not be always trying, always unsettled; no, at length we must be settled, and hold fast that which is good. Proving all things must be in order to holding fast that which is good. 7. Abstain from all appearance of evil, v. 22. Corrupt affections indulged in the heart, and evil practices allowed of in the life, will greatly tend to promote fatal errors in the mind; whereas purity of heart, and integrity of life, will dispose men to receive the truth in the love of it. He who is not shy of the appearances of sin will not long abstain from the actual commission of sin.

Verses 23–29

I. Paul's prayer for them, v. 23. 1. To whom the apostle prays, The very God of peace. By their peaceableness and unity those things would best be obtained which he prays for. 2. The things he prays for are their sanctification, that God would sanctify them wholly; and their preservation, that they might be preserved blameless. All those who are sanctified in Christ Jesus shall be preserved to the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. We should pray to God to perfect his work, and preserve us blameless, till at length we are presented faultless before the throne of his glory with exceeding joy.

II. His comfortable assurance that God would hear his prayer: Faithful is he who calleth you, who will also do it, v. 24. The faithfulness of God was their security that they should persevere to the end. God would do what he desired; he would accomplish all the good pleasure of his goodness towards them. Our fidelity to God depends upon his faithfulness to us.

III. His request of their prayers: Brethren, pray for us, v. 25. Brethren should thus express brotherly love. The more people pray for their ministers the more good ministers may have from God, and the more benefit people may receive by their ministry.

IV. His salutation: Greet all the brethren with a holy kiss, v. 26. Thus the apostle sends a friendly salutation from himself, and Silvanus, and Timotheus, and would have them salute each other in their names; and thus he would have them signify their mutual love and affection to one another.

V. His solemn charge for the reading of this epistle, v. 27. This is not only an exhortation, but an adjuration by the Lord. And this epistle was to be read to all the holy brethen. In order to this, these holy oracles should not be kept concealed in an unknown tongue, but translated into the vulgar languages. The scriptures should be read in the public assemblies of Christians also.

VI. The apostolical benediction that is usual in other epistles: The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you. Amen, v. 28. We need no more to make us happy than to know that grace which our Lord Jesus Christ has manifested. This is an ever-flowing and overflowing fountain of grace to supply all our wants.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO

THE THESSALONIANS

This Second Epistle was written soon after the former, and seems to have been designed to prevent a mistake concerning the second coming of Christ, as if it were near at hand. The apostle informs them that there were many intermediate counsels yet to be fulfilled before that day of the Lord should come, though, because it is sure, he had spoken of it as near.

CHAP. I

After the introduction (ver. 1, 2) the apostle begins this epistle with an account of his high esteem for these Thessalonians, ver. 3, 4. He then comforts them under their afflictions and persecutions, ver. 5–10, and tells them what his prayers were to God for them, ver. 11, 12.

Verses 1–4

I. The introduction (v. 1, 2), in the same words as in the former epistle. This church of the Thessalonians was built, as all true churches are; in God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.

II. The apostle's expression of the high esteem he had for them.

1. How his esteem of them is expressed. (1) He glorified God on their behalf, v. 3. It is our duty to be thankful to God for all the good that is found in us or others: and it not only is an act of kindness to our fellow-christians, but our duty, to thank God on their behalf. (2) He also glories in them before the churches of God, v. 4. The apostle never flattered his friends, but he took pleasure in speaking well of them, to the glory of God.

2. For what he esteemed them and thanked God. In his former epistle (ch. i. 3) he gave thanks for their faith, love, and patience; here he gives thanks for the increase of all those graces. Where there is the truth of grace there will be increase of it. And where there is the increase of grace God must have all the glory of it. We are as much indebted to him for the improvement of grace, as we are for the very beginning of it. We may be tempted to think that though when we were bad we could not make ourselves good, yet when we are good we can easily make ourselves better. Their faith grew exceedingly, v. 3. The growth of their faith appeared by the works of faith; and, where faith grows, all other graces grow proportionably. Their charity abounded (v. 3). Where faith grows love will abound. Their patience as well as faith increased in all their persecutions and tribulations. And patience has then its perfect work when it extends itself to all trials. They endured all these by faith, and endured them with patience, not with an insensibility under them, but with patience arising from Christian principles.

Verses 5–10

I. The present happiness and advantage of their sufferings, v. 5. They were improved by their sufferings, were counted worthy of the kingdom of God. Religion, if it is worth anything, is worth everything, and those either have no religion at all, or know not how to value it, that cannot find in their hearts to suffer for it.

II. The future recompence that shall be given to persecutors and persecuted.

1. In this future recompence there will be, (1) A punishment inflicted on persecutors, v. 6. And there is nothing that more infallibly marks a man for eternal ruin than a spirit of persecution. God will render a recompence, and will trouble those that trouble his people. (2) A reward for those that are persecuted, v. 7. There is a rest that remains for the people of God, a rest from sin and sorrow. The future rest will abundantly recompence all their present troubles. There is enough in heaven to countervail all that we may lose or suffer for the name of Christ in this world.

2. Concerning this future recompence.

(1) The certainty of it: It is a righteous thing with God (v. 6). God's suffering people will lose nothing by their sufferings, and their enemies will gain nothing.

(2) When this righteous recompence shall be made, v. 7. The Lord Jesus will in that day appear from heaven. He will be revealed with his mighty angels (v. 7). He will come in flaming fire, v. 8. A refining fire, to purify the saints. A consuming fire to the wicked. The effects of this appearance will be terrible to some and joyful to others.

First, They will be terrible to some. Those that sinned against the principles of natural religion, and rebelled against the light of nature (v. 8). Those that rebel against the light of revelation. To such persons the revelation of our Lord Jesus Christ will be terrible, because of their doom, v. 9. They will then be punished. They did sin's work, and must receive sin's wages. Their punishment will be no less than destruction. This destruction shall come from the presence of the Lord. It shall come from the glory of his power.

Secondly, It will be a joyful day to some, even to the saints. Christ Jesus will be glorified and admired by his saints. Christ will be glorified and admired in them. His grace and power will be magnified in the salvation of his saints. How will they be wondered at in this great and glorious day; or, rather, how will Christ be admired!

His earnest and constant prayer for them: Wherefore also we pray, &c.

I. What the apostle prayed for, v. 11. 1. That God would begin his good work of grace in them; so we may understand this expression: That our God would count you (or, as it might be read, make you) worthy of this calling. We are called to God's kingdom and glory. Now, if this be our calling, our great concern should be to be worthy of it. We should pray that he would make us worthy. 2. That God would carry on the good work that is begun. The good pleasure of God denotes his gracious purposes towards his people. Now, there are various and manifold purposes of grace and goodwill in God towards his people; and the apostle prays that all of them may be fulfilled towards these Thessalonians. In particular, the apostle prays that God would fulfil in them the work of faith with power.

II. Why the apostle prayed for these things (v. 12). Our good works should so shine before men that others may glorify God, that Christ may be glorified in and by us, and then we shall be glorified in and with him.

CHAP. II

An error into which some among them had fallen concerning the coming of Christ, as being very near, ver. 1–3. Then he proceeds to confute the error he cautioned them against, ver. 4–12. He then comforts them and exhorts them to steadfastness, ver. 13–15. And concludes with a prayer for them, ver. 16–17.

Verses 1–3

Some among the Thessalonians had mistaken the apostle's meaning about the coming of Christ, by thinking that it was near at hand. The apostle is careful to rectify this mistake. If errors and mistakes arise among Christians, we should take the first opportunity to rectify them, and good men will be especially careful to suppress errors that may arise from a mistake of their words and actions. We have a subtle adversary, who will sometimes promote errors even by means of the words of scripture.

I. How very earnest this apostle was, v. 1. He entreats them as brethren who might have charged them as a father charges his children. And this is the best way to deal with men when we would preserve or recover them from errors, to deal gently and affectionately with them.

1. It is most certain that the Lord Jesus Christ will come to judge the world. Whatever mistakes may arise about the time of his coming, his coming itself is certain.

2. At the second coming of Christ all the saints will be gathered together to him. It will be the completing of the happiness of his saints. There will then be a general meeting of all the saints, and none but saints; all the Old Testament saints, and all the New Testament saints. They shall be gathered together to Christ. He will be the great centre of their unity. To be with him for ever, and altogether happy in his presence to all eternity.

II. The Thessalonians should not be deceived about the time of Christ's coming, and so be shaken in mind, or be troubled. Errors in the mind tend greatly to weaken our faith, and such as are weak in faith and of troubled minds are oftentimes apt to be deceived. The apostle would not have them be deceived, v. 3. There are many who lie in wait to deceive, and they have many ways of deceiving; we have reason therefore to stand upon our guard. The apostle cautions them not to be deceived about the near approach of Christ's coming, as if it was to have been in the apostle's days. He gives them warning. He would not have their faith weakened. They ought not to waver in their minds as to this great thing, which is the faith and hope of all the saints. False doctrines are like the winds, that toss the water to and fro, and they are apt to unsettle the minds of men, who are sometimes as unstable as water. He would not have their comforts lessened with false alarms. In itself it should be matter of the believer's hope and joy. We should always watch and pray, but must not be discouraged nor uncomfortable at the thought of Christ's coming.

Verses 3–12

The apostle confutes the error against which he had cautioned them. There are several events previous to the second coming of Christ.

I. A general apostasy, v. 3. The apostle speaks of some very great apostasy such as should give occasion to the revelation or rise of that man of sin. This, he says (v. 5), he had told them of when he was with them. No sooner was Christianity planted and rooted in the world than there began to be a defection in the Christian church. It was so in the Old Testament church, and therefore it was no strange thing that after the planting of Christianity there should come a falling away.

II. A revelation of that man of sin (v. 3). The apostle afterwards speaks of the revelation of that wicked one (v. 8): here he seems to speak of his rise. He is called the man of sin, and he is the son of perdition, because he himself is devoted to certain destruction, and is the instrument of destroying many others. The characters here given, v. 4. The antichrist is some usurper of God's authority who claims divine honours. His rise is mentioned, v. 6, 7. There was something that hindered, or let, until it was taken away. This mystery of iniquity was gradually to arrive at its height. The apostle calls it a mystery of iniquity. This mystery of iniquity did already work. While the apostles were yet living the enemy came and sowed tares. The fall or ruin of the antichristian state is declared, v. 8. The head of this antichristian kingdom is called that wicked one. The revelation or discovery of this to the world would be the sure presage of his ruin. The apostle assures the Thessalonians that the Lord would destroy him. The power of antichrist in due time will be totally and finally destroyed, and this will be by the brightness of Christ's coming. The apostle further describes the rule of this man of sin. A divine power is pretended for the support of this kingdom, but it is only after the working of Satan. The apostle calls it all deceiveableness of unrighteousness, v. 10. Many are the subtle artifices the man of sin has used. His willing subjects, v. 10. Had they loved the truth, they would have persevered in it, and been preserved by it; but no wonder if they easily parted with what they never had any love to. The sin and ruin of the subjects of antichrist's kingdom declared, v. 11, 12. An erroneous mind and vicious life often go together and help forward one another. He will punish men for their unbelief, and for their dislike of the truth and love to sin and wickedness. He sometimes withdraws his grace from such sinners as are here mentioned; he gives them up to their own hearts' lusts, and leaves them to themselves, and then sin will follow of course.

I. The consolation the Thessalonians might take, v. 13, 14. The apostle reckoned himself bound in duty to be thankful to God on this account. And there was good reason, because they were beloved by the Lord.

1. The stability of the election of grace, v. 13. God had chosen them from the beginning. He had loved them with an everlasting love. (1) The eternal date of it—it is from the beginning. (2) The end to which they were chosen—salvation, complete and eternal salvation. (3) The means in order to obtaining this end—sanctification of the spirit and belief of the truth. We are not elected of God because we were holy, but that we might be holy. Being chosen of God, we must not live as we list. Faith and holiness must be joined together, as well as holiness and happiness.

2. The efficacy of the gospel call, v. 14. They were called thereunto by the gospel. It is a call to honour and happiness, even the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ. Such shall be with Christ, to behold his glory, and they shall be glorified with Christ and partake of his glory.

II. He does not say, "You are chosen to salvation, and therefore you may be careless and secure"; but therefore stand fast. The Thessalonians are exhorted to steadfastness in their Christian profession.

Verses 16, 17

The apostle's earnest prayer for them.

I. To whom he prays: Our Lord Jesus Christ himself, and God, even our Father. We may and should direct our prayers, not only to God the Father, but also to our Lord Jesus Christ himself.

II. From what he takes encouragement—from the consideration of what God had already done for him and them (v. 16). The love of God is the spring and fountain of all the good we have or hope for. From this fountain all our consolation flows. And the consolation of the saints is an everlasting consolation. The comforts of the saints are not dying things. Their consolation is founded on the hope of eternal life. The free grace and mercy of God are what they hope for, and what their hopes are founded on.

III. What it is that he asks of God for them, v. 17. He prayed that they might have more abundant consolation, and he prayed that they might be established. Comfort is a means of establishment; for the more pleasure we take in the ways of God, the more likely we shall be to persevere therein. Our establishment in the ways of God is a likely means in order to comfort. If we are halting and faltering in our duty, no wonder if we are strangers to the pleasures and joys of religion. We must be established in every good word and work. Christ must be honoured by our good works and good words.

CHAP. III

The apostle had prayed earnestly for the Thessalonians, and now he desires their prayers, ver. 1–5. Commands and directions for correcting some things amiss among them, ver. 6–15, and a conclusion with benedictions and prayers, ver. 16–18.

Verses 1–5

I. The apostle desires the prayers of his friends, v. 1. He always remembered them in his prayers, and would not have them forget him and his fellow-labourers. This is one way by which the communion of saints is kept up, not only by their praying together but by their praying for one another when they are absent one from another. What they are desired to pray for: 1. For the success of the gospel ministry, v. 1. He desired that the word of the Lord might run (so it is in the original), that it might get ground, and not only go forward, but go apace. We should pray that the gospel may have free course to the hearts and the consciences of men, that it may be glorified in the conversion of sinners. God will glorify the gospel, and so will glorify his own name. 2. For the safety of gospel ministers. He asks their prayers, not for preferment, but for preservation, v. 2. Those who are enemies to the preaching of the gospel are unreasonable and wicked men. There is the greatest absurdity in the world, as well as impiety. Godly and faithful ministers are as the standard-bearers, who are most struck at. Many do not believe the gospel; no wonder if such are restless in their endeavours to oppose the gospel, and disgrace the ministers of the word; and too many have not common faith or honesty; there is no confidence that we can safely put in them, and we should pray to be delivered from those who have no conscience nor honour.

II. He encourages them to trust in God.

1. What the good is which we may expect from the grace of God—establishment, and preservation from evil. We stand no longer than God holds us up. We have as much need of the grace of God for our perseverance to the end as for the beginning of the good work.

2. What encouragement we have to depend upon the grace of God. He is faithful to his promises. When once the promise is made, performance is sure and certain. He is a faithful God and a faithful friend. Let it be our care to be true and faithful in our promises, and to the relations we stand in to this faithful God.

3. A further ground of hope that God would do this for them, v. 4. The apostle had this confidence in them, and this was founded upon his confidence in God; for there is otherwise no confidence in man.

III. He makes a short prayer for them, v. 5, that their hearts may be brought into the love of God. This is not only most reasonable in order to our happiness, but is our happiness itself. We can never attain to this unless God by his grace direct our hearts aright, for our love is apt to go astray after other things. We must wait for Christ, which supposes our faith in him, that we believe he came once in flesh and will come again in glory. We have need of patience, patience for Christ's sake and after Christ's example.

Verses 6–15

Commands and directions to some who were faulty, correcting some things that were amiss among them. The best society of Christians may have some faulty persons among them. Perfection is not to be found on this side heaven: but evil manners beget good laws.

I. That which was amiss among the Thessalonians.

1. There were some who walked disorderly, not after the tradition they received from the apostle, v. 6.

2. There were among them some idle persons and busy-bodies, v. 11. It does not appear that they were gluttons or drunkards, but idle, and therefore disorderly people. It is not enough for any to say they do no hurt; for it is required of all persons that they do good. It is probable that these persons had a notion concerning the near approach of the coming of Christ, which served them for a pretence to leave off the work of their calling, and live in idleness. Industry in our particular callings as men is a duty required of us by our general calling as Christians. There were busy-bodies among them. The same persons who were idle were busy-bodies also. Most commonly those persons who have no business of their own to do, or who neglect it, busy themselves in other men's matters. If we are idle, the devil will soon find us something to do. The mind of man is a busy thing; if it be not employed in doing good, it will be doing evil.

II. The good laws which were occasioned by these evil manners.

1. Whose laws they are: they are commands of the apostles of our Lord, that is, the commands of our Lord himself, v. 6, 12. The authority of Christ should awe our minds to obedience, and his grace and goodness should allure us.

2. What the good laws and rules are.

(1) His commands and directions to the whole church. [1] Their behaviour towards the disorderly persons (v. 6). Note that man is charged with not obeying the word of God. We must have sufficient proof of his fault before we proceed further. Admonish him in a friendly manner; we must put him in mind of his sin, and of his duty. If he will not hear do not keep company with him, that ye may not learn his evil ways; for he who follows vain persons is in danger of becoming like them. Another reason is for the shaming, and so the reforming, of those that offend. Love therefore to the persons of our offending brethren should be the motive of our withdrawing from them; and even those who are under the censures of the church must not be accounted as enemies (v. 15). [2] Their general conduct ought to be according to the good example the apostle had given them, v. 7. The particular good example the apostle mentions was their diligence: "We behaved not ourselves disorderly among you (v. 7), we did not spend our time idly." They took pains in their ministry and in getting their own living, v. 8.

Those who preach the gospel may of right expect to live by the gospel. This is a just debt that people owe to their ministers, and the apostle had power or authority to have demanded this (v. 9); but he waived his right from affection to them, and that he might be an example for them to follow (v. 9).

(2) He commands those that lived idle lives to reform, v. 10. The labourer is worthy of his meat; but what is the loiterer worthy of? None should live like useless drones in the world. It was not the mere humour of the apostle, it was the command of our Lord Jesus Christ, that with quietness we work, and eat our own bread, v. 12. Men ought some way or other to earn their own living, otherwise they do not eat their own bread. We must study to be quiet, and do our own business. This is an excellent but rare composition, to be of an active yet quiet spirit, active in our own business and yet quiet as to other people's.

(3) He exhorts those that did well, not to be weary in well-doing (v. 13). You must never give over, nor tire in your work. It will be time enough to rest when you come to heaven.

Verses 16–18

The apostle's benediction and prayers for these Thessalonians.

I. That God would give them peace. Peace is the blessing pronounced or desired. This peace is desired for them always. Peace by all means: for peace is often difficult, as it is always desirable. If we have any peace that is desirable, God must give it.

II. That the presence of God might be with them. We need nothing more to make us safe and happy, nor can we desire anything better for ourselves and our friends. It is the presence of God that makes heaven to be heaven, and this will make this earth to be like heaven.

III. That the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ might be with them. It is through the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ that we may comfortably hope to have peace with God and enjoy the presence of God. It is this grace that is all in all to make us happy.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE FIRST EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO

TIMOTHY

Hitherto Paul's epistles were directed to churches; now follow some to particular persons: two to Timothy, one to Titus, and another to Philemon. Timothy and Titus were evangelists. Their commission and work was much the same with that of the apostles, and accordingly they were itinerants, as we find Timothy was. Timothy was first converted by Paul, and therefore he calls him his own son in the faith.

The scope of these two epistles is to direct Timothy how to discharge his duty as an evangelist at Ephesus, where he now was.

CHAP. I

After the inscription (ver. 1, 2) we have, I. The charge given to Timothy, ver. 3, 4. II. The true end of the law (ver. 5–11). III. He mentions his own call to be an apostle, ver. 12–16. IV. His doxology, ver. 17. V. A renewal of the charge to Timothy, ver. 18. And of Hymenæus and Alexander, ver. 19, 20.

Verses 1–4

I. The inscription of the epistle. His credentials were unquestionable. He had a commandment, not only from God our Saviour, but from Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ is a Christian's hope: all our hope of eternal life is built upon him. He calls Timothy his own son, because he had been an instrument of his conversion, and because he had been a son that served him. Timothy had not been wanting in the duty of a son to Paul, and Paul was not wanting in the care and tenderness of a father to him.

II. The benediction. In all the epistles to the churches the apostolical benediction is grace and peace; in these two epistles to Timothy and that to Titus it is grace, mercy, and peace. Ministers need more mercy than others. If Timothy needed the increase and continuance of it, how much more do we ministers.

III. Paul tells Timothy what was the end of his appointing him to this office. His business was to take care to fix both the ministers and the people of that church, that they do not add to the Christian doctrine, that they do not alter it, but cleave to it as it was delivered to them. In the times of the apostles there were attempts made to corrupt Christianity, otherwise this charge to Timothy might have been spared. He must not only see to it that he did not preach any other doctrine, but he must charge others that they preach it pure and uncorrupt. They will be the corrupting and ruining of religion among you, for they minister questions rather than edifying. That which gives occasion for doubtful disputes pulls down the church rather than builds it up. Godly edifying is the end ministers should aim at in all their discourses. Godly edifying must be in faith. It is by faith that we come to God at first, and it must be in the same way, and by the same principle of faith, that we must be edified. Ministers should avoid what will occasion disputes. Even disputes about great and necessary truths eat out the vitals of religion, which consist in practice and obedience as well as in faith.

Verses 5–11

Here the apostle shows the use of the law, and the glory of the gospel.

I. The end and uses of the law: it is intended to promote love.

1. The main scope and drift of the divine law are to engage us to the love of God and one another. Surely the gospel, which obliges us to love our enemies, to do good to those who hate us (Matt. v. 44), does not design to supersede a commandment the end whereof is love? Those therefore who boasted of their knowledge of the law, but used it only as a colour for the disturbance that they gave to the preaching of the gospel, defeated that which was the very end of the commandment, and that is love, love out of a pure heart. Our hearts must be cleansed from all sinful love; our love must arise out of a good conscience; a real belief of the truth of the word of God, here called a faith unfeigned. It is love without dissimulation: the faith that works by it must be of the like nature, genuine and sincere. When persons swerve from the great law of charity they will turn aside to vain jangling; when a man misses his end it is no wonder that every step he takes is out of the way. Jangling, especially in religion, is vain, and yet many people's religion consists of little else but vain jangling.

2. The use of the law (v. 8). The Jews used it unlawfully. They set it up for justification, and so used it unlawfully. Call it back to its right use and take away the abuses, for the law is still very useful as a rule of life. It is good to teach us what is sin and what is duty. It is the grace of God that changes men's hearts; but the terrors of the law may be of use to tie their hands and restrain their tongues. The law is not made primarily for the righteous, but for sinners of all sorts, whether in a greater or less measure, v. 9, 10.

II. He shows the glory and grace of the gospel. The glorious gospel, for so it is: much of the glory of God appears in the works of creation and providence, but much more in the gospel, where it shines in the face of Jesus Christ. Paul reckoned it a great honour put upon him, and a great favour done him, that this glorious gospel was committed to his trust.

Verses 12–17

I. Thanks to Jesus Christ for putting him into the ministry. It is Christ's work to put men into the ministry. Ministers cannot make ministers, much less can persons make themselves ministers; for it is Christ's work. Those whom he puts into the ministry he fits for it; whom he calls he qualifies. Christ gives not only ability, but fidelity, to those whom he puts into the ministry. Christ's ministers are trusty servants. A call to the ministry is a great favour.

II. He gives an account of his conversion.

1. What he was before his conversion. Frequently those who are designed for great and eminent services are left to themselves before their conversion. The greatness of sin is no bar to our acceptance with God, nor to our being employed for him, if it be truly repented of. True penitents will not be backward to own their former condition. This good apostle often confessed what his former life had been.

2. The great favour of God to him.

(1) Because he did it ignorantly and in unbelief, he obtained mercy. What we do ignorantly is a less crime than what we do knowingly; yet a sin of ignorance is a sin. Ignorance in some cases will extenuate a crime, though it does not take it away. Unbelief is at the bottom of what sinners do ignorantly. For these reasons Paul obtained mercy.

(2) The abundant grace of Jesus Christ, v. 14, that grace of Christ which appears in his glorious gospel (v. 15). Here we have the sum of the whole gospel, that Jesus Christ came into the world. It is good news, worthy of all acceptation; and yet not too good to be true, for it is a faithful saying. Paul was a sinner of the first rank; so he acknowledges himself to have been. Persecutors are some of the worst of sinners: such a one Paul had been. He that elsewhere calls himself the least of all saints (Eph. iii. 8) here calls himself the chief of sinners. The chief of sinners may become the chief of saints. This is a faithful saying which may be depended on.

(3) The mercy which Paul found with God.

[1] For the encouragement of others to repent and believe (v. 16). It was an instance of the long-suffering of Christ that he would bear so much with one who had been so very provoking; and it was designed for a pattern to all others, that the greatest sinners might not despair of mercy with God.

[2] He mentions it to the glory of God. He could not go on with his letter without inserting a thankful acknowledgement of God's goodness to him. Those who are sensible of their obligations to the mercy and grace of God will have their hearts enlarged in his praise. When we have found God good we must not forget to pronounce him great; and his kind thoughts of us must not at all abate our high thoughts of him, but rather increase them. God's gracious dealings with us should fill us with admiration of his glorious attributes. "To him be glory for ever and ever."

Verses 18–20

The charge he gives to Timothy to proceed in his work with resolution, v. 18. It seems, there had been prophecies before concerning Timothy. This encouraged Paul to commit this charge to him. The ministry is a good warfare against sin and Satan. Ministers must war this good warfare diligently and courageously. The prophecies which went before concerning Timothy are a motive to stir him up to a vigorous discharge of his duty; so the good hopes that others have entertained concerning us should excite us to our duty. Holding faith and a good conscience, v. 19. Those that put away a good conscience will soon make shipwreck of faith; we must look to the one as well as the other. As for those who had made shipwreck of the faith, he specifies two, Hymenæus and Alexander, who had made a profession of the Christian religion. Paul had delivered them to Satan, had declared them to belong to the kingdom of Satan that they might learn not to blaspheme. God can, if he please, work by contraries: Hymenæus and Alexander are delivered to Satan, that they may learn not to blaspheme, when one would rather think they would learn of Satan to blaspheme the more. Let us hold faith and a good conscience, for if we once let go our hold of these we do not know where we shall stop.

CHAP. II

I. Of prayer, ver. 1–8. II. Of women's apparel, ver. 9, 10. III. Of their subjection, ver. 11–14. IV. A promise given for their encouragement in child-bearing, ver. 15.

Verses 1–8

I. A charge given to Christians to pray for all men in general, and particularly for all in authority. Paul does not send him any prescribed form of prayer. Paul thought it enough to give them general heads; they, having the scripture to direct them in prayer and the Spirit of prayer poured out upon them, needed not any further directions. The disciples of Christ must be praying people. There must be prayers for ourselves in the first place; this is implied here. We must also pray for all men. See how far the Christian religion was from being a sect, when it taught men this diffusive charity, to pray for all men. Pray for kings (v. 2); though the kings at this time were heathens, yet they must pray for them. For kings, and all that are in authority. We must give thanks for them, pray for their welfare and for the welfare of their kingdoms, that in the peace thereof we may have peace. He does not say, "that we may get preferments under them, grow rich, and be in honour and power under them"; no, the summit of the ambition of a good Christian is to lead a quiet and peaceable life. We cannot expect to be kept quiet and peaceable unless we keep in all godliness and honesty. Here we have our duty as Christians summed up in two words: godliness, that is, the right worshipping of God; and honesty, that is, a good conduct towards all men. These two must go together. Christians are to be men much given to prayer. In our prayers we are to have a generous concern for others as well as for ourselves; we are to pray for all men, and to give thanks for all men. Kings themselves, and those who are in authority, are to be prayed for. They want our prayers, for they have many difficulties to encounter, many snares to which their exalted stations expose them.

II. He shows God's love to mankind in general, v. 4.

1. God bears a goodwill to all mankind. There is one God (v. 5), and one only. This one God will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth. It concerns us to get the knowledge of the truth, because that is the way to be saved.

2. There is one Mediator, and that Mediator gave himself a ransom for all. As the mercy of God extends itself to all his works, so the mediation of Christ extends to all the children of men, so that they are not now under the law as a covenant of works, but as a rule of life. They are under grace. We deserved to have died. Christ died for us. He put himself into the office of Mediator between God and man. A mediator supposes a controversy. Sin had made a quarrel between us and God. Jesus Christ is a Mediator who undertakes to make peace, to bring God and man together. He is a ransom that was to be testified in due time. This doctrine of Christ's mediation Paul was entrusted to preach to every creature. He was commissioned particularly to preach to the Gentiles, faithfully and truly. God has a goodwill to the salvation of all; so that it is not so much the want of a will in God to save them as it is a want of will in themselves to be saved in God's way. Those who are saved must come to the knowledge of the truth. Without knowledge the heart cannot be good; if we do not know the truth, we cannot be ruled by it. Paul was ordained a minister, to declare this to the Gentiles, that Christ is the one Mediator between God and men, who gave himself a ransom for all. Ministers must preach the truth; they are, like our apostle, to preach in faith and verity, and they must also be faithful and trusty.

III. A direction how to pray, v. 8. Men must pray everywhere: no place is amiss for prayer, no place more acceptable to God than another. Lifting up holy hands, or pure hands, pure from the pollution of sin.

We must pray in charity: Without wrath, or malice, or anger at any person. We must pray in faith without doubting, or as some read it, without disputing.

Verses 9–15

I. Women who profess the Christian religion should be modest, sober, silent, and submissive. They must be very modest in their apparel (you may read the vanity of a person's mind in the gaiety and gaudiness of his habit), because they have better ornaments with which they should adorn themselves. Good works are the best ornament. Those that profess godliness should, in their dress, as well as other things, act as becomes their profession. Women must learn the principles of their religion, learn Christ, learn the scriptures. They must be silent, submissive, and not usurp authority. Adam was first formed, then Eve out of him. And as she was last in the creation, so she was first in the transgression. A word of comfort (v. 15) that those who continue in sobriety shall be saved in child-bearing, or with child-bearing. The sentence which they are under for sin shall be no bar to their acceptance with Christ.

II. The extensiveness of the rules of Christianity; they reach not only to men, but to women. Women are to profess godliness as well as men, and, to their honour be it spoken, many of them were eminent professors of Christianity in the days of the apostles, as the book of Acts will inform us. The best ornaments for professors of godliness are good works. Women must be learners, and are not allowed to be public teachers in the church; the woman must not usurp authority over the man, but is to be in silence. But, notwithstanding this prohibition, good women ought to teach their children at home the principles of religion. Timothy from a child had known the holy scriptures; and who should teach him but his mother and grandmother? Two very good reasons given for the man's authority over the woman, and her subjection to the man, v. 13, 14. Here is much for her support and encouragement, v. 15. Though in sorrow, yet she shall bring forth, and be a living mother of living children.

CHAP. III

I. The qualification of a person to be admitted to the office of a bishop, ver. 1–7. II. The qualifications of deacons (ver. 8–10), and of their wives (ver. 11), again of the deacons, ver. 12, 13. III. The reasons of his writing to Timothy, ver. 14, to the end.

Verses 1–7

Timothy, we suppose, was an evangelist who was left at Ephesus. They were very loth to part with Paul, especially because he told them they should see his face no more (Acts xx. 38), and therefore Paul left Timothy with them.

I. The ministry is a work. The office of a scripture-bishop is an office of divine appointment, and not of human invention. This office of a Christian bishop is a work which requires diligence and application. Ministers should always look more to their work than to the honour and advantage of their office. It is a good work, a work of the greatest importance. The ministry is conversant about no lower concerns than the life and happiness of immortal souls. There ought to be an earnest desire of the office in those who would be put into it.

II. The workman must be duly qualified. 1. A minister must be blameless, he must not lie under any scandal. 2. He must be the husband of one wife. 3. He must be vigilant and watchful against Satan. 4. He must be sober, temperate, moderate in all his actions, and in the use of all creature-comforts. 5. He must be of good behaviour, and not light, vain, and frothy. 6. He must be given to hospitality. 7. Apt to teach, both able and willing to communicate to others the knowledge which God has given him. 8. No drunkard. 9. No striker; one who is not quarrelsome, but does everything with mildness, love, and gentleness. 10. One who is not greedy of filthy lucre, who is dead to the wealth of this world, lives above it. 11. He must be patient, and not a brawler, of a mild disposition. As not a striker with his hands, so not a brawler with his tongue. 12. Not covetous. Covetousness is bad in any, but it is worst in a minister. 13. He must be one who keeps his family in good order. The families of ministers ought to be examples of good to all other families.—With all gravity. The best way to keep inferiors in subjection, is to be grave with them. Not having his children in subjection with all austerity, but with all gravity. 14. He must not be a novice, who knows no more of religion than the surface of it, for such a one is apt to be lifted up with pride: the more ignorant men are the more proud they are. We should take heed of pride, because it is a sin that turned angels into devils. 15. He must be of good reputation among his neighbours.

III. What great reason we have to cry out, as Paul does, Who is sufficient for these things? (2 Cor. ii. 16). What holy watchfulness is necessary in this work! Have not the most faithful and concientious ministers just reason to complain against themselves? How far short do the best come of what they should be and what they should do! Yet let those bless God, and be thankful, whom the Lord has enabled, and counted faithful. He will fit us for our work and reward our faithfulness with a crown of glory.

Verses 8–13

The character of deacons. They must be grave. Gravity becomes all Christians, but especially those who are in office in the church. Not doubled-tongued; a double tongue comes from a double heart; flatterers and slanderers are double-tongued. Not given to much wine; for this opens the door to many temptations. Not greedy of filthy lucre; this would especially be bad in the deacons, who were entrusted with the church's money, v. 9. If we keep a pure conscience, this will preserve in our souls the mystery of faith, v. 10. The soundness of their judgments, their zeal for Christ, and the blamelessness of their conversation, must be proved. Their wives likewise must have a good character (v. 11). All who are related to ministers must double their care to walk as becomes the gospel of Christ, lest the ministry be blamed. As he said before of the bishops or ministers, so here of the deacons, they must be the husband of one wife; they must rule their children and their own houses well: the families of deacons should be examples to other families. The reason why the deacons must be thus qualified (v. 13). In the primitive church there were but two orders of ministers or officers, bishops and deacons. The design of the deacon's office was to mind the temporal concerns of the church, such as the salaries of the ministers and providing for the poor. Integrity and uprightness in an inferior office are the way to be preferred to a higher station in the church: They purchase to themselves a good degree. This will also give a man great boldness in the faith, whereas a want of integrity and uprightness will make a man timorous.

Verses 14–16

He hoped shortly to come to him, to give him further directions and assistance in his work, and he therefore wrote the more briefly to him. But he wrote lest he should tarry long, that Timothy might know how to behave himself in the house of God.

I. Ministers ought to behave themselves well: their office binds them to their good behaviour, for any behaviour will not do in this case. The church is the house of God, he dwells there.

II. It is the great support of the church that it is the church of the living God.

1. It is the pillar and ground of truth. (1) The church itself is the pillar and ground of truth. The church holds forth the scripture and the doctrine of Christ, as the pillar to which a proclamation is affixed holds forth the proclamation. (2) Others understand it of Timothy. He as an evangelist, he and other faithful ministers, are the pillars and ground of truth; it is their business to maintain the truths of Christ in the church. Let us be diligent and impartial in our own enquiries after truth; let us buy the truth at any rate, and not think much of any pains to discover it. Let us be careful to keep and preserve it. Let us take care to publish it.

2. But what is the truth which the churches and ministers are the pillars and grounds of? He tells us (v. 16).

(1) Christianity is a mystery that could not have been found out by reason or the light of nature, because it is above reason, though not contrary thereto. It is a mystery of godliness, and herein it exceeds all the mysteries of the Gentiles.

(2) It is Christ. [1] He is God manifest in the flesh. [2] He is justified in the Spirit. Whereas he was reproached as a sinner, and put to death as a male-factor, being raised again, he was justified in the Spirit. [3] He was seen of angels. Angels ministered to him, for he is the Lord of angels. [4] He is preached unto the Gentiles. This is a great part of the mystery of godliness, that Christ was offered to the Gentiles a Redeemer and Saviour. [5] He was believed on in the world. Who would have thought that the world, which lay in wickedness, would believe in the Son of God, would take him to be their Saviour who was himself crucified at Jerusalem? [6] He was received up into glory. It is not only his ascension that is meant, but his sitting at the right hand of God, where he ever lives. He who was manifest in flesh was God, really and truly God. This makes it to be a mystery. Godliness is a mystery in all its parts and branches. It being a great mystery, we should rather humbly adore it, than curiously pry into it.

CHAP. IV

I. A dreadful apostasy, ver. 1–3. II. He treats of Christian liberty, ver. 4, 5. III. He gives Timothy divers directions, ver. 6, to the end.

Verses 1–5

A prophecy of the apostasy of the latter times.

I. The prophecies concerning antichrist, as well as the prophecies concerning Christ, came from the Spirit. Some shall depart from the faith, an apostasy from the faith. Some, not all; for in the worst of times God will have a remnant.

1. One of the great instances of the apostasy, giving heed to doctrines of demons, or concerning demons.

2. The instruments of promoting and propagating this apostasy and delusion. It will be done by hypocrisy of those that speak lies, v. 2, who have their consciences seared with a red-hot iron, who are perfectly lost to the very first principles of virtue and moral honesty. Another part of their character is that they forbid to marry, and that they command to abstain from meats, and place religion in such abstinence at certain times and seasons.

3. The apostasy of the latter times should not surprise us, because it was expressly foretold by the Spirit. The Spirit speaks expressly, but the oracles of the heathen were always doubtful and uncertain. In such general apostasies all are not carried away, but only some. Men must be hardened, and their consciences seared, before they can depart from the faith, and draw in others to side with them.

II. The apostle takes occasion to lay down the doctrine of the Christian liberty,—that, whereas under the law there was a distinction of meats between clean and unclean, all this is now taken away. We are to look upon our food as that which God has created; we have it from him, and therefore must use it for him. We must not refuse the gifts of God's bounty, nor be scrupulous in making differences where God has made none; but receive them, and be thankful, v. 4. God's good creatures are then good, and doubly sweet to us, when they are received with thanksgiving, v. 5. It is a desirable thing to have a sanctified use of our creature-comforts. Now they are sanctified to us: By the word of God. By prayer, which blesses our meat to us. Every creature is God's, for he made all. Every creature of God is good. The blessing of God makes every creature nourishing to us, and therefore nothing ought to be refused. We ought therefore to sanctify the creatures we receive by prayer.

Verses 6–16

The apostles reckoned it a main part of their work to put their hearers in remembrance; for we are apt to forget, and slow to learn and remember, the things of God. The best way for ministers to grow in knowledge and faith is to put the brethren in remembrance; while we teach others, we teach ourselves.

I. Godliness is here pressed upon him and others, v. 7, 8. Those who would be godly must exercise themselves unto godliness; it requires a constant exercise. What will it avail us to mortify the body if we do not mortify sin? There is a great deal to be got by godliness. The promises made to godly people relate to the life that now is, but especially they relate to the life that is to come. If godly people have but little of the good things of the life that now is, yet it shall be made up to them in the good things of the life that is to come. It is not enough that we refuse profane and old wives' fables, but we must exercise ourselves to godliness.

II. The encouragement which we have to proceed in the ways of godliness (v. 8). Will the profit balance the loss? Here is another of Paul's faithful sayings, worthy of all acceptation—that all our labours and losses in the service of God will be abundantly recompenced, so that though we lose for Christ we shall not lose by him, v. 10.

1. Toil and trouble are to be expected by us in this world, not only as men, but as saints.

2. Those who labour and suffer reproach in the service of God may depend upon the living God that they shall not lose by it. Let this encourage them. He is the Saviour of all men. Now, if he be thus the Saviour of all men, we may hence infer that much more he will be the rewarder of those who seek and serve him. The salvation he has in store for those that believe is sufficient to recompence them for all their services and sufferings. The life of a Christian is a life of labour and suffering: We labour and suffer. The best we can expect to suffer in the present life is reproach for our well-doing, for our work of faith and labour of love.

III. An exhortation to Timothy,

1. To command and teach these things that he had now been teaching him.

2. To conduct himself with that gravity and prudence which might gain him respect, notwithstanding his youth. Men's youth will not be despised if they do not by youthful vanities and follies make themselves despicable; and this men may do who are old, who may therefore thank themselves if they be despised.

3. To confirm his doctrine by a good example. Those who teach by their doctrine must teach by their life, else they pull down with one hand what they build up with the other.

4. He charges him to study hard, v. 13. Though Timothy had extraordinary gifts, yet he must use ordinary means. Or it may be meant of the public reading of the scriptures; he must read and exhort. He must teach them both what to do and what to believe. The best way for ministers to avoid being despised is to teach and practise the things that are given them in charge. Those ministers that are the best accomplished for their work must yet mind their studies, and they must mind also their work.

5. He charges him to beware of negligence, v. 14. The gifts of God will wither if they be neglected. Here see the scripture-way of ordination: it was by the laying on of hands, and the laying on of the hands of the presbytery. The office of the ministry is a gift, it is the gift of Christ, and this was a very kind gift to his church. Ministers ought not to neglect the gift bestowed upon them, whether the office of the ministry or the qualifications for that office.

6. Having this work committed to him, he must give himself wholly to it, and make it appear that he improved in knowledge. Ministers are to be much in meditation. They are to meditate on the great trust committed to them. Ministers must be wholly in these things. By this means their profiting will appear in all things.

7. He presses it upon him to be very cautious. This will be the way to save thyself, and those that hear thee. "Save thyself in the first place, so shalt thou be instrumental to save those that hear thee." The best way to answer both these ends is to take heed to ourselves.

CHAP. V

Here the apostle, I. Directs Timothy how to reprove, ver. 1, 2. II. Adverts to widows, ver. 3–16. III. To elders, ver. 17–19. IV. Treats of public reproof, ver. 20. V. Gives a solemn charge concerning ordinations, ver. 21, 22. VI. Refers to his health (ver. 23), and states men's sins to be very different in their effects, ver. 24, 25.

Verses 1, 2

Ministers are reprovers by office; it is a part, though the least pleasing part, of their office. Be very tender in rebuking elders. Respect must be had to the dignity of their years and place. The younger must be rebuked as brethren, with love and tenderness. There is need of a great deal of meekness in reproving those who deserve reproof. The elder women must be reproved, as mothers. The younger women must be reproved, but reproved as sisters, with all purity.

Verses 3–16

The general rule is to honour widows that are widows indeed, to maintain them, to relieve them with respect and tenderness.

I. She is to be reckoned a widow indeed, who, being desolate, trusteth in God, v. 5, 6. Those who trust in God must continue in prayer. But she is not a widow indeed that lives in pleasure (v. 6). A jovial widow is not a widow indeed. She that lives in pleasure is dead while she lives, is no living member of the church, but as a carcase in it, or a mortified member. They are in the world to no purpose, buried alive as to the great ends of living.

II. The church should not be charged with the maintenance of those widows who had relations of their own that were able to maintain them (v. 4). So v. 16. The respect of children to their parents, with their care of them, is fitly called piety. Children can never sufficiently requite their parents for the care they have taken of them, but they must endeavour to do it. He speaks of this again (v. 8). If they spend that upon their lusts which should maintain their families, they have denied the faith (v. 16). There should be prudence in the choice of the objects of charity, that it may not be thrown away upon those who are not properly so, that there may be the more for those who are real objects of charity.

III. Directions concerning the characters of the widows that were to receive the church's charity. Particular care ought to be taken to relieve those who, when they had wherewithal, were ready to every good work. Those who would find mercy when they are in distress must show mercy when they are in prosperity.

IV. Take heed of admitting into the number those who are likely to be no credit to them (v. 11): The younger widows refuse; they will be weary of living by rule, as they must do; so they will marry, and cast off their first faith. The apostle here advises the younger widows to marry (v. 14). It is seldom that those who are idle are idle only; they learn to make mischief among neighbours, and sow discord among brethren. If housekeepers do not mind their business, but are tattlers, they give occasion to the adversaries of Christianity to reproach the Christian name. In the primitive church there was care taken of poor widows, and the churches of Christ in these days should follow so good an example. Great care is to be taken that those share in the public bounty who most want it and best deserve it. The credit of religion, and the reputation of Christian churches, are very much concerned in the character and behaviour of those that receive alms of the church. Christianity obliges its professors to relieve their indigent friends. Rich people should be ashamed to burden the church with their poor relations.

I. Concerning the supporting of ministers. Care must be taken that they be honourably maintained (v. 17). They had not, in the primitive church, one to preach to them and another to rule them, but ruling and teaching were performed by the same persons. The work of ministers consists principally in two things: ruling well and labouring in the word and doctrine. Those who were not idle, but laborious in this work, were worthy of double honour. Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treads out the corn. Does God take care for oxen, and will he not take care of his own servants? The ox only treads out the corn of which they make the bread that perishes; but ministers break the bread of life which endures for ever. Those who would have ministers starved, or not comfortably provided for, God will require it of them another day.

II. Concerning the accusation of ministers (v. 19). There must be an accusation; it must not be a flying uncertain report. This accusation is not to be received unless supported by two or three credible witnesses; and the accusation must be received before them, that is, the accused must have the accusers face to face. Great care should be taken that the thing alleged against him be well proved, "but (v. 20) those that sin rebuke before all; that the plaster may be as wide as the wound, and that those who are in danger of sinning by the example of their fall may take warning by the rebuke given them for it, that others also may fear." Public rebuke is designed for the good of others as well as for the good of the party rebuked.

III. Concerning the ordination of ministers (v. 22), it seems to be meant of the ordaining of men to the office of the ministry. Some understand it of absolution: "Be not too hasty in laying hands on any." Those who are rash will make themselves partakers in other men's sins.

IV. Concerning absolution, to which v. 24, 25, seem to refer. Some men's sins are so plain and obvious that there is no dispute concerning the bringing of them under the censures of the church.—Others they follow after; their wickedness does not presently appear, nor till after a due search has been made concerning it. So also, as to the evidences of repentance. There are secret, and there are open sins. Some are humbled and brought to repentance while it is quite otherwise with others. The incorrigible cannot be hid.

V. Concerning Timothy himself. A charge to him to be careful of his office, v. 21. He charges him to guard against partiality. Ministers must give an account to God and the Lord Jesus Christ, and woe to them if they have been partial in their ministrations. To take care of his health Paul advises him to use wine for the helping of his stomach and the recruiting of his nature. It is the will of God that people should take all due care of their bodies, to use them so that they may be most fit and helpful to us in the service of God. Wine should be used as a help, and not a hindrance, to our work and usefulness.

CHAP. VI

1. He treats of the duty of servants, ver. 1, 2. II. Of false teachers, ver. 3–5. III. Of godliness and covetousness, ver. 6 10. IV. What Timothy was to flee, and what to follow, ver. 11, 12. V. A solemn charge, ver. 13–16. VI. A charge for the rich, ver. 17–19. And lastly, A charge to Timothy, ver. 20, 21.

Verses 1–5

I. Here is the duty of servants. They are yoked to work, not to be idle. They must respect their masters, they must count them worthy of all that honour which was fit for them to receive. If servants that embraced the Christian religion should grow disobedient to their masters, the doctrine of Christ would be reflected on for their sakes. If the professors of religion misbehave themselves, the name of God and his doctrine are in danger of being blasphemed. And this is a good reason why we should all conduct ourselves well. Or suppose the master were a Christian, and a believer, and the servant a believer too? They must think themselves the more obliged to serve them because the faith and love that bespeak men Christians oblige them to do good. Believing masters and servants are brethren, and partakers of the benefit.

II. Paul here warns Timothy to withdraw from those who corrupted the doctrine of Christ. If any man teach otherwise (v. 3–5). We are not required to consent to any words as wholesome words except the words of our Lord Jesus Christ. But he that does not consent to the words of Christ is proud (v. 4), knowing nothing. Commonly those are most proud who know least. Those who fall off from the plain practical doctrines of Christianity fall in with controversies. When men are not content with the words of the Lord Jesus Christ, but will frame notions of their own and impose them, they sow the seeds of all mischief in the church (v. 5); disputes that are all subtlety, and no solidity. Men of corrupt minds are destitute of the truth. The words of our Lord Jesus Christ are wholesome words, they are the fittest to prevent or heal the church's wounds, as well as to heal a wounded conscience. When men leave the wholesome words of our Lord Jesus Christ, they will never agree in other words, either of their own or other men's invention, but will perpetually wrangle and quarrel about them. Such persons as are given to perverse disputings appear to be men of corrupt minds, and destitute of the truth; especially such as act in this manner for the sake of gain, which is all their godliness. Christians will withdraw themselves from such.

Verses 6–12

I. The excellency of contentment and the evil of covetousness.

1. The excellency of contentment, v. 6–8. Though Christianity is the worst trade, it is the best calling in the world. Those that make a trade of it, merely to serve their turn for this world, will find it a sorry trade; but those that mind it as their calling, and make a business of it, will find it a gainful calling.

(1) The truth he lays down is that godliness with contentment is great gain. Godliness is itself great gain, and, wherever there is true godliness, there will be contentment. Christian contentment is great gain. He that is godly is sure to be happy in another world; and if withal he do by contentment accommodate himself to his condition in this world he has enough. It is not like the little gain of worldlings, who are so fond of a little worldly advantage. Godliness is ever accompanied with contentment. All truly godly people have learned with Paul, in whatever state they are, to be therewith content.

(2) The reason he gives for it, v. 7. We can challenge nothing as a debt that is due to us, for we came naked into the world. Whatever we have had since, we are obliged to the providence of God for it. We cannot be poorer than when we came into this world, and yet then we were provided for; therefore let us trust in God for the remaining part of our pilgrimage. We shall carry nothing with us out of this world. Why should we not be content with a little, because, how much soever we have, we must leave it behind us?

(3) Hence he infers, v. 8. If God give us the necessary supports of life, we ought to be content therewith. What will worldlings do when death shall strip them of their happiness and portion, and they must take an everlasting farewell of all these things, on which they have so much doted? The necessaries of life are the bounds of a true Christian's desire. A few comforts of this life, will serve him, and these he may hope to enjoy.

2. The evil of covetousness v. 9. It is not said, those that are rich, but those that will be rich, that place their happiness in worldly wealth. When the devil sees which way their lusts carry them, he will soon bait his hook accordingly.

(1) Some will be rich; they are resolved upon it. Such will not be safe nor innocent. Worldly lusts are foolish and hurtful, for they drown men in destruction and perdition.

(2) The apostle affirms that the love of money is the root of all evil, v. 10. People may have money, and yet not love it; but, if they love it inordinately, it will push them on to all evil. Covetous persons will quit the faith, if that be the way to get money. Those that depart from God do but treasure up sorrows for themselves.

II. Hence he takes occasion to caution Timothy. He addresses himself to him as a man of God. Ministers are men of God, and ought to conduct themselves accordingly. He charges Timothy to take heed of the love of money. It ill becomes men of God to set their hearts upon the things of this world; men of God should be taken up with the things of God. To arm him against the love of the world, he directs him to follow that which is good. It is not enough that men of God flee these things, but they must follow after what is directly contrary thereto. What excellent persons men of God are who follow after righteousness! They are the excellent of the earth, they should be approved of men. He exhorts him to do the part of a soldier. Those who will get to heaven must fight their way thither. It is a good fight, it is a good cause, and it will have a good issue. It is the fight of faith. Eternal life is the crown proposed to us. This we must lay hold on, as those that are afraid of coming short of it and losing it. Lay hold, and take heed of losing your hold.

Verses 13–21

I. He gives him a solemn charge. He charges him as he will answer it at the great day to that God whose eyes are upon us all, who sees what we are and what we do. This should quicken us to the service of God that we serve a God who quickens all things. He charges him before Christ Jesus. Christ died not only as a sacrifice, but as a martyr; and he witnessed a good confession when he was arraigned before Pilate. That good confession of his before Pilate, My kingdom is not of this world, should be effectual to draw off all his followers from the love of this world.

II. He reminds him of the confession that he himself had made, v. 12. The obligation of that was still upon him, and he must live up to that.

III. He reminds him of Christ's second coming. The Lord Jesus Christ will appear, and it will be a glorious appearing. Ministers should have an eye to this appearing of the Lord Jesus Christ, and, till his appearing, they are to keep this commandment without spot, unrebukable. The appearing of Christ is certain, but it is not for us to know the time and season of it. Let this suffice us, that in time he will show it.

1. Concerning Christ and God the Father the apostle here speaks great things. God is the only Potentate; the powers of earthly princes are all derived from him. He is the blessed and the only Potentate, infinitely happy. He only has immortality. He dwells in inaccessible light. No man can get to heaven but those whom he is pleased to bring thither, and admit into his kingdom. He is invisible. It is impossible that mortal eyes should bear the brightness of the divine glory. No man can see God and live.

2. He concludes with a doxology. What an evil is sin when committed against such a God! What are we then, that the blessed God, the King of kings and Lord of lords, should seek after us? Blessed are those who are admitted to dwell with this great and blessed Potentate.

IV. The apostle adds a lesson for rich people, v. 17–19.

1. Timothy must charge those that are rich to beware of the temptations, and improve the opportunities of their prosperous estate. He must caution them to take heed of pride. He must caution them against vain confidence in their wealth. Nothing is more uncertain than the wealth of this world; many have had much of it one day and been stripped of all the next. Those who are rich must see God giving them their riches, and giving them to enjoy them richly; for many have riches, but enjoy them poorly, not having a heart to use them. He must charge them to do good with what they have. Those are truly rich who are rich in good works. He must charge them to think of another world, and prepare for that which is to come by works of charity.

2. Ministers must not be afraid of the rich. They must caution them against pride, and vain confidence in their riches. A lesson for ministers in the charge given to Timothy: Keep that which is committed to thy trust. Every minister is a trustee. The truths of God, the ordinances of God, keep these. Keep close to the written word, for that is committed to our trust. Some who have been very proud of their learning, their science, which is falsely so called, have by that been drawn away from the faith of Christ, which is a good reason why we should keep to the plain word of the gospel. O Timothy, keep that which is committed to thy trust! as if he had said, "I cannot conclude without charging thee again; whatever thou doest, be sure to keep this trust, for it is too great a trust to be betrayed." That science which opposes the truth of the gospel is falsely so called. Those who are for advancing reason above faith are in danger of leaving faith.

V. Our apostle concludes with a solemn prayer and benediction. Grace is an earnest, yea, a beginning, of glory; for, wherever God gives grace, he will give glory. Grace be with you all. Amen.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE SECOND EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO TIMOTHY

This second epistle Paul wrote to Timothy from Rome, when he was a prisoner there and in danger of his life; I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand, ch. iv. 6. He had been brought before the emperor Nero, which he calls his first answer, when no man stood with him, but all men forsook him, ch. iv. 16. And interpreters agree that this was the last epistle he wrote. Where Timothy now was is not certain.

CHAP. I

After the introduction (ver. 1, 2) we have, I. Paul's sincere love to Timothy, ver. 3–5. II. Divers exhortations given to him, ver. 6–14. III. He speaks of Phygellus and Hermogenes, with others, and closes with Onesiphorus, ver. 15, to the end.

Verses 1–5

I. The inscription of the epistle. The gospel is the promise of life in Christ Jesus; life is the end, and Christ the way. Paul was an apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God; his commission to be an apostle was not by the will of man. God called him to be an apostle. We have the promise of life. This, as well as all other promises, is in and through Jesus Christ. The grace, mercy, and peace, which Timothy wanted, comes from God the Father and Christ Jesus our Lord. The best want these blessings, and they are the best we can ask for our dearly-beloved friends.

II. Paul's thanksgiving to God for Timothy's faith and holiness. Paul was much in prayer, he prayed night and day. Prayer was his constant business, and he never forgot his friends in his prayers, as we often do. It was a comfort to him that he was of the seed of those that served God; as likewise that he had served him with a pure conscience. Timothy was sorry to part with Paul, he wept at parting, and therefore Paul desired to see him again, because he had perceived by that what a true affection he had for him. He thanks God that Timothy kept up the religion of his ancestors, v. 5. It is a comfortable thing when children imitate the faith and holiness of their godly parents, and tread in their steps. The faith that dwells in real believers is unfeigned; it is a faith that will stand the trial, and it dwells in them as a living principle. It was the matter of Paul's thanksgiving that Timothy inherited the faith of his mother Eunice and his grandmother Lois.

Exhortation and excitation of Timothy to his duty (v. 6). The best men need remembrancers.

I. Stir up the gift that is in them as fire under the embers. Use gifts, and have gifts. He must take all opportunities to use these gifts, for that is the best way of increasing them. The great hindrance of usefulness in the increase of our gifts is slavish fear. Paul therefore warns Timothy against this, v. 7. God hath delivered us from the spirit of fear, and hath given us the spirit of power, and of love, and of a sound mind. The spirit of power, or of courage and resolution; the spirit of love to God which will set us above the fear of man, and the spirit of a sound mind, or quietness of mind, for we are oftentimes discouraged in our work by the creatures of our own imagination, which a sober, thinking mind would obviate.

II. He exhorts him to count upon afflictions, and get ready for them. Be not thou ashamed of the gospel.

1. We must not be ashamed of those who are suffering for the gospel of Christ. Timothy must not be ashamed of good old Paul, though he was now in bonds. The gospel is the testimony of our Lord; in and by this he bears testimony of himself to us, and by professing our adherence to it we bear testimony of him and for him. Paul was the Lord's prisoner. For his sake he was bound with a chain. If we are ashamed of either now, Christ will be ashamed of us hereafter. "Expect afflictions for the gospel's sake, be willing to take thy lot with the suffering saints in this world. Be partaker of the afflictions of the gospel."

2. He takes notice what great things God has done for us by the gospel, v. 9, 10.

(1) The nature of that gospel and the glorious designs of it. The gospel aims at our salvation: and we must not think much to suffer for that which we hope to be saved by. It is designed for our sanctification. All who shall be saved hereafter are sanctified now. Wherever the call of the gospel is an effectual call, it is found to be a holy call. The origin of it is the free grace and eternal purpose of God in Christ Jesus. If we had merited it, it had been hard to suffer for it; but our salvation by it is of free grace, and therefore we must not think much to suffer for it. In Christ Jesus, for all the gifts that come from God to sinful man come in and through Christ Jesus. The gospel is the manifestation of this purpose and grace. Did Jesus Christ suffer for it, and shall we think much to suffer for it? By the gospel of Christ death is abolished. Death once an enemy has become a friend; it is the gate by which we pass out of a troublesome, sinful world, into a world of perfect peace and purity. Death does not triumph over those who believe the gospel, but they triumph over it. He has brought life and immortality to light by the gospel. He has brought it to light, not only set it before us, but offered it to us, by the gospel.

(2) Consider the example of blessed Paul, v. 11, 12. He was appointed to preach the gospel, and particularly appointed to teach the Gentiles. He thought it a cause worth suffering for, and why should not Timothy think so too? No man needs to be afraid nor ashamed to suffer for the cause of the gospel. Good men often suffer many things for the best cause in the world. They need not be ashamed, the cause will bear them out. Those who trust in Christ know whom they have trusted. What must we commit to Christ? The salvation of our souls, and their preservation to the heavenly kingdom; and what we so commit to him he will keep. There is a day coming when we must give an account of our souls: now, if by an active obedient faith we commit it to Jesus Christ, we may be sure he is able to keep it.

III. He exhorts him to hold fast the form of sound words, v. 13. Adhere to it in opposition to all heresies and false doctrine. But how must it be held fast? Faith and love must go together; it is not enough to believe the sound words, but we must love them, believe their truth and love their goodness. It must be faith and love fastening upon Jesus Christ. Of hearing words, so it may read; there is a healing virtue in the word of God. To the same purport is v. 14. That good thing was the form of sound words, the Christian doctrine, which was committed to Timothy in his baptism, and in his ordination. The Christian doctrine is a trust committed to us. It is a good thing, of unspeakable value in itself, and which will be of unspeakable advantage to us. It is committed to us to be preserved pure and entire, and to be transmitted to those who shall come after us. Even those who are ever so well taught cannot keep what they have learned, any more than they could at first learn it, without the assistance of the Holy Spirit. We must not think to keep it by our own strength, but keep it by the Holy Ghost. The assistance and indwelling of the Holy Ghost do not exclude men's endeavours, but they very well consist together.

Verses 15–18

I. He mentions the apostasy of many from the doctrine of Christ, v. 15. He does not say that they had turned away from the doctrine of Christ, but they had turned away from him.

II. He mentions the constancy of Onesiphorus, v. 16. He often refreshed him and he was not ashamed of his chains. When Onesiphorus was at Rome he took care to seek Paul out, v. 17. A good man will seek opportunities of doing good. At Ephesus he had ministered to him, and been very kind to him. How Paul returns his kindness, v. 16–18. He repays him with his prayers.

III. He prays for Onesiphorus himself, as well as for his house: That he may find mercy in that day, in the day of death and of judgment. We need desire no more to make us happy than to find mercy of the Lord in that day. If you would have mercy then, you must seek for it now of the Lord. The best thing we can ask, either for ourselves or our friends, is that the Lord will grant to them that they may find mercy of the Lord in that day.

CHAP. II

I. He encourages him in his work, showing him whence he must fetch help, ver. 1. II. He must take care of a succession in the ministry, ver. 2. III. He exhorts him to constancy and perseverance in this work, considering what would be the end of all his suffering, &c., ver. 3–15. IV. He must shun profane and vain babblings (ver. 16–18). V. He speaks of the foundation of God, which standeth sure, ver. 19–21. VI. What he is to avoid and what to do, ver. 22, to the end.

Verses 1–7

Paul encourages Timothy to constancy and perseverance in his work, v. 1. Those who have work to do for God must strengthen themselves for it. Where there is the truth of grace there must be a labouring after the strength of grace. We have need to grow stronger and stronger in that which is good. Or it may be understood in opposition to our being strong in our own strength: "Be strong, not confiding in thy own sufficiency, but in the grace that is in Jesus Christ." There is grace enough in him for all of us. We must be strong in this grace; not in ourselves, or in the grace we have already received, but in the grace that is in him.

I. Timothy must count upon sufferings, even unto blood, and therefore he must train up others to succeed him in the ministry of the gospel, v. 2. He must lodge the gospel as a trust in their hands, and so commit to them the things which he had heard. Two things he must have an eye to in ordaining ministers: Their fidelity or integrity, and also their ministerial ability. They must not only be knowing themselves, but be apt to teach.

II. He must endure hardness (v. 3). All Christians, but especially ministers, are soldiers of Jesus Christ. The soldiers of Jesus Christ must approve themselves good soldiers, faithful to their captain, resolute in his cause. Those who would approve themselves good soldiers of Jesus Christ must endure hardness; we must count upon it in this world, and bear it patiently when it comes.

III. He must not entangle himself in the affairs of this world, v 4. If we have given up ourselves to be Christ's soldiers, we must sit loose to this world; and though we must employ ourselves in the affairs of this life while we are here (we have something to do here), we must not entangle ourselves with those affairs. The great care of a soldier should be to please his general; so the great care of a Christian should be to please Christ.

IV. He must see to it that in carrying on the spiritual warfare he went by rule, that he observed the laws of war (v. 5). In doing that which is good we must take care that we do it in a right manner, that our good may not be evil spoken of. Those who do so shall be crowned at last.

V. He must be willing to wait for a recompence (v. 6). If we would be partakers of the fruits, we must labour. We must do the will of God, before we receive the promises.

The apostle further commends what he had said to the attention of Timothy. Timothy must be reminded to use his considering faculties about the things of God. Consideration is as necessary to a good conversation as to a sound conversion. He prays for him: The Lord give thee understanding in all things. The most intelligent man needs more and more of this gift. If he who gave the revelation in the word does not give the understanding in the heart, we are nothing.

Verses 8–13

I. To encourage Timothy in suffering, the apostle puts him in mind of the resurrection of Christ (v. 8). The consideration of it should make us faithful to our Christian profession. The incarnation and resurrection of Jesus Christ, heartily believed and rightly considered, will support a Christian under all sufferings in the present life.

II. Another thing to encourage him in suffering was that he had Paul for an example.

1. How the apostle suffered (v. 9). We must not think it strange if those who do well fare ill in this world, and if the best of men meet with the worst of treatment; but this was his comfort that the word of God was not bound. Persecuting powers cannot hinder the operation of the word of God upon men's hearts and consciences; that cannot be bound by any human force. This might encourage Timothy not to be afraid of bonds for the testimony of Jesus.

2. Why he suffered cheerfully, v. 10. Next to the salvation of our own souls we should be willing to do and suffer any thing to promote the salvation of the souls of others.

III. Another thing with which he encourages Timothy is the prospect of a future state.

1. Those who faithfully adhere to Christ, whatever it cost them, will certainly have the advantage of it in another world, v. 11. If we be dead to this world we shall go to live with him in a better world, to be for ever with him. Those who suffer for Christ on earth shall reign with Christ in heaven, v. 12.

2. It is at our peril if we prove unfaithful to him. That man must needs be for ever miserable whom Christ disowns at last. This will certainly be the issue, whether we believe it or no (v. 13). If we be faithful to Christ, he will certainly be faithful to us. If we be false to him, he will be faithful to his threatenings

This is a faithful saying, and may be depended on and ought to be believed.

Verses 14–18

He comes in the next place to direct him in his work.

I. He must make it his business to edify those who were under his charge. This is the work of ministers; not to tell people that which they never knew before, but to put them in mind of that which they do know, charging them that they strive not about words. If people did but consider of what little use most of the controversies in religion are, they would not be so zealous in their strifes of words. People are very prone to strive about words, and such strifes never answer any other ends than to shake some and subvert others. Study to show thyself approved unto God, v. 15, a workman that need not be ashamed. Workmen that are unskilful, or unfaithful, or lazy, have need to be ashamed; but those who mind their business, and keep to their work, are workmen that need not be ashamed. And what is their work? Not to invent a new gospel, but rightly to divide the gospel that is committed to their trust.

II. He must take heed of that which would be a hindrance to him in his work, v. 16. He must take heed of error: Shun profane and vain babblings. When once men became fond of those they will increase unto more ungodliness. The way of error is down-hill. The infecting of one often proves the infecting of many, or the infecting of the same person with one error often proves the infecting of him with many errors. The apostle mentions some who had lately advanced erroneous doctrines: Hymeneus and Philetus. They did not deny the resurrection, but they put a corrupt interpretation upon that true doctrine, saying that the resurrection was past already. By this they overthrew the faith of some. Whatever takes away the doctrine of a future state overthrows the faith of Christians. Error is very productive and on that account the more dangerous. When men err concerning the truth, they always endeavour to have some plausible pretence for it.

I. The unbelief of men cannot make the promise of God of no effect. The prophets and apostles, that is, the doctrines of the Old and New Testament, are still firm; and they have a seal with two mottoes upon it, one on the one side, and the other on the other, as is usual in a broad seal. One expresses our comfort—that the Lord knows those that are his. He will never lose them. Another declares our duty—that everyone who names the name of Christ must depart from iniquity. We must depart from iniquity, else he will not own us.

II. Though there are some whose faith is overthrown, yet there are others who keep their integrity, and hold it fast (v. 20). There are some professors of religion that are like the vessels of wood and earth, they are vessels of dishonour. But at the same time all are not vessels of dishonour. When we are discouraged by the badness of some, we must encourage ourselves by the goodness of others. Now we should see to it that we be vessels of honour: sanctified for our Master's use. Every vessel must be fit for its Master's use; everyone in the church whom God approves must be devoted to his Master's service and meet for his use.

I. Paul here exhorts Timothy to beware of youthful lusts, v. 22. The lusts of the flesh are youthful lusts, which young people must carefully watch against. He prescribes an excellent remedy against youthful lusts. Youthful lusts are very dangerous, for they war against the soul. The exciting of our graces will be the extinguishing of our corruptions; the more we follow that which is good the faster and the further we shall flee from that which is evil. Our prayers to God and Christ are not acceptable except they come out of a pure heart.

II. He cautions him against contention, and (v. 23) cautions him against foolish and unlearned questions, strifes of words. Those who advanced them thought themselves wise and learned; but Paul calls them foolish and unlearned. They breed debates and quarrels among Christians. Religion consists more in believing and practising what God requires than in subtle disputes.—The servant of the Lord must not strive, v. 24. The servant of the Lord must be gentle to all men.—Apt to teach. Those are unapt to teach who are apt to strive. In meekness instructing (v. 25) not only those who subject themselves, but those who oppose themselves. This is the way to convey truth in its light and power, and to overcome evil with good. That which ministers must have in their eyes, in instructing those who oppose themselves, is their recovery. Repentance is God's gift. It is a gift with a peradventure in the case of those who oppose themselves. The same God who gives us the discovery of the truth does by his grace bring us to the acknowledging of it, otherwise our hearts would continue in rebellion against it. And thus sinners recover themselves out of the snare of the devil. The misery of sinners, v. 26. They are slaves to the worst of task-masters. They are taken in a snare, and in the worst snare, because it is the devil's. The happiness of those who repent: they recover themselves out of this snare. Those who before were led captive by the devil at his will come to be led into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

CHAP. III

I. The apostle forewarns Timothy what the last days would be, ver. 1–9. II. Prescribes various remedies against them (ver. 10, to the end), particularly his own example, and the knowledge of the holy scriptures. Paul tells Timothy how bad others would be, and therefore how good he should be.

Verses 1–9

Timothy must not think it strange if there were in the church bad men; for the net of the gospel was to enclose both good fish and bad, Matt. xiii. 47, 48. Even in gold ore there will be dross, and a great deal of chaff among the wheat when it lies on the floor.

I. In the last days (v. 1), in gospel times, there would come perilous times, not so much on account of persecution from without as on account of corruptions within. Two traitors within the garrison may do more hurt to it than two thousand besiegers without. Perilous times shall come, for men shall be wicked. Sin makes the time perilous.

II. Paul tells Timothy what shall be the marks and signs whereby these times may be known, v. 2, &c. Self-love will make the times perilous. Instead of Christian charity, which takes care for the good of others, they will mind themselves only. Covetousness. When men are lovers of themselves, no good can be expected from them, as good may be expected from those who love God. When every man is for what he can get and for keeping what he has, this makes men dangerous to one another. Pride and vain-glory. When men are boasters and blasphemers. When men do not fear God they will not regard man. When children are disobedient to their parents. What wickedness will those stick at who will be abusive to their own parents and rebel against them? Unthankfulness and unholiness make the times perilous. What is the reason that men are unholy and without the fear of God, but that they are unthankful for the mercies of God? When they are without natural affection, and truce-breakers, v. 3. When children are disobedient to their parents (v. 2) and when parents are without natural affection to their children, v. 3. And those who will not be bound by natural affection, no marvel that they will not be bound by the most solemn leagues and covenants. They are truce-breakers. When men are false accusers one of another—devils one to another. When men have no government of themselves and their own appetites: they are incontinent, they are fierce. When that which is good and ought to be honoured is generally despised. When men are generally treacherous, wilful, and haughty (v. 4). When men are puffed up, behaving scornfully to all about them, then the times are perilous. When men are generally lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God. That is a carnal mind, and is full of enmity against him, which prefers anything before him, especially such a sordid thing as carnal pleasure is. When they have the form of godliness (v. 5). A form of godliness is a very different thing from the power of it; men may have the one and be wholly destitute of the other.

III. Paul warns Timothy to take heed of certain seducers. He shows how industrious they were to make proselytes (v. 6). They crept into houses, to insinuate themselves into the good opinion of people, and so to draw them over to their party. And see what sort of people those were that they gained; they were such as were weak, and such as were wicked. A foolish head and a filthy heart make persons an easy prey to seducers. He shows how far they were from coming to the knowledge of the truth, though they pretended to be ever learning, v. 7. He foretells the certain stop that should be put to their progress (v. 8, 9). Those heretics resisted the truth and were men of corrupt minds, reprobate concerning the faith, but they shall proceed no further. Though the spirit of error may be let loose for a time, God has it in a chain. Their folly shall be manifest, it shall appear that they are impostors, and every man shall abandon them.

Verses 10–17

I. The apostle sets before him his own example (v. 10). Christ's apostles had no enemies but those who did not know them, or did not know them fully; those who knew them best loved and honoured them the most. Paul kept back nothing from his hearers, but declared to them the whole counsel of God, so that if it were not their own fault they might fully know it. He had fully known his conversation. His manner of life was of a piece with his doctrine, and did not contradict it. Those cannot expect to profit the people at all that preach well and live ill. Timothy fully knew what was the great thing that Paul had in view: "Thou hast known my purpose, what I drive at." Timothy fully knew Paul's good character. He knew that he had suffered ill for doing well (v. 11), (he mentions those only which happened to him while Timothy was with him, at Antioch, at Iconium, at Lystra). He knew what care God had taken of him. As he never failed his cause, so his God never failed him. Thou hast fully known my afflictions. When we fully know the afflictions, not only how they suffer, but how they are supported and comforted under their sufferings, then, instead of being discouraged, we shall be animated by them, especially considering that we are told before that we must count upon such things (v. 12). Those who will live godly must expect it; especially those who will live godly in Christ Jesus, especially when they are resolute in it. The apostle's life was very exemplary for three things: for his doctrine, for his life, and for his persecutions and sufferings. His life was a life of great usefulness, yet it was a life of great sufferings. The apostle mentions the Lord's delivering him out of them all, for Timothy's and our encouragement under sufferings.

II. He warns Timothy of the fatal end of seducers, v. 13. As good men, by the grace of God, grow better and better, so bad men, through the subtlety of Satan and the power of their own corruptions, grow worse and worse.

III. He directs him particularly to what he had learned out of the holy scriptures (v. 14, 15). It is not enough to learn that which is good, but we must continue in it, and persevere in it unto the end. If Timothy would adhere to the truth as he had been taught it, this would arm him against the snares and insinuations of seducers.

1. It is a great happiness to know the certainty of the things wherein we have been instructed. Consider of whom thou hast learned them; not of evil men and seducers, but good men, who had themselves experienced the power of the truths they taught thee. "Knowing especially the firm foundation upon which thou hast built (v. 15): That from a child thou hast known the holy scriptures."

2. Those who would acquaint themselves with the things of God, must know the holy scriptures.

3. It is a great happiness to know the holy scriptures from our childhood. The age of children is the learning age; and those who would get true learning must get it out of the scriptures.

4. They must not lie by us neglected, and seldom or never looked into.

(1) What is the excellency of the scripture (v. 16). The prophets and apostles did not speak from themselves, but what they received of the Lord that they delivered unto us.

(2) What use it will be of to us. It is able to make us wise to salvation. Those are wise indeed who are wise to salvation. "Through faith." The scriptures will make us wise to salvation, if they be mixed with faith. For, if we do not believe their truth and goodness, they will do us no good. It is profitable to us for all the purposes of the Christian life. It instructs us in that which is true, reproves us for that which is amiss, directs us in that which is good. That the man of God may be perfect, v. 17. That which furnishes a man of God in this world is the scripture. By it we are thoroughly furnished for every good work. Scripture has various uses, and answers divers ends and purposes. Scripture is a perfect rule of faith and practice. If we consult the scripture which was given by inspiration of God, and follow its directions, we shall be made men of God, perfect and thoroughly furnished to every good work. O that we may love our Bibles more, and keep closer to them than ever!

CHAP. IV

I. Paul presses Timothy to the diligent and conscientious discharge of his work as an evangelist, ver. 1–5. II. The reason of his concern in this case. His departure was at hand, ver. 6–8. III. Divers particular matters, ver. 9–15. IV. He informs him of what befell him at his first answer; though men forsook him, the Lord stood by him, ver. 16–18. And then he concludes with salutations and a benediction, ver. 19, to the end.

Verses 1–8

I. How awfully this charge is introduced (v. 1). The best of men have need to be awed into the discharge of their duty. The eye of God and Jesus Christ was upon him: I charge thee before God and the Lord Jesus Christ. He charges him as he will answer it at the great day, reminding him of the judgment to come. He will appear; he will come the second time, and it will be a glorious appearance. Then his kingdom shall appear in its glory: At his appearing and kingdom; for he will then appear in his kingdom.

II. What is the matter of the charge, v. 2–5.

1. To preach the word. This is ministers' business. It is not their own notions and fancies that they are to preach, but the pure plain word of God.

2. To urge what he preached: "Be instant in season and out of season, reprove, rebuke, exhort; do this work with all fervency of spirit. In season, when some special opportunity offers itself of speaking to them with advantage. Out of season, because thou dost not know but the Spirit of God may fasten upon them."

3. He must tell people of their faults. Endeavour, by dealing plainly with them, to bring them to repentance.

4. He must direct, encourage, and quicken those who began well. "Exhort them with all longsuffering and doctrine." He must do it very patiently. While God shows to them all longsuffering, let ministers exhort with all longsuffering. He must do it rationally, not with passion, but with doctrine. Teach them the truth as it is in Jesus, and this will be a means both to reclaim them from evil and to bring them to good.

5. He must watch in all things. "Watch to thy work; watch against the temptations of Satan; watch over the souls of those who are committed to thy charge."

6. He must count upon afflictions and endure them. "Inure thyself to hardships."

7. He must remember his office, and discharge its duties. The office of the evangelist was, as the apostles' deputy, to water the churches that they planted. This was Timothy's work.

8. He must fulfil his ministry: Make full proof of it. Perform all the parts of his office with diligence and care. The best way to make full proof of our ministry is to fulfil it, to fill it up in all its parts with proper work.

III. The reasons to enforce the charge.

1. Because errors and heresies were likely to creep into the church (v. 3, 4). "Improve the present time when they will endure it." They will grow weary of the old plain gospel of Christ, and then they will be greedy of fables. False teachers were not of God's sending; but they chose them to please their itching ears. People do so when they will not endure sound doctrine; that preaching which is searching, plain, and to the purpose. There is a wide difference between the word of God and the word of such teachers; the one is sound doctrine, the word of truth, the other is only fables.

2. Because Paul for his part had almost done his work, v. 6.

(1) "Therefore there will be the more occasion for thee." The fewer hands there are to work the more industrious those hands must be that are at work.

(2) "I have done the work of my day and generation; do thou in like manner do the work of thy day and generation."

(3) The comfort and cheerfulness of Paul, in the prospect of his approaching departure, might encourage Timothy. "I can look back upon my warfare with a great deal of satisfaction; and therefore be not afraid of the difficulties thou must meet with. The crown of life is as sure to thee as if it were already upon thy head." Here the apostle looks forward, upon his death approaching, and he looks upon it now as near at hand: I am already poured out. Observe,

[1] With what pleasure he speaks of dying. He calls it his departure, or his release. Death to a good man is his release from the imprisonment of this world and his departure to the enjoyments of another world; he does not cease to be, but is only removed from one world to another.

[2] With what pleasure he looks back upon the life he had lived (v. 7). He did not fear death, because he had the testimony of his conscience that by the grace of God he had in some measure answered the ends of living. He had fought a good fight. His life was a course, and he had now finished it; as his warfare was accomplished, so his race was run. "I have kept the faith." We must fight this good fight; we must fight it out, and finish our course. Towards the end of our days to be able to speak in this manner, what comfort, unspeakable comfort, will it afford!

[3] With what pleasure he looks forward to the life he was to live hereafter (v. 8). Let this encourage Timothy to endure hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ that there is a crown of life before us. It is called a crown of righteousness, because our holiness and righteousness will there be perfected, and will be our crown. And yet this crown of righteousness was not peculiar to Paul, as if it belonged only to apostles and martyrs, but to all those also that love his appearing. It is the character of all the saints that they love the appearing of Jesus Christ: they love his second appearing at the great day; love it, and long for it. This crown, which believers shall wear, is laid up for them; they have it not at present, for here they are but heirs; they have it not in possession, and yet it is sure.

1. He bids him hasten to him (v. 9). Paul wanted Timothy's company and help; and the reason he gives is because several had left him (v. 10): Demas hath forsaken me, having loved this present world. Love to this present world is often the cause of apostasy from the truths and ways of Jesus Christ. Crescens had gone one way and Titus another way. Luke ever remained with Paul (v. 11, 12). 2. He speaks respectfully concerning Mark. This Mark was he about whom Paul and Barnabas had contended, Acts xv. 39. Paul would not take him with him to the work, because he had once flinched and drawn back: but now, says he, Take Mark, and bring him with thee. By this it appears that Paul was now reconciled to Mark. We must not disclaim for ever making use of those that are profitable and useful, though they may have done amiss. 3. Paul orders Timothy as he came through Troas to bring with him thence those things which he had left behind him there (v. 13), the cloak he had left there, which Paul had the more occasion for in a cold prison. He would have his books with him. Whereas he had exhorted Timothy to give attendance to reading, so he did himself. 4. He mentions Alexander, and the mischief that he had done him, v. 14, 15. Paul foretells that God would reckon with him. The Lord will reward him according to his works. Some who were once Paul's hearers and admirers did not give him reason to remember them with much pleasure; for one forsook him, and another did him much evil. At the same time he mentions some with pleasure; the badness of some did not make him forget the goodness of others.

Verses 16–22

I. He gives Timothy an account of his own present circumstances.

1. He had lately been called to appear before the emperor (v. 16). The Christians at Rome were forward to go and meet him (Acts xxviii); but when it came to the pinch, and they would be in danger of suffering with him, then they all forsook him. Paul had his trials in his friends' forsaking him in a time of danger as well as in the opposition made by enemies: all forsook him. God might lay it to their charge, but Paul endeavours to prevent it by his earnest prayers.

2. When he had nobody to keep him in countenance, God made his face to shine. Paul knew how to preach at the bar as well as in the pulpit. And that all the Gentiles might hear; the emperor himself and the great men who would never have heard Paul preach if he had not been brought before them. And I was delivered out of the mouth of the lion. And the Lord shall deliver me from every evil work. See how Paul improved his experiences. "And shall preserve me to his heavenly kingdom." If the Lord stand by us, he will strengthen us, and his presence will more than supply everyone's absence. Former deliverances should encourage future hopes. We ought to give God the glory of all past, present, and future deliverances: To whom be glory for ever and ever. Amen.

II. He sends salutations, v. 19. He mentions his leaving Trophimus sick at Miletum (v. 20).

III. He hastens Timothy to come to him before winter (v. 21).

IV. He sends commendations to him from Eubulus, Pudens, Linus, Claudia, and all the brethren.

V. He concludes with a prayer, that the Lord Jesus would be with his spirit. We need no more to make us happy than to have the Lord Jesus Christ with our spirits. And it is the best prayer we can put up for our friends. Grace be with you. Amen. And if grace be with us here to convert and change us, to make us holy, to keep us humble, and to enable us to persevere to the end, glory will crown us hereafter.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO

TITUS

This Epistle of Paul to Titus is much of the same nature with those to Timothy. We read much of this Titus. He was a Greek, Gal. ii. 3. Paul called him his son (Titus i. 4), his brother (2 Cor. ii. 13), his partner and fellow-helper (2 Cor. viii. 23). He went up with the apostles to the church at Jerusalem (Gal. ii. 1), was much conversant at Corinth, for which church he had an earnest care, 2 Cor. viii. 16. Paul's second epistle to them was sent by his hand, 2 Cor. viii. 16–18, 23; ix. 2–4; xii. 18. He was with the apostle at Rome, and thence went into Dalmatia (2 Tim. iv. 10), after which no more occurs of him in the scriptures. In Crete the gospel had got some footing; and here were Paul and Titus in one of their travels; but the apostle could not himself tarry long at this place. He therefore left Titus some time there, to carry on the work which had been begun, wherein, probably, meeting with more difficulty than ordinary, Paul wrote this epistle to him; and yet perhaps not so much for his own sake as for the people's, that the endeavours of Titus might be more significant and effectual among them.

CHAP. I

I. The preface to the epistle with the apostle's salutations and prayer for Titus, ver. 1-4. II. The end of Titus's being left at Crete, ver. 5. III. How that end should be pursued in reference both to good and bad ministers, ver. 6, to the end.

Verses 1–4

I. The writer. Paul, a Gentile name taken by the apostle of the Gentiles, Acts xiii. 9, 46, 47. Ministers will accommodate even smaller matters, so that there may be any furthering of acceptance in their work. A servant of God, and an apostle of Jesus Christ. The highest officers in the church are but servants. (Much divinity and devotion are comprehended in the inscriptions of the epistles.) According to the faith of God's elect. Their doctrine agreed with the faith of all the elect. Faith is the first principle of sanctification. The gospel is truth; the great, sure, and saving truth. Divine faith rests not on fallible reasonings and profitable opinions, but on the truth itself, which is after godliness. All gospel truth is after godliness; it is truth not only to be known, but acknowledged; it must be held forth in word and practice. To bring to this knowledge and faith, and to the acknowledging of the truth which is after godliness, is the great end of the gospel ministry, v. 2. This is the further intent of the gospel, to beget hope as well as faith. The faith and godliness of Christians lead to eternal life, and give hope of it; for God, that cannot lie, hath promised it. Here is the stability and antiquity of the promise of eternal life to the saints. God, who cannot lie, hath promised before the world began. No wonder if the contempt of it be punished severely, since he has not only promised it of old, but (v. 3) has in due times manifested his word through preaching. That which some called foolishness of preaching has been thus honoured. Which is committed unto me. The ministry is a trust; none taketh this honour, but he who is thereunto appointed; and whoso is appointed and called must preach the word. According to the commandment of God our Saviour. Let none rest therefore in men's calling, without God's.

II. The person written to, Titus, a Gentile Greek, yet called both to the faith and ministry. The grace of God is free and powerful. What worthiness or preparation was there in one of heathen stock and education? My own (or my genuine) son, not by natural generation, but by supernatural regeneration. "After the common faith, that faith which is common to all the regenerate, and which thou hast in truth, and expressest in the life."

III. The salutation and prayer, wishing all blessings to him. The blessings wished: Grace, mercy, and peace. Grace is the fountain of all blessings. Mercy, and peace, and all good, spring out of this. Get into God's favour, and all must be well; for, the persons from whom blessings are wished: From God the Father, the fountain of all good. Every blessing, every comfort, comes to us from God, as a Father. And the Lord Jesus Christ our Saviour. All is from the Father by the Son.

I. More generally. Titus was to go on in settling what the apostle himself had not time for, in his short stay there. 1. The apostle's great diligence in the gospel; when he had set things on foot in one place, he hastened away to another. 2. His faithfulness and prudence. He neglected not the places that he went from; but left some to cultivate the young plantation. 3. His humility; he disdained not to be helped in his work, and that by such as were not of so great gifts as himself. 4. Titus, though inferior to an apostle, was yet above the ordinary fixed pastors or bishops, who were to tend particular churches as their peculiar stated charge; but Titus was in a higher sphere, to ordain such ordinary pastors where wanting, and settle things in their first state and form, and then to pass to other places. Here at Crete Titus was but occasionally, and for a short time; Paul willed him to despatch the business he was left for, and come to him at Nicopolis, where he purposed to winter; after this he was sent to Corinth, was with the apostle at Rome, and was sent thence into Dalmatia, which is the last we read of him in scripture. Their work was spiritual. The things wanting were divine and spiritual ordinances, and appointments for spiritual ends, derived from Christ. For settling these was Titus left. No easy thing is it to raise churches, and bring them to perfection. Paul had himself been here labouring, and yet were there things wanting. The best are apt to decay and to go out of order. This in general was Titus's work in Crete.

II. In special: To ordain elders in every city. These presbyters or elders were to have the ordinary and stated care and charge of the churches. Presbyters here therefore are gospel ministers, to dispense Christ's ordinances, and to feed the church of God. A church without a fixed and standing ministry in it is imperfect and wanting. Where a fit number of believers is, presbyters or elders must be set; their continuance in churches is as necessary as their first appointment, for perfecting the saints, and edifying the body of Christ. Faith comes by hearing, and is preserved through it also. Ignorance and corruption, decays of good and increase of all evil, come by want of a teaching and quickening ministry. On such accounts therefore was Titus left in Crete, to set in order the things that were wanting.

III. The rule of his proceeding. As under the law all things were to be made according to the pattern shown to Moses in the mount; so under the gospel all must be ordered and managed according to the direction of Christ, and of his chief ministers. Human traditions and inventions may not be brought into the church of God. If an evangelist might not do any thing but by appointment, much less may others.

Verses 6–16

The apostle here gives Titus directions about ordination.

I. Of those whom he should ordain.

1. Their qualifications respecting their life.

(1) More general: If any be blameless; not absolutely without fault, so none are; nor altogether unblamed, this is rare and difficult; for Christ himself and his apostles were blamed. But he must be one who lies not under an ill character.

(2) More particularly.

[1] There is his relative character. In his own person, he must be of conjugal chastity. And, as to his children, having faithful children, obedient and good, brought up in the true Christian faith, and living according to it, at least as far as the endeavours of the parents can avail. Not accused of riot, nor unruly. The most innocent may be falsely so charged; they must look to it therefore that there be no colour for such censure. Children so faithful and obedient, will be a good sign of faithfulness and diligence in the parent. From his faithfulness in the less, there may be encouragement to commit to him the greater, the rule of the church of God. The ground of this qualification is shown from the nature of his office (v. 7). Being such bishops and overseers of the flock, who were to be examples to them, and God's stewards to take care of the affairs of his house, there is great reason that they should be blameless.

[2] The more absolute ones are expressed, First, Negatively. Not self-willed. The prohibition is of large extent, excluding self-opinion,—self-love, making self the centre of all,—also self-confidence and self-pleasing, set on one's own will and way. A great honour it is to a minister to be ready to ask and to take advice, to be ready to defer to the mind and will of others, becoming all things to all men, that they may gain some. Not soon angry. How unfit are those to govern a church who cannot govern themselves. Not given to wine. Moderate use of this, as of the other good creatures of God, is not unlawful. But excess therein is shameful in all, especially in a minister. Not given to filthy lucre; not entering into the ministry with base worldly views. Nothing is more unbecoming a minister, who is to direct his own and others' eyes to another world, than to be too intent upon this. Secondly, Positively: he must be (v. 8) a lover of hospitality. Such a spirit and practice, according to ability and occasion, are very becoming such as should be examples of good works. A lover of good men, or of good things; ministers should be exemplary in both. Sober, or prudent; a needful grace in a minister both for his ministerial and personal carriage and management. Just in things belonging to civil life. Holy in what concerns religion. Temperate; it comes from a word that signifies strength, and denotes one who has power over his appetite and affections.

2. As to doctrine,

(1) Here is his duty: Holding fast the faithful word, as he has been taught—holding it fast in his own belief and profession, and in teaching others. Ministers must hold fast, and hold forth, the faithful word in their teaching and life.

(2) Here is the end: That he may be able, by sound doctrine, both to exhort, and to convince the gainsayers. How should he do this if he himself were uncertain or unsteady, not holding fast that faithful word and sound doctrine.

II. Whom he should reject or avoid. The reasons he takes both from bad teachers and hearers among them, v. 10, to the end.

1. From bad teachers. (1) Those false teachers are described. They were unruly, headstrong and ambitious of power, refractory and untractable. And vain talkers and deceivers, falling into errors and mistakes, and fond of them, and studious and industrious to draw others into the same. Many such there were, especially those of the circumcision, who yet were for mingling Judaism and Christianity together, and so making a corrupt medley. (2) Here is the apostle's direction how to deal with them (v. 11): Their mouths must be stopped by confutation and conviction. (3) The reasons are given for this. From the pernicious effects of their errors. Their base end in what they do: serving a worldly interest under pretence of religion.

2. In reference to their people or hearers, who are described from ancient testimony given of them.

(1) Here is the witness (v. 12): One of the Cretans, likely to know and unlikely to slander them. A prophet of their own; so their poets were accounted.

(2) Here is the matter of his testimony: The Cretans are always liars, evil beasts, slow bellies. Even to a proverb, they were infamous for falsehood and lying; to play the Cretan, or to lie, is the same; and they were compared to evil beasts for their sly hurtfulness and savage nature, and called slow bellies for their laziness and sensuality, more inclined to eat than to work.

(3) Here is the verification of this by the apostle himself: v. 13. The apostle saw too much ground for that character.

(4) He instructs Titus how to deal with them. When Paul wrote to Timothy he bade him instruct with meekness; but now, when he writes to Titus, he bids him rebuke them sharply. Timothy had a more polite people to deal with, and therefore he must rebuke them with meekness; and Titus had to do with those who were more rough and uncultivated. Their corruptions were many and gross, and therefore should be dealt with accordingly. There must in reproving be a distinguishing between sins and sins; some are more gross and heinous in their nature: and between sinners and sinners; some are of a more tender and tractable temper, apter to be wrought on by gentleness; others are more hardy and stubborn, and need more cutting language.

(5) Here is the end of it noted (v. 14), that they may show themselves truly and effectually changed. The sharpest reproofs must aim at the good of the reproved, to reclaim and reform the erroneous and the guilty. Soundness in the faith is most desirable and necessary. This is the soul's health and vigour. A special means to soundness in the faith is to turn away the ear from fables and the fancies of men. Fancies and devices of men in the worship of God are contrary to truth and piety.

(6) He gives the reasons of this. To good Christians that are sound in the faith and thereby purified all things are pure, but to those that are defiled and unbelieving nothing is pure. They suck poison out of that from which others draw sweetness; their mind and conscience, being defiled, a taint is communicated to all they do.

There are many who profess to know God, and yet in their lives deny and reject him; their practice is a contradiction to their profession. The apostle, instructing Titus to rebuke sharply, does himself rebuke sharply; he gives them very hard words, yet doubtless no harder than their case warranted, and their need required. Being abominable, deserving that God and good men should turn away their eyes from them as nauseous and offensive. And disobedient. They might do divers things; but it was not the obedience of faith. To every good work reprobate, without skill or judgment to do anything aright. See the miserable condition of hypocrites. Let us not be so ready to fix this charge on others as careful that it agree not to ourselves.

CHAP. II

The apostle here directs Titus about the faithful discharge of his own office generally (ver. 1), and particularly as to several sorts of persons (ver. 2–10) and gives the grounds of these and of other following directions (ver. 11–14), with a summary direction in the close, ver. 15.

Verses 1–10

Here he exhorts him,

I. Generally, to a faithful discharge of his own office. His ordaining others to preach would not excuse himself from preaching, nor might he take care of ministers and elders only, but he must instruct private Christians also in their duty. The true doctrines of the gospel are sound doctrines, they are in themselves good and holy, and make the believers so.

II. Specially and particularly, he instructs him to apply this sound doctrine to several sorts of persons, from v. 2–10. Ministers must be particular as well as practical in their preaching; they must teach men their duty, and must teach all and each his duty.

1. To the aged men. Old disciples of Christ must conduct themselves in everything agreeably to the Christian doctrine. That the aged men be sober; they must keep measure in things, both for health and for fitness, for counsel and example to the younger. Grave: levity is unbecoming in any, but especially in the aged. Temperate. Sound in the faith, sincere and steadfast. Those who are full of years should be full of grace and goodness, the inner man renewing more and more as the outer decays. In charity, or love; this is fitly joined with faith, which works by, and must be seen in, love. It must be sincere love, without dissimulation: love of God for himself, and of men for God's sake. And in patience. Aged persons are apt to be peevish and therefore need to be on their guard against such infirmities. Faith, love, and patience, are three main Christian graces, and soundness in these is much of gospel perfection.

2. To the aged women. These also must be instructed and warned. Those virtues before mentioned (sobriety, gravity, temperance, soundness in the faith, charity, and patience) recommended to aged men, are not proper to them only, but applicable to both sexes. There is not one way of salvation for one sex or sort, and another for another; but both must learn and practise the same things; the virtues and duties are common. That the aged women likewise be in behaviour as becometh holiness; or as beseems and is proper for holy persons, such as they profess to be. Whatsoever things are beseeming or unbeseeming holiness form a measure and rule of conduct to be looked to. Not false accusers—slandering and backbiting their neighbours, a great and too common fault; not only loving to speak, but to speak ill, of people, and to separate very friends. Not given to much wine. This is unseemly and evil in any, but especially in this sex and age, and was too much to be found among the Greeks of that time and place. Teachers of good things. Not public preachers, that is forbidden, but otherwise teach they may and should, by example and good life. Those whose actions and behaviour become holiness are thereby teachers of good things; and, besides this, they may and should also teach by doctrinal instruction at home, and in a private way. Their business is, and they may be called on to it, to be teachers of good things.

3. There are lessons for young women also, whom the aged women must teach. For teaching such things aged women have often better access than the men, even than ministers have. To be sober and discreet, contrary to the vanity and rashness which younger years are subject to. Discreet and chaste stand well together; many expose themselves to fatal temptations by that which at first might be but indiscretion. Chaste, and keepers at home, are well joined too. Not but there are occasions of going abroad; but a gadding temper for merriment and company sake is the opposite evil intended. Good, generally, in opposition to all vice; and specially kind, helpful, and charitable. It may also have a more particular sense; one of a meek and yet cheerful spirit and temper, not sullen nor bitter. To love their husbands, and to be obedient to them: and where there is true love this will be no difficult command. God would have a resemblance of Christ's authority over the church held forth in the husband's over the wife. Christ is the head of the church, to protect and save it, to supply it with all good, and secure it from evil; and so is the husband over the wife, to keep her from injuries, and to provide comfortably for her. It is not then a slavish subjection that is required; but a loving subordination. And to love their children, not with a natural affection only, but a spiritual; not a fond foolish love, neglecting due reproof and correction where necessary, but a regular Christian love, forming their life and manners aright, taking care of their souls as well as of their bodies. That the word of God may not be blasphemed. "What are these the better for this their new religion?" would the infidels be ready to say. "Judge what a God he is by these his servants; and what his word, and doctrine, and religion, are by these his followers."

4. Here is the duty of young men. They are apt to be eager and hot, therefore they must be earnestly exhorted to be considerate, not rash; humble and mild, not haughty and proud; for there are more young people ruined by pride than by any other sin.

5. With these instructions to Titus the apostle inserts some directions to himself. For his conversation, v. 7. Without this, he would pull down with one hand what he built with the other. Good doctrine and good life must go together. In all things: some read, above all things. Above all things, example, especially that of the teacher himself, is needful; hereby both light and influence are more likely to go together. Ministers must be examples to the flock, and the people followers of them, as they are of Christ. For his teaching and doctrine, as well as for his life, v. 7, 8. In their preaching, therefore, the display of human learning or oratory, is not to be affected; but sound speech must be used, which cannot be condemned; scripture-language in expressing scripture-truths. This is sound speech, that cannot be condemned. Thus be an example in word; and in conversation, the life corresponding with the doctrine. The reason both for the strictness of the minister's life and the gravity and soundness of his preaching. Adversaries would be seeking occasion to reflect, and would do so could they find anything amiss in doctrine or life. Faithful ministers will have enemies watching, such as will endeavour to find or pick holes in their teaching or behaviour; the more need therefore for them to look to themselves.

6. The directions respecting servants. Servants must know and do their duty to their earthly masters, but with an eye to their heavenly one.

(1) The duties themselves are these:

[1] v. 9: Obedience the prime duty, that by which they are characterized. Their will must be subject to their master's will, and their time and labour at their master's disposal and command. If he be a master, the duties of a servant are to be paid to him as such.

[2] To please them well in all things. We are not to understand it either of obeying or pleasing them, without any limitation; but always with a reserve of God's right. If his command and the earthly master's come in competition, we are instructed to obey God rather than man. And not only must the will of God be the measure of the servant's obedience, but the reason of it also. All must be done with a respect to him, in virtue of his authority, and for pleasing him primarily and chiefly. Christian liberty comports well with civil servitude and subjection. Persons may serve men, and yet be the servants of Christ. Servants therefore should not be troubled at their condition, but be faithful and cheerful in the station wherein God hath set them, striving to please their masters in all things. Hard it may be, but it must be aimed at as much as possible.

[3] Not answering again. When conscious of a fault, to palliate or stand in justification of it doubles it. Yet this not answering again excludes not turning away wrath with a soft answer, when season and circumstances admit. Good and wise masters will be ready to hear and do right.

[4] Not purloining, but showing all good fidelity. This is another great essential of good servants, to be honest. They must be just and true, and do for their masters as they would or should for themselves. Be it so that the master is hard and strait, scarcely making sufficient provision for servants; yet they must not be their own carvers, nor go about by theft to right themselves. He must not only not steal nor waste, but must improve his master's goods, and promote his prosperity to his utmost. He that increased not his master's talent is accused of unfaithfulness, though he had not embezzled nor lost it.

(2) The consideration with which Titus was to enforce them: That they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things. If they be careful to do their duty, it will redound to the glory of God and the credit of religion. The unbelieving masters would think the better of that despised way when they found that those of their servants who were Christians were better than their other servants. True religion is an honour to the professors of it; and they should see that they do not any dishonour to it.

Verses 11–14

The grounds upon which all the foregoing directions are urged.

I. From the nature and design of the gospel. Let all sorts do their respective duties, for this is the very aim and business of Christianity, to instruct persons, to a right frame and conduct.

1. They are put under the dispensation of the grace of God. Now grace is obliging and constraining to goodness. Without this effect, grace is received in vain.

2. This gospel grace brings salvation. Hence it is called the word of life; it brings to faith, and so to life.

3. It hath appeared. The old dispensation was comparatively dark and shadowy; this is a clear and shining light.

4. It hath appeared to all men. Gospel grace is open to all, and all are invited to come and partake of the benefit of it. The doctrine of grace and salvation by the gospel is for all ranks and conditions of men (slaves and servants, as well as masters).

5. This gospel revelation is to teach. It directs what to shun and what to follow, what to avoid and what to do. The gospel is not for speculation only or chiefly, but for practice and right ordering of life.

(1) Denying ungodliness and worldly lusts. "Put away ungodliness and irreligion, all unbelief of the divine Being, not loving, nor fearing, nor trusting in him, nor obeying him as we should. And worldly lusts, all corrupt and vicious desires and affections that prevail in worldly men." An earthly sensual conversation suits not a heavenly calling.

(2) To live soberly, righteously, and godly, &c. Religion is not made up of negatives only; there must be doing good as well as eschewing evil. We should live soberly with respect to ourselves, keeping the limits of moderation and temperance; and righteously towards all men, rendering to all their due, and injuring none, but rather doing good to others. Selfishness is a sort of unrighteousness; it robs others of that share in us which is their due. Live righteously therefore as well as soberly. And godly towards God. Regard to him indeed should run through all. But there is an express and direct duty also that we owe to God, belief and acknowledgment of his being and perfections,—loving, fearing, and trusting in him,—depending on him, and devoting ourselves to him,—praying to him, praising him, and meditating on his word and works. This is godliness, looking and coming to God, as he has manifested himself in Christ. Thus must we exercise ourselves to godliness, without which there can be no adorning of that gospel which is according to it. The gospel teaches us not only how to believe and hope well, but also to live well, as becomes that faith and hope in this present world, and as expectants of another and better.

(3) Looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Hope is put for the thing hoped for, heaven and the felicities thereof, called emphatically that hope, because it is the great thing we look for; and a blessed hope, because, when attained, we shall be completely happy for ever. This denotes both the time of the accomplishing of our hope and the sureness and greatness of it. The great God and our Saviour (or even our Saviour) Jesus Christ. Christ then is the great God, not figuratively, but properly and absolutely, the true God. In his second coming he will reward his servants, and bring them to glory with him. [1] There is a common and blessed hope for all true Christians in the other world. By hope is meant the thing hoped for, Christ himself, who is called our hope, and blessedness in and through him, hence fitly termed here that blessed hope. [2] The design of the gospel is to stir up all to a good life by this blessed hope. Denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world, looking for the blessed hope; not as mercenaries, but as dutiful and thankful Christians. [3] At the glorious appearing of Christ will the blessed hope of Christians be attained. The glory of the great God and our Saviour will then break out as the sun. The work and design of the gospel are to raise the heart to wait for this second appearing of Christ. Let us then look to this hope. [4] The comfort and joy of Christians are that their Saviour is the great God, and will gloriously manifest himself.

II. From the end of Christ's death, v. 14. To bring us to holiness and happiness was the end of Christ's death, as well as the scope of his doctrine.

1. The purchaser of salvation—Jesus Christ, that great God and our Saviour, who saves not simply as God, much less as man alone; but as God-man. Man, that he might obey, and suffer, and die, for man; and God, that he might support the manhood.

2. The price of our redemption: He gave himself. The Father gave him, but he gave himself too; and, in the freeness and voluntariness, as well as the greatness of the offering, lay the acceptableness and merit of it. The human nature was the offering, and the divine the altar, sanctifying the gift.

3. The persons for whom He died. He gave himself for us, not only for our good, but in our stead. He loved us, and gave himself for us; what can we do less than love and give up ourselves to him?

4. The ends of his giving himself for us, (1) That he might redeem us from all iniquity. This is fitted to the first lesson, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts. Christ gave himself to redeem us from these, therefore put them away. To love and live in sin is to trample under foot redeeming blood. But how could the short sufferings of Christ redeem us from all iniquity? Through the infinite dignity of his person. He who was God suffered, though not as God. The great God and our Saviour gave himself for us; this accounts for it. Happy end and fruit of Christ's death, redemption from all iniquity! Christ died for this: and, (2) To purify to himself a peculiar people. This enforces the second lesson: To live soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world. Christ died to purify as well as to pardon—to heal the nature, as well as to free from guilt and condemnation. Thus does he make to himself a peculiar people, by purifying them. Thus are they distinguished from the world that lies in wickedness. Redemption from sin and sanctification of the nature go together, and both made a peculiar people unto God. And (3) Zealous of good works. This peculiar people must be seen to be so by doing good, and having a zeal therein.

Verse 15

A summary direction to Titus in which we have the matter and manner of ministers' teaching.

I. The matter of ministers' teaching: These things, namely, those before mentioned: the truths and duties of the gospel, of avoiding sin, and living soberly, righteously, and godly, in this present world.

II. The manner; by doctrine, and exhortation, and reproof with all authority. The great and necessary truths and duties of the gospel, especially, these speak and exhort, press with much earnestness. Ministers must not be cold and lifeless in delivering heavenly doctrine and precepts, as if they were indifferent things; but they must urge them with earnestness. And rebuke; convince and reprove such as contradict or gainsay, or neglect and do not receive the truth as they should. Rebuke with all authority, as coming in the name of God. Ministers are reprovers in the gate.

III. "Let no man despise thee. Speak and exhort these things, press them upon all, with boldness and faithfulness reprove sin, and carefully look to thyself and thy own conduct, and then none will despise thee." The most effectual way for ministers to secure themselves from contempt is to keep close to the doctrine of Christ, and do their duty with prudence and courage.

Perhaps too an admonition might be here intended to the people—that Titus, though young, yet should not be contemned by them.

CHAP. III

Of duties which concern Christians more in common, ver. 1–8. What Titus in teaching should avoid, with some other directions (ver. 9–14), and salutations in the close, ver. 15.

Verses 1–8

The apostle had directed Titus in reference to the particular duties of several sorts of persons; now he bids him exhort to what concerned them more in common. Ministers are people's remembrancers of their duty. Forgetfulness of duty is a common frailty; there is need therefore of reminding and quickening them thereto.

I. The duties themselves. 1. Put them in mind to be subject to principalities and powers, to obey magistrates, that is, all civil rulers. That they be subject to them and obey them in things lawful and honest. The Christian religion was misrepresented by its adversaries as prejudicial to the rights of princes and civil powers, and tending to faction and sedition, and to rebellion against lawful authority. Christians must be reminded to show themselves examples rather of all due subjection and obedience to the government that is over them. 2. To be ready to every good work. The precept regards doing good of every kind and on every occasion that may offer, whether respecting God, ourselves, or our neighbour. Mere harmlessness, or good words and good meanings only, are not enough without good works. "Not only take, but seek, occasion for doing good. Put all in mind of this." And, 3. To speak evil of no man. If no good can be spoken, rather than speak evil unnecessarily, say nothing. We must never take pleasure in speaking ill of others, nor make the worst of anything, but the best that we can. We must not go up and down as tale-bearers, carrying ill-natured stories. As this evil is too common, so it is of great malignity. This is among the sins to be put off, for, if indulged, it unfits for Christian communion here and the society of the blessed in heaven. Remind them therefore to avoid this. 4. To be no brawlers; no fighters, either with hand or tongue. Contention and strife arise from men's lusts, which must be curbed, not indulged; and Christian's need to be reminded of these things. 5. But gentle, equitable and just, not taking words or actions in the worst sense; and for peace sometimes yielding somewhat of strict right. 6. Showing all meekness to all men. Not only have meekness in our hearts, but show it in our speech and conduct. All meekness—meekness in all instances and occasions, not towards friends only, but to all men. Meekness of spirit and demeanour renders religion amiable; it is a commanded imitation of Christ, and brings its own reward with it.

II. He adds the reasons.

1. From their own past condition. We ourselves also were sometimes, (1) Foolish; without true spiritual understanding, ignorant of heavenly things. Those should be most disposed to bear with others' follies who may remember many of their own. And, (2) Disobedient; heady and unpersuadable, resisting the word. Well are these set together, foolish and disobedient. For what folly like this, to disobey God and his laws, natural or revealed? (3) Deceived, or wandering, out of the ways of truth and holiness. Man in this his degenerate state is of straying nature. He is weak, and ready to be imposed upon by the wiles of Satan, and of men lying in wait to seduce and mislead. (4) Serving divers lusts and pleasures. Carnal people think they enjoy their pleasures; the word calls it servitude and vassalage. It is the misery of the servants of sin that they have many masters, one lust hurrying them one way, and another another. The lusts that tempt them promise them liberty, but in yielding they become the servants of corruption. (5) Living in malice. Malice desires hurt to another and rejoices in it. (6) And envy, which grudges and repines at another's good. Both are roots of bitterness, whence many evils spring. These were some of the sins in which we lived in our natural state. (7) Hateful. (8) And hating one another. It is the misery of sinners that they hate one another, as it is the duty and happiness of saints to love one another. The consideration of its having been thus with us should dispose us to be more meek and tender-hearted, towards those who are such.

2. From their present state. "We are delivered out of that our miserable condition by no merit nor strength of our own." The apostle again opens the causes of our salvation, v. 4–7.

(1) The prime author of our salvation—God the Father, therefore termed here God our Saviour. All things belonging to the new creation, and recovery of fallen man to life and happiness, are of God the Father. The Father begins, the Son manages, and the Holy Spirit works and perfects all.

(2) The spring and rise of it—the divine philanthropy, or kindness and love of God to man. By grace we are saved from first to last. This is the ground and motive. The occasion is in man, his misery and wretchedness. Sin bringing that misery, wrath might have issued out rather than compassion; but God would pity and save rather than destroy. He delights in mercy.

(3) Here is the means—the shining out of this love and grace of God in the gospel, after it appeared. The appearing of love and grace has, through the Spirit, great virtue to change and turn to God.

(4) False grounds are here removed: Not by works of righteousness which we have done, but according to his mercy, he saved us. Works must be in the saved but not among the causes of his salvation; they are the way to the kingdom, not the meriting price of it. Faith and all saving graces are God's free gift and his work; the beginning, increase, and perfection of them in glory, all are from him.

(5) The formal cause of salvation, regeneration or spiritual renewing, as it is here called. A new prevailing principle of grace and holiness is wrought, which makes the man a new man, having new thoughts, desires, and affections. He saved us. What is so begun, as sure to be perfected in time, is expressed as if it already were so. We must be initially saved now, by regeneration, if on good ground we would expect complete salvation in heaven. The change then will be but in degree, not in kind. Grace is glory begun, as glory is but grace in its perfection.

(6) The outward sign and seal thereof in baptism, called therefore the washing of regeneration. The work itself is inward and spiritual; but it is outwardly signified and sealed in this ordinance. Baptism saves figuratively and sacramentally, where it is rightly used. Slight not this outward sign and seal, yet rest not in the outward washing. The covenant sealed in baptism binds to duties, as well as conveys benefits and privileges; if the former be not minded, in vain are the latter expected.

(7) The principal efficient, the renewing of the Holy Ghost. In the economy of our salvation, the applying and effecting part is especially attributed to the Holy Spirit. We are said to be born of the Spirit, to be quickened and sanctified by the Spirit, to be led and guided, strengthened and helped, by the Spirit. Earnestly therefore is he to be sought, and greatly to be heeded by us, that we quench not his holy motions. As we act towards him, so may we expect he will to us; if we slight, and resist, and oppose his workings, he will slacken them; if we continue to vex him, he will retire.

(8) The manner of God's communicating this Spirit in the gifts and graces of it; not with a scanty and niggardly hand, but most freely and plentifully: Which he shed on us abundantly. More of the Spirit in its gifts and graces is poured out under the gospel than was under the law. A measure of the Spirit the church has had in all ages, but more since the coming of Christ, than before. There was then great abundance of common gifts of illumination, outward calling and profession, and general faith, and of more special gifts of sanctification too, such as faith, and hope, and love. Let us get a share in these. What will it signify if much be shed forth and we remain dry? This is the manner of God's communicating grace and all spiritual blessings under the gospel —plentifully; he is not straitened towards us.

(9) The procuring cause of all, namely, Christ: Through Jesus Christ our Saviour. All come through him, and through him as a Saviour. Let us praise God for him above all; let us go to the Father by him. Have we grace? Let us thank him with the Father and Spirit for it, and grow and increase therein more and more.

(10) The ends why we are brought into this new spiritual condition, justification, and heirship, and hope of eternal life: That being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs according to the hope of eternal life. Justification is the free remission of a sinner, and accepting him as righteous through the righteousness of Christ received by faith. This God does freely as to us, yet through the intervention of Christ's sacrifice and righteousness, laid hold on by faith. It is by grace, as the spring and rise, though through the redemption that is in Christ, and by faith applying that redemption. Inherent righteousness we must have, and the fruits of it in works of obedience; as fruits of our justification, and evidences of our interest in Christ and qualification for life and happiness, and the very beginning and part of it; but the procuring of all this is by Christ, that, being justified by his grace, we should be made heirs. Our justification is by the grace of God, and our justification by that grace is necessary in order to our being made heirs of eternal life. Eternal life is set before us in the promise. The Spirit works faith in us and hope of that life, and so are we made heirs of it; faith and hope bring it near, and fill with joy in the well-grounded expectation of it. The meanest believer is a great heir. All this gives good reason why we should show all meekness to all men, because we have experienced so much benefit by the kindness and love of God to us, and may hope that they, in God's time, may be partakers of the like grace as we are.

III. When he has opened the grace of God towards us, he immediately presses the necessity of good works; for we must not expect the benefit of God's mercy: unless we make conscience of our duty (v. 8). It must be an operative working faith. They must make it their care to maintain good works, not to do them occasionally only. These things are good and profitable unto men; these good works, say some, or the teaching of these things, rather than idle questions, as follows.

What Titus should avoid in teaching; how he should deal with a heretic; with some other directions.

I. He tells Titus what, in teaching, he should shun, v. 9. Idle and foolish enquiries must be shunned.—And genealogies. Some lawful and useful enquiries might be made into these things, to see the fulfilling of the scriptures in some cases, and especially in the descent of Christ the Messiah; but all that served to pomp only, and to feed vanity, in boasting of a long pedigree, these Titus must withstand as foolish and vain.—And contentions, and strivings about the law. There were those who were for the Mosaic rites and ceremonies, and would have them continued in the church. Titus must give no countenance to these, but avoid and oppose them; for they are unprofitable and vain: this is to be referred to all those foolish questions and genealogies, as well as those strivings about the law. They are so far from instructing and building up in godliness, that they are hindrances of it rather. Ministers must not only teach things good and useful, but shun and oppose the contrary; nor should people have itching ears, but love and embrace sound doctrine.

II. But because there will be heresies and heretics in the church, the apostle next directs Titus how to deal with such, v. 10. "Admonish him once and again, that, if possible .he may be brought back, and thou mayest gain thy brother; but, if this will not reduce him, cast him out of the communion. Those who will not be reclaimed by admonitions, but are obstinate in their sins and errors, are subverted and self-condemned. How great an evil real heresy is. Such a one is subverted or perverted—a metaphor from a building so ruined as to render it difficult if not impossible to repair and raise it up again. Real heretics have seldom been recovered to the true faith: not so much defect of judgment, as perverseness of the will, being in the case. Pains and patience must be used about those that err most grievously. They must be admonished, instructed, and warned. Upon continued obstinacy the church is obliged, to preserve its own purity, by severing such a corrupt member; which discipline may by God's blessing become effectual to reform the offender.

III. The apostle subjoins some further directions, v. 12, 13.

1. Titus should hold himself ready to come to Paul at Nicopolis, as soon as Artemas or Tychicus should be sent to Crete, to supply his place. Of Artemas we read little, but Tychicus is mentioned on many occasions with respect. Paul calls him a beloved brother, and faithful minister, and fellow-servant in the Lord: one fit therefore for the service intimated.

2. The other personal charge to Titus is that he would bring two of his friends on their journey diligently, and see them furnished, so that nothing should be wanting to them. Zenas is styled the lawyer. Apollos was an eminent and faithful minister. Accompanying such persons part of their way, and accommodating them for their work and journeys, was a pious and needful service. Let Christians learn to maintain good works, that they be not unfruitful. Christianity is not a fruitless profession. It is not enough that they be harmless, but they must be profitable, doing good, as well as eschewing evil.—"Let ours set up and maintain some honest labour and employment, to provide for themselves and their families, that they be not unprofitable burdens on the earth"; so some understand it. Let them not think that Christianity gives them a writ of ease. To maintain good works for necessary uses; not living like drones on the labours of others, but themselves fruitful to the common benefit.

IV. The apostle concludes with salutations and benedictions, v. 15. Great comfort and encouragement it is to have the heart and prayers of other Christians with and for us. Grace be with you all. Amen. This is the apostle's wish and prayer. Grace is the chief thing to be wished and begged for, with respect to ourselves or others; it is, summarily, all good. Amen shuts up the prayer, expressing desire and hope, that so it may, and so it shall be.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE EPISTLE OF ST. PAUL TO

PHILEMON

Philemon, one of note and probably a minister in the church of Colosse, a city of Phrygia, had a servant named Onesimus, who, having purloined his goods, ran away from him, and came to Rome, where Paul was then a prisoner for the gospel, and was, by the blessing of God, converted by him, after which he ministered awhile to the apostle in bonds. Understanding him to be another man's servant, Paul would not, without his consent, detain him, but sends him back with this letter-commendatory, wherein he earnestly sues for his pardon and kind reception. There is no reason to doubt but Paul prevailed with Philemon to forgive and receive Onesimus.

CHAP. I

In this epistle we have, I. The preface, ver 1–7. II The substance and body of it, ver. 8–21. And then the conclusion, ver. 22, to the end

Verses 1–7

I. In the first two verses of the preface we have the persons from and to whom it is written,

1. The persons writing: Paul, the principal, who calls himself a prisoner of Jesus Christ. This was proper to move Philemon upon the request made to him by such a one, especially when strengthened too with the concurrence of Timothy. What could be denied to two such petitioners?

2. The persons written to are Philemon and Apphia, and with them Archippus, and the church in Philemon's house. Philemon, the master of Onesimus, was the principal; a good man he was, and probably a minister, and on both accounts dearly beloved by Paul. With Philemon Apphia is joined, probably his yoke-fellow. She was a party offended and injured by Onesimus, and therefore proper to be taken notice of in a letter for reconciliation and forgiveness. These are the principal parties written to. The less principal are, Archippus, and the church in Philemon's house. Archippus was a minister in the church of Colosse, Philemon's friend. Paul might think him one whom Philemon would advise with, and who might be capable of furthering the good work of peace-making and forgiveness. And to the church in thy house, his whole family, in which the worship of God was kept up. Families which generally may be most pious and orderly may yet have one or other in them impious and wicked. This was the aggravation of Onesimus's sin, that it was where he might have learned better. This one evil servant did not hinder Philemon's house from being called a church. Such should all families be—nurseries of religion. Wicked families are nurseries for hell, as good ones are for heaven. Paul, for some concern that all might have in this matter of Onesimus, directs to them all, that their affection as well as Philemon's might return to him, and that they might further, and not hinder, the reconciliation wished and sought.

II. The apostle's salutation of those named by him (v. 3). He wishes for them the best things; not gold, nor silver, nor any earthly good, but grace and peace from God in Christ. Grace, the spring and fountain of all blessings; and peace, all good, as the fruit and effect of that grace. From God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ. From the Father, who is our Father in Christ; and from Christ, his favour and goodwill as God, and the fruits of it through him as Mediator. The favour of God and peace with him, as in itself it is the best and most desirable good, so is it the cause of all other, and what puts sweetness into every mercy and can make happy even in the want of all earthly things.

III. He expresses the singular affection he had for him, by thanksgiving and prayer to God in his behalf, and the great joy for the many good things he knew and heard to be in him, v. 4–7.

1. The object of Paul's praises and prayers for Philemon, v. 4. It is the privilege of good men that in their praises and prayers they come to God as their God: I thank my God, said Paul. Our prayers and praises should be offered up to God, not for ourselves only, but for others also. In this lies no little part of the communion of saints. Paul, in his private thanksgivings and prayers, was often particular in remembering his friends. This is a means of exercising love, and obtaining good for others.

2. The circumstance: Always making mention of thee. So must we remember Christian friends much and often, as their case may need.

3. The matter both of his praises and prayers, in reference to Philemon.

(1) Of his praises. He thanks God for the love which he heard Philemon had towards the Lord Jesus. For his faith in Christ also. Love to Christ, and faith in him, are prime Christian graces, for which there is great ground of praise to God. He praises God likewise for Philemon's love to all the saints. These two must go together. Different sentiments and ways in what is not essential will not make a difference of affection as to the truth. Mere external differences are nothing here. Paul calls a poor converted slave his bowels. We must love, as God does, all saints. Hearing of thy love and faith, which thou hast towards the Lord Jesus, and towards all saints. Love to saints, if it be sincere, will be catholic and universal love towards all saints; faith and love, though in the heart they are hidden things, are known by the effects of them.

(2) The apostle joins prayer with his praises, that the fruits of Philemon's faith and love might be more and more conspicuous, that the communication of them might constrain others to the acknowledgment of all the good things that were in him and in his house towards Christ Jesus.

4. He adds a reason, both of his prayer and his praises (v. 7). The good thou hast done and still doest is abundant matter of joy and comfort to me and others, who therefore desire you may continue and abound in such good fruits more and more.

Verses 8–25

I. The main business of the epistle, which was to plead with Philemon on behalf of Onesimus. Many arguments Paul urges for this purpose, v. 8–21. The 1*st Argument* is taken from what was before noted: "Seeing so much good is reported of thee and found in thee, especially thy love to all saints, now let me see it on a fresh and further occasion." A disposition to do good, together with past instances and expressions of it, is a good handle to take hold of for pressing to more.

2*nd Argument* is from the authority of him that was now making this request to him, v. 8. This was a matter within the compass of the apostle's power to require, though he would not in this instance act up to it.

3*rd Argument*. He chooses to entreat it of him (v. 9). He argues from love rather than authority, which doubtless must carry engaging influence with it.

4*th Argument. Being such a one as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Jesus Christ.* Years bespeak respect. The request of an aged apostle, and now suffering for Christ and his gospel, should be tenderly considered.

5*th Argument*. From the spiritual relation now between Onesimus and himself, v. 10. My son, whom I have begotten in my bonds; he was dear to him, and he hoped would be so to Philemon, under this consideration. Prison mercies are sweet.

6*th Argument* is from Philemon's own interest, v. 11. Unsanctified persons are unprofitable persons. Grace makes good for somewhat: "In time past unprofitable but now profitable, as he has since his conversion been here to me, ministering to me in my confinement." There seems an allusion to the name Onesimus, which signifies profitable. Now he will answer to his name. How tenderly does Paul here speak, when he is pleading with Philemon not to make severe reflections on his servant's misconduct, but to forgive. What happy changes conversion makes—of evil good! of unprofitable useful!

7*th Argument*. He urges Philemon from the strong affection that he had to Onesimus, v. 12. Even good men may sometimes need great earnestness and entreaty to forgive those who have injured and offended them.

8*th Argument* is from the apostle's denying himself in sending back Onesimus, v. 13, 14. Paul was now in prison, and wanted a friend or servant to assist him, for which he found Onesimus fit and ready, and therefore would have detained him to minister to him. Yet he would not take this liberty, though his circumstances needed it: I have sent him back to thee, that any good office of thine to me might not be of necessity, but willingly. He might indeed have presumed on Philemon's willingness; but, notwithstanding his need, he would deny himself rather than take that way.

9*th Argument*. Such a change was now wrought in Onesimus that Philemon needed not fear his ever running from him, or injuring him any more, v. 15. Charity would so hope and judge, yea, so it would be. How tenderly still the sins of penitents are spoken of; he calls it a departure for a season instead of giving it the term that it deserved. True penitents will not return to folly. Observe the goodness, and power of God, that he should be led into the way of salvation who had fled from it, and find means made effectual at Rome who had been hardened under them at Colosse.

10*th Argument* is taken from the capacity under which Onesimus now would return, and must be received by Philemon (v. 16). There is a spiritual brotherhood between all true believers, however distinguished in civil and outward respects; they are all children of the same heavenly Father. Christianity does not annul nor confound the respective civil duties, but strengthens the obligation to them. Religious servants are more than mere ordinary servants; they have grace in their hearts, and have found grace in God's sight, and so will in the sight of religious masters. "A brother beloved, specially to me, but how much more to thee, both in the flesh and in the Lord. He is God's servant and thine too; here are more ties than he is under to me."

11*th Argument*. From the communion of saints, v. 17. Own and treat him as thou wouldst me, with a like ready and true, though perhaps not equal, affection.

12*th Argument*. A promise of satisfaction to Philemon, v. 18, 19.

(1) A confession of Onesimus's debt to Philemon. True penitents will be ingenuous in owning their faults, and especially is this to be done in cases of injury to others.

(2) Paul here engages for satisfaction. The communion of saints does not destroy distinction of property: Onesimus is yet Philemon's servant still, and indebted to him for wrongs that he had done. Suretiship is not in all cases unlawful, but in some is a good and merciful undertaking. Hereby he expresses his real and great affection for Onesimus, and his full belief of the sincerity of his conversion.

(3) The reason of things between him and Philemon: "Albeit, I do not say to thee how thou owest unto me even thy own self besides." The apostle glances at the benefits he had conferred on Philemon. I have been the instrument of all that spiritual good to thee; and what thy obligation to me on this account is I leave to thee to consider.

13*th Argument* is from the joy and comfort the apostle hereby would have on Philemon's own account, as well as on Onesimus's, v. 20. Philemon was Paul's son in the faith, yet he entreats him as a brother: Onesimus a poor slave, yet he solicits for him as if he were seeking some great thing for himself. Christians should do the things that may rejoice the hearts of one another. From the world they expect trouble; and where may they look for comfort and joy but in one another? It is not any selfish respect I am actuated by, but what is pleasing to Christ.

14*th Argument*. This lies in the good hope and opinion which he expresses of Philemon, v. 21. Good thoughts and expectations of us more strongly move and engage us to do the things expected from us. Good persons will be ready for good works, and not narrow and pinching, but abundant in them.

II. The conclusion.

1. He signifies his good hope of deliverance, through their prayers, and that shortly he might see them, desiring Philemon to make provision for him, v. 22.

(1) Prepare me also a lodging. He wills Philemon to do it, intending to be his guest. Who would not show the utmost of affectionate regards to such a one?

(2) For I trust that through your prayers I shall be given unto you. He did not know how God might deal with him, but the benefit of prayer he had often found, and hoped he should again, for deliverance, and liberty to come to them. Trust must be with the use of means, prayer especially; this hath unlocked heaven and opened prison-doors. The least may in this way be helpful to the greatest. Though prayer obtains, yet it does not merit the things obtained: they are God's gift, and Christ's purchase. I trust that through your prayers I shall be freely bestowed on you. In praying for faithful ministers, people in effect pray for themselves: "I trust I shall be given unto you, for your service, and comfort."

2. He sends salutations from one who was his fellow-prisoner, and four more who were his fellow-labourers, v. 23, 24. Epaphras, my fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus. He was of Colosse, and so countryman and fellow-citizen with Philemon, who, being at Rome, perhaps accompanying Paul, was confined in the same prison, and for the same cause. My fellow-prisoner in Christ Jesus is mentioned as his glory and the apostle's comfort. So God sometimes lightens the sufferings of his servants by the communion of saints, the sweet fellowship they have one with another in their bonds. Never more enjoyment of God have they found than when suffering together for God.—Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, my fellow-labourers. The mention of these seems in a manner to interest them in the business of the letter. How ill would it look by denial of the request of it to slight so many worthy names as most of these, at least, were! Marcus, cousin of Barnabas, and son of Mary, who was so hospitable to the saints at Jerusalem. Though some failing seems to have been in him when Paul and he parted, yet in conjunction with Barnabas he went on with his work, and here Paul and he, we perceive, were reconciled. Aristarchus is mentioned with Marcus (Col. iv. 10), and called there by Paul his fellow-prisoner. Next is Demas: no mark of disgrace lay on him here, but he is joined with others who were faithful. Lucas is the last, that beloved physician and evangelist, who came to Rome, companion with Paul.

3. Here is the apostle's closing prayer and benediction, v. 25. What is wished and prayed for: Grace, the free favour and love of God; with this the apostle begins and ends. From whom: Our Lord Jesus Christ. All grace to us is from Christ; he purchased, and he bestows it. To whom: Your spirit, not of Philemon only, but of all who were named in the inscription. All the house saluted are here joined in the closing benediction, the more to quicken all to further the end of the epistle.

Amen is added, not only for strong and affectionate summing up the prayer and wish, so let it be; but as an expression of faith that it will be heard, so shall it be. The grace of Christ with their spirits, Philemon's especially, would sweeten and mollify them, and dispose to forgive others as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven us.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE EPISTLE TO

THE HEBREWS

Concerning this epistle we must enquire, I. Into the divine authority of it; for this has been questioned by some. The divine original of it shines forth with such strong and unclouded rays that he who runs may read it as an eminent part of the canon of scripture. Its general reception in the church of God in all ages—these are the evidences of its divine authority. II. As to the penman of this epistle, we are not so certain; it does not bear the name of any in the front of it, as the rest of the epistles do, and there has been some dispute among the learned to whom they should ascribe it. But it is generally assigned to the apostle Paul. In the primitive times it was generally ascribed to him. III. As to the scope and design of this epistle, it is very evident that it was clearly to inform the minds, and strongly to confirm the judgment, of the Hebrews in the transcendant excellency of the gospel above the law. The design of this epistle was to press the believing Hebrews to a constant adherence to the Christian faith, and perseverance in it, notwithstanding all the sufferings they might meet with in so doing. It must be acknowledged that there are many things in this epistle hard to be understood, but the sweetness we shall find therein will make us abundant amends for all the pains we take to understand it.

CHAP. 1

In this chapter we have a twofold comparison stated: I. Between the evangelical and legal dispensation, ver. 1–3. II. Between the glory of Christ and that of the highest creatures, the angels, ver. 4, to the end.

Verses 1–3

The apostle begins with a general declaration of the excellency of the gospel dispensation above that of the law.

I. The way wherein God communicated himself and his will to men under the Old Testament. The persons by whom God delivered his mind under the Old Testament; they were the prophets, that is, persons chosen of God, and qualified by him, for that office of revealing the will of God to men. The persons to whom God spoke by the prophets: To the fathers, to all the Old Testament saints. The order in which God spoke to men in those past times: he spoke to his ancient people at sundry times and in divers manners. By several parts, as the word signifies, which may refer either to the several ages of the Old Testament dispensation; or to the several gradual openings of his mind concerning the Redeemer. In divers manners, according to the different ways in which God thought fit to communicate his mind to his prophets.

II. God's method of communicating his mind and will under the New Testament dispensation, these last days as they are called. Now we must expect no new revelation, but only more of the Spirit of Christ to help us better to understand what is already revealed. It is the final, the finishing revelation. It is a revelation which God has made by his Son, the most excellent messenger that was ever sent into the world.

1. The glory of his office. God hath appointed him to be heir of all things. By him God made the worlds, both visible and invisible, the heavens and the earth. By him he made the old creation, by him he makes the new creature, and by him he rules and governs both. He upholds all things by the word of his power. The weight of the whole creation is laid upon Christ: he supports the whole and all the parts.

2. Hence the apostle passes to the glory of the person of Christ, v. 3. He is the only-begotten Son of God, and as such he must have the same nature. The person of the Son is the glory of the Father, shining forth with a truly divine splendour. Jesus Christ in his person is God manifest in the flesh. The person of the Son is the true image and character of the person of the Father. In beholding the power, wisdom, and goodness, of the Lord Jesus Christ, we behold the power, wisdom, and goodness, of the Father. This is the glory of the person of Christ; the fulness of the Godhead dwells in him.

3. From the glory of the person of Christ he proceeds to mention the glory of his grace. The sufferings of Christ had this great honour in them, to be a full satisfaction for the sins of his people: By himself he purged away our sins; he has made atonement for sin. Himself, the glory of his person and nature, gave to his sufferings such merit as was a sufficient reparation of honour to God, who had suffered injury and affront by the sins of men.

4. From the glory of his sufferings we are at length led to consider the glory of his exaltation. Having assumed our nature, and suffered in it on earth, he has taken it up with him to heaven.

Now it was by no less a person than this that God in these last days spoke to men. The dispensations of the gospel must therefore exceed, very far exceed, the dispensation of the law.

Verses 4–14

The apostle now proceeds to show that he is much superior not only to the prophets, but to the angels themselves. Both in nature and office Christ is vastly superior to the angels themselves.

I. The superior nature of Christ is proved from his superior name.

II. The superiority of the name and nature of Christ above the angels is declared in the holy scriptures, and is to be deduced thence. Now here are several passages of scripture cited, in which those things are said of Christ that were never said of the angels.

1. It was said of Christ, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee (Ps. ii. 7). Now this was never said concerning the angels, and therefore by inheritance he has a more excellent nature and name than they.

2. It is said concerning Christ, but never concerning the angels, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son.

3. It is said of Christ, When God bringeth his First-begotten into the world, let all the angels of God worship him. The proof of this is taken out of Ps. xcvii 7, Worship him, all you gods, "All you that are superior to men, own yourselves to be inferior to Christ in nature and power."

4. God has said concerning Christ, Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever, &c., v. 8–12. But of the angels he has only said that he hath made them spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire, v. 7.

(1) What does God say here of the angels? He maketh his angels spirits, and his ministers a flame of fire. The office of the angels: they are God's ministers, or servants, to do his pleasure. He endows them with light and zeal, readiness and resolution to do his pleasure: they are no more than what God has made them to be.

(2) How much greater things are said of Christ by the Father. Here two passages of scripture are quoted.

[1] One of these is out of Ps. xlv. 5, 7, where God declares of Christ, First, His true and real divinity, Thy throne, O God. And, if God the Father declares him to be so, he must be really and truly so. Secondly, God declares his dignity and dominion, as having a throne, a kingdom, and a sceptre of that kingdom. Thirdly, God declares the eternal duration of the dominion and dignity of Christ: Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever. This distinguishes Christ's throne from all earthly thrones, which are tottering, and will at length tumble down; but the throne of Christ shall be as the days of heaven. Fourthly, God declares of Christ the perfect equity of his administration, v. 8. He came righteously to the sceptre, and he uses it in perfect righteousness, v. 9. Christ came to fulfil all righteousness. He came to finish transgression, and to make an end of sin as a hateful as well as hurtful thing. Fifthly, God declares of Christ how he was qualified for the office of Mediator, and how he was installed and confirmed in it (v. 9). Christ has the name Messiah from his being anointed. This anointing of Christ was with the oil of gladness, that joy which was set before him as the reward of his service and sufferings, that crown of glory and gladness which he should wear for ever after the suffering of death. This anointing of Christ was above the anointing of his fellows. All God's other anointed ones had only the Spirit in a certain measure; Christ had the Spirit above measure, without any limitation.

[2] The other passage of scripture is taken out of Ps. cii. 25–27, and is recited in v. 10–12, where the omnipotence of the Lord Jesus Christ is declared as it appears both in creating the world and in changing it. In creating the world (v. 10). His right, as God with the Father, was absolute, resulting from his creating power. This power he had before the beginning of the world, and he exerted it in giving a beginning and being to the world. He not only founded the earth, but the heavens too are the work of his hands, the hosts of heaven, the angels themselves; and therefore he must needs be infinitely superior to them. In changing the world that he has made. a This world is mutable, all created nature is so; this world has passed through many changes, and shall pass through more (v. 11, 12). Not only men and beasts and trees grow old, but this world itself grows old, and is hastening to its dissolution; it changes like a garment, has lost much of its beauty and strength. It bears the symptoms of a dying world. But then its dissolution will not be its utter destruction, but its change. Christ will fold up this world as a garment not to be abused any longer. Sin has made a great change in the world for the worse, and Christ will make a great change in it for the better. b Christ is immutable. Thus the Father testifies of him, Thou remainest, thy years shall not fail. Christ is the same in himself, and the same to his people in all the changes of time. Christ is immutable and immortal: his years shall not fail. Christ lives to take care of us while we live, and of ours when we are gone.

III. The superiority of Christ to the angels appears in this that God never said to the angels what he has said to Christ, v. 13, 14.

1. What has God said to Christ? He has said, "Sit thou at my right hand, till I make thy enemies thy footstool, Ps. cx. 1. Christ Jesus has his enemies, enemies even among men. Let us not think it strange then if we have our enemies. Christ never did anything to make men his enemies; he has done a great deal to make them all his friends and his Father's friends, and yet he has his enemies. All the enemies of Christ shall be made his footstool. God the Father has undertaken for this, and, though it be not done presently, it shall certainly be done. Christ shall go on to rule and reign till this be done; he shall not leave any of his great designs unfinished. And it becomes his people to go on in their duty, till he make them conquerors over all their spiritual enemies.

2. What has God said to the angels? They are ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for those who shall be the heirs of salvation. (1) What the angels are as to their nature: they are spirits. (2) What the angels are as to their office: they are ministering spirits. They are the ministers of divine Providence. The angels are sent forth for this end—to minister to those who shall be the heirs of salvation. The description given of the saints—they are heirs of salvation; at present they are under age, heirs, not inheritors. They are heirs because they are children of God. The dignity and privilege of the saints—the angels are sent forth to minister for them. Bless God for the ministration of angels.

CHAP. II

The apostle, I. Makes some application of the doctrine laid down concerning the excellency of the person of Christ, ver. 1–4. II. Enlarges further upon the pre-eminence of Christ above the angels, ver. 5–9. III. Proceeds to remove the scandal of the cross, ver. 10–15. IV. Asserts the incarnation of Christ, and assigns the reason of his so doing, ver. 16, to the end.

Verses 1–4

He now comes to apply this doctrine both by way of exhortation and argument.

I. By way of exhortation, v. 1. It is the great concern of everyone under the gospel to give the most earnest heed to all gospel discoveries and directions. We must embrace them in our hearts and affections, retain them in our memories, and finally regulate our words and actions according to them.

II. He adds strong motives to enforce the exhortation.

1. From the great loss we shall sustain if we do not take this earnest heed to the things which we have heard: We shall let them slip. Our minds and memories are like a leaky vessel, they do not without much care retain what is poured into them. Those meet with an inconceivable loss who let gospel truths slip out of their minds. All is lost, if the gospel be lost. If we do not well attend, we shall not long retain the word of God; inattentive hearers will soon be forgetful hearers.

2. Another argument is taken from the dreadful punishment we shall incur if we do not do this duty, v. 2, 3. (1) How the law is described: it was the word spoken by angels, and declared to be steadfast. It is like the promise, yea and amen; it is truth and faithfulness, and it will abide and have its force whether men obey it or no; for every transgression and disobedience will receive a just recompence of reward. If men trifle with the law of God, the law will not trifle with them. Punishments are as just, and as much due to sin as rewards are to obedience. (2) How the gospel is described. It is salvation, a great salvation, so great that none can fully express, no, nor yet conceive, how great it is. It shows how we may be saved from so great sin and so great misery, and be restored to so great holiness and so great happiness. (3) How sinning against the gospel is described: it is declared to be a neglect of this great salvation; it is a contempt put upon the saving grace of God in Christ, making light of it, not caring for it. Let us all take heed that we be not found among those wicked wretched sinners who neglect the grace of the gospel. (4) How the misery of such sinners is described: it is declared to be unavoidable (v. 3): How shall we escape? The despoilers of this salvation are condemned already, under arrest and in the hands of justice already. There is no escaping out of this condemned state, but by accepting the great salvation discovered in the gospel; as for those who neglect it, the wrath of God is upon them, and it abides upon them. There is no door of mercy left open for them; there will be no more sacrifice for sin.

3. Another argument to enforce the exhortation is taken from the person by whom the gospel began to be spoken (v. 3): that is, the Lord Jesus Christ. Now surely it may be expected that all will reverence this Lord, and take heed to a gospel that began to be spoken by one who spoke so as never man spoke.

4. Another argument is taken from the character of those who were witnesses to Christ and the gospel (v. 3, 4). (1) The promulgation of the gospel was continued and confirmed by the evangelists and apostles, who were eye and ear-witnesses of what Jesus Christ began both to do and to teach, Acts i. 1. These witnesses could have no worldly end to serve hereby. They exposed themselves by their testimony to the loss of all that was dear to them in this life, and many of them sealed it with their blood. (2) God himself bore witness to those who were witnesses for Christ. He bore them witness by signs, and wonders, and divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his will. It was the will of God that we should have sure footing for our faith, and a strong foundation for our hope in receiving the gospel. As at the giving forth of the law there were signs and wonders, so he witnesses to the gospel by more and greater miracles, as to a more excellent and abiding dispensation.

Verses 5–9

For to the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak.

I. Here the apostle lays down a negative proposition, including a positive one—That the state of the gospel-church, which is here called the world to come, is not subjected to the angels. This new world is committed to Christ, and put in absolute subjection to him only. His angels were too weak for such a charge.

II. A scripture-account of that blessed Jesus. It is taken from Ps. viii. 4–6. These words are to be considered both as applicable to mankind in general, and as applied here to the Lord Jesus Christ.

1. As applicable to mankind in general, an affectionate thankful expostulation with the great God concerning his kindness to the sons of men. (1) In remembering them, or being mindful of them. God is always mindful of us, let us never be forgetful of him. (2) In visiting them. He comes to see us, how it is with us; and by his visitation our spirit is preserved. (3) In making man the head of all the creatures in this lower world. (4) In crowning him with glory and honour, the honour of having noble powers and faculties. (5) In giving him dominion over the inferior creatures.

2. As applied to the Lord Jesus Christ, v. 8, 9. The moving cause of all the kindness God shows to men is the grace of God. The fruits of this free grace of God is that God crowned the human nature of Christ with glory and honour, in his being perfectly holy; that by his sufferings he might make satisfaction, tasting death for every man. As a reward of his humiliation in suffering death, he was crowned with glory and honour.

The apostle here proceeds to remove the scandal of the cross.

I. It became God that Christ should suffer, v. 10.

1. God is described as the final end and first cause of all things, and as such it became him to secure his own glory in all that he did.

2. He is declared to have acted up to this glorious character in the work of redemption.

(1) In the choice of the end; and that was to bring many sons to glory. We must be the sons of God both by adoption and regeneration, before we can be brought to the glory of heaven. Though the sons of God are but a few in one place and at one time, yet when they shall be all brought together it will appear that they are many.

(2) In the choice of the means. In finding out such a person as should be the captain of our salvation. In making this captain of our salvation perfect through sufferings. He perfected the work of our redemption by shedding his blood. He found his way to the crown by the cross, and so must his people too.

II. How much they should be benefited by the cross and sufferings of Christ. Hereby they are brought into a near union with Christ, and into a very endearing relation.

1. Into a near union (v. 11). Christ, who is the agent in this work of sanctification, and Christians, are all of one. They are all of one heavenly Father. They are of one earthly father, Adam. Christ and believers have the same human nature. They are of one spirit, the same mind is in them that was in Christ.

2. Into an endearing relation.

(1) He declares what this relation is: he is not ashamed to call them brethren. Christ and believers are brethren in what is heavenly as well as in what is earthly. He will never be ashamed of any who are not ashamed of him, and who take care not to be a shame and reproach to him and to themselves.

(2) He illustrates this from three texts of scripture.

[1] The first is out of Ps. xxii. 22. Christ should have a church or congregation in the world, a company of volunteers, freely willing to follow him. These should not only be brethren to one another, but to Christ himself. He would declare his Father's name to them.

[2] The second scripture is quoted from Ps. xviii. 2. His brethren must suffer and trust too.

[3] The third scripture is taken from Isa. viii. 18. Christ's children were given him of the Father. And they are given to Christ at their conversion. Christ receives them, rejoices in them, takes them up to heaven, and there presents them to his Father.

Verses 14–18

I. The incarnation of Christ is asserted (v. 16). He took our nature into union with his divine nature, and became really and truly man. He did not lay hold of angels, but he laid hold of the seed of Abraham. The nature of angels could not be an atoning sacrifice for the sin of man. He took upon him the human nature from one descended from the loins of Abraham, that the same nature that had sinned might suffer. Now there is hope and help for the chief of sinners in and through Christ.

II. The reasons and designs of the incarnation of Christ are declared.

1. For no higher nor lower nature than man's that had sinned could so suffer for the sin of man as to satisfy the justice of God, and raise man up to a state of hope.

2. He became man that he might die. The legal sacrifices and offerings God could not accept as a propitiation. A body was prepared for Christ.

3. The devil was the first sinner, and the first tempter to sin, and sin was the procuring cause of death. He draws men into sin, the ways whereof are death. In these respects he may be said to have had the power of death. But now Christ has so far destroyed him who had the power of death that he can keep none under the power of spiritual death; nor can he draw any into sin.

4. That he might deliver his own people from the slavish fear of death to which they are often subject, Christ became man, and died, to deliver them from perplexities of soul, by letting them know that death is not only a conquered enemy, but a reconciled friend. Death is not now in the hand of Satan, but in the hand of Christ.

5. He must be faithful to God and merciful to men. In things pertaining to God, to his justice, and to his honour—to make reconciliation for the sins of the people. In things pertaining to his people, to their support and comfort, v. 18. Christ's passion: He suffered being tempted; and his temptations were not the least part of his sufferings. Christ's compassion: He is able to succour those that are tempted. He knows how to deal with tempted sorrowful souls, because he has been himself sick of the same disease, not of sin, but of temptation and trouble of soul. The best of Christians are subject to many temptations. Temptations bring our souls into such distress and danger that they need support and succour.

CHAP. III

The apostle applies what he had said concerning the priesthood of Christ, ver. 1–6. He then adds many weighty counsels and cautions, from ver. 7, to the end.

Verses 1–6

The application of the doctrine concerning the priesthood of our Lord Jesus Christ.

I. The apostle exhorts Christians to have this high priest much in their thoughts.

1. The honourable compellation used towards those to whom he wrote: Holy brethren, partakers of the heavenly calling. Brethren, not only my brethren, but the brethren of Christ, and in him brethren to all the saints. Holy brethren; holy not only in profession and title, but in principle and practice, in heart and life. Partakers of the heavenly calling—partakers of the means of grace, and of the Spirit of grace, that came from heaven; that calling which brings down heaven into the souls of men.

2. The titles he gives to Christ, whom he would have them consider, (1) As the apostle of our profession, the great revealer of that faith which we profess to hold and of that hope which we profess to have. (2) Not only the apostle, but the high priest, too, of our profession, upon whose satisfaction and intercession we profess to depend for pardon of sin, and acceptance with God. (3) As Christ, the Messiah. (4) As Jesus, our Saviour, our healer.

II. The duty we owe to him who bears all these high and honourable titles. Look unto Jesus, the author and finisher of your faith. Even those that are holy brethren, and partakers of the heavenly calling, have need to stir up one another to think more of Christ than they do; the best of his people think too seldom and too slightly of him.

III. Several arguments to enforce this duty of considering Christ the apostle and high priest of our profession.

1. The first is taken from his fidelity, v. 2. He was faithful to him that appointed him, as Moses was in all his house. Moses was faithful in the discharge of his office to the Jewish church in the Old Testament, and so is Christ under the New; this was a proper argument to urge upon the Jews.

2. The superior glory and excellence of Christ above Moses (v. 3–6). (1) Christ was a maker of the house, Moses but a member in it. Christ, who is God, drew the ground-plan of the church, provided the materials, and disposed them to receive the form; he has compacted and united this his house, and crowned all with his own presence, which is the true glory of this house of God. (2) Christ was the master of this house, as well as the maker, v. 5, 6. Moses was only a faithful servant. Christ, as the eternal Son of God, is the rightful owner and sovereign ruler of the church. Christ is worthy of more glory than Moses, and of greater regard and consideration. Now follows a comfortable accommodation of it to himself and all true believers. Whose house we are. A characteristic description of those persons who constitute this house: "If we hold fast the confidence, and the rejoicing of the hope, firmly to the end." There must not only be a setting out well in the ways of Christ, but a steadfastness and perseverance therein unto the end.

Verses 7–19

Here the apostle proceeds in pressing upon them serious counsels and cautions; and he recites a passage out of Ps. xcv. 7, &c.

I. What he counsels them to do—to give a speedy and present attention to the call of Christ. "Hear his voice; apply it to yourselves and set about it this very day, for to-morrow it may be too late."

II. What he cautions them against—hardening their hearts, turning the deaf ear to the calls and counsels of Christ. The hardening of our hearts is the spring of all our other sins.

III. Whose example he warns them by—that of the Israelites their fathers in the wilderness: As in the provocation and day of temptation; this refers to Exod. xvii. 2–7. Days of temptation are often days of provocation. The sins of others should be a warning to us. Our fathers' sins and punishments should be remembered by us, to deter us from following their evil examples. The sin they were guilty of: they distrusted God, murmured against Moses, and would not attend to the voice of God. The aggravations of their sin: they sinned when they saw his works—works of wonder wrought for their deliverance out of Egypt, and their support and supply in the wilderness. They continued thus to sin against God for forty years. The source and spring of such aggravated sins. They erred in their hearts; and these heart-errors produced many other errors in their lips and lives. They did not know God's ways, though he had walked before them. They did not observe either his providences or his ordinances. The just resentment God had at their sins, and yet the great patience he exercised towards them (v. 10). All sin does not only anger and affront God, but it grieves him. If they by their sins continue to grieve the Spirit of God, their sins shall be made grievous to their own spirits, either in a way of judgment or mercy. God swore in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest. Sin, long continued in, will kindle the divine wrath. His wrath will make their condition a restless condition; there is no resting under the wrath of God.

IV. What use the apostle makes of their awful example, v. 12, 13, &c.

1. He gives the Hebrews a proper caution; the word is, Take heed—look to it. "Look about you; be upon your guard against enemies both within and without." The ruin of others should be a warning to us to take heed of the rock they split upon.

2. He enlarges upon the matter of the admonition: Take heed, brethren, lest there be in any of you an evil heart of unbelief in departing from the living God. A heart of unbelief is an evil heart. An evil heart of unbelief is at the bottom of all our sinful departures from God; if once we allow ourselves to distrust God, we may soon desert him.

3. That which would be a remedy against this evil heart of unbelief, v. 13. Since tomorrow is none of ours, we must make the best improvement of today. There is a great deal of deceitfulness in sin; it promises much, but performs nothing. The deceitfulness of sin is of a hardening nature. Every act of sin confirms the habit.

4. He conforts those who not only set out well, but hold on well, and hold out to the end (v. 14). The saints' privilege: they are made partakers of Christ, in all that he is, in all that he has done, or can do. The condition on which they hold that privilege, their perseverance. Not but they shall persevere, being kept by the mighty power of God through faith to salvation, but to be pressed thus to it is one means by which Christ helps his people to persevere. The same spirit with which Christians set out in the ways of God they should maintain to the end. There are a great many who in the beginning show a great deal of courage and confidence, but do not hold them fast to the end.

5. The apostle resumes what he had quoted before, v. 15, 16, &c. The apostle tells them that though some who had heard the voice of God did provoke him, yet all did not so. God will have a remnant that shall be obedient to his voice.

6. The apostle puts some queries upon what had been before mentioned (v. 17–19). God is grieved only with those of his people who sin against him, and continue in sin. Unbelief (with rebellion which is the consequent of it) is the great damning sin of the world. This sin shuts up the heart of God, and shuts up the gate of heaven, against them.

CHAP. IV

The apostle proceeds, I. To declare that our privileges by Christ under the gospel exceed the privileges of the Jewish church under Moses, ver. 1–4. II. He assigns the cause why the ancient Hebrews did not profit by their religious privileges, ver 2. Then, III. Confirms the privileges of those who believe, and the misery of those who continue in unbelief, 3–10. IV. Concludes with arguments and motives to faith and obedience.

Verses 1–10

I. Our privileges by Christ under the gospel are not only as great, but greater than those enjoyed under the Mosaic law. We have a promise left us of entering into his rest. This promise of spiritual rest is a promise left us by the Lord Jesus Christ in his last will and testament, as a precious legacy. Our business is to see to it that we be the legatees, and so have the prospect and earnest of perfect and everlasting rest in heaven.

II. We have as great advantages as they (v. 2); the same gospel for substance was preached under both Testaments. We have the gospel as well as they, and in greater purity and perspicuity than they had.

III. The reason why so few of the ancient Jews profited by that dispensation of the gospel was their want of faith, v. 2. The word is preached to us that we may profit by it; it is a price put into our hands to get wisdom. There have been in all ages a great many unprofitable hearers. Those who are not gainers by hearing are great losers. That which is at the bottom of all our unprofitableness is our unbelief. If the hearers have not faith in their souls to mix with the word, they will be never the better for it. This faith must mingle with every word, and be in act and exercise while we are hearing.

IV. Those who enjoy the gospel should maintain a holy fear and jealousy over themselves, v. 1. Those who might have attained salvation by faith may fall short by unbelief. It is a dreadful thing so much as to seem to fall short of the gospel salvation. It is much more dreadful really to fall short. Maintain a holy and religious fear lest we should fall short. Presumption is the high road to ruin.

V. The apostle confirms the happiness of all those who truly believe the gospel.

1. By asserting so positively the truth of it, from the experience of himself and others: "We who have believed, do enter into rest," v. 3.

2. He illustrates and confirms it. (1) From God's finishing his work of creation, and so entering into his rest (v. 3, 4). He will cause those who believe to finish their work, and then to enjoy their rest. (2) From God's continuing the observance of the sabbath. There is a more spiritual sabbath remaining for the people of God than that into which Joshua led the Jews (v. 6–9). Believers shall enter into their rest, v. 10.

VI. The apostle confirms the misery of those who do not believe; they shall never enter into this spiritual rest, either of grace here or glory hereafter. It remains only for the people of God; others by their sin abandon themselves to eternal restlessness.

Verses 11–16

I. A serious exhortation, v. 11. The end proposed —rest in Christ on earth, with Christ in heaven. The way to this end prescribed—labour, diligent labour; this is the only way to rest; those who will not work now shall not rest hereafter. Let us therefore labour, let us all call upon one another to this diligence. Now is our working time, our rest remains.

II. Powerful motives to make the advice effectual.

1. Lest any man fall after the same example of unbelief. To have seen so many fall before us will be a great aggravation of our sin, if we will not take warning by them.

2. The great help we may have from the word of God that we may obtain this rest, v. 12. It is quick; it is very lively and active, in seizing the conscience of the sinner, in cutting him to the heart, and in comforting him and binding up the wounds of the soul. It is powerful. It convinces powerfully, converts powerfully, and comforts powerfully. It is powerful to batter down Satan's kingdom, and to set up the kingdom of Christ upon the ruins thereof. It is sharper than any two-edged sword. It will enter where no other sword can, and make a more critical dissection: it pierces to the dividing asunder of the soul and the spirit, the soul and its habitual prevailing temper; it makes a soul that has been a long time of a proud spirit to be humble, of a perverse spirit to be meek and obedient. This sword divides between the joints and the marrow. This sword can make men willing to undergo the sharpest operation for the mortifying of sin. It is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart. The word will turn the inside of a sinner out, and let him see all that is in his heart.

3. The perfections of the Lord Jesus Christ.

(1) His person, particularly his omniscience, v. 13. None of the creatures can be concealed from Christ; and there are none of the motions and workings of our heads and hearts but what are open and manifest to him. This omniscience of Christ should engage us to persevere in faith and obedience.

(2) His office, and this particular office of our high priest.

[1] What kind of high priest Christ is (v. 14). First, A great high priest. The greatness of our high priest is set forth by his having passed into the heavens. Christ executed one part of his priesthood on earth, in dying for us; the other he executes in heaven, by pleading the cause of his people. The greatness of Christ is set forth by his name, Jesus—a physician and a Saviour, able to save to the uttermost all who come to God by him. Secondly, He is not only a great, but a gracious high priest, merciful, compassionate, and sympathizing with his people, v. 15. He is touched with the feeling of our infirmities, not only that he might be able to satisfy for us, but to sympathize with us. Thirdly, He is a sinless high priest: He was in all things tempted as we are, yet without sin. We seldom meet with temptations but they give us some shock. We are apt to give back, though we do not yield; but our great high priest came off clear in his encounter with the devil.

[2] How we should demean ourselves towards him. Let us hold fast our profession of faith in him, v. 14. Let us never deny him, never be ashamed of him before men. Christians must not only set out well, but they must hold out. We should encourage ourselves to come boldly to the throne of grace, v. 16. There is a throne of grace set up. God might have set up a tribunal of strict justice, but he has chosen to set up a throne of grace. There grace reigns, and acts with sovereign freedom, power, and bounty. It is our duty to be often found before this throne of grace. It is good for us to be there. Our business at the throne of grace should be that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need. Mercy and grace are the things we want, mercy to pardon all our sins and grace to purify our souls. In all our approaches to this throne of grace for mercy, we should come with a humble freedom and boldness; we should ask in faith, nothing doubting. We are indeed to come with reverence and godly fear; not as if we were dragged before the tribunal of justice, but kindly invited to the mercy-seat, where grace reigns, and loves to exert and exalt itself towards us. The office of Christ, as being our high priest, and such a high priest, should be the ground of our confidence in all our approaches to the throne of grace.

CHAP. V

The apostle continues his discourse upon the priesthood of Christ. I He explains the nature of the priestly office in general, ver. 1-3. II. The proper call there must be to this office, ver. 4 6 III. The requisite qualifications for the work, ver. 7-9. IV. The peculiar order of the priesthood of Christ, ver. 6, 7, 10. V. He reproves the Hebrews, that they had not made those improvements in knowledge which might have made them capable of looking into the more abstruse parts of scripture, ver. 11 14.

Verses 1-9

An account of the nature of the priestly office in general.

I. Of what kind of beings the high priest must be. He must be taken from among men; he must be a man, one of ourselves. This implies that God would not admit sinful man to come to him immediately and alone; that God was pleased to take one from among men, by whom they might approach God in hope.

II. For whom every high priest is ordained: For men in things pertaining to God, for the glory of God and the good of men.

III. For what purpose every high priest was ordained: That he might offer both gifts and sacrifices for sin.

1. That he might offer gifts or free-will offerings, as an acknowledgment that our all is of him and from him. All we bring to God must be free and not forced; it must be a gift.

2. That he might offer sacrifices for sin. Christ is constituted a high priest for both these ends. Our good deeds must be presented by Christ, and our evil deeds must be expiated by the sacrifice of himself.

IV. How this high priest must be qualified, v. 2.

1. He must be one that can have compassion on the ignorant. He must be one who can find in his heart to pity them, one that is willing to instruct those that are dull of understanding. On those that are out of the way. He must be one who has tenderness enough to lead them back from the by-paths of error, sin, and misery, into the right away: this will require great patience and compassion, even the compassion of a God.

2. He must also be compassed with infirmity; and so be able from himself to sympathize with us. Thus Christ was qualified.

V. How the high priest was to be called of God. (v. 4). The office of the priesthood was a very great honour. Those only can expect his presence and blessing on them and their administrations, that are called of God; others may expect a blast instead of a blessing.

VI. How this is brought home and applied to Christ, v. 5. Though Christ reckoned it his glory to be made a high priest, yet he would not assume that glory to himself. He did not run without being sent; and, if he did not, surely others should be afraid to do it.

VII. The apostle prefers Christ before Aaron. In the manner of his call, in which God said unto him, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee. Now God never said thus to Aaron. Another expression that God used in the call of Christ, v. 6. God the Father appointed him a priest of a higher order than that of Aaron. The priesthood of Aaron was to be but temporary; the priesthood of Christ was to be perpetual. In the holiness of his person. Other priests were to offer up sacrifices, as for the sins of others, so for themselves, v. 3. But Christ needed not to offer for sins for himself.

VIII. Christ's discharge of this his office, and the consequences of that discharge, v. 7-9.

1. The discharge of his office of the priesthood (v. 7). He took to him flesh; he became a mortal man. Christ, in the days of his flesh, subjected himself to death; he was a tempted, bleeding, dying Jesus! God the Father was able to save him from death. What would have become of us if God had saved Christ from dying? It was in kindness to us that the Father would not suffer that bitter cup to pass away from him; for then we must have drunk the dregs of it. Christ, in the days of his flesh, offered up prayers and supplications to his Father. A great many instances we have of Christ's praying. This refers to his prayer in his agony, and to that before his agony. The prayers and supplications that Christ offered up were joined with strong cries and tears, herein setting us an example. How many dry prayers, how few wet ones, do we offer up to God! Christ was heard in that he feared. He was answered by present supports in his agonies, and in being carried well through death, and delivered from it by a glorious resurrection. He was carried through death; and there is no real deliverance from death but to be carried well through it. We may have many recoveries from sickness, but we are never saved from death till we are carried well through it.

2. The consequences of this discharge of his office, v. 8, 9, &c.

(1) By these his sufferings he learned obedience, though he was a Son, v. 8. Let none then who are the children of God by adoption expect an absolute freedom from suffering. Though he never was disobedient, yet he never performed such an act of obedience as when he became obedient to death, even to the death of the cross. We should learn by all our afflictions a humble obedience to the will of God.

(2) Hereby he has become the author of eternal salvation to men. This salvation is actually bestowed on none but those who obey Christ. We must hearken to his word, and obey him. He is exalted to be a prince to rule us, as well as a Saviour to deliver us; and he will be a Saviour to none but to those to whom he is a prince. But to those who obey him, he will be the author—the grand cause of their salvation.

Verses 10-14

I. He had many things which he could say to them concerning this mysterious person called Melchisedec, whose priesthood was eternal. There are great mysteries in the person and offices of the Redeemer; Christianity is the great mystery of godliness.

II. The reason why he did not say all those things concerning Christ, our Melchisedec, that he had to say: You are dull of hearing. Dull hearers make the preaching of the gospel a difficult thing, and even many who have some faith are but dull hearers.

III. It was not a mere natural infirmity, but it was a sinful infirmity, v. 12.

1. They might have been so well instructed in the doctrine of the gospel as to have been teachers of others.

2. You have need that one should teach you again, &c. In the oracles of God there are some first principles, plain to be understood and necessary to be learned. There are also deep and sublime mysteries.

IV. There are in the church babes and persons of full age (v. 12–14), and there are in the gospel milk and strong meat. Those that are babes, unskilful in the word of righteousness, must be fed with milk. Christ despises not his babes; he has provided suitable food for them. There is strong meat for those that are of full age, v. 14. The deeper mysteries of religion belong to those that are of a higher class in the school of Christ. Every true Christian stands in need of nourishment. The word of God is food and nourishment to the life of grace. There are spiritual senses as well as those that are natural. The soul has its sensations as well as the body; these are much depraved and lost by sin, but they are recovered by grace. It is by use and exercise that these senses are improved, made more quick and strong to taste the sweetness of what is good and true, and the bitterness of what is false and evil.

CHAP. VI

The best way to prevent apostasy, the dreadful nature of which sin he sets forth (ver. 1–8), and then expresses his good hopes concerning them, and sets before them the great encouragement they had from God, ver. 9, to the end.

Verses 1–8

In order to their growth, Christians must leave the principles of the doctrine of Christ. They must not lose them, they must not despise them, they must not forget them. But they must not rest in them, they must not be always laying the foundation, they must go on, and build upon it. Though some of them were but weak, yet others of them had gained more strength; and they must be provided for suitably. He hoped they would be growing and so be able to digest stronger meat.

I. Several foundation-principles, which must be well laid at first, and then built upon.

1. Repentance from dead works. Take care that you return not to sin again, for then you must have the foundation to lay again. Repentance for and from dead works is a foundation-principle, which must not be laid again, though we must renew our repentance daily.

2. Faith towards God. Repentance from dead works, and faith towards God, are connected, and always go together; they are inseparable twins, the one cannot live without the other.

3. The doctrine of baptisms. This ordinance of baptism is a foundation to be rightly laid, and daily remembered, but not repeated.

4. Laying on of hands, on persons passing solemnly from their initiated state by baptism to the confirmed state. Or by this may be meant ordination of persons to the ministerial office. This is to be done but once.

5. The resurrection of the dead.

6. Eternal judgment.

These are the great foundation-principles, and from these they must never depart.

II. The apostle declares his readiness to assist the Hebrews in building themselves up on these foundations, v. 3. That resolution is right which is not only made in the sincerity of our hearts, but in a humble dependence upon God. Ministers should not only teach people what to do, but go before them, and along with them, in the way of duty.

III. Spiritual growth is the surest way to prevent apostasy from the faith.

1. He shows how far persons may go in religion, and, after all, fall away, and perish for ever, v. 4, 5. (1) They may be enlightened. It is rather to be understood of notional knowledge and common illumination, of which persons may have a great deal, and yet come short of heaven. (2) They may taste of the heavenly gift like persons in the market, who taste of what they will not come up to the price of, and so but take a taste, and leave it. (3) They may be made partakers of the Holy Ghost, of his extraordinary and miraculous gifts. Such gifts in the apostolic age were sometimes bestowed upon those who had no true saving grace. (4) They may taste of the good word of God; they may hear the word with pleasure, and talk well of it, and yet never have it dwelling richly in them. (5) They may have tasted of the powers of the world to come. These lengths hypocrites may go, and, after all, turn apostates.

2. The dreadful case of such as fall away. The greatness of the sin of apostasy. It is crucifying the Son of God afresh, and putting him to open shame. They declare that they approve of what the Jews did in crucifying Christ, and that they would be glad to do the same thing again, and would have him to be a public shame and reproach. The great misery of apostates. It is impossible to renew them again unto repentance. God can renew them to repentance, but he seldom does it; and with men themselves it is impossible. Their misery is exemplified by a proper similitude, v. 8. To give this the greater force, here is observed the difference that there is between the good ground and the bad. A description of the good ground: It drinketh in the rain that cometh often upon it. Believers do not only taste of the word of God, but they drink it in; and this good ground bringeth forth fruit. And this fruit-field or garden receives the blessing. Here is the different case of the bad ground: It bears briers and thorns; it is not only barren of good fruit, but fruitful in that which is bad, briers and thorns. Such ground is rejected. And that is not all, but such ground is nigh unto cursing; so far is it from receiving the blessing. Its end is to be burned. This is the sad end to which apostasy leads, and therefore Christians should go on and grow in grace, lest, if they do not go forward, they should go backward.

The apostle proceeds to apply himself to their hopes.

I. He declares the good hope he had concerning them, v. 9. There are things that accompany salvation, things that are never separated from salvation. Ministers must sometimes speak by way of caution to those of whose salvation they have good hopes. And those who have in themselves good hopes should yet consider seriously how fatal a disappointment it would be if they should fall short. Thus they are to work out their salvation with fear and trembling.

II. Encouragements to them to go on. God had wrought a principle of holy love and charity in them, v. 10. Good works and labour proceeding from love to God are commendable; and what is done to any in the name of God shall not go unrewarded. Those who expect a gracious reward for the labour of love must continue in it as long as they have ability and opportunity. Those who persevere in a diligent discharge of their duty shall attain to the full assurance of hope in the end. Full assurance is a higher degree of hope; they differ not in nature, but only in degree. Full assurance is attainable by great diligence and perseverance to the end.

III. Caution and counsel how to attain this full assurance of hope to the end. They should not be slothful. They must not love their ease, nor lose their opportunities. They should follow the good examples of those who had gone before, v. 12. There are some who from assurance have gone to inherit the promises. The way by which they came to the inheritance was that of faith and patience. We must follow them in the way of faith and patience.

IV. The assured truth of the promises of God, v. 13, to the end.

1. They are all confirmed by the oath of God. Those whom he has blessed indeed he will go on to bless. He swore by himself. No greater security can be given or desired. It was made good to him after he had patiently endured. There is always an interval, and sometimes a long one, between the promise and the performance. That interval is a trying time to believers. Those who patiently endure shall assuredly obtain the blessedness promised, as sure as Abraham did, v. 16. This is the nature and design of an oath, in which men swear by the greater, by the Lord himself. Now, if God would condescend to take an oath to his people, he will surely remember the nature and design of it.

2. The promises of God are all founded in his eternal counsel; and this counsel of his is an immutable counsel. God never needs to change his counsels.

3. The promises of God may safely be depended upon.

(1) Who they are to whom God has given such full security of happiness. They are the heirs of the promise. They are such as have fled for refuge to the hope set before them. Here is a refuge for all sinners who shall have the heart to flee to it.

(2) What God's design towards them is—that they might have strong consolation. God is concerned for the consolation of believers. The consolations of God are strong enough to support his people under their strongest trials. The comforts of this world are too weak, but the consolations of the Lord are neither few nor small.

(3) What use the people of God should make of their hope and comfort, v. 19. We are in this world as a ship at sea, in danger of being cast away. Heaven is the harbour to which we sail. We have need of an anchor to keep us sure and steady. Gospel hope is our anchor. It is sure and steadfast. It is sure in its own nature; it is not a flattering hope made out of the spider's web, but it is a true work of God. It is steadfast as to its object; it is an anchor that has taken good hold. It does not seek to fasten in the sands, but enters within the veil, and fixes there upon Christ; he is the anchor-hold of the believer's hope.

CHAP. VII

Now the apostle assures them that by receiving the Lord Jesus they would have a much better high priest, a priesthood of a higher order. I. We have a more particular account of Melchisedec, ver. 1–3. II. The superiority of his priesthood to that of Aaron, ver. 4 10. III. An accommodation of all to Christ, to show the superior excellency of his person, office, and covenant, ver. 11, to the end.

Verses 1–10

Here the apostle sets before them some of the strong meat he had spoken of before.

I. The great question that first offers itself is, Who was this Melchisedec? All the account we have of him in the Old Testament is in Gen. xiv. 18, &c., and in Ps. cx. 4. We are much in the dark about him.

1. The opinions concerning him that are best worthy our consideration are these three: (1) The rabbin, and most of the Jewish writers, think he was Shem the son of Noah. (2) Many Christian writers have thought him to be Jesus Christ himself. (3) The most general opinion is that he was a Canaanite king, who reigned in Salem.

2. How Christ is represented thereby, v. 1–3. (1) Melchisedec was a king, and so is the Lord Jesus. (2) He was king of righteousness: his name signifies the righteous king. Jesus Christ is a rightful and a righteous king. (3) He was king of Salem, that is, king of peace; first king of righteousness, and after that king of peace. So is our Lord Jesus. (4) He was priest of the most high God. So is the Lord Jesus. (5) The scripture has chosen to set him forth as an extraordinary person, without giving us his genealogy, that he might be a fitter type of Christ, whose priesthood is without descent, but is personal and perpetual. (6) He met Abraham returning from the slaughter of the kings, and blessed him. He gave as a king, and blessed as a priest. Thus our Lord Jesus meets his people, refreshes them, renews their strength, and blesses them. (7) Abraham gave him a tenth part of all (v. 2). And thus are we obliged to make all possible returns of love and gratitude to the Lord Jesus for all the favours we receive from him. (8) This Melchisedec was made like unto the Son of God, and abideth a priest continually. He bore the image of God in his piety and authority, and stands upon record as an immortal high priest.

II. Let us now consider how great this Melchisedec was, and how far his priesthood was above that of the order of Aaron (v. 4, 5, &c.). The greatness of this man and his priesthood appears from Abraham's paying the tenth of the spoils unto him; and it is well observed that Levi paid tithes to Melchisedec in Abraham, v. 9. Levi paid tithes to Melchisedec, as to a greater and higher priest than himself. It appears also it was Melchisedec's blessing of Abraham, v. 6, 7. Abraham's great dignity and felicity—was that he had the promises. That man is rich and happy indeed who has an estate in bills and bonds under God's own hand and seal. Melchisedec's greater honour—was his privilege to bless Abraham; and it is an incontested maxim that the less is blessed of the greater, v. 7.

Verses 11–28

The necessity there was of raising up another priest, after the order of Melchisedec and not after the order of Aaron, v. 11, 12, &c.

I. It is asserted that perfection could not come by the Levitical priesthood and the law.

II. Therefore another priest must be raised up, after the order of Melchisedec, by whom perfection might come.

III. It is asserted that the priesthood being changed there must of necessity be a change of the law.

IV. It is not only asserted, but proved, that the priesthood and law are changed, v. 13, 14. A dispensation is now set up, by which true believers may be made perfect.

1. There is a change in the tribe of which the priesthood comes, v. 14. This change of the family shows a real change of the law of priesthood.

2. There is a change in the form and order of making the priests. The law by which Christ was constituted a priest, after the order of Melchisedec, was the power of an endless life. This gives the preference infinitely to Christ and the gospel. The high priest of our profession holds his office by that innate power of endless life which he has in himself, to communicate eternal life to all those who duly rely upon his sacrifice and intercession.

3. There is a change in the efficacy of the priesthood, v. 18, 19. The Levitical priesthood brought nothing to perfection. But the priesthood of Christ brings along with it a better hope; it shows us the true foundation of all the hope we have towards God for pardon and salvation. By this hope we are encouraged to draw nigh unto God, to live a life of communion with him.

4. There is a change in God's way of acting in this priesthood. Christ was made a priest with the oath of God, v. 21.

5. There is a change in the dispensation of that covenant. The gospel dispensation is more full, free, and efficacious, than that of the law. He, as surety, has united the divine and human nature together in his own person, and therein given assurance of reconciliation; and he has, as surety, united God and man together in the bond of the everlasting covenant.

6. There is a remarkable change in the number of the priests. In that of Aaron there was a multitude of priests; but in this of Christ there is but one and the same. They were not suffered to continue by reason of death. Our high priest continues for ever, and his priesthood is an unchangeable one. There can be no vacancy in this priesthood, no hour nor moment in which the people are without a priest to negotiate their spiritual concerns in heaven. This ever-living high priest is able to save to the utmost all who come to God by him, v. 25.

7. There is a remarkable difference in the moral qualifications of the priests. He is such a high priest as became us, holy, harmless, and undefiled, &c., v. 26–28. Our case, as sinners, needed a high priest to make satisfaction and intercession for us. No priest could be suitable or sufficient for our reconciliation to God but one who was perfectly righteous. The Lord Jesus was exactly such a high priest as we wanted, for he has a personal holiness, absolutely perfect. He is holy. No sin dwells in him, though it does in the best of Christians. He is harmless, never did the least wrong to God or man. He is undefiled, though he took upon him the guilt of our sins, yet he never involved himself in the fact and fault of them. He is separate from sinners. Though he took a true human nature, yet the miraculous way in which it was conceived set him upon a separate footing from all the rest of mankind. He is made higher than the heavens, for he is exalted at the right hand of God, to perfect the design of his priesthood. The validity and prevalency of Christ's priesthood in v. 27 are placed in the impartiality and disinterestedness of it. He needed not to offer up for himself: it was a disinterested mediation; he mediated for that mercy for others which he did not need for himself.

CHAP. VIII

The priesthood of Christ. I. He sums up what he had already said, ver. 1, 2. II. He sets before them the necessary parts of the priestly office, ver. 3–5. And, III. Largely illustrates the excellency of the priesthood of Christ, ver. 6, to the end.

Verses 1–5

I. A summary recital of what had been said before concerning the excellency of Christ's priesthood, v. 1, 2. What we have in Christ; we have a high priest, and such a high priest as no other people ever had; all others were but types and shadows of this high priest. Where he now resides: He sits on the right hand of the throne of the Majesty on high. This is the reward of his humiliation. What is that sanctuary of which he is a minister, v. 2. There was an outer part, in which was the altar where they were to offer their sacrifices, which typified Christ dying; and there was an interior part within the veil, which typified Christ interceding for the people in heaven. Having finished the work of satisfaction in the true tabernacle of his own body, he is now a minister of the sanctuary, the holy of holies, the true tabernacle in heaven. He is not only in heaven enjoying great dominion and dignity, but as the high priest of his church.

II. The apostle sets before the Hebrews what it was that belonged to that office, v. 3, 4. It necessarily belongs to the priesthood of Christ that he should have somewhat to offer; and he had himself to offer, as the great atoning sacrifice. Christ must now execute his priesthood in heaven; having finished the work of sacrificing here, he must go into heaven, to present his righteousness and to make intercession there. If Christ were on earth, he would not be a priest (v. 4), that is, not according to the Levitical law. If he had still continued on earth, he could not have been a perfect priest; and an imperfect one he could not be.

The apostle illustrates and confirms the superior excellency of the priesthood of Christ. His ministry is more excellent, by how much he is the Mediator of a better covenant.

I. What is here said of the old covenant. 1. That it was made with the fathers of the Jewish nation at Mount Sinai (v. 9). 2. That this covenant was not found faultless (v. 7, 8). It was perfect in its kind, and fitted to answer its end, but very imperfect in comparison of the gospel. 3. That it was not sure or steadfast, v. 9. God will regard those who remain in his covenant, but will reject those who cast away his yoke from them. 4. That it is decayed, grown old, and vanisheth away, v. 13. It is antiquated, of no more use in gospel times than candles are when the sun has risen.

II. What is here said of the New Testament dispensation.

1. That it is a better covenant (v. 6). It is without fault, well ordered in all things. It requires nothing but what it promises grace to perform. All is put into a good and safe hand.

2. That it is established upon better promises. This covenant contains in it promises of assistance and acceptance in duty, promises of progress and perseverance in grace and holiness, of bliss and glory in heaven.

3. It is a new covenant. This will always be a new covenant, in which all who truly take hold of it shall be always found preserved by the power of God.

4. The articles of this covenant are sealed between God and his people by baptism and the Lord's supper.

(1) God articles with his people, v. 10. He once wrote his laws to them, now he will write his laws in them. Their souls shall be a table and transcript of the law of God.

(2) He articles with them to take them into a near and very honourable relation to himself. He will be to them a God. Nothing more can be said in a thousand volumes than is comprehended in these few words: I will be a God to them. They shall be to him a people, to love, honour, observe, and obey him in all things. This those must do and will do who have God for their God; this they shall do, for God will enable them to do it. It is God himself who first founds the relation, and then fills it up with grace suitable and sufficient, and helps them in their measure to fill it up with love and duty.

(3) He articles with them that they shall grow more and more acquainted with their God (v. 11). There shall not be so much need of one neighbour teaching another the knowledge of God. This private instruction shall not be so necessary under the New Testament as it was under the Old. There shall be a mighty increase and spreading of Christian knowledge in persons of all sorts, of each sex, and of all ages. O that this promise might be fulfilled in our days!

(4) God articles with them about the pardon of their sins (v. 12). The freeness of this pardon. It does not result from merit in man, but from mercy in God. The fulness of this pardon; it extends to all kinds of sin. The fixedness of this pardon. It is so final and so fixed that God will remember their sins no more; he will not recall his pardon. It is the effect of that mercy that is from everlasting, and the earnest of that mercy that shall be to everlasting. Therefore we have great reason to rejoice that the former dispensation is antiquated and has vanished away.

CHAP. IX

The Old Testament was never intended to be rested in, but to prepare for the institutions of the gospel. And here he treats, I. Of the tabernacle, the place of worship, ver. 1–5. II. Of the worship and services performed in the tabernacle, ver. 6–7. III. Of the spiritual sense and the main design of all, ver. 8, to the end.

Verses 1–7

I. The apostle gives an account of the tabernacle. It was divided into two parts, called a first and a second tabernacle, an inner and an outer part. We are also told what was placed in each part of the tabernacle.

1. In the outer part. (1) The candlestick; doubtless not an empty and unlighted one, but where the lamps were always burning. And there was need of it, for there were no windows in the sanctuary. Their light was only candle-light, in comparison of the fulness of light which Christ, the Sun of righteousness, would bring along with him. (2) The table and the show-bread set upon it. This table was set directly opposite to the candlestick. We must not come in the dark to his table, but by light from Christ must discern the Lord's body. He is the bread of life; in our Father's house there is bread enough and to spare; we may have fresh supplies from Christ, especially every Lord's day.

2. We have an account of what was in the inner part of the sanctuary, which was within the second veil, and is called the holiest of all. Now in this part were, (1) The golden censer, which was to hold the incense, or the golden altar set up to burn the incense upon. (2) The ark of the covenant overlaid round about with pure gold, v. 4. Now here we are told both what was in this ark and what was over it. [1] What was in it. First, The golden pot that had manna. This was a memorial of God's miraculously feeding his people in the wilderness, that they might never forget such signal favour, nor distrust God for the time to come. Secondly, Aaron's rod that budded. This was that rod of God with which Moses and Aaron wrought such wonders; and this was a type of Christ, by whom God has wrought wonders for his people. Thirdly, The tables of the covenant, in which the moral law was written, signifying the regard God has to the preservation of his holy law, and the care we all ought to have that we keep the law of God. [2] What was over the ark (v. 5). The mercy-seat, which was the covering of the ark. It was of pure gold, as long and as broad as the ark in which the tables of the law were laid. It was an eminent type of Christ, and of his perfect righteousness, ever adequate to the dimensions of the law of God, and covering all our transgressions. The cherubim of glory shadowing the mercy-seat, represented the holy angels of God.

II. The apostle proceeds to speak of the duties and services performed in those places, v. 6.

1. The ordinary priests went always into the first tabernacle, to accomplish the service of God. None but priests were to enter into the first part of the tabernacle. The ordinary priests were only to enter into the first part of the tabernacle, it would have been fatal presumption in them to have gone into the holiest of all.

2. Into the second, the interior part, went the high priest alone, v. 7. None but the high priest must go into the holiest; so none but Christ could enter into heaven by his own right, and by his own merits. The high priest must not enter without blood. None of us can enter either into God's gracious presence here or his glorious presence hereafter, but by the blood of Jesus. The high priest offered up that blood for himself and his own errors first, and then for the errors of the people, v. 7. Christ is a more excellent person and high priest than any under the law, for he has no errors of his own to offer for. Ministers, when in the name of Christ they intercede for others, must first apply the blood of Christ to themselves for their pardon. When the legal high priest had offered for himself, he must not stop there, but must also offer for the errors of the people. Our high priest forgets not to offer for his people; he pleads the merit of his sufferings for the benefit of his people on earth.

Verses 8–14

The apostle undertakes to deliver to us the mind and meaning of the Holy Ghost in all the ordinances of the tabernacle.

I. The way into the holiest of all was not yet made manifest, v. 8. There was not that free access to God then that there is now; God has now opened a wider door.

II. The first tabernacle was only a figure for the time then present, v. 9.

III. None of the gifts and sacrifices there offered could make the offerers perfect as pertaining to conscience (v. 9); they could not deliver conscience from a dread of the wrath of God. He might thereby be saved from temporal punishments, but he could not be saved by them from sin.

IV. The Old Testament institutions were but imposed upon them until the time of reformation, v. 10. These were never designed for a perpetuity, but only till the better things provided for them were actually bestowed upon them. We have far greater advantages under the gospel than they had under the law; and either we must be better or we shall be worse.

V. As he writes to those who believed that Jesus was the Christ, so he very justly infers that he is infinitely above all legal high priests (v. 11, 12).

1. Christ is a high priest of good things to come. The Old Testament set forth in shadows what was to come; the New Testament is the accomplishment of the Old. All the good things yet to come, when the promises shall be accomplished; all these depend upon Christ and his priesthood, and shall be fulfilled; all the good things to come in the heavenly state, which will perfect both the Testaments; as the state of glory will perfect the state of grace.

2. Christ is a high priest by a greater and more perfect tabernacle (v. 11), his own body, or rather human nature, conceived by the Holy Ghost overshadowing the blessed virgin. This was a new fabric, a new order of building.

3. Christ, our high priest, has entered into heaven, not as their high priest entered into the holiest, with the blood of bulls and of goats, but by his own blood.

4. Our high priest entered into heaven once for all, and has obtained eternal redemption.

5. The Holy Ghost showed what was the efficacy of the blood of the Old Testament sacrifices. The efficacy of the blood of the legal sacrifices extended to the purifying of the flesh (v. 13): from ceremonial uncleanness. The far greater efficacy of the blood of Christ (v. 14). What it was that gave such efficacy to the blood of Christ. It was his offering himself to God. It was Christ's offering up himself to God through the eternal Spirit. It was Christ's offering himself to God without spot, without any sinful stain. What the efficacy of Christ's blood is. It is sufficient to purge the conscience from dead works, it reaches to the very soul and conscience. It is sufficient to enable us to serve the living God by sanctifying and renewing the soul through the gracious influences of the Holy Spirit.

I. The gospel is here considered as a testament. A covenant is an agreement between two or more parties about things that are in their own power; this agreement takes effect at such time and in such manner as therein declared. A testament is a voluntary act and deed of a single person, bestowing legacies on such legatees as are described by the testator, and which can only take effect upon his death. Christ is the Mediator of a New Testament (v. 15), to redeem persons from their transgressions committed against the law or first testament; to qualify all those that are effectually called to receive the promise of an eternal inheritance.

II. To make this New Testament effectual, it was necessary that Christ should die. This he proves by two arguments: 1. From the general nature of every will or testamentary disposition, v. 16. No estate, no right, is conveyed by will, till the testator's death has made it effectual. 2. From the particular method that was taken by Moses in the ratification of the first testament, which was not done without blood, v. 18, 19, &c. God accepted the blood of bulls and goats; and by these means the covenant of grace was ratified under the former dispensation. Moses spoke every precept to all the people, according to the law, v. 19. Then he took the blood of calves and of goats, with water, and scarlet wool, and hyssop, and applied this blood by sprinkling it. With these Moses sprinkled, (1) The book of the law and covenant. (2) The people. The blood of Christ will be no advantage to us if it be not applied to us. Moses at the same time used these words, This is the blood of the testament which God hath enjoined unto you. (3) The tabernacle and all the utensils of it. All the sacrifices offered up and services performed there were accepted only through the blood of Christ.

Verses 23–29

I. The necessity of purifying the patterns of the things in heaven, v. 23. The sanctuary of God on earth is a pattern of heaven, and communion with God in his sanctuary is to his people a heaven upon earth.

II. The things themselves are better than the patterns, and must therefore be consecrated with better sacrifices. These heavenly things are the privileges of the gospel state, begun in grace, perfected in glory. Now it is very evident that the sacrifice of Christ is infinitely better than those of the law, 1. From the places in which the sacrifices were offered. Those under the law were the holy places made with hands, v. 24. Christ's sacrifice was by himself carried up into heaven, for he appears in the presence of God for us. 2. From the sacrifices themselves, v. 26. Those under the law were the lives and blood of other creatures. The sacrifice of Christ was the oblation of himself; he offered his own blood, and it was of infinite value. 3. From the frequent repetition of the legal sacrifices. This showed the imperfection of that law; but it is the perfection of Christ's sacrifice, that being once offered, it was sufficient to all the ends of it. But now once in the end of the world hath he appeared, to put away sin by the sacrifice of himself. 4. From the inefficacy of the legal sacrifices, and the efficacy of Christ's sacrifice. The legal sacrifices could not of themselves put away sin. Jesus Christ by one sacrifice has made an end of sin.

III. The apostle illustrates the argument from the appointment of God concerning men (v. 27, 28).

1. The appointment of God concerning men contains in it two things. They must once die. This is matter of comfort to the godly, that they shall die well and die but once; but it is matter of terror to the wicked, who die in their sin. After death they shall come to judgment. This is the unalterable decree of God concerning men—they must die, and they must be judged.

2. The appointment of God concerning Christ. He must be once offered to bear the sins of many. He was not offered for any sin of his own; he was wounded for our transgressions. Christ shall appear the second time without sin, to the salvation of those who look for him. He appeared in the form of sinful flesh; but his second appearance will be without any such charge upon him. This will be to the salvation of all who look for him; he will then perfect their holiness, their happiness.

CHAP. X

The apostle proceeds in this chapter, I. To lay low the whole of that priesthood and sacrifice, ver. 1–6. II. He raises and exalts the priesthood of Christ very high, ver. 7–18. III. He shows to believers the honours of their state, and calls them to suitable duties, ver. 19, to the end.

Verses 1–6

Here the apostle sets himself to lay low the Levitical dispensation.

I. The law had but a shadow, of good things to come. These good things were to come, not clearly discovered. The Jews then had but the shadow of the good things of Christ; we under the gospel have the substance.

II. The law was not the very image of the good things to come, but was only a shadow. The law was a very rough draught of the great design of divine grace, and therefore not to be so much doted on.

III. The legal sacrifices, being offered year by year, could never make the comers thereunto perfect, v. 1, 2. Under the gospel, the atonement is perfect, and the sinner, once pardoned, is ever pardoned as to his state, and only needs to renew his repentance and faith.

IV. As the legal sacrifices did not of themselves take away sin, so it was impossible they should, v. 4. The atoning sacrifice must be one capable of consenting, and must voluntarily substitute himself in the sinner's stead: Christ did so.

V. There was a time fixed and foretold by the great God, and that time had now come, when these legal sacrifices would be no longer accepted by him nor useful to men. This time of the repeal of the Levitical laws was foretold by David (Ps. xl. 6, 7).

Verses 7–18

He recommends Christ to them as the true high priest, the true atoning sacrifice. This he illustrates,

I. From the purpose and promise of God concerning Christ, which are frequently recorded in the volume of the book of God, v. 7.

II. From what God had done in preparing a body for Christ (that is, a human nature), that he might be qualified to be our Redeemer and Advocate.

III. From the readiness and willingness that Christ discovered to engage in this work, when no other sacrifice would be accepted, v. 7–9. Christ voluntarily came into it: "Lo, I come! I delight to do thy will, O God!" This should endear Christ and our Bibles to us, that in Christ we have the fulfilling of the scriptures.

IV. From the errand and design upon which Christ came. Christ came to do the will of God in two instances. 1. In taking away the first priesthood, which God had no pleasure in. 2. In establishing the second, his own priesthood and the everlasting gospel. This is the great design upon which the heart of God was set from all eternity. And it is not more agreeable to the will of God than it is advantageous to the souls of men.

V. From the perfect efficacy of the priesthood of Christ (v. 14). This is what the Levitical priesthood could never do; and, if we indeed are aiming at a perfect state, we must receive the Lord Jesus as the only high priest that can bring us to that state.

VI. From the place to which our Lord Jesus is now exalted, v. 12, 13. 1. To what honour Christ is exalted—to the right hand of God, the seat of power, the giving hand; the receiving hand; the working hand; this is the highest post of honour. 2. How Christ came to this honour—as a reward due to his sufferings. He will never quit it, nor cease to employ it for his people's good. This is his rest for ever. He has further expectations, which shall not be disappointed. One would think such a person as Christ could have no enemies except in hell; but it is certain that he has enemies on earth. Let not Christians then wonder that they have enemies. But Christ's enemies shall be made his footstool; this he is expecting. When his enemies shall be subdued, their enemies shall be subdued also.

VII. The apostle recommends Christ from the witness the Holy Ghost has given in the scriptures concerning him (v. 15): Whereof the Holy Ghost is a witness. The passage is cited from Jer. xxxi. 31. God promises that he will pour out his Spirit upon his people; he will put his laws in their hearts, and write them in their minds, v. 16. Their sins and iniquities he will remember no more (v. 17), which will alone show the sufficiency of Christ's satisfaction, that it needs not be repeated, v. 18. This was much more than the Levitical priesthood and sacrifices could effect.

I. Here the apostle sets forth the dignities of the gospel state. The privileges are, 1. Boldness to enter into the holiest. They have access to God till they are prepared to enter into his glorious presence in heaven. 2. A high priest over the house of God, even this blessed Jesus. God is willing to dwell with men on earth, and to have them dwell with him in heaven; but fallen man cannot dwell with God without a high priest.

II. The way and means by which Christians enjoy such privileges—by the blood of Jesus. The apostle enters further into the particulars of it, v. 20. 1. It is the only way. 2. It is a new way. It is a way that will always be effectual. 3. It is a living way. This way we may come to God, and live. It is by a living Saviour who, though he was dead is alive; and it is a way that gives life and lively hope to those who enter into it. 4. It is a way that Christ has consecrated for us through the veil, that is, his flesh. Our way to heaven is by a crucified Saviour; his death is to us the way of life.

III. The duties binding upon them on account of these privileges, v. 22, 23, &c.

1. They must draw near to God, and that in a right manner. They must draw near in conformity to God, and communion with him, still endeavouring to get nearer and nearer, till they come to dwell in his presence. (1) With a true heart. God is the searcher of hearts, and he requires truth in the inward parts. (2) In full assurance of faith. We should lay aside all sinful distrust. Without faith it is impossible to please God. (3) Having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience. They may be cleansed from guilt, and whatever evils the consciences of men are subject to by reason of sin. (4) Our bodies washed with pure water, that is, with the water of baptism, or with the sanctifying virtue of the Holy Spirit, cleansing from the filthiness of the flesh as well as of the spirit.

2. The apostle exhorts believers to hold fast the profession of their faith, v. 23. (1) The duty itself—to hold fast the profession of our faith. Our spiritual enemies will do what they can to wrest our faith, and hope, out of our hands, but we must hold fast. (2) The manner in which we must do this—without wavering. Those who begin to waver are in danger of falling away. (3) The motive or reason enforcing this duty: He is faithful that hath promised. There is no fickleness with him, and there should be none with us. We must depend more upon his promises to us than upon our promises to him.

IV. We have the means prescribed for promoting our fidelity and perseverance, v. 24, 25, &c. 1. We should consider one another, to provoke to love and to good works. Christians ought to have a tender consideration and concern for one another. A good example given to others is the best and most effectual provocation to love and good works. 2. Not to forsake the assembling of ourselves together, v 25. Even in those times there were some who forsook these assemblies. The communion of saints is a great help and privilege, and a good means of steadiness and perseverance. 3. To exhort one another, to watch over one another, and be jealous of ourselves and one another with a godly jealousy. This, would be the best friendship. 4. We should observe the approaching of times of trial. Christians ought to observe the signs of the times, such as God has foretold. There is a trying day coming on us all, the day of our death, and we should observe all the signs of its approaching, and improve them to greater watchfulness and diligence in duty.

V. The apostle proceeds to enforce his exhortations (v. 26, 27, &c.).

1. From the description he gives of the sin of apostasy. It is sinning wilfully after we have received the knowledge of the truth. The sin here mentioned is a total and final apostasy, when men reject Christ, the only Saviour, and renounce the gospel, the only way of salvation, and the words of eternal life, after they have professed the Christian religion.

2. From the dreadful doom of such apostates. (1) There remains no more sacrifice for such sins, no other Christ to come to save such sinners. Those under the gospel who will not accept of Christ, that they may be saved by him, have no other refuge left them. (2) There remains for them only a certain fearful looking for of judgment, v. 27. God gives some notorious sinners, while on earth, a fearful foreboding in their own consciences, with a despair of ever being able either to endure or escape it.

3. From the methods of divine justice with those who despised Moses's law. These, when convicted by two or three witnesses, were put to death; they died without mercy. Hence the apostle infers the heavy doom that will fall upon those that apostatize from Christ. They have trodden under foot the Son of God. What punishment can be too great for such men? They have counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith he was sanctified, an unholy thing. Men who have seemed before to have the blood of Christ in high esteem may come to account it an unholy thing. Those have done despite unto the Spirit of grace. They have grieved, resisted, yea, done despite to him, which is the highest act of wickedness, and makes the case of the sinner desperate, refusing to have the gospel salvation applied to him.

4. From the description we have of the nature of God's vindictive justice, v. 30. The terrors of the Lord are known both by revelation and reason. The other quotation is from Deut. xxxii. 36, The Lord will judge his people; he will search and try his visible church, and will punish the sinners in Zion with the greatest severity. Now those who know him who hath said, Vengeance belongeth to me, I will recompense, must needs conclude, as the apostle does (v. 31). Those who know the joy that results from the favour of God can thereby judge of the power and dread of his vindictive wrath.

5. He presses them to perseverance by putting them in mind of their former sufferings for Christ. When they had suffered: In former days, after they were illuminated. A natural state is a dark state, and those who continue in that state meet with no disturbance from Satan and the world; but a state of grace is a state of light, and therefore the powers of darkness will violently oppose it. What they suffered: they endured a great fight of afflictions. They were afflicted in themselves. In their own persons. In their names and reputations (v. 33), by many reproaches. Christians ought to value their reputation, because the reputation of religion is concerned: this makes reproach a great affliction. They were afflicted in the afflictions of their brethren. The Christian spirit is a sympathizing spirit, not a selfish spirit, but a compassionate spirit. Christians are one body, the children of that God who is afflicted in all the afflictions of his people. If one member of the body suffers, all the rest suffer with it. The apostle takes particular notice how they had sympathized with him (v. 34). How they had suffered. They took their sufferings patiently, and not only so, but joyfully received it from God, that they should be thought worthy to suffer reproach for the name of Christ. What it was that enabled them thus to bear up under their sufferings. They knew in themselves that they had in heaven a better and a more enduring substance. The happiness of the saints in heaven is substance. All things here are but shadows. It is a better substance than any thing they can have or lose here. It will out-live time and run parallel with eternity. In heaven they shall have everything better. Christians should know this in themselves. The assured knowledge of this will help them to endure any fight of afflictions they may be encountered with in this world.

6. He presses them to persevere (v. 35). He exhorts them not to cast away their confidence, but to hold fast that profession for which they had suffered so much. The reward of their holy confidence would be very great. It carries a present reward in it, in holy peace and joy, and it shall have a great recompence of reward hereafter. He shows them how necessary a grace the grace of patience is in our present state (v. 36). They must first do the will of God before they receive the promise; and, after they have done the will of God, they have need of patience to wait for the time when the promise shall be fulfilled. We must be God's waiting servants when we can be no longer his working servants. To help their patience, he assures them of the near approach of Christ's coming (v. 37). There is an appointed time and beyond that time he will not tarry.

7. He presses them to perseverance, by telling them that this will be their happiness, whereas apostasy is the reproach, and will be the ruin, of all who are guilty of it (v. 38, 39). It is the honourable character of just men that in times of the greatest affliction they can live by faith. Faith puts life and vigour into them. They can trust God, and live upon him. As their faith maintains their spiritual life now, it shall be crowned with eternal life hereafter. Apostasy is the mark of those in whom God takes no pleasure; and it is a cause of God's severe displeasure and anger. The apostle concludes with declaring his good hope concerning himself and these Hebrews (v. 39). Professors may go a great way, and after all draw back; and this drawing back from God is drawing on to perdition: the further we depart from God the nearer we approach to ruin. Those who have been kept faithful in great trials for the time past have reason to hope that the same grace will be sufficient to help them still to live by faith. If we live by faith, and die in faith, our souls will be safe for ever.

CHAP. XI

The nature and fruits of this excellent grace. I. The nature of it, ver. 1–3. II. The great examples we have in the Old Testament of those who lived by faith, ver. 4–38. III. The advantages that we have in the gospel for the exercise of this grace, above what those had who lived in the times of the Old Testament, ver. 39, 40.

Verses 1–3

I. A definition of the grace of faith in two parts. It is the substance of things hoped for. Faith and hope go together; and the same things that are the object of our hope are the object of our faith. It is a firm persuasion and expectation that God will perform all that he has promised to us in Christ. Believers in the exercise of faith are filled with joy unspeakable and full of glory. It is the evidence of things not seen. Faith demonstrates to the eye of the mind the reality of those things that cannot be discerned by the eye of the body. It is designed to serve the believer instead of sight, and to be to the soul all that the senses are to the body.

II. An account of the honour it reflects upon all those who have lived in the exercise of it (v. 2). True faith is an old grace, and has the best plea to antiquity: it is not a new invention, a modern fancy. The eldest and best men that ever were in the world were believers. They were an honour to their faith, and their faith was an honour to them. It put them upon doing the things that were of good report.

III. We have here one of the first articles of faith, the creation of the worlds by the word of God, not out of pre-existent matter, but out of nothing, v. 3. The grace of faith has a retrospect as well as prospect; it looks not only forward to the end of the world, but back to the beginning of the world. Now what does faith give us to understand concerning the worlds. 1. That these worlds were not eternal, nor did they produce themselves, but they were made by another. 2. That the maker of the worlds is God. 3. That God made the world by his word and by his active will. 4. That the world was thus framed out of nothing. These things we understand by faith.

Verses 4–31

The apostle now proceeds to set before us some illustrious examples of it in the Old Testament times, and these may be divided into two classes: 1. Those whose names are mentioned, and the particular actings of whose faith are specified. 2. Those whose names are barely mentioned, and an account given in general of the exploits of their faith.

I. The leading instance and example of faith here recorded is that of Abel. It begins with Abel, one who lived by faith, and died for it, and therefore a fit pattern for the Hebrews to imitate.

1. He offered up a more acceptable sacrifice than Cain. After the fall, God opened a new way for the children of men to return to him in religious worship. After the fall, God must be worshipped by sacrifices. Cain was the elder brother, but Abel has the preference. It is not seniority of birth, but grace, that makes men truly honourable. Abel brought a sacrifice of atonement, brought of the firstlings of the flock. Cain brought only a sacrifice of acknowledgment, a mere thank-offering, the fruit of the ground.

2. What Abel gained by his faith. In this place we are told that he obtained by his faith some special advantages: Witness that he was righteous. God gave witness to the righteousness of his person, by testifying his acceptance of his gifts. By it he, being dead, yet speaketh. He had the honour to leave behind him an instructive speaking case; and what does it speak to us? That fallen man has leave to go in to worship God, with hope of acceptance. That God will not suffer the injuries done to his people to remain unpunished, nor their sufferings unrewarded.

II. The faith of Enoch, v. 5.

1. What is here reported of him. (1) He walked with God. (2) He was translated, that he should not see death, nor any part of him be found upon earth. (3) Before his translation he had this testimony, that he pleased God. He had the evidence of it in his own conscience, and the Spirit of God witnessed with his spirit.

2. What is here said of his faith, v. 6. We cannot please God without such a faith as helps us to walk with God, an active faith. God is again to be found of us through Christ. God has prescribed means and ways wherein he may be found. Those who would find God must seek him diligently; and when once they have found him, they will never repent the pains they have spent in seeking after him.

III. The faith of Noah, v. 7.

1. The ground of Noah's faith—a warning he had received from God of things as yet not seen. God usually warns sinners before he strikes, and, where his warnings are slighted, the blow will fall the heavier.

2. The actings of Noah's faith, and the influence it had both upon his mind and practice. He was moved with fear. Faith first influences our affections, then our actions; and faith works upon those affections that are suitable to the matter revealed. If it be some good thing, faith stirs up love and desire; if some evil thing, faith stirs up fear. His faith influenced his practice. His fear moved him to prepare an ark. His faith set him to work in earnest.

3. The rewards of Noah's faith. (1) Hereby himself and his house were saved, when a whole world of sinners were perishing about them. (2) Hereby he judged and condemned the world; his holy fear condemned their vain confidence; his faith condemned their unbelief; his obedience condemned their contempt. Good examples will either convert sinners or condemn them. This is the best way the people of God can take to condemn the wicked; not by harsh and censorious language, but by a holy exemplary conversation. (3) Hereby he became an heir of the righteousness which is by faith. He was possessed of a true justifying righteousness; he was heir to it.

IV. The faith of Abraham, the friend of God, and father of the faithful, in whom the Hebrews boasted. The apostle enlarges more upon the heroic achievements of Abraham's faith than of that of any other of the patriarchs; and in the midst of his account of the faith of Abraham he inserts the story of Sarah's faith.

1. The ground of Abraham's faith, the call and promise of God, v. 8. (1) This call was the call of God. This was an effectual call, by which he was converted from the idolatry of his father's house, Gen. xii. 1. The grace of God is absolutely free, in taking some of the worst of men. God must come to us before we come to him. This calls us not only to leave sin, but sinful company. (2) The promise of God. God promised Abraham that the place he was called to he should afterwards receive for an inheritance. God calls his people to an inheritance. This inheritance is not immediately possessed by them, but the promise is sure.

2. The exercise of Abraham's faith. He went out, not knowing whither he went. He put himself into the hand of God, to send him whithersoever he pleased. All that are effectually called resign up their own will and wisdom to the will and wisdom of God. Though they know not always their way, yet they know their guide. He sojourned in the land of promise as in a strange country. This was an exercise of his faith. Abraham lived in Canaan as a sojourner only. He dwelt in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, heirs with him of the same promise. The promise is made to believers and their children, and it is pleasant to see parents and children sojourning together in this world as heirs of the heavenly inheritance.

3. The supports of Abraham's faith (v. 10). It is a city that hath foundations, even the immutable purposes and almighty power of God. The due regard that Abraham had to this heavenly city: he looked for it. He waited for it, and in the mean time he conversed in it by faith. It was a support to him under all the trials of his sojourning state.

V. The faith of Sarah.

1. The difficulties of Sarah's faith. The prevalency of unbelief for a time: she laughed at the promise, as impossible to be made good. The great improbability of the thing promised, that she should be the mother of a child.

2. The actings of her faith. Her unbelief is pardoned and forgotten, but her faith prevailed and is recorded, v. 11.

3. The rewards of her faith. She received strength to conceive seed. He can make the barren soul fruitful, as well as the barren womb. She was delivered of a child, a child of the promise. From them, by this son, sprang a numerous progeny of illustrious persons, as the stars of the sky (v. 12).

VI. The faith of the other patriarchs, v. 13.

1. The trial of their faith. They had not received the promises. One imperfection of the present state of the saints on earth is that their happiness lies more in promise than in actual enjoyment and possession.

2. The actings of their faith. Though they had not received the promises, yet,

(1) They saw them afar off. Faith has a clear and a strong eye, and can see promised mercies at a great distance.

(2) They were persuaded of them, that they were true and should be fulfilled.

(3) They embraced them. Faith has a long arm, and can lay hold of blessings at a great distance.

(4) They confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on earth. They are strangers as saints, whose home is heaven; they are pilgrims as they are travelling towards their home.

(5) Hereby they declared plainly that they sought another country (v. 14), heaven.

(6) They gave full proof of their sincerity. They were not mindful of that country whence they came, v. 15. Those that are once savingly called out of a sinful state have no mind to return into it again; they now know better things. They did not take the opportunity that offered itself for their return. But they steadfastly adhered to God. We must show the truth of our faith and profession by a steady adherence to him. Their sincerity appeared not only in not returning to their former country, but in desiring a better country, that is, a heavenly. All true believers desire this better country. The stronger faith is the more fervent those desires will be.

(7) They died in the faith of those promises, v. 13. That faith held out to the last.

3. The gracious reward of their faith, v. 16. He is called their God. He calls himself so; he gives them leave to call him so. God is not ashamed to be called their God: such is his love to them. Let them take care that they be not a shame and reproach to their God, and so provoke him to be ashamed of them. As the proof of this, God has prepared for them a city, a happiness suitable to the relation into which he has taken them. If God neither could nor would give his people anything better than this world affords, he would be ashamed to be called their God.

VII. Now after the apostle has given this account of the faith of others, with Abraham, he returns to him again, and gives us an instance of the greatest trial and act of faith that stands upon record. This was his offering up Isaac, v. 17.

1. The trial of Abraham's faith. God had before this tempted or tried the faith of Abraham. But this trial was greater than all; he was commanded to offer up his son Isaac. "Take thy son, thy only son by Sarah, Isaac thy laughter, the child of thy joy and delight; take him away to the land of Moriah; do not only leave him there, but offer him for a burnt-offering." Some things that very much added to the greatness of this trial. He was put upon it after he had received the promises (v. 18). In being called to offer up his Isaac, he seemed to be called to cut off his own family, to cancel the promises of God. This Isaac was his only-begotten son by his wife Sarah, the only one he was to have by her, and the only one that was to be the child and heir of the promise. Besides his most tender affection to this his son, all his expectations were bound up in him, and, if he perished, must perish with him. To have this son offered up as a sacrifice, and that by his own hand; it was a trial that would have overset the firmest and the strongest mind.

2. The actings of Abraham's faith in so great a trial: he obeyed. He went as far in it as to the very critical moment, and would have gone through with it if God had not prevented him.

3. The supports of his faith, v. 19. He knew that God was able to raise him from the dead, and he believed that God would do so. God is able to raise the dead, to raise dead bodies, and to raise dead souls.

4. The reward of his faith in this great trial (v. 19). He received his son. He had parted with him to God, and God gave him back again. He received him from the dead, for he gave him up for dead.

VIII. The faith of Isaac, v. 20.

1. The actings of his faith: He blessed Jacob and Esau concerning things to come. Both Jacob and Esau were blessed as Isaac's children. Jacob had the precedency and the principal blessing. If one has his portion in this world, and the other in the better world, it is God who makes the difference; for even the comforts of this life are more and better than any of the children of men deserve.

2. The difficulties Isaac's faith struggled with. He seemed to have forgotten how God had determined the matter at the birth of these his sons, Gen. xxv. 23. When he came to pronounce the blessing, he trembled very exceedingly (Gen. xxvii. 33); and he charged Jacob that he had subtly taken away Esau's blessing. But, notwithstanding all this, Isaac's faith recovered itself, and he ratified the blessing: I have blessed him, yea, and he shall be blessed. Now, the faith of Isaac thus prevailing over his unbelief, it has pleased the God of Isaac to pass by the weakness of his faith, to commend the sincerity of it.

IX. The faith of Jacob (v. 21). There were a great many instances of the faith of Jacob; his life was a life of faith.

1. The actings of his faith.

(1) He blessed both the sons of Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh. He made them both heads of different tribes, as if they had been his own immediate sons. As Isaac did before, so now Jacob prefers the younger, Ephraim; though Joseph had placed them so that the right hand of his father should be laid on Manasseh, the elder.

(2) He worshipped, leaning on his staff; he praised God for what he had done for him, and for the prospect he had of approaching blessedness. He was not able to support himself, so far as to sit up in his bed without a staff, and yet he would not make this an excuse for neglecting the worshipping of God; he would do it as well as he could with his body, as well as with his spirit.

2. When Jacob thus acted his faith: when he was dying. He lived by faith, and he died by faith and in faith.

X. The faith of Joseph, v. 22.

1. What he did by his faith. He made mention by faith of the departing of the children of Israel, that the time should come when they should be delivered out of Egypt. Though he should not live to see their deliverance, yet he could die in the faith of it. He gave commandment concerning his bones, that they should preserve them unburied in Egypt. Though he had lived and died in Egypt, yet he did not live and die an Egyptian, but an Israelite. He preferred a significant burial in Canaan before a magnificent one in Egypt.

2. When the faith of Joseph acted after this manner: when he was dying. God often gives his people living comforts in dying moments.

XI. The faith of the parents of Moses. 1. The acting of their faith: they hid this their son three months. Moses was persecuted betimes, and forced to be concealed; in this he was a type of Christ, who was persecuted almost as soon as he was born, and his parents were obliged to flee with him into Egypt for his preservation. 2. The reasons of their thus acting. No doubt, natural affection could not but move them; but there was something further. They saw he was a proper child. There appeared in him something uncommon; the beauty of the Lord sat upon him. Sometimes, not always, the countenance is the index of the mind. 3. The prevalency of their faith over their fear. They were not afraid of the king's commandment. They believed that God would preserve his people, and that the time was coming when it would be worth while for an Israelite to live. Some must hazard their own lives to preserve their children, and they were resolved to do it. Faith is a great preservative against the sinful slavish fear of men.

XII. The faith of Moses himself (v. 24, 25, &c.).

1. An instance of his faith in conquering the world.

(1) He refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, whose foundling he was, and her fondling too. How glorious was the triumph of his faith. He refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter lest he should undervalue the truer honour of being a son of Abraham, the father of the faithful; lest it should look like renouncing his religion as well as his relation to Israel; and no doubt both these he must have done if he had accepted this honour.

(2) He was willing to take his lot with the people of God here, though it was a suffering lot, that he might have his portion with them hereafter (v. 25). Herein he acted rationally as well as religiously. The pleasures of sin must end in speedy repentance or in speedy ruin. The pleasures of this world, and especially those of a court, are too often the pleasures of sin. A true believer will despise them. Suffering is to be chosen rather than sin, there being more evil in the least sin than there can be in the greatest suffering.

(3) See how Moses weighed matters: in one scale he put the worst of religion—the reproaches of Christ, in the other scale the best of the world—the treasures of Egypt (v. 26). The worst of religion weighed down the best of the world. The reproaches of the church of God are the reproaches of Christ. God's people are, and always have been, a reproached people. Christ accounts himself reproached in their reproaches and, while he thus interests himself in their reproaches, they become riches. Faith discerns this, and acts accordingly.

2. The circumstance of time is taken notice of, when Moses by his faith gained this victory (v. 24); not only in years of discretion, but of experience, to the age of forty years. He made this choice when he had grown ripe for judgment and enjoyment, able to know what he did and why he did it. It was not the act of a child, but it proceeded from mature deliberation. It is an excellent thing for persons to despise the world when they are most capable of relishing and enjoying it.

3. What it was that supported and strengthened the faith of Moses: He had respect unto the recompence of reward. Believers may and ought to have respect to this recompence of reward. It will prove a land-mark to direct their course, a load-stone to draw their hearts, and a cordial to refresh them.

4. We have another instance of the faith of Moses, v. 27. (1) The product of his faith: He forsook Egypt. Twice Moses forsook Egypt: As a supposed criminal, when the king's wrath was incensed against him for killing the Egyptian. As a commander after God had employed him to humble Pharaoh and make him willing to let Israel go. (2) The prevalency of his faith. It raised him above the fear of the king's wrath. Those who forsook Egypt must expect the wrath of men; but they need not fear it. (3) The principle upon which his faith acted in these his motions: He endured, as seeing him that was invisible. By faith we may see this invisible God. We may be fully assured of his existence, and of his gracious and powerful presence with us. Such a sight of God will enable believers to endure to the end.

5. We have yet another instance of the faith of Moses, v. 28. The passover was one of the most solemn institutions of the Old Testament, and a very significant type of Christ. To entitle them to this distinguishing favour, a lamb must be slain; the blood of it must be sprinkled with a bunch of hyssop upon the lintel of the door, and on the two side-posts. Christ is that Lamb, he is our Passover, he was sacrificed for us. His blood must be sprinkled; it must be applied to those who have the saving benefit of it. It is not owing to our inherent righteousness that we are saved from the wrath of God, but to the blood of Christ and his imputed righteousness. Wherever this blood is applied, the soul receives Christ by faith, and lives upon him. All our spiritual privileges on earth should quicken us to set out early, and get forward, in our way to heaven.

XIII. The Israelites passing through the Red Sea under the conduct of Moses their leader, v. 29.

1. The safe passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea, when there was no other way to escape from Pharaoh and his host. Israel's danger was very great. Their deliverance was very glorious. The grace of faith will help us through all the dangers we meet with in our way to heaven.

2. The destruction of the Egyptians. Their rashness was great, and their ruin was grievous. When God judges, he will overcome; and it is plain that the destruction of sinners is of themselves.

XIV. The Israelites, under Joshua their leader, before the walls of Jericho. The story we have Joshua vi. 5, &c. The means prescribed of God to bring down the walls of Jericho. Here was a great trial of their faith. The method prescribed seemed very improbable to answer such an end. But this was the way God commanded them to take, and he loves to do great things by small and contemptible means, that his own arm may be made bare. The powerful success of the prescribed means. The walls of Jericho fell before them. God can in his own time cause all the powerful opposition that is made to his interest to fall down, and the grace of faith is mighty through God for the pulling down of strongholds. When he has some great thing to do for them, he raises up great and strong faith in them.

XV. The faith of Rahab, v. 31.

1. Who this Rahab was. She was a Canaanite, a stranger to the commonwealth of Israel, and had but little help for faith, and yet she was a believer. She was a harlot, and lived in a way of sin. Christ has saved the chief of sinners. Where sin has abounded, grace has superabounded.

2. What she did by her faith: She received the spies in peace. She not only bade them welcome, but she concealed them from their enemies, and she made a noble confession of her faith. True faith will show itself in good works, especially towards the people of God. Faith will venture all hazards in the cause of God and his people. A true believer is desirous, not only to be in covenant with God, but in communion with the people of God.

3. What she gained by her faith. She escaped perishing with those that believed not. It was an utter destruction that befell that city: man and beast were cut off. The signal preservation of Rahab. Joshua gave a strict charge that she should be spared, and none but she and hers. Singular faith, when the generality are not only unbelievers, but against believers, will be rewarded with singular favours.

Verses 32–40

The apostle now concludes his narrative with a more summary account of another set of believers. He prefaces this part of the narrative with an elegant expostulation: What shall I say more? Time would fail me. We should be pleased to think how great the number of believers was under the Old Testament, and how strong their faith. We should lament it, that now, when the rule of faith is more clear and perfect, the number of believers should be so small and their faith so weak.

I. The apostle mentions,

1. Gideon. He was an eminent instrument raised up of God to deliver his people from the oppression of the Midianites. God put the whole army of the Midianites to confusion and ruin.

2. Barak. He obtained a great victory by his faith over all the host of Sisera.

3. Samson. If Samson had not had a strong faith as well as a strong arm, he had never performed such exploits. True faith is acknowledged and accepted, even when mingled with many failings. The believer's faith endures to the end, and, in dying, gives him victory over death and all his deadly enemies; his greatest conquest he gains by dying.

4. Jephthah. As various and new enemies rise up against the people of God, various and new deliverers are raised up for them. The grace of God often finds out, and fastens upon, the most undeserving and ill-deserving persons, to do great things for them and by them. Jephthah was the son of a harlot. Faith will not only put men upon making their vows to God, but paying their vows after the mercy received; yea, though they have vowed to their own great grief, as in the case of Jephthah and his daughter.

5. David that great man after God's own heart. Few ever met with greater trials, and few ever discovered a more lively faith. The same faith made him a very successful and victorious prince, and, after a long life of virtue and honour (though not without some foul stains of sin), he died in faith, and he has left behind him such excellent memoirs of the trials and acts of faith in the book of Psalms as will ever be of great esteem and use.

6. Samuel, raised up to be a most eminent prophet of the Lord to Israel, as well as a ruler over them. God revealed himself to Samuel when he was but a child, and continued to do so till his death.

7. To Samuel he adds, and of the prophets, who were employed of God sometimes to denounce judgment, sometimes to promise mercy, always to reprove sin; sometimes to foretell remarkable events; and chiefly to give notice of the Messiah. A true faith was very requisite for the right discharge of such an office as this.

II. What things were done by their faith.

1. By faith they subdued kingdoms, v. 33. The interests and powers of kings and kingdoms are often set up in opposition to God and his people. God can easily subdue all those kings and kingdoms that set themselves to oppose him.

2. They wrought righteousness. They believed God, and it was imputed to them for righteousness. It is a greater happiness to work righteousness than to work miracles.

3. They obtained promises. It is by faith that we are prepared to wait for the promises, and in due time to receive them.

4. They stopped the mouths of lions. Faith engages the power of God for his people, whenever it shall be for his glory, to overcome brute beasts and brutish men.

5. They quenched the violence of the fire, v. 34. So did the three children, or rather mighty champions, Dan. iii. 17–27. Never was the grace of faith more severely tried, never more nobly exerted, nor ever more gloriously rewarded, than theirs was.

6. They escaped the edge of the sword. The swords of men are held in the hand of God. Faith takes hold of that hand of God which has hold of the swords of men; and God had often suffered himself to be prevailed upon by the faith of his people.

7. Out of weakness they were made strong. It is the same grace of faith that from spiritual weakness helps men to recover and renew their strength.

8. They grew valiant in fight. True faith gives truest courage and patience, as it discerns the strength of God, and thereby the weakness of all his enemies. And they were not only valiant, but successful. God, as a reward and encouragement of their faith, put to flight the armies of the aliens; God made them flee and fall before his faithful servants.

9. Women received their dead raised to life again, v. 35. Many of the weaker sex have been strong in faith. God has sometimes yielded so far to the tender affections of sorrowful women as to restore their dead children to life again.

III. The apostle tells us what these believers endured by faith. They were tortured, not accepting deliverance, v. 35. They bore the torture, and would not accept of deliverance. That which animated them thus to suffer was the hope they had of obtaining a better resurrection. They endured trials of cruel mockings and scourgings, and bonds and imprisonment, v. 36. They were persecuted in their reputation by mockings, which are cruel to an ingenuous mind; in their persons by scourging, the punishment of slaves; in their liberty by bonds and imprisonment. They were put to death in the most cruel manner. Their enemies clothed death in all the array of cruelty and terror, and yet they boldly met it and endured it. Those who escaped death were used so ill that death might seem more eligible than such a life. Their enemies spared them, only to prolong their misery, v. 37, 38. Such sufferings as these they endured then for their faith; and such they endured through the power of the grace of faith: and which shall we most admire, the wickedness of human nature, or the excellency of divine grace, that is able to bear up the faithful under such cruelties, and to carry them safely through all?

IV. What they obtained by their faith. 1. A most honourable commendation from God—that the world was not worthy of such men; the world did not deserve such blessings. The righteous are not worthy to live in the world, and God declares the world is not worthy of them. 2. They obtained a good report (v. 39) of all good men, add the truth itself. 3. They had a title to the promises, though they received not the great things promised. They had shadows, but had not seen the substance; and yet, under this imperfect dispensation, they discovered this precious faith. This the apostle insists upon to render their faith more illustrious. He tells the Hebrews that God had provided some better things for them (v. 40), and therefore they might be assured that he expected at least as good things from them. Their faith should be much more perfect than the faith of the Old Testament saints; for their state and dispensation were more perfect than the former.

CHAP. XII

The apostle presses home the argument, I. From a greater example than he had yet mentioned, Christ himself, ver. 1–3. II. From the gentle nature of the afflictions they endured in their Christian course, ver. 4–17. III. From the conformity between the state of the gospel-church on earth and the triumphant church in heaven, ver. 18, to the end.

Verses 1–3

The great duty which the apostle urges upon the Hebrews. The duty consists of two parts.

I. Preparatory: Lay aside every weight, and the sin, &c. Every weight, that is, all inordinate affection and concern for the body, and the present life and world. The sin that doth so easily beset us; the sin that has the greatest advantage against us, by the circumstances we are in, our constitution, our company.

II. Perfective: Run with patience the race that is set before us.

1. Christians have a race to run.

2. This race is set before them; it is marked out unto them, both by the word of God and the examples of the faithful servants of God, that cloud of witnesses with which they are compassed about.

3. This race must be run with patience and perseverance. Faith and patience are the conquering graces, and therefore must be always cultivated.

4. Christians have a greater example to encourage them than any who have been mentioned before, v. 2.

(1) What our Lord Jesus is to his people: he is the author and finisher of their faith, not only the object, but the author. He is the great leader and precedent of our faith. He is the finisher of our faith. He is the finisher of grace, and of the work of faith with power in the souls of his people; and he is the judge and the rewarder of their faith.

(2) What trials Christ met with in his race and course. He endured the contradiction of sinners against himself (v. 3), yet he endured their evil manners with great patience. He endured all. He endured the cross—all those sufferings that he met with in the world; for he took up his cross betimes, and was at length nailed to it. Yet all this he endured with invincible patience and resolution. He despised the shame. All the reproaches that were cast upon him, both in his life and at his death, he despised.

(3) What it was that supported the human soul of Christ, the joy that was set before him. He rejoiced to see that by his sufferings he should make satisfaction to the injured justice of God, that he should make peace between God and man, that he should open a way of salvation.

(4) The reward of his suffering: he has sat down at the right hand of the throne of God. He ever lives to make intercession for his people.

(5) What is our duty. We must look unto him; we must set him continually before us as our example. We must consider him, meditate much upon him. We shall find that as his sufferings far exceeded ours, so his patience far excels ours.

(6) The advantage we shall reap by thus doing: it will be a means to prevent our weariness and fainting (v. 3). There is a proneness in the best to grow weary and to faint under their trials and afflictions. The best way to prevent this is to look unto Jesus. Faith and meditation will fetch in fresh supplies of strength, comfort, and courage.

Verses 4–17

I. The gentle and moderate measure of their sufferings, v. 4. He owns that they had suffered much; they had been striving to an agony against sin. He puts them in mind that they might have suffered more; for they had not yet resisted unto blood. Our Lord Jesus does not call his people out to the hardest trials at first, but wisely trains them up by less sufferings to be prepared for greater. The gentleness of Christ in accommodating their trials to their strength. They should not magnify their afflictions, but should take notice of the mercy that is mixed with them.

II. He argues from the nature of those sufferings. They are divine chastisements; their heavenly Father has his hand in all; of this he has given them due notice, and they should not forget it, v. 5.

1. Those afflictions which may be truly persecution as far as men are concerned in them are fatherly rebukes and chastisements as far as God is concerned in them. Men persecute them because they are religious; God chastises them because they are not more so.

2. God has directed his people how they ought to behave themselves under all their afflictions. They must not despise the chastening of the Lord. Those who make light of affliction make light of God and make light of sin. They must not faint when they are rebuked.

3. Afflictions, though they may be the fruits of God's displeasure, are yet proofs of his paternal love to his people and care for them (v. 6, 7). The best of God's children have their faults and follies, which need to be corrected. He will correct sin in his own children; they are of his family. In this he acts as becomes a father; no wise and good father will wink at faults in his own children as he would in others. To be suffered to go on in sin without a rebuke is a sad sign of alienation from God; such are bastards, not sons. They are the spurious offspring of another father, not of God, v. 7, 8.

4. Those that are impatient under the discipline of their heavenly father behave worse towards him than they would do towards earthly parents, v. 9, 10. It is the duty of children to give the reverence of submission to their correction when they have been disobedient. He recommends humble and submissive behaviour towards our heavenly Father, when under his correction. (1) Our earthly fathers are but the fathers of our flesh, but God is the Father of our spirits. Our fathers on earth were instrumental in the production of our bodies, which are but flesh. We must owe much more to him who is the Father of our spirits. (2) Our earthly parents chastened us for their own pleasure. Sometimes they did it to gratify their passion rather than to reform our manners. This is a weakness the fathers of our flesh are subject to. It should be for our profit. God loves his children so that he would have them to be as like himself as can be, and for this end he chastises them when they need it. (3) The fathers of our flesh corrected us for a few days, in our state of childhood, and when we came to maturity we loved and honoured them the more for it. Our whole life here is a state of childhood; when we come to a state of perfection we shall be fully reconciled to all the measures of God's discipline over us now. (4) God's correction is no condemnation. He does it to prevent the death and destruction of their souls, that they may live to God, and be like God, and be for ever with him.

5. The children of God ought not to judge of his dealings with them by present sense, but by reason, and faith, and experience, v. 11.

(1) The judgment of sense. Afflictions are not grateful to the sense, but grievous.

(2) The judgment of faith. Affliction produces peace, by producing more righteousness; for the fruit of righteousness is peace. Their great concern is that the chastening they are under may be endured by them with patience, and improved to a greater degree of holiness. [1] That their affliction may be endured with patience, v. 12. A burden of affliction is apt to make the Christian's hands hang down, and his knees grow feeble, to dispirit him and discourage him; but this he must strive against; that he may the better run his spiritual race. Faith, and patience, and holy courage and resolution, will make him walk more steadily. He must encourage and not dispirit others. There are many that are in the way to heaven who yet walk but weakly and lamely in it. Such are apt to discourage one another; but it is their duty to help one another forward in the way to heaven. [2] That their affliction may be improved to a greater degree of holiness, v. 14. Faith and patience will enable them to follow peace and holiness too. Sufferings are apt to sour the spirit and sharpen the passions; but the children of God must follow peace with all men. Peace and holiness are connected together. This true Christian peaceableness is never found separate from holiness. Without holiness no man shall see the Lord.

6. Where afflictions and sufferings for the sake of Christ are not considered by men as the chastisement of their heavenly Father, they will be a dangerous temptation to apostasy (v. 15, 16).

(1) A serious caveat against apostasy.

[1] The nature of apostasy. It is failing of the grace of God, coming short of a principle of true grace in the soul, and so coming short of the love and favour of God here and hereafter. The consequences of apostasy: where persons fail of having the true grace of God, a root of bitterness will spring up, corruption will prevail and break forth. It produces to themselves corrupt principles. It also produces bitter fruits to others. Many are defiled, tainted with those bad principles, and drawn into defiling practices.

[2] The apostle backs the caution with an awful example, that of Esau. Esau's sin. He profanely despised and sold the birthright, and all the advantages attending it. So do apostates. Esau's punishment. His conscience was convinced of his sin and folly, when it was too late. He now saw that the blessing he had made so light of was worth the having. He was rejected of God: He found no place of repentance. Esau, in his great wickedness, had made the bargain, and God, in his righteous judgment, ratified and confirmed it.

(2) Apostasy from Christ is the fruit of preferring the gratification of the flesh to the blessing of God. Sinners will not always have such mean thoughts of the divine blessing and inheritance as now they have. When the day of grace is over they will find no place for repentance. Christians should never give up their hope of their Father's blessings by deserting their holy religion, to avoid suffering.

Verses 18–29

I. He shows how much the gospel church differs from the Jewish church, and how much it excels, v. 18–21. 1. It was a gross sensible state. Mount Sinai was a mount that might be touched (v. 18), a gross palpable place; so was the dispensation. The state of the gospel church on Mount Zion is more spiritual. 2. It was a dark dispensation. Upon that mount there were blackness and darkness. The gospel state is clear and bright. 3. It was a dreadful and terrible dispensation; the Jews could not bear the terror of it, v. 19. Yea, Moses himself said, I exceedingly fear and quake. The gospel state is mild, and kind, suited to our weak frame. 4. It was a limited dispensation; all might not approach to that mount. Under the gospel we have all access with boldness to God. This was the state of the Jewish church, fitted to set forth the strict and tremendous justice of God.

II. He shows how much the gospel church represents the church triumphant in heaven. The gospel church is called Mount Zion, the heavenly Jerusalem. In coming to Mount Zion, believers come into heavenly places, and into a heavenly society.

1. Into heavenly places. (1) Unto the city of the living God. God has taken up his gracious residence in the gospel church, which on that account is an emblem of heaven. (2) To the heavenly Jerusalem, as free denizens there.

2. To a heavenly society. (1) To an innumerable company of angels. Those who by faith are joined to the gospel church are joined to the angels, and shall at length be like them. (2) To the general assembly and church of the first-born, that are written in heaven, to the universal church, however dispersed. By faith we come to them, have communion with them in the same blessed hope, and walk in the same way of holiness. Here will be the general assembly of the first-born, the saints of former and earlier times. The names of these are written in heaven: they have a name in God's house, and are enrolled in the Lamb's book of life, as citizens are enrolled in the livery-books. (3) To God the Judge of all, that great God who will judge both Jew and Gentile according to the law they are under. (4) To the spirits of just men made perfect; to the best sort of men, the righteous, to the best part of just men, their spirits, and to these in their best state, made perfect. (5) To Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel. This is none of the least of the many encouragments there are to perseverance. [1] The gospel covenant is a new covenant, distinct from the covenant of works. [2] Christ is the Mediator of this new covenant. [3] This covenant is ratified by the blood of Christ sprinkled upon our consciences. This blood of Christ pacifies God and purifies the consciences of men. [4] This is speaking blood, and it speaks better things than that of Abel. It speaks to God in behalf of sinners; it pleads not for vengeance, but for mercy. It speaks to sinners, in the name of God. It speaks pardon to their sins, peace to their souls.

III. The apostle closes the chapter by improving the argument in a manner suitable to the weight of it (v. 25, &c.). Then he spoke on earth, now he speaks from heaven.

1. When God speaks to men in the most excellent manner he justly expects from them the most strict attention. He now speaks from a higher and more glorious throne—heaven. He speaks now more powerfully and effectually. Then indeed his voice shook the earth, but now he hath shaken not only the earth, but the heavens. It is by the gospel from heaven that God shook to pieces the Jewish nation, and introduced a new state of the church.

2. When God speaks to men in the most excellent manner, the guilt of those who refuse him is the greater, v. 25. It was by the sound of the gospel trumpet that a new kingdom was erected for God in the world, which can never be so shaken as to be removed. This was a change made once for all. The apostle justly concludes, (1) How necessary it is for us to obtain grace from God, to serve him acceptably. We lose all our labour in religion if we be not accepted of God. (2) We cannot worship God acceptably, unless we worship him with godly reverence and fear. As faith, so holy fear, is necessary to acceptable worship. (3) It is only the grace of God that enables us to worship God in a right manner. (4) God is the same just and righteous God under the gospel that he appeared to be under the law. He is in himself a consuming fire; that is, a God of strict justice.

CHAP. XIII

The apostle recommends several excellent duties to them as the proper fruits of faith (ver. 1–17); he then bespeaks their prayers for him, and offers up his prayers to God for them, gives them some hope of seeing himself and Timothy, and ends with the general salutation and benediction, ver. 18, to the end.

Verses 1–17

The apostle calls the believing Hebrews to the performance of many excellent duties.

I. To brotherly love (v. 1). The spirit of Christianity is a spirit of love. Faith works by love. The true religion is the strongest bond of friendship. This brotherly love was in danger of being lost, and that in a time of persecution, when it would be most necessary. Christians should always love and live as brethren, and the more they grow in devout affection to God their heavenly Father, the more they will grow in love to one another for his sake.

II. To hospitality, v. 2. We must add to brotherly kindness, charity. The duty required—to entertain strangers. Seeing they are without any certain dwelling place, we should allow them room in our hearts and in our houses, as we have opportunity and ability. The motive: Thereby some have entertained angels unawares. God has often bestowed honours and favours upon his hospitable servants, beyond all their thoughts, unawares.

III. To Christian sympathy, v. 3.

1. The duty. Those that are themselves at liberty must sympathise with those that are in bonds and adversity, as if they were bound with them in the same chain.

2. The reason of the duty: As being yourselves in the body; not only in the body natural, but in the same mystical body. It would be unnatural in Christians not to bear each other's burdens.

IV. To purity and chastity, v. 4. A recommendation of God's ordinance of marriage, that it is honourable in all. It is honourable and happy, when persons come together pure and chaste, and preserve the marriage bed undefiled. A dreadful but just censure of impurity and lewdness: Whoremongers and adulterers God will judge. He will call such sins by their proper names, not by the names of love and gallantry, but of whoredom and adultery. He will bring them into judgment. He will convict them, condemn them.

V. To Christian contentment, v. 5, 6. The sin that is contrary to his grace and duty—covetousness. We must take care not only to keep this sin down, but to root it out of our souls. The duty that is contrary to covetousness—being satisfied and pleased with such things as we have. What God gives us from day to day we must be content with. We must bring our minds to our present condition. Those who cannot do it would not be contented though God should raise their condition to their minds, for the mind would rise with the condition. Paul, though abased and empty, had learned in every state, in any state, therewith to be content. What reason Christians have to be contented with their lot, v. 5, 6. This promise contains the sum and substance of all the promises. From this comprehensive promise they may assure themselves of help from God, v. 6. Men can do nothing against God, and God can make all that men do against his people to turn to their good.

VI. To the duty Christians owe to their ministers, and that both to those that are dead and to those that are yet alive.

1. To those that are dead, v. 7.

(1) The description given of them. They were such as had the rule over them, and had spoken to them the word of God.

(2) The duties owing to them. "Remember them. Follow their faith; labour after the grace of faith by which they lived and died so well. Consider the end of their conversation!" Now this duty of following the same true faith in which they had been instructed the apostle enlarges much upon by referring to the immutability and eternity of the Lord Jesus Christ. The great head of the church ever lives, and is ever the same; and they should be steadfast and immovable, in imitation of Christ. Furthermore he describes erroneous doctrines which they must avoid.

[1] They were divers and various (v. 9), different from what they had received and inconsistent with themselves.

[2] They were strange doctrines.

[3] They were of an unsettling, distracting nature. They were quite contrary to that grace of God which fixes and establishes the heart.

[4] They were about external, little, perishing things, such as meats and drinks, &c.

[5] They were unprofitable. They did not make them more holy, nor more humble, nor more thankful, nor more heavenly.

[6] They would exclude those who embraced them from the privileges of the Christian altar (v. 10): We have an altar. The Christian church has its altar. Not a material altar, but a personal one, and that is Christ; he is both our altar, and our sacrifice. This altar furnishes out a feast for true believers. The Lord's supper is the feast of the gospel passover. Those who adhere to the tabernacle or the Levitical dispensation, or return to it again, exclude themselves from the privileges of this altar. This part of the argument he first proves and then improves.

a. This servile adherence to the Jewish state is a bar to the privileges of the gospel altar. The gospel feast is the fruit of the sacrifice, which those have no right to who do not acknowledge the sacrifice itself. He proceeds, b. To improve this argument (v. 13–15): Let us go forth therefore unto him without the camp. Let us be willing to bear his reproach. We must submit to it; and we have the more reason because we must necessarily go forth in a little time by death; for here we have no continuing city. We should go forth now by faith, and seek in Christ the rest and settlement which this world cannot afford us, v. 14. Let us make a right use of this altar. Let us bring our sacrifices to this altar, v. 15, 16. 1. The sacrifice of praise to God, which we should offer up to God continually. In this are included all adoration and prayer, as well as thanksgiving; this is the fruit of our lips. 2. The sacrifice of alms-deeds, and Christian charity, v. 16, not contending ourselves to offer the sacrifice of our lips, mere words, but the sacrifice of good deeds.

2. To their living ministers (v. 17). The duty—to obey them, and submit themselves to them. Christians must submit to be instructed by their ministers, and not think themselves too wise, too good, or too great, to learn from them; and they must obey them. The motives to this duty. (1) They have the rule over the people; their office is truly authoritative. (2) They watch for the souls of the people. They are to watch against everything that may be hurtful. They are to watch for all opportunities of helping the souls of men forward in the way to heaven. (3) They must give an account how they have discharged their duty. They would be glad to give a good account. If they can then give in an account of their own fidelity and success, it will be a joyful day to them. If they give up their account with grief, it will be the people's loss as well as theirs.

I. The apostle recommends himself, and his fellow-sufferers, to the prayers of the Hebrew believers (v. 18).

1. This is one part of the duty which people owe to their ministers. Ministers need the prayers of the people; and the more earnestly the people pray for their ministers the more benefit they may expect to reap from their ministry.

2. There are good reasons why people should pray for their ministers.

(1) We trust we have a good conscience, &c., v. 18. Many of the Jews had a bad opinion of Paul. He here modestly asserts his own integrity. We trust! he might have said, We know; but he chose to speak in a humble style. "We trust we have a good conscience in all things. We would act honestly and sincerely in all things." A good conscience has a respect to all God's commands and all our duty. Those who have this good conscience, yet need the prayers of others.

(2) Another reason why he desires their prayers, v. 19, intimating that, now he was absent from them, he had a great desire and real intention to come again to them,—and that the best way to facilitate his return to them, was to make it a matter of their prayer.

II. He offers up his prayers to God for them: Now the God of peace, &c., v. 20. The title given to God—the God of peace, who has found out a way for peace and reconciliation between himself and sinners. The great work ascribed to him: He hath brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, &c. That divine power by which he was raised is able to do everything for us that we stand in need of. The titles given to Christ—our Lord Jesus, our sovereign, our Saviour, and the great shepherd of the sheep. They are the flock of his pasture, and his care and concern are for them. The way and method in which God is reconciled, and Christ raised from the dead: Through the blood of the everlasting covenant. This blood is the sanction and seal of an everlasting covenant between God and his people. The mercy prayed for, v. 21. The perfection of the saints in every good work is the great thing desired by them and for them. The way in which God makes his people perfect; it is by working in them always what is pleasing in his sight. To this every one should say, Amen.

III. He was pleased with the hopes of not only seeing Timothy, but seeing the Hebrews with him, v. 23.

IV. He closes with salutations, and a solemn, though short benediction (v. 22).

1. The salutation. From himself to them all, ministers and people. From the Christians in Italy to them.

2. The solemn, though short benediction (v. 25).

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF

JAMES

The writer of this epistle was not James the son of Zebedee; for he was put to death by Herod (Acts xii). It is called a general epistle, because (as some think) not directed to any particular person or church, but such a one as we call a circular letter. The time when this epistle was written is uncertain. The design of it is to reprove Christians for their great degeneracy both in faith and manners. It was also a special intention of the author of this epistle to awaken the Jewish nation to a sense of the greatness and nearness of those judgments which were coming upon them; and to support all true Christians in the way of their duty, under the calamities and persecutions they might meet with.

CHAP. I

After the inscription and salutation (ver. 1), Christians are taught how to conduct themselves when under the cross. Those who endure their trials and afflictions are pronounced blessed, ver. 2–12. But those sins which bring sufferings, are by no means to be imputed to God, who cannot be the author of sin, but is the author of all good, ver. 13–18. The word of God should be made our chief study; and what we hear and know of it we must take care to practise. To this is added an account wherein pure religion consists, ver. 19 27.

Verse 1

The inscription of this epistle.

I. The character by which our author desires to be known: James, a servant of God, and of the Lord Jesus Christ. Though James is called by the evangelist the brother of our Lord, yet it was his glory to serve Christ in the spirit, rather than to boast of his being akin according to the flesh. Hence let us learn to prize this title above all others in the world—the servants of God and of Christ. We cannot acceptably serve the Father, unless we are also servants of the Son.

II. The twelve tribes which are scattered abroad. They were dispersed in mercy. They were scattered in several countries for the diffusing of the light of divine revelation. They began now to be scattered in wrath. Even good people among them shared in the common calamity. These Jews of the dispersion were those who had embraced the Christian faith. It is often the lot even of God's own tribes to be scattered abroad. While God's tribes are scattered abroad, he will send to look after them. Here is an apostle writing to the scattered; an epistle from God to them. We should not despond and think ourselves rejected, under outward calamities, God remembers and sends comfort to his scattered people.

III. James here shows the respect he had even for the dispersed: greeting. It was the desire of this apostle's heart that those who were scattered might be comforted.

Verses 2–12

I. The suffering state of Christians in this world is represented. It is implied that troubles and afflictions may be the lot of the best Christians. Such as have a title to the greatest joy may yet endure very grievous afflictions. The trials of a good man are such as he does not create to himself, nor sinfully pull upon himself; but they are such as he is said to fall into.

II. The graces and duties of a state of trial and affliction.

1. One Christian grace to be exercised is joy, v. 2. We must not sink into a sad and disconsolate frame of mind, which would make us faint under our trials. Philosophy may instruct men to be calm under their troubles; but Christianity teaches them to be joyful. Our trials will brighten our graces now and our crown at last. There is the more reason for joy in afflictions if we consider the other graces that are promoted by them.

2. Faith, v. 3; and then in v. 6. There must be a sound believing of the great truths of Christianity, and a resolute cleaving to them, in times of trial.

3. There must be patience: The trial of faith worketh patience. The trying of one grace produces another. To exercise Christian patience aright, we must let it work. Stoical apathy and Christian patience are very different: by the one men become, in some measure, insensible of their afflictions; but by the other they become triumphant in and over them. Let us give it leave to work, and it will work wonders in a time of trouble. We must let it have its perfect work. When we bear all that God appoints, and as long as he appoints, and when we not only bear troubles, but rejoice in them, then patience hath its perfect work. When the work of patience is complete, then the Christian is entire, and nothing will be wanting.

4. Prayer. What we ought more especially to pray for—wisdom. We should not pray so much for the removal of an affliction as for wisdom to make a right use of it. To be wise in trying times is a special gift of God. In what way this is to be obtained—upon our asking for it. Let the foolish become beggars at the throne of grace, and they are in a fair way to be wise. We have the greatest encouragement to do this: he giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not. It shall be given, v. 5. He to whom we are sent, has it to give: and he is of a giving disposition. Nor is there any fear of his favours being limited to some for he gives to all men. If you should say you want a great deal of wisdom, a small portion will not serve your turn, he gives liberally; and lest you should be afraid of being put to shame for your folly, he upbraideth not. Ask when you will, and as often as you will, you will meet with no upbraidings. The promise is: It shall be given him. There is one thing necessary to be observed in our asking, v. 6. There must be no wavering, no staggering at the promise of God through unbelief.

5. Sincerity of intention, and a steadiness of mind, constitute another duty required under affliction: He that wavereth is like a wave of the sea, driven with the wind, and tossed. To be sometimes lifted up by faith, and then thrown down again by distrust—this is very fitly compared to a wave of the sea, that rises and falls, swells and sinks, just as the wind tosses it higher or lower, that way or this. The success of prayer is spoiled hereby, v. 7. Such a distrustful shifting, unsettled person is not likely to value a favour from God as he should do, and therefore cannot expect to receive it. A wavering faith and spirit has a bad influence upon our conversations, v. 8. There will be great unsteadiness in all our conversation and actions. He that is unstable as water shall not excel.

III. Both poor and rich are directed on what grounds to build their joy and comfort, v. 9–11. Those of low degree are to be looked upon as brethren. Good Christians may be rich in the world, v. 10. Grace and wealth are not wholly inconsistent. Both these are allowed to rejoice. No condition of life puts us out of a capacity of rejoicing in God. All who are brought low, and made lowly by grace, may rejoice in the prospect of their exaltation at the last in heaven. What reason rich people have to be humble: As the flower of the grass he shall pass away. He, and his wealth with him, v. 11. For the sun has no sooner risen with a burning heat than it withereth the grass. As a flower fades before the heat of the scorching sun, so shall the rich man fade away in his ways. For this reason let him that is rich rejoice, not so much in the providence of God, that makes him rich, as in the grace of God, that makes and keeps him humble.

IV. A blessing is pronounced on those who endure their exercises and trials, v. 12. It is not the man who suffers only that is blessed, but he who endures. Afflictions cannot make us miserable. A blessing may arise from them. Sufferings and temptations are the way to eternal blessedness: When he is tried, he shall receive the crown of life, when he is approved, when his graces are found to be true and of the highest worth (so metals are tried as to their excellency by the fire). The tried Christian shall be a crowned one: and the crown he shall wear will be a crown of life. We only bear the cross for a while, but we shall wear the crown to eternity. This blessedness is a promised thing to the righteous sufferer. It is therefore what we may most surely depend upon. Our enduring temptations must be from a principle of love to God and to our Lord Jesus Christ: The Lord hath promised to those that love him. The crown of life is promised to all those who have the love of God reigning in their hearts.

Verses 13–18

I. God is not the author of any man's sin. Some professors might fall in the hour of temptation. The blame of their misconduct must lie entirely upon themselves. There is nothing in the nature of God that they can lay the blame upon. There is nothing in the providential dispensations of God that the blame of any man's sin can be laid upon (v. 13). As God cannot be tempted with evil himself, so neither can he be a tempter of others. It is very bad to sin; but it is much worse, when we have done amiss, to charge it upon God, and say it was owing to him. Afflictions are designed to draw out our graces, but not our corruptions.

II. Where the true cause of evil lies, and where the blame ought to be laid (v. 14). The true original of evil and temptation is in our own hearts. The combustible matter is in us, though the flame may be blown up by some outward causes. The method of sin in its proceeding. First it draws away, then entices. The heart is carried from that which is good, and enticed to cleave to that which is evil, estranged from the life of God, and then by degrees fixed in a course of sin. The word here rendered drawn away signifies a being forcibly haled or compelled. The word translated enticed signifies being wheedled and beguiled. The force and power of sin could never prevail, were it not for its cunning and guile. The success of corruption in the heart (v. 15). Sin being allowed to excite desires in us, it will soon ripen those desires into consent, and then it is said to have conceived. The final issue of sin: Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death. There is death upon the soul, and death comes upon the body.

III. We are taught yet further that God is the Father and fountain of all good, v. 16, 17. We should take particular care not to err in our conceptions of God: "Do not err, my beloved brethren, do not wander." God is not, cannot be, the author of anything that is evil; but must be acknowledged as the cause and spring of everything that is good, v. 17. God is unchangeable, and our changes and shadows are not from any mutability or shadowy alterations in him, but from ourselves. The Father of lights, with whom there is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. Every good gift is from him. He gives the light of reason. He gives also the light of learning. The light of divine revelation is more immediately from above. So that we have nothing good but what we receive from God. Our regeneration, and all the holy happy consequences of it, must be ascribed to him (v. 18). A true Christian is a creature begotten anew. It is of God's own will; not by our skill or power; but purely from the goodwill and grace of God. The means whereby this is effected, the word of truth, that is, the gospel. This gospel is indeed a word of truth, or else it could never produce such real, such lasting, such great and noble effects. The end and design of God's giving renewing grace, That we should be a kind of first-fruits of his creatures. Christ is the first-fruits of Christians, Christians are the first-fruits of creatures.

Verses 19–27

We are required,

I. To restrain the workings of passion. This we shall learn if we are indeed begotten again by the word of truth, v. 19. Be ready to hear and consider what God's word teaches. This may be applied to the afflictions and temptations spoken of in the beginning of the chapter. Instead of censuring God under our trials, let us open our ears and hearts to hear what he will say to us. This may be understood as referring to the disputes and differences that Christians were running into among themselves. We should be swift to hear reason and truth on all sides, and be slow to speak: and, when we do speak, there should be nothing of wrath. If men would govern their tongues, they must govern their passions. If we would be slow to speak, we must be slow to wrath.

II. A very good reason is given for suppressing anger, v. 20. The worst thing we can bring to a religious controversy is anger. Wrath is a human thing, and the wrath of man stands opposed to the righteousness of God. Those who pretend to serve the cause of God hereby show that they are acquainted neither with God nor his cause.

III. We are called upon to suppress other corrupt affections, as well as rash anger, v. 21. Hereby we are taught, as Christians, to watch against, and lay aside, all the disorders of a corrupt heart, which would prejudice it against the word and ways of God. There is abundance of that which is evil in us, to be watched against; there is superfluity of naughtiness. It is not enough to restrain evil affections, but they must be cast from us, or laid apart. This must extend not only to outward sins, but to all sin of thought and affection as well as speech and practice; all filthiness.

IV. Concerning hearing the word of God.

1. We are required to prepare ourselves for it (v. 21).

2. How to hear it: Receive with meekness the engrafted word, which is able to save your souls. In hearing the word of God, we are to receive it; receive it as the stock does the graft; so that the fruit which is produced may be, not according to the nature of the sour stock, but according to the nature of the gospel which is engrafted into our souls. We must therefore yield ourselves to the word of God, with most submissive tempers: this is to receive it with meekness. Being willing to hear of our faults, and taking it not only patiently, but thankfully. In all our hearing we should aim at the salvation of our souls. It is the design of the word of God to make us wise to salvation.

3. What is to be done after hearing (v. 22). Hearing is in order to doing; the most attentive and the most frequent hearing of the word of God will not avail us, unless we be also doers of it. It is not enough to remember what we hear. Bare hearers are self-deceivers. Self-deceit will be found the worst deceit at last.

4. What is the proper use of the word of God, v. 23–24. The use we are to make of God's word may be learnt from its being compared to a glass, in which a man may behold his natural face. As a looking-glass shows us the spots and defilements upon our faces, so the word of God shows us our sins. It shows us what is amiss, that it may be amended. When we attend to the word of God, so as to see ourselves, our true state and condition, and dress ourselves anew by the glass of God's word, this is to make a proper use of it. We have here an account of those who do not use this glass of the word as they ought, v. 24. In vain do we hear God's word, and look into the gospel glass, if we go away, and forget our spots, and forget our remedy. This is the case of those who do not hear the word as they ought. Those also are described who hear aright, and who use the glass of God's word as they should do (v. 25). The gospel is a law of liberty, or of liberation. The ceremonial law was a yoke of bondage; the gospel of Christ is a law of liberty. It is a perfect law. In hearing the word, we look into this perfect law. Then only do we look into the law of liberty as we should when we continue therein. Those who thus do, and continue in the law and word of God, are, and shall be, blessed in their deed. This blessedness does not lie in knowing, but in doing the will of God. It is not talking, but walking, that will bring us to heaven.

V. How we may distinguish between a vain religion and that which is pure and approved of God.

1. What is a vain religion: If any man among you seemeth to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, but deceives his own heart, this man's religion is vain. In a vain religion there is much of show. When men are more concerned to seem religious than really to be so, it is a sign that their religion is but vain. In a vain religion there is much censuring of others. When we hear people ready to speak of the faults of others, that they themselves may seem the wiser and better, this is a sign that they have but a vain religion. The man who has a detracting tongue cannot have a truly humble gracious heart. There is no strength nor power in that religion which will not enable a man to bridle his tongue. In a vain religion a man deceives his own heart. When once religion comes to be a vain thing, how great is the vanity!

2. Wherein true religion consists, v. 27. It is the glory of religion to be pure and undefiled. A holy life and a charitable heart show a true religion. That religion is pure and undefiled which is so before God and the Father. True religion teaches us to do everything as in the presence of God. Compassion and charity to the poor and distressed form a very great and necessary part of true religion: Visiting the fatherless and widow in their affliction. By them we are to understand all who are proper objects of charity, all who are in affliction. If the sum of religion be drawn up in two articles this is one—to be charitable and relieve the afflicted. An unspotted life must accompany an unfeigned love and charity: To keep himself unspotted from the world. The world is apt to spot and blemish the soul, and it is hard to live in it, and have to do with it, and not be defiled; but this must be our constant endeavour. Herein consists pure and undefiled religion.

CHAP. II

The apostle condemns a sinful regarding of the rich, and despising the poor, ver. 1–7. Mercy should be followed, as well as justice, ver. 8–13. He exposes the error and folly of those who boast of faith without works, ver. 14, to the end.

Verses 1–7

He shows how much mischief there is in the sin of respect of persons.

I. A caution against this sin laid down in general, v. 1. The character of Christians fully implied: they are such as have the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ. They have it as a trust; they have it as a treasure. How honourably James speaks of Jesus Christ; he calls him the Lord of glory. Christ's being the Lord of glory should teach us not to respect Christians for anything so much as their conformity to Christ. We should not show respect to men, so as to cloud or lessen the glory of our glorious Lord. This is certainly a very heinous sin.

II. We have this sin described and cautioned against, by an example of it (v. 2, 3). You act partially, and determine wrong, merely because the one makes a better appearance than the other. God has his remnant among all sorts of people, among those that wear soft and gay clothing, and among those that wear poor and vile raiment. In matters of religion, rich and poor stand upon a level; no man's riches set him in the least nearer to God, nor does any man's poverty set him at a distance from God. All undue honouring of worldly greatness and riches should especially be watched against in Christian societies. If a poor man be a good man, we must not value him a whit the less for his poverty; and, if a rich man be a bad man, we must not value him any whit the more for his riches. There is many a humble, heavenly, good Christian, who is clothed meanly; but neither should he nor his Christianity be thought the worse of on this account.

III. We have the greatness of this sin set forth, v. 4, 5. Are you not then partial in yourselves? According to the strict rendering of the original, the question is, "Have you not made a difference? And, in that difference, do you not judge by a false rule, and go upon false measures?" This respect of persons is owing to the evil and injustice of the thoughts. "You have become judges of evil thoughts; you are judges according to those unjust estimations and corrupt opinions which you have formed to yourselves. You secretly prefer outward pomp before inward grace, and the things that are seen before those which are not seen." The deformity of sin is never truly and fully discerned till the evil of our thoughts be disclosed. This respect of persons is a heinous sin, because it is to show ourselves most directly contrary to God (v. 5–6). God has made those heirs of a kingdom whom you make of no reputation. Many of the poor of this world are the chosen of God. Their being God's chosen does not prevent their being poor; their being poor does not at all prejudice the evidences of their being chosen. God designed to recommend his holy religion, not by the external advantages of gaiety and pomp, but by its intrinsic worth; and therefore chose the poor of this world. Many poor of the world are rich in faith; thus the poorest may become rich. It is expected from those who have wealth that they be rich in good works; but it is expected from the poor in the world that they be rich in faith. Believing Christians are heirs of a kingdom, though they may be very poor as to present possessions. Where any are rich in faith, there will be also divine love. We read of the crown promised to those that love God, in the former chapter (v. 12); we here find there is a kingdom too. And, as the crown is a crown of life, so the kingdom will be an everlasting kingdom. After such considerations as these, the charge is cutting indeed, v. 6. Respecting persons on account of their riches or outward figure, is shown to be a very great sin, because of the mischiefs which are owing to worldly wealth and greatness, v. 7. This will make your sin appear exceedingly sinful and foolish, in setting up that which tends to pull you down, and to dishonour that worthy name by which you are called.

How the matter may be mended.

I. The law that is to guide us, v. 8. As the scripture teaches us to love all our neighbours, be they rich or poor, as ourselves, so, in our having a steady regard to this rule, we shall do well. The rule for Christians to walk by is settled in the scriptures. The scripture gives us this as a law, to love our neighbour as ourselves. This law is a royal law, it comes from the King of kings. Its own worth and dignity deserve it should be thus honoured. A pretence of observing this royal law, when it is interpreted with partiality, will not excuse men in any unjust proceedings.

II. This general law is to be considered together with a particular law, v. 9. The very royal law itself, rightly explained, would serve to convict them, because it teaches them to put themselves as much in the places of the poor as in those of the rich.

III. The extent of the law, and how far obedience must be paid to it. They must fulfil the royal law, have a regard to one part as well as another, v. 10. Do you plead for your respect to the rich, because you are to love your neighbour as yourselves? Well then show also an equitable and due regard to the poor, because you are to love your neighbour as yourself: or else your offending in one point will spoil your pretence of observing that law at all. This is further illustrated by putting a case different from that before mentioned (v. 11). One, perhaps, is very severe in the case of adultery; but less ready to condemn murder: another has a prodigious dread of murder, but has more easy thoughts of adultery; whereas one who looks at the authority of the Lawgiver, will see the same reason for condemning the one as the other. If we offend in one point, we contemn the authority of him who gave the whole law, and so far are guilty of all.

IV. James directs Christians to govern and conduct themselves by the law of Christ, v. 12. The gospel is called a law. It prescribes duty, as well as administers comfort; and Christ is a king to rule us as well as a prophet to teach us, and a priest to sacrifice and intercede for us. It is a law of liberty, the service of God, according to the gospel, is perfect freedom. We must all be judged by this law of liberty. It concerns us therefore so to speak and act now as becomes those who must shortly be judged by this law of liberty; that we be of a gospel temper, and that our conversation be a gospel conversation. The consideration of our being judged by the gospel should engage us more especially to be merciful in our regards to the poor (v. 13). Such as show no mercy now shall find no mercy in the great day. There will be such as shall become instances of the triumph of mercy, in whom mercy rejoices against judgment.

Verses 14–26

The apostle shows the error of those who rested in a bare profession of the Christian faith, as if that would save them. A man is justified, not by faith only, but by works.

I. Upon this arises a very great question, namely, how to reconcile Paul and James. Paul, in his epistles to the Romans and Galatians, seems to assert the directly contrary thing, that we are justified by faith only, and not by the works of the law. It may be sufficient only to observe these few things following: When Paul says that a man is justified by faith, without the deeds of the law (Rom. iii. 28), he plainly speaks of another sort of work than James does, but not of another sort of faith. Paul speaks of works wrought in obedience to the law of Moses, and before men's embracing the faith of the gospel. James speaks of works done in obedience to the gospel. Both are concerned to magnify the faith of the gospel, as that which alone could save us and justify us. Paul had to do with those who depended on the merit of their works in the sight of God. James had to do with those who cried up faith, but would not allow works to be used even as evidences. Those who cry up the gospel so as to set aside the law, and those who cry up the law so as to set aside the gospel, are both in the wrong. The justification of which Paul speaks is different from that spoken of by James; the one speaks of our persons being justified before God, the other speaks of our faith being justified before men: "Show me thy faith by thy works," says James. Paul speaks of justification in the sight of God.

II. Let us see what is more particularly to be learnt from this excellent passage of James.

1. Faith without works will not profit, and cannot save us. What doth it profit, my brethren, if a man say he hath faith, and have not works? Can faith save him? Faith which does not save will not really profit us. All things should be accounted profitable or unprofitable to us as they tend to forward or hinder the salvation of our souls. For a man to have faith, and to say he has faith, are two different things. Men may boast of that to others, and be conceited of that in themselves, of which they are really destitute.

2. As love or charity is an operative principle, so is faith. By trying how it looks for a person to pretend he is very charitable who yet never does any works of charity, you may judge what sense there is in pretending to have faith without the fruits of it, v. 15–17. What will such a charity as this, that consists in bare words, avail either you or the poor? You might as well pretend that your love and charity will stand the test without acts of mercy as think that a profession of faith will bear you out before God without works of piety and obedience, v. 17. We are too apt to rest in a bare profession of faith, and to think that this will save us. Mock-faith is as hateful as mock-charity, and both show a heart dead to all real godliness.

3. Compare a faith boasting of itself without works and a faith evidenced by works, by looking on both together, to try how this comparison will work upon our minds, v. 18. "Thou makest a profession, and sayest thou hast faith; I make no such boasts, but leave my works to speak for me." This is the evidence by which the scriptures all along teach men to judge both of themselves and others. And this is the evidence according to which Christ will proceed at the day of judgment.

4. Look upon a faith of bare speculation and knowledge as the faith of devils, v. 19. That instance of faith which the apostle here chooses to mention is the first principle of all religion. But to rest here, and take up a good opinion of thy state towards God, merely on account of thy believing in him, this will render thee miserable: The devils also believe, and tremble. If thou contentest thyself with a bare assent to articles of faith, and some speculations upon them, thus far the devils go. They tremble, not out of reverence, but hatred and opposition to that one God on whom they believe.

therefore yield ourselves to the word of God, with most submissive tempers: this is to receive it with meekness. Being willing to hear of our faults, and taking it not only patiently, but thankfully. In all our hearing we should aim at the salvation of our souls. It is the design of the word of God to make us wise to salvation.

3. What is to be done after hearing (v. 22). Hearing is in order to doing; the most attentive and the most frequent hearing of the word of God will not avail us, unless we be also doers of it. It is not enough to remember what we hear. Bare hearers are self-deceivers. Self-deceit will be found the worst deceit at last.

As a looking-glass shows us the spots and defilements upon our faces, so the word of God shows us our sins. It shows us what is amiss, that it may be amended. When we attend to the word of God, so as to see ourselves, our true state and condition, and dress ourselves anew by the glass of God's word, this is to make a proper use of it. We have here an account of those who do not use this glass of the word as they ought, v. 24. "Thou makest a profession, and sayest thou hast faith; I make no such boasts, but leave my works to speak for me." This is the evidence by which the scriptures all along teach men to judge both of themselves and others. And this is the evidence according to which Christ will proceed at the day of judgment.

4. Look upon a faith of bare speculation and knowledge as the faith of devils, v. 19. That instance of faith which the apostle here chooses to mention is the first principle of all religion. But to rest here, and take up a good opinion of thy state towards God, merely on account of thy believing in him, this will render thee miserable: The devils also believe, and tremble. If thou contentest thyself with a bare assent to articles of faith, and some speculations upon them, thus far the devils go. They tremble, not out of reverence, but hatred and opposition to that one God on whom they believe.

5. He who boasts of faith without works is to be looked upon at present as a foolish condemned person, v. 20. Faith without works is said to be dead, not only as void of all those operations which are the proofs of spiritual life, but as unavailable to eternal life.

6. A justifying faith cannot be without works, from two examples.

(1) The first instance is that of Abraham (v. 21). By what Abraham did, it appeared that he truly believed. The faith of Abraham was a working faith (v. 22). Abraham believed God, and it was imputed unto him for righteousness, v. 23. And thus he became the friend of God. You see then (v. 24) how that by works a man is justified, and not by faith only; not by believing without obeying, but by having such a faith as is productive of good works. Those who would have Abraham's blessings must be careful to copy after his faith: to boast of being Abraham's seed will not avail any. Those works which evidence true faith must be such as God himself commands, and not the mere fruits of our own imagination and devising. The actings of faith make it grow perfect, as the truth of faith makes it act. Such an acting faith will make others, as well as Abraham, friends of God.

(2) The second example is Rahab, v. 25. The former instance was of one renowned for his faith all his life long. This is of one noted for sin. The strongest faith will not do, nor the meanest be allowed to go without works. That which proved her faith sincere was, that, to the hazard of her life, she received the messengers, and sent them out another way. Where great sins are pardoned, there must be great acts of self-denial. Her former acquaintance must be discarded, her former course of life entirely abandoned, and she must give signal proof and evidence of this.

7. The apostle draws this conclusion, As the body without the spirit is dead, so faith without works is dead also, v. 26. The best works, without faith, are dead; they want their root and principle. It is by faith that anything we do is really good. The most plausible profession of faith, without works, is dead: as the root is dead when it produces nothing green, nothing of fruit. Faith is the root, good works are the fruits, and we must see to it that we have both. We must not think that either, without the other, will justify and save us.

CHAP. III

Those who profess religion ought especially to govern their tongues, ver. 1–12. True wisdom makes men meek, and hereby it may easily be distinguished from a wisdom that is earthly, ver. 13, to the end.

Verses 1–12

The foregoing chapter shows how unprofitable and dead faith is without works. Such a faith is, however, apt to make men conceited in their tempers and their talk. The best need to be cautioned against a dictating, censorious use of their tongues. We are therefore taught,

I. Not to use our tongues so as to lord it over others, v. 1. We must not affect to speak and act as those who are continually assuming the chair, we must not prescribe to one another, so as to make our own sentiments a standard by which to try all others. "Therefore be not many masters (or teachers, as some read it); but rather speak with the humility and spirit of learners." Those who thus set up for judges and censurers shall receive the greater condemnation. Our judging others will but make our own judgment the more strict and severe, Matt. vii. 1, 2. Another reason is because we are all sinners, v. 2. Were we to think more of our own mistakes and offences, we should be less apt to judge other people. Self-justifiers are commonly self-deceivers. Their magisterial deportment, and censorious tongues, may prove worse than any faults they condemn in others.

II. To govern our tongue so as to prove ourselves perfect and upright men, and such as have an entire government over ourselves. But, on the other hand, if a man seemeth to be religious and bridleth not his tongue, that man's religion is vain. Further, he that offends not in word will not only prove himself a sincere Christian, but a very much advanced Christian. For the wisdom and grace which enable him to rule his tongue will enable him also to rule all his actions. This we have illustrated by two comparisons: 1. The governing and guiding of all the motions of a horse, by the bit which is put into his mouth, v. 3. There is a great deal of brutish fierceness and wantonness in us. This shows itself very much by the tongue, so that this must be bridled. As an unruly and ungovernable horse runs away with his rider, or throws him, so an unruly tongue will serve those who have no command over it. 2. The governing of a ship by the right management of the helm, v. 4, 5. As the helm is a very small part of the ship, so is the tongue a very small part of the body: but the right governing of the helm will steer and turn the ship, and a right management of the tongue is, in a great measure, the government of the whole man. Things of small bulk may yet be of vast use. We should learn to make the due management of our tongues more our study, because, though they are little members, they are capable of doing a great deal of good or a great deal of hurt.

III. To dread an unruly tongue as one of the greatest and most pernicious evils, v. 5, 6. There is such an abundance of sin in the tongue that it may be called a world of iniquity. So is the tongue among the members that it defileth the whole body. The whole body is often drawn into sin and guilt by the tongue. It setteth on fire the course of nature. The affairs of mankind and of societies are often thrown into confusion, and all is on a flame, by the tongues of men. And it is set on fire of hell. Hell has more to do in promoting the fire of the tongue than men are generally aware of. When it is set on fire of hell, as in all undue heats it is, there it is mischievous, producing rage and hatred, and those things which serve the purposes of the devil.

IV. We are next taught how very difficult a thing it is to govern the tongue, v. 7, 8. Fierce creatures have not been subdued nor tamed by miracle only. What is here spoken of is something commonly done; not only hath been tamed, but is tamed of mankind. Yet the tongue is worse than these, and cannot be tamed by the power and art which serves to tame these things. The apostle does not intend to represent it as a thing impossible, but as a thing extremely difficult, which therefore will require great watchfulness, and pains, and prayer. And sometimes all is too little; for it is an unruly evil, full of deadly poison. The tongue is apt to break through all bounds and rules, and to spit out its poison on one occasion or other, notwithstanding the utmost care.

V. We are taught to think of the use we make of our tongues in religion and in the service of God, v. 9, 10. How absurd it is that those who use their tongues in prayer and praise should ever use them in cursing, slandering, and the like! That tongue which addresses with reverence the divine Being cannot, without the greatest inconsistency, turn upon fellow-creatures with reviling brawling language. These things ought not so to be; and, if such considerations were always at hand, surely they would not be. Further, to fix this thought, the apostle shows that contrary effects from the same causes are monstrous, and not to be found in nature, and therefore cannot be consistent with grace, v. 11, 12. True religion will not admit of contradictions; and a truly religious man can never allow of them either in his words or his actions.

Verses 13–18

The difference between men's pretending to be wise and their being really so, and between the wisdom which is from beneath and that which is from above.

I. We have some account of true wisdom, v. 13. A wise man will not value himself merely upon knowing things, if he has not wisdom to make a right application of that knowledge. These two things must be put together to make up the account of true wisdom. A good conversation. If we are wiser than others, this should be evidenced by the goodness of our conversation, not by the roughness or vanity of it. True wisdom may be known by its works. The conversation here does not refer only to words, but to the whole of men's practice; therefore it is said, Let him show out of a good conversation his works. Not he who thinks well, or he who talks well, is allowed to be wise, if he do not live and act well. True wisdom may be known by the meekness of the spirit and temper. It is a great instance of wisdom prudently to bridle our own anger, and patiently to bear the anger of others. When we are mild and calm, we are best able to hear reason, and best able to speak it. Wisdom produces meekness, and meekness increases wisdom.

II. We have the glorying taken away of those who are of a contrary character, v. 14–16. Envying and strife are opposed to the meekness of wisdom. The heart is the seat of both; but envy and wisdom cannot dwell together in the same heart. The order of things here laid down. Envying is first and excites strife; strife, vain-glorying and lying; and then (v. 16) hereupon ensue confusion and every evil work. One sin begets another, and it cannot be imagined how much mischief is produced: there is every evil work. Whence such wisdom cometh, v. 15. It springs from earthly principles. It is sensual, indulging the flesh. It is devilish. And therefore those who are lifted up with such wisdom as this must fall into the condemnation of the devil.

III. We have the lovely picture of that wisdom which is from above more fully drawn, v. 17, 18. True wisdom is God's gift. It comes from above. It is pure, without mixture of maxims or aims that would debase it: studious of holiness both in heart and life. The wisdom that is from above is peaceable. Those who are truly wise do what they can to preserve peace, that it may not be broken; and to make peace, that where it is lost it may be restored. Heavenly wisdom makes men peaceable. It is gentle, not being rude and overbearing in conversation, nor harsh and cruel in temper. Heavenly wisdom is easy to be entreated, it is very persuadable, either to what is good or from what is evil. There is an easiness that is weak and faulty; but it is not a blameable easiness to yield ourselves to the persuasions of God's word, and to all just requests of our fellow-creatures. Heavenly wisdom is full of mercy and good fruits, both to relieve those who want and to forgive those who offend. Heavenly wisdom is without partiality. The margin reads it, without wrangling. The wisest men are least apt to be censurers. That wisdom which is from above is without hypocrisy. It has no disguises nor deceits. It is sincere and open, steady and uniform, and consistent with itself. True wisdom will go on to sow the fruits of righteousness in peace, and thus, to make peace in the world, v. 18. And that which is sown in peace will produce a harvest of joys.

CHAP. IV

I. Some causes of contention, ver. 1–5. II. We are taught to abandon the friendship of this world, ver. 4–10. III. All detraction and rash judgment of others are to be carefully avoided, ver. 11, 12. IV. We must preserve a constant regard to the disposals of divine Providence, ver. 13, to the end.

Verses 1–10

This chapter speaks of a lust after worldly things as that which carried their divisions to a shameful height.

I. The apostle here reproves the Jewish Christians for their wars, and for their lusts as the cause of them, v. 1. The origin of their wars and fightings was not (as they pretended) a true zeal for their country, and for the honour of God, their prevailing lusts were the cause of all. What is shrouded under a specious pretence of zeal for God and religion often comes from men's pride. They make a war within as well as fightings without. From lust of power and dominion, lust of pleasure, or lust of riches, arise all the broils and contentions that are in the world. It is therefore the right method for the cure of contention to lay the axe to the root, and mortify those lusts that war in the members. It should kill these lusts to think of their disappointment, v. 2. Inordinate desires are either totally disappointed, or they are not to be appeased and satisfied by obtaining the things desired. Worldly and fleshly lusts are the distemper which will not allow of contentment or satisfaction in the mind. Sinful desires and affections generally exclude prayer: "You fight and war, yet you have not, because you ask not. You do not consult God in your undertakings, and you do not commit your way to him, but follow your own corrupt views and inclinations: therefore you meet with continual disappointments. Your lusts spoil your prayers," v. 3. Pride, vanity, luxury, and sensuality, are what you would serve by your successes, and by your very prayers. You disgrace devotion and dishonour God by such gross and base ends; and therefore your prayers are rejected. They ask God to give them success in their callings or undertakings; not that they may glorify their heavenly Father and do good with what they have, but that they may consume it upon their lusts. When we speed not in our prayers it is because we ask amiss; either we do not ask for right ends or not in a right manner. When our prayers are rather the language of our lusts than of our graces, they will return empty.

II. We have fair warning to avoid all criminal friendships with this world, v. 4. There is this brand put upon worldly-mindedness—that it is enmity to God. A man may have a competent portion of the good things of this life, and yet may keep himself in the love of God, but it is constructive treason and rebellion against God to set the world upon his throne in our hearts. Whosoever therefore is the friend of the world is the enemy of God. Hence arise wars and fightings, even from this adulterous idolatrous love of the world. What peace can there be among men, so long as there is enmity towards God? (v. 5). Natural corruption principally shows itself by envying, and there is a continual propensity to this. Now this way of the world, affecting pomp and pleasure, and falling into strifes and quarrels for the sake of these things, is the certain consequence of being friends to the world. Christians, to avoid contentions, must avoid the friendship of the world. If we belong to God, he gives more grace than to live and act as the generality of the world do. The grace of God will correct and cure the spirit that naturally dwells in us; where he giveth grace, he giveth another spirit than that of the world.

III. The difference God makes between pride and humility, v. 6. This is represented as the language of scripture in the Old Testament. 1. The disgrace cast upon the proud: God resists them. The proud resists God. Let proud spirits hear this and tremble—God resists them. He will certainly fill with shame the faces of such as have filled their hearts with pride. 2. The honour and help God gives to the humble. Grace, as opposed to disgrace, is honour; this God gives to the humble. Wherever God gives true grace, he will give more. He will especially give more grace to the humble, because they see their need of it, will pray for it and be thankful for it; and such shall have it.

IV. We are taught to submit ourselves entirely to God, v. 7. Christians should forsake the friendship of the world, and should by grace learn to glory in their submissions to God We are subjects, and as such must be submissive; not only through fear, but through love. Now, as this subjection and submission to God are what the devil most industriously strives to hinder, so we ought with great care and steadiness to resist his suggestions. "Resist him and he will flee from you." If we basely yield to temptations, the devil will continually follow us; but if we stand it out against him, he will be gone from us. Resolution shuts and bolts the door against temptation.

V. We are directed how to act towards God, v. 8–10. 1. Draw nigh to God. The heart that has rebelled must be brought to the foot of God; the spirit that was estranged from a life of communion with God must become acquainted with him. 2. Cleanse your hands. He who comes unto God must have clean hands. The hands must be cleansed or it will be in vain for us to draw nigh to God. 3. The hearts of the double-minded must be purified. To purify the heart is to be sincere. 4. Be afflicted, and mourn, and weep. "What afflictions God sends take them as he would have you, and be duly sensible of them. Times of contention and division are times to mourn in, and the sins that occasion wars and fightings should be mourned for. Let your laughter be turned to mourning and your joy to heaviness." This may be taken either as a prediction of sorrow or a prescription of seriousness. They are directed, before things come to the worst, to lay aside their vain mirth and their sensual pleasures, that they might indulge godly sorrow and penitential tears. 5. "Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord. Let there be a thorough humiliation in bewailing everything that is evil; let there be great humility in doing that which is good."

VI. We have great encouragement to act thus towards God (v. 8–10). Those that draw nigh to God in a way of duty shall find God drawing nigh to them in a way of mercy. If there be not a close communion between God and us, it is our fault, and not his. He shall lift up the humble. If we be truly penitent and humble under the marks of God's displeasure, we shall in a little time know the advantages of his favour; he will lift us up out of trouble, or he will lift us up in our spirits and comfort us under trouble. The highest honour in heaven will be the reward of the greatest humility on earth.

I. We are cautioned against the sin of evil-speaking, v. 11. We must not speak evil things of others, though they be true, unless there be some necessary occasion for it; much less must we report evil things when they are false. Our lips must be guided by the law of kindness, as well as truth and justice. 1. Because you are brethren. It is required of us that we be tender of the good name of our brethren; where we cannot speak well, we had better say nothing than speak evil. 2. Because this is to judge the law. He who quarrels with his brother, and condemns him for the sake of anything not determined in the word of God, does thereby reflect on that word of God, as if it were not a perfect rule. Let us take heed of judging the law, for the law of the Lord is perfect; if men break the law, leave that to judge them; if they do not break it, let us not judge them. Those who are most ready to set up for judges of the law generally fail most in their obedience to it. 3. Because God, the Lawgiver, has reserved the power of passing the final sentence on men wholly to himself, v. 12. God is the supreme Lawgiver, who only can give law to the conscience, and who alone is to be absolutely obeyed. His right to enact laws is incontestable, because he has such a power to enforce them. He is able to save, and to destroy. He has power fully to reward the observance of his laws, and to punish all disobedience. Here he cautions against being many judges. Let us not prescribe to our brethren. It is sufficient that we have the law of God, which is a rule to us all; and therefore we should not set up other rules.

II. We are cautioned against a presumptuous confidence of the continuance of our lives, v. 13, 14. Reflect a little on this way of thinking and talking; call yourselves to account for it. There were some who said of old, as too many say still, We will go to such a city, and do this or that, while all serious regards to the disposals of Providence were neglected. 1. How apt worldly men are to leave God out of their schemes. 2. How much of worldly happiness lies in the promises men make to themselves beforehand. Their heads are full of fine visions, as to what they shall do in some future time. 3. How vain a thing it is to look for anything good in futurity, without the concurrence of Providence. We will go to such a city (say they). Something might possibly stop their way, or call them elsewhere. Many who have set out on a journey have gone to their long home, and never reached their journey's end. But, suppose they should reach the city they designed, how did they know they should continue there? Something might happen to shorten their stay They could not be certain that they should buy and sell there. Suppose they should go to that city, and continue there a year, yet they might not get gain; getting of gain in this world is at best but an uncertain thing. The frailty, shortness, and uncertainty of life, ought to check the presumptuous confidence of such projectors for futurity, v. 14. God hath wisely left us in the dark concerning future events. We know not what shall be on the morrow; we may know what we intend to do and to be, but a thousand things may happen to prevent us. We are not sure of life itself, since it is but as a vapour. It appears but for a little time, and then vanisheth away.

III. We are taught to keep up a constant sense of our dependence on the will of God, v. 15. The apostle now directs them how to be and do better: "You ought to say it in your hearts at all times, that if the Lord will give leave, you have such and such designs to accomplish." With the leave and blessing of God was used by the Greeks in the beginning of every undertaking. If the Lord will, we shall live. We must remember that our times are not in our own hands, but at the disposal of God, and therefore must be submissive to him. If the Lord will, we shall do this or that. All our actions and designs are under the control of Heaven. Therefore both our counsels for action and our conduct in action should be entirely referred to God.

IV. We are directed to avoid vain boasting, v. 16. They promised themselves life and prosperity, and great things in the world, without any just regard to God; and then they boasted of these things. Such rejoicing is evil; it is foolish and it is hurtful. If we rejoice in God that our times are in his hand, that all events are at his disposal, and that he is our God, this rejoicing is good. But, if we rejoice in our own vain confidences and presumptuous boasts, this is evil.

V. We are taught to act up to our own convictions, that we never go contrary to our own knowledge (v. 17). It is aggravated sin; it is sinning with a witness; and it is to have the worst witness against a man that can be, when he sins against his own conscience. Omissions are sins which will come into judgment, as well as commissions. He that does not the good he knows should be done, as well as he who does the evil he knows should not be done, will be condemned.

CHAP. V

The apostle denounces the judgments of God upon those rich men who oppress the poor, ver. 1–6. Hereupon, all the faithful are exhorted to patience under their trials and sufferings, ver. 7–11. The sin of swearing is cautioned against, ver. 12. We are directed how to act, both under affliction and in prosperity, ver. 13. Prayer for the sick, and anointing with oil, are prescribed, ver. 14, 15. Christians are directed to acknowledge their faults one to another, and to pray one for another, ver. 16–18. And, lastly, it is recommended to us to do what we can for bringing back those that stray from the ways of truth.

Verses 1–11

The apostle is here addressing first sinners and then saints.

I. The address to sinners; and here we find James seconding what his great Master had said: Woe unto you that are rich; for you have received your consolation, Luke vi. 24. The poor among the Jews received the gospel, and many of them believed; but the generality of the rich rejected Christianity, and persecuted those who believed on Christ.

1. He foretells the judgments of God that should come upon them, v. 1–3. They should have miseries come upon them, misery that should arise from the very things in which they placed their happiness. Go to now, you rich men. Rich men are apt to say to themselves (and others are ready to say to them), Eat, drink, and be merry; but God says, Weep and howl. Those who live like beasts are called to howl like such. "Corruption, decay, rust, and ruin, will come upon all your goodly things (v. 2). Those things which you now inordinately affect will be of no worth, of no use to you," v. 3. They think to heap up treasure for their latter days, but, alas! they are only heaping up treasures that will prove at last to be only treasures of wrath.

2. What those sins are which should bring such miseries. Covetousness is laid to the charge of this people. God gives us our worldly possessions that we may honour him and do good with them; but if, instead of this, we sinfully hoard them up, this is a very heinous crime, and will be witnessed against by the very rust and corruption of the treasure thus heaped together. Another sin is oppression, v. 4. Those who have wealth in their hands get power into their hands, and then they are tempted to abuse that power to oppress such as are under them. They made as hard bargains with the poor as they could, and even after that would not make good their bargains as they should have done. Another sin is sensuality and voluptuousness, v. 5. God does not forbid us to use pleasure; but to live in them as if we lived for nothing else is a very provoking sin. Luxury makes people wanton. Wantonness and luxury are commonly the effects of great plenty and abundance. "You have nourished your hearts as in a day of slaughter: you live as if it were every day a day of sacrifices, a festival." Some may say, "What harm is there in good cheer, provided people do not spend above what they have?" What! Is it no harm for people to make gods of their bellies, and to give all to these, instead of abounding in acts of charity and piety? Pride, and idleness, and fulness of bread, mean the same thing with living in pleasure, and being wanton, and nourishing the heart as in a day of slaughter. Another sin is persecution, v. 6. This fills up the measure of their iniquity. When such do suffer, and yield without resistance to the unjust sentence of oppressors, this is marked by God, to the honour of the sufferers and the infamy of their persecutors.

II. An address to saints. From what has been said concerning wicked and oppressing rich men, occasion is given to administer comfort to God's afflicted people.

1. Attend to your duty. (1) "Be patient though God should not appear for you immediately. Wait for him." When we have done our work, we have need of patience to stay for our reward. This Christian patience is not a mere yielding to necessity, as the moral patience taught by some philosophers was, but it is a humble acquiescence in the wisdom and will of God. Be patient to the coming of the Lord. And because this is a lesson Christians must learn, though ever so hard or difficult to them, it is repeated in v. 8. (2) "Establish your hearts—let your faith be firm, your practice of what is good constant and continued, and your resolutions for God and heaven fixed, in spite of all sufferings or temptations." (3) Grudge not one against another; Groan not one against another. Do not make yourselves uneasy and make one another uneasy by groaning to and grieving one another. Those who are in the midst of common enemies, and in any suffering circumstances, should be more especially careful not to groan against one another, otherwise judgments will come upon them as well as others.

2. Consider what encouragement here is for Christians to be patient. "Look to the example of the husbandman. When you sow your corn in the ground, you wait many months for the former and latter rain, and are willing to stay till harvest for the fruit of your labour. Consider him that waits for a crop of corn; and will not you wait for a crown of glory? If you should be called to wait a little longer than the husbandman does, is it not something proportionably greater and infinitely more worth your waiting for? Think how short your waiting time may possibly be (v. 8–9). Do not be impatient, do not quarrel with one another; the great Judge is at hand: as near as one who is just knocking at the door." Grudge not, lest you be condemned. Fretfulness and discontent expose us to the just judgment of God, and we bring more calamities upon ourselves by our groans and grudgings against one another, than we are aware of. We are encouraged to be patient by the example of the prophets (v. 10). When we think that the best men have had the hardest usage in this world, we should hereby be reconciled to affliction. Those who were the greatest examples of suffering affliction were also the best and greatest examples of patience. We count those happy who endure (v. 11). Job also is proposed as an example, v. 11. Under all he could bless God and what came to him in the end? God accomplished those things for him which plainly prove that the Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy. The tender mercy of God is such that he will make his people an abundant amends for all their sufferings and afflictions. Let us serve our God, and endure our trials, as those who believe the end will crown all.

Verses 12–20

I. The sin of swearing is cautioned against, v. 12. Some have translated the words, before all things; they should not, in common conversation, before everything they say, put an oath. All customary needless swearing is all along in scripture condemned, as a very grievous sin. Profane swearing was very customary among the Jews. Some of the looser sort of those who were called Christians might be guilty also of this.

1. Above all things, swear not; but how many are there who mind this the least of all things, and who make light of nothing so much as common profane swearing! It strikes most directly at the honour of God and most expressly throws contempt upon his name and authority. This sin has, of all sins, the least temptation to it. It is with most difficulty left off when once men are accustomed to it, therefore it should above all things he watched against. "Above all things swear not." But "all this is so far from forbidding necessary oaths that it is but to conform them, by preserving the due reverence of them." The Jews thought if they did but omit the great oath they were safe. But they grew so profane as to swear by the creature, as if it were God. On the other hand, those who swear commonly and profanely by the name of God do hereby put him upon the level with every common thing.

2. But let your yea be yea, and your nay nay; lest you fall into condemnation. Be sure to stand to your word, and be true to it, so as to give no occasion for your being suspected of falsehood. It is being suspected of falsehood that leads men to swearing.

II. As Christians we are taught to suit ourselves to the dispensations of Providence (v. 13). Our condition in this world is various; and our wisdom is to submit to its being so, and to behave as becomes us both in prosperity and under affliction. Afflictions should put us upon prayer, and prosperity should make us abound in praise. 1. In a day of affliction nothing is more seasonable than prayer. Times of affliction should be praying times. God sends afflictions, that we may be engaged to seek him early; and that those who at other times have neglected him may be brought to enquire after him. Afflictions naturally draw out complaints; and to whom should we complain but to God in prayer? It is necessary to exercise faith and hope under afflictions; and prayer is the appointed means both for obtaining and increasing these graces in us. 2. In a day of mirth and prosperity singing psalms is very proper and seasonable. This we are sure of, that the singing of psalms is a gospel ordinance, and that our joy should be holy joy, consecrated to God. Holy mirth becomes families and retirements, as well as public assemblies.

III. We have particular directions given as to sick persons, v. 14, 15. It lies upon sick people as a duty to send for ministers, and to desire their assistance and their prayers. It is the duty of ministers to pray over the sick, when thus desired and called for. The sick were to be anointed with oil in the name of the Lord. When miracles ceased, this institution ceased also. Some have thought that it should not be wholly laid aside in any age, but that where there are extraordinary measures of faith in the person anointing, and in those who are anointed, an extraordinary blessing may attend the observance of this direction for the sick. There is one thing carefully to be observed here, that the saving of the sick is not ascribed to the anointing with oil, but to prayer, v. 15. Prayer over the sick must proceed from, and be accompanied with, a lively faith. There must be faith both in the person praying and in the person prayed for. And, if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him. The great thing therefore we should beg of God for ourselves and others in the time of sickness is the pardon of sin. Sin is both the root of sickness and the sting of it. If sin be pardoned, either affliction shall be removed in mercy or we shall see there is mercy in the continuance of it.

IV. Christians are directed to confess their faults one to another, v. 16. The confession here required is that of Christians to one another. Where persons have injured one another. Where persons have tempted one another to sin, or have consented in the same evil actions. So far as confession is necessary to our reconciliation with such as are at variance with us, or for reparation of wrongs done to any, making our own spirits quiet and easy, so far we should be ready to confess our faults. And sometimes also it may be of good use to Christians to disclose their peculiar weaknesses and infirmities to one another. Those who make confession of their faults one to another should thereupon pray with and for one another.

V. The great advantage and efficacy of prayer are declared and proved, v. 17, 18. He who prays must be a righteous man. The prayer itself must be a fervent, in-wrought, well-wrought prayer. Such prayer avails much. It is of great advantage to ourselves, it may be very beneficial to our friends, and we are assured of its being acceptable to God. Elijah was a man of like passions with us. He was a zealous good man and a very great man, but he had his infirmities. In prayer we must not look to the merit of man, but to the grace of God. He prayed earnestly, or, as it is in the original, in prayer he prayed. It is not enough to say a prayer, but we must pray in prayer. Elijah prayed that it might not rain; and God heard him, so that it rained not on the earth for the space of three years and six months. Again he prayed, and the heaven gave rain, &c. This is recorded for encouragement even to ordinary Christians to be instant and earnest in prayer. Where there may not be so much of miracle in God's answering our prayers, yet there may be as much of grace.

VI. The epistle concludes with an exhortation to do all we can to promote the conversion and salvation of others, v. 19, 20. "If any err, and one convert him, let him be who he will that does so good an office for another, he is therein an instrument of saving a soul from death." Be they ever so great, you must not be afraid to show them their error; and, be they ever so weak and little, you must not disdain to make them wiser and better. If they err from the truth, whether it be in opinion or practice, you must endeavour to bring them again to the rule. Errors in judgment and in life generally go together. If we are instrumental in the conversion of any, we are said to convert them, though this be the work of God. And, if we can do no more towards the conversion of sinners, yet we may do this—pray for the grace and Spirit of God to convert and change them. He that is said to err from the truth in v. 19 is described as erring in his way in v. 20 and we cannot be said to convert any merely by altering their opinions, unless we can bring them to correct and amend their ways. This is conversion. He who thus converteth a sinner from the error of his ways shall save a soul from death. By such conversion of heart and life, a multitude of sins shall be hid. Though our sins are many, even a multitude, yet they may be hid or pardoned. Let people contrive to cover their sin as they will, there is no way effectually to hide it but by forsaking it. Some make the sense of this text to be, that conversion shall prevent a multitude of sins; and it is a truth beyond dispute that many sins are prevented in the party converted, many also may be prevented in others that he may have an influence upon.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF

PETER

Two epistles we have enrolled in the sacred canon of the scripture written by Peter. When our Saviour called his apostles, and gave them their commission, he nominated him first in the list; and by his behaviour towards him he seems to have distinguished him as a special favourite among the twelve. Many instances of our Lord's affection to him, both during his life and after his resurrection, are upon record. Peter himself modestly styles himself an apostle of Jesus Christ; and, when he writes to the presbyters of the church, he humbly places himself in the same rank with them: The elders who are among you I exhort, who am also an elder, ch. v. 1.

The design of this first epistle is, I. To explain more fully the doctrines of Christianity to these newly-converted Jews. II. To direct and persuade them to a holy conversation. III. To prepare them for sufferings. This seems to be his principal intention; for he has something to this purport in every chapter.

CHAP. I

The apostle describes the persons to whom he writes, and salutes them (ver. 1, 2), blesses God for their regeneration to a lively hope of eternal salvation (ver. 3-5), in the hope of this salvation he shows they had great cause of rejoicing, ver 6-9. This is that salvation which the ancient prophets foretold and the angels desire to look into, ver. 10-12. He exhorts them to sobriety and holiness (ver. 13-21), and to brotherly love, ver. 22-25.

Verses 1, 2

1. The author of it, described, 1. By his name—Peter. Jesus Christ gave him the surname of Peter, which signifies a rock, as a commendation of his faith. 2. By his office—an apostle of Jesus Christ. It signifies the highest office in the Christian church. Peter, (1) Asserts his own character as an apostle. To pretend to what we have not is hypocrisy; and to deny what we have is ingratitude. (2) He mentions his apostolical function as his warrant and call to write this epistle to these people.

II. The persons to whom this epistle was addressed are described,

1. By their external condition—Strangers dispersed throughout Pontus, Galatia, &c. At present their circumstances were poor and afflicted. The best of God's servants may, through the hardships of times, be dispersed about, and forced to leave their native countries. The value of good people ought not to be estimated by their present external condition.

2. They are described by their spiritual condition.

(1) Elect according to the foreknowledge of God the Father. Election is either to an office, or it is to the enjoyment of special privileges, or it is to eternal salvation. This is the election here spoken of. [1] This election is said to be according to the foreknowledge of God. Foreknowledge may be taken in two ways: First, For mere prescience, foresight, or understanding, that such a thing will be, before it comes to pass. Thus a mathematician certainly foreknows that at such a time there will be an eclipse. But such a prescience is not the cause why anything is so or so. Secondly, Foreknowledge sometimes signifies counsel, appointment, and approbation. The death of Christ was not only foreseen, but foreordained, as v. 20. Take it thus here; so the sense is, elect according to the counsel, ordination, and free grace of God. [2] It is added, according to the foreknowledge of God the Father. In the affair of man's redemption, election is ascribed to the Father, as reconciliation is to the Son and sanctification to the Holy Ghost.

(2) They were elect through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ. Every elect person must be sanctified by the Spirit, and justified by the blood of Jesus. By sanctification here understand living to God in all the duties of a Christian life, which is here summed up in one word, obedience. By the Spirit is meant the Holy Ghost, the author of sanctification. Unto obedience. This word denotes the end of sanctification, which is, to bring rebellious sinners to obedience again, You have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit, v. 22.

(3) They were elected also to the sprinkling of the blood of Jesus. Here is a manifest allusion to the typical sprinklings of blood under the law. The blood of Christ, the grand and all-sufficient sacrifice, was not only shed, but must be sprinkled and communicated to every one of these elect Christians. All that are chosen to eternal life as the end are chosen to obedience as the way. Unless a person be sanctified by the Spirit, and sprinkled with the blood of Jesus, there will be no true obedience in the life.

III. The salutation follows. The blessings desired for them are grace and peace. Grace—the free favour of God, with all its proper effects. Peace. All sorts of peace may be here intended: peace with God, with the feeling of it in our own consciences. The request or prayer, in relation to these blessings—that they may be multiplied. He wishes them the continuation, the increase, and the perfection of them. The best blessings we can desire for ourselves, or one for another, are grace and peace, with the multiplication of them. Peace cannot be enjoyed where there is no true grace; first grace, then peace. Peace without grace is mere stupidity; but grace may be true where there is for a time no actual peace. Christ was once in an agony. The increase of grace and peace, as well as the first gift of them, is from God.

Verses 3-5

I. A thanksgiving to God.

1. The duty performed, which is blessing God.

2. The object of this blessing described by his relation to Jesus Christ: The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Here are three names of one person, denoting his threefold office. He is Lord, a universal king. Jesus, a priest or Saviour. Christ, a prophet.

3. The reasons that oblige us to this duty of blessing God, which are comprised in his abundant mercy. He hath begotten us again, and this deserves our thanksgiving to God, especially if we consider the fruit it produces in us, which is that excellent grace of hope, a lively hope, a living, durable hope, as that hope must needs be that has such a solid foundation as the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead. A good Christian's condition is never so bad but he has great reason still to bless God. In our prayers and praises we should address God as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; it is only through him that we and our services are accepted. The best of men owe their best blessings to the abundant mercy of God. All the evil in the world is from man's sin, but all the good in it is from God's mercy. We subsist entirely upon divine mercy. Regeneration produces a lively hope of eternal life. Those who are begotten to a new and spiritual life are begotten to a new and spiritual hope. The hope of a Christian has this excellency, it is a living hope. The hope of eternal life in a true Christian is a hope that keeps him alive, quickens him, supports him, and conducts him to heaven. The delusive hopes of the unregenerate are vain and perishing; the hypocrite and his hope expire and die both together. The resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead is the ground or foundation of a Christian's hope. There being an inseparable union between Christ and his flock, they rise by virtue of his resurrection as a head.

II. The apostle goes on to describe that life under the notion of an inheritance. He tells them they were new-born to a new inheritance, infinitely better than what they had lost. They are put in mind of a noble inheritance reserved in heaven for them.

1. Heaven is the undoubted inheritance of all the children of God. God giveth his gifts unto all, but the inheritance to none but his children. This inheritance is not our purchase, but our Father's gift; not wages that we merit, but the effect of grace.

2. The incomparable excellencies of this inheritance. It is incorruptible, in which respect it is like its Maker. All corruption is a change from better to worse, but heaven is without change and without end; the house is eternal in the heavens. This inheritance is undefiled. Sin and misery have no place there. It fadeth not away, but always retains its vigour and beauty. "Reserved in heaven for you." It is certain, a reversion in another world, safely kept and preserved till we come to the possession of it. The persons for whom it is reserved are described by their character: everyone that is begotten again to a lively hope.

III. The apostle supposes some doubt or uneasiness whether they might not possibly fall short by the way. He answers that they should be kept and preserved from all such destructive temptations as would prevent their safe arrival at eternal life. The heirs of heaven shall certainly be conducted safely to the possession of it. The blessing here promised is preservation: You are kept; the author of it is God; the means in us made use of for that end are our own faith and care; the end to which we are preserved is salvation; and the time when we shall see the safe end and issue of all is the last time. Their being kept implies both danger and deliverance; they may be attacked, but shall not be overcome. The preservation of the regenerate to eternal life is the effect of God's power. Preservation by God's power does not supersede man's endeavour and care for his own salvation. Faith is a sovereign preservative of the soul through a state of grace unto a state of glory. This salvation is ready to be revealed in the last time. It is now prepared and reserved in heaven for them. Though it be made ready now, yet it is in a great measure hidden and unrevealed at present, even to the heirs of salvation themselves. It shall be fully and completely revealed in the last time. Life and immortality are now brought to light by the gospel, but this life will be revealed more gloriously at death, when the soul shall be admitted into the presence of Christ, and behold his glory.

Verses 6–9

The first word, wherein, refers to the apostle's foregoing discourse about the excellency of their present state, and their grand expectations for the future, v. 6.

I. Several things in mitigation of their sorrows. Every sound Christian has always something wherein he may greatly rejoice. The chief joy of a good Christian arises from things spiritual and heavenly. His joy arises from his treasure, which consists of matters of great value, and the title to them is sure. The best Christians may yet be in great heaviness through manifold temptations. All sorts of adversities are temptations, or trials. These seldom go singly, but are manifold, and come from different quarters, the effect of all which is great heaviness. The afflictions and sorrows of good people are but for a season. The shortness of any affliction does much abate the heaviness of it. Great heaviness is often necessary to a Christian's good: If need be, you are in heaviness. God does not afflict his people willingly, but acts with judgment, in proportion to our needs. These troubles, that lie heavy, never come upon us but when we have need, and never stay any longer than needs must.

II. He expresses the end of their afflictions and the ground of their joy under them, v. 7. The afflictions of serious Christians are designed for the trial of their faith. God's design in afflicting his people is their probation, not their destruction. This trial is made upon faith principally, because the trial of this is, in effect, the trial of all that is good in us. Christ prays for this apostle, that his faith might not fail; if that be supported, all the rest will stand firm. A tried faith is much more precious than tried gold. Here is a double comparison of faith and gold. Gold is the most valuable and durable of all the metals; so is faith among the Christian virtues; it lasts till it brings the soul to heaven. The trial of faith is much more precious than the trial of gold. Gold does not increase and multiply by trial in the fire, it rather grows less; but faith is established and multiplied by the afflictions that it meets with. Gold must perish at last—gold that perisheth; but faith never will. The trial of faith will be found to praise, and honour and glory. If a tried faith be found to praise, honour, and glory, let this recommend faith to you, as much more precious than gold, though it be assaulted and tried by afflictions. Jesus Christ will appear again in glory. The trial will soon be over, but the glory, honour, and praise will last to eternity.

III. He particularly commends the faith of these primitive Christians.

1. The excellency of its object, the unseen Jesus, v. 8. It is one thing to believe God, or Christ (so the devils believe), and another thing to believe in him.

2. Two notable productions or effects of their faith, love and joy, and this joy so great as to be above description.

(1) Sense converses with things sensible and present; reason is a higher guide, but faith ascends further still. It is the evidence of things not seen.

(2) True faith is never alone, but produces a strong love to Jesus Christ. True Christians have a sincere love to Jesus, because they believe in him.

(3) Where there are true faith and love to Christ there is joy unspeakable and full of glory. It cannot be described by words; the best discovery is by an experimental taste of it; it is full of glory, full of heaven. There is much of heaven and the future glory in the present joys of improved Christians; their faith removes the causes of sorrow, and affords the best reasons for joy. Well might these primitive Christians rejoice with joy unspeakable, since they were every day receiving the end of their faith, the salvation of their souls, v. 4. The blessing they were receiving: The salvation of their souls, which salvation is here called the end of their faith, the end wherein faith terminates. The salvation of the soul was the prize these Christians sought for, the end they aimed at, which came nearer and more within their reach every day. Every faithful Christian is daily receiving the salvation of his soul. These believers had the beginnings of heaven in the possession of holiness and a heavenly mind. They were on the losing side in the world, but the apostle puts them in mind of what they were receiving; if they lost an inferior good, they were all the while receiving the salvation of their souls. The glory of God and our own felicity are so connected that if we regularly seek the one we must attain the other.

Verses 10–12

The apostle goes on to show them what warrant he had for what he had delivered. He produces the authority of the prophets to convince them that the doctrine of salvation by faith in Jesus Christ was no new doctrine.

I. Who made this diligent search—the prophets, who were persons inspired by God.

II. The object of their search, which was salvation, and the grace of God which should come unto you. They foresaw glorious times of light, grace, and comfort, which made the prophets and righteous men desire to see and hear the things which came to pass in the days of the gospel.

III. The manner of their enquiry: they enquired and searched diligently. The words are strong and emphatic, alluding to miners, who dig to the bottom, and break through not only the earth, but the rock, to come to the ore; so these holy prophets had an earnest desire to know, and were proportionably diligent in their enquiries. Their being inspired did not make their industrious search needless. The doctrine of man's salvation by Jesus Christ has been the study and admiration of the greatest and wisest of men. Those who would be acquainted with this great salvation, and the grace that shines therein, must enquire and search diligently into it.

IV. The particular matters which the ancient prophets chiefly searched into, v. 11. Jesus Christ was the main subject of their studies.

1. His humiliation and death, and the glorious consequences of it. This enquiry would lead them into a view of the whole gospel.

2. Undoubtedly these holy prophets earnestly desired to see the days of the Son of man; and therefore their minds were set upon the time of its accomplishment, so far as the Spirit of Christ, which was in them, had signified anything towards that purpose. The nature of the times was also under their strict consideration. From the example of Christ Jesus learn to expect a time of services and sufferings before you are received to glory. It was so with him, and the disciple is not above his Lord.

V. The success with which their enquiries were crowned. God gave them a satisfactory revelation to quiet and comfort their minds. They were informed that these things should not come to pass in their time: Not unto themselves, but to us; and we must report them, under the infallible direction of the Holy Ghost, to all the world. Which things the angels, &c.

You have here three sorts of enquirers: 1. The prophets, who searched diligently into it. 2. The apostles, who consulted all the prophecies, and were witnesses of the accomplishment of them, and so reported what they knew to others in the preaching of the gospel. 3. The angels, who most attentively pry into these matters. A diligent endeavour after the knowledge of Christ will certainly be answered with good success. The holiest and best of men sometimes have their lawful and pious requests denied. God is pleased to answer our necessities rather than our requests. It is the practice of a Christian to be useful to others rather than to himself. The prophets ministered to others, not unto themselves. The revelations of God to his church are all perfectly consistent; the doctrine of the prophets and that of the apostles exactly agree, as coming from the same Spirit of God. The gospel is the ministration of the Spirit; the success of it depends upon his operation and blessing. The mysteries of the gospel are so glorious that the blessed angels earnestly desire to look into them.

I. He exhorts them to sobriety and holiness.

1. Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, &c., v. 13. Let the loins or strength and vigour of your minds be exerted in your duty; disengage yourselves from all that would hinder you, and go on resolutely in your obedience. Be sober, be vigilant against all your spiritual dangers and enemies, and be temperate and modest in the whole of your behaviour. Be sober-minded also in opinion, as well as in practice. The main work of a Christian lies in the right management of his heart and mind. The best Christians have need to be exhorted to sobriety. A Christian's work is not over as soon as he has got into a state of grace; he must still hope and strive for more grace. We must hope perfectly, and yet gird up our loins, and address ourselves vigorously to the work we have to do, encouraging ourselves from the grace of Jesus Christ.

2. As obedient children, &c., v. 14. An argument to press them to holiness from the consideration of what they now are, children of obedience, and what they were when they lived in lust and ignorance. The children of God ought to prove themselves to be such by their obedience to God. The best of God's children have had their times of lust and ignorance. Persons, when converted, differ exceedingly from what they were formerly.

3. But as he who hath called you, &c., v. 15, 16. It is required in strong terms, and enforced by three reasons, taken from the grace of God in calling us,—from his command, it is written,—and from his example. Be you holy, for I am holy. It is a great favour to be called effectually by divine grace into the possession of all the blessings of the new covenant; and great favours are strong obligations; they enable as well as oblige to be holy. Complete holiness is the desire and duty of every Christian. It must, for the extent of it, be universal. We must be holy, and be so in all manner of conversation, towards all people, friends and enemies; in all our intercourse and business still we must be holy. For the pattern of it, we must be holy, as God is holy: we must imitate him, though we can never equal him. The consideration of the holiness of God should oblige us to the highest degree of holiness we can attain unto.

4. If you call on the Father, &c., v. 17. The whole time of our sojourning here is to be passed in the fear of God. Holy confidence in God as a Father, and an awful fear of him as a Judge, are very consistent. The judgment of God will be without respect of persons: According to every man's work. God will not respect persons from personal considerations, but judge them according to their work.

5. He adds (v. 18) a second argument. Herein he puts them in mind, (1) That they were redeemed by a ransom paid to the Father. (2) What the price paid for their redemption was. (3) From what they were redeemed. (They knew this, and cannot pretend ignorance.) The consideration of our redemption ought to be a constant and powerful inducement to holiness, and the fear of God. God expects that a Christian should live answerably to what he knows. Neither silver nor gold, nor any of the corruptible things of this world, can redeem so much as one soul.

They are corruptible, and therefore cannot redeem an incorruptible and immortal soul. The blood of Jesus Christ is the only price of man's redemption. The design of Christ in shedding his most precious blood was to redeem us, not only from eternal misery hereafter, but from a vain conversation in this world. Not only the open wickedness, but the vanity and unprofitableness of our conversation are highly dangerous. A man's conversation may plead antiquity, custom, and tradition, in its defence, and yet after all be a most vain conversation. Antiquity is no certain rule of verity.

6. Some things relating both to the Redeemer and the redeemed, v. 20, 21.

(1) The Redeemer is further described as one, [1] That was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world. It imports an act of the will, a resolution that the thing shall be. [2] That was manifested in these last days for them. He was manifested to be that Redeemer whom God had fore-ordained. "This was done in these last times of the New Testament and of the gospel. You have the comfort of the manifestation and appearance of Christ, if you believe on him." [3] That was raised from the dead by the Father, who gave him glory, proclaimed him to all the world to be his Son by his resurrection from the dead, and glorified him with that glory which he had with God before the world was.

(2) The redeemed are also described here by their faith and hope, the cause of which is Jesus Christ: "You do by him believe in God."

(3) The decree of God to send Christ to be a Mediator was from everlasting. God had purposes of special favour towards his people long before he made any manifestations of such grace to them. Great is the happiness of the last times in comparison with what the former ages of the world enjoyed. Our gratitude and services should be suitable to such favours.

II. He exhorts them to brotherly love.

1. He supposes that the gospel had already produced at least an unfeigned love of the brethren, v. 22. It is not to be doubted but that every sincere Christian purifies his soul. The apostle takes this for granted: Seeing you have, &c. The word of God is the great instrument of a sinner's purification. Many hear the truth, but are never purified by it, because they will not submit to it nor obey it. The Spirit of God is the great agent in the purification of man's soul. The Spirit excites our endeavours, and makes them successful. The aid of the Spirit does not supersede our own industry; these people purified their own souls, but it was through the Spirit. The souls of Christians must be purified before they can so much as love one another unfeignedly. There is no charity but out of a pure heart.

2. He further presses upon Christians the duty of loving one another with a pure heart fervently from the consideration of their spiritual relation. All Christians are born again. They are brought into a new and a near relation to one another, they become brethren by their new birth. This new and second birth is much more desirable and excellent than the first. By the one we become the children of men, by the other the sons and daughters of the Most High. Brethren by nature are bound to love one another; but the obligation is double where there is a spiritual relation.

Verses 24, 25

He now sets before us the vanity of the natural man. Nothing can make him a solid substantial being, but the being born again of the incorruptible seed, the word of God; and this word is daily set before you in the preaching of the gospel. Man, in his utmost flourish and glory, is still a withering, fading, dying creature. His wit, beauty, strength, vigour, wealth, honour—these are but as the flower of grass, which soon withers and dies away. The only way to render this perishing creature solid and incorruptible is for him to entertain and receive the word of God; for this will preserve him to everlasting life, and abide with him for ever.

CHAP. II

The general exhortation to holiness is continued. The means of obtaining it, the word of God, is recommended, ver. 1–12. Particular directions are given, ver. 13, to the end.

Verses 1–3

I. Lay aside or put off what is evil.

1. The sins to be put off, or thrown aside. Malice. Malice is settled overgrown anger, retained till it inflames a man to design mischief. Guile, or deceit in words. Hypocrisies. The word being plural comprehends all sorts of hypocrisies. Envies; which is a grieving at the good and welfare of another. Evil speaking, speaking against another, or defaming him.

2. The best Christians have need to be cautioned and warned against the worst sins. They are but sanctified in part, and are still liable to temptations. Our best services towards God will neither please him nor profit us if we be not conscientious in our duties to men. One sin, not laid aside, will hinder our spiritual profit and everlasting welfare.

II. The apostle, like a wise physician, goes on to direct to wholesome food, that they may grow thereby. The duty exhorted to is a strong and constant desire for the word of God. This milk of the word must be sincere, not adulterated by the mixtures of men: As new-born babes. A new life requires suitable food. Infants desire common milk, and their desires towards it are fervent and frequent. Such must Christians' desires be for the word of God: that they may grow thereby. Strong desires and affections to the word of God are a sure evidence of a person's being born again. Growth and improvement in wisdom and grace are the desire of every Christian. The word of God, does not leave a man as it finds him.

III. He adds an argument from their own experience, v. 3. The apostle does not express a doubt, but affirms that these good Christians had tasted the goodness of God. Our Lord Jesus Christ is very gracious to his people; he has in him a fulness of grace. The graciousness of our Redeemer is best discovered by an experimental taste of it. We cannot taste at a distance, as we may see, and hear, and smell. To taste the graciousness of Christ experimentally supposes our being united to him by faith. The best of God's servants have in this life but a taste of the grace of Christ.

Verses 4–12

I. A description of Jesus Christ as a living stone.

1. He is called a stone, to denote his invincible strength and everlasting duration, and to teach his servants that he is the foundation on which they are built. He is the living stone, having eternal life in himself. The reputation and respect he has with God and man are very different. He is disallowed of men, but chosen of God, and gracious. To whom coming; by faith, whereby we are united to him at first, and draw nigh to him afterwards. Jesus Christ is the very foundation-stone of all our hopes and happiness. However Christ may be disallowed by an ungrateful world, yet he is chosen of God, and precious in his account. Those who expect mercy from this gracious Redeemer must come to him, which is our act, though done by God's grace—a real endeavour, not a fruitless wish.

2. The apostle goes on to speak of the superstructure, the materials built upon him, v. 6. The apostle is recommending the Christian church and constitution to these dispersed Jews. The Christian church is a much nobler fabric than the Jewish temple; it is a living temple. Christ, the foundation, is a living stone. Christians are lively stones, and they are a holy priesthood. They offer spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ. All sincere Christians have in them a principle of spiritual life communicated to them from Christ; not dead in trespasses and sins, but alive to God. The church of God is a spiritual house. This house is daily built up, every part of it improving, and the whole supplied in every age by the addition of new particular members. All good Christians are a holy priesthood. This holy priesthood must and will offer up spiritual sacrifices to God. The most spiritual sacrifices of the best men are not acceptable to God, but through Jesus Christ; therefore bring all your oblations to him, and by him present them to God.

II. He confirms what he had asserted of Christ being a living stone, &c., from Isa. xxviii. 16. In their quotations they kept rather to the sense than the words of scripture. The true sense of scripture may be justly and fully expressed in other than scripture-words, but in the weighty matters of religion we must depend entirely upon scripture-proof. The word of God is the only rule God hath given us. The accounts that God hath given us in scripture concerning his Son Jesus Christ are what require our strictest attention. Behold, I lay, &c. The constituting of Christ Jesus head of the church is an eminent work of God: I lay in Zion. Jesus Christ is the chief corner-stone that God hath laid in his spiritual building. The corner-stone stays inseparably with the building, supports it, unites it, and adorns it. So does Christ by his holy church, his spiritual house.

III. He deduces an important inference, v. 7. "You who believe will be so far from being ashamed of him that you will boast of him and glory in him for ever." The disobedient will go on to disallow Jesus Christ; but God is resolved that he shall be, in despite of all opposition, the head of the corner. The apostle draws an inference from the prophet's testimony. The prophet did not expressly say so, but yet he said that from which the consequence was unavoidable. The business of a faithful minister is to apply general truths to the particular condition and state of his hearers. The apostle quotes a passage (v. 6) out of the prophet, and applies it severally to good and bad. This requires wisdom, courage, and fidelity; but it is very profitable to the hearers. Disobedient people have no true faith. These may have some right notions, but no solid faith. Those that ought to be builders of the church of Christ are often the worst enemies that Christ has in the world. God will carry on his own work notwithstanding the falseness of pretended friends and the opposition of his worst enemies.

IV. The apostle adds a further description, still preserving the metaphor of a stone, v. 8. The words are taken from Isa. viii. 13, 14.

1. The builders, the chief-priests, refused him, and the people followed their leaders; and so Christ became to them a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offence. All those that are disobedient take offence at the word of God. They are offended with Christ himself, with his doctrine and the purity of his precepts. The same blessed Jesus who is the author of salvation to some is to others the occasion of their sin and destruction. Those who reject him as a Saviour will split upon him as a Rock.

2. Those who received him were highly privileged, v. 9. The Jews were exceedingly tender of their ancient privileges.

(1) The apostle answers, that if they did not submit they were ruined (v. 7, 8), but that if they did submit they should lose no real advantage, but continue still a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, &c. All true Christians are a chosen generation; they all make one family, a sort and species of people distinct from the common world. All the true servants of Christ are a royal priesthood, separated from sin and sinners, consecrated to God, and offering to God spiritual services and oblations, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ. All Christians, wheresoever they be, compose one holy nation. It is the honour of the servants of Christ that they are God's peculiar people. These dignities and virtues of Christians are not natural to them; for their first state is a state of horrid darkness, but they are effectually called out of darkness that they should show forth the virtues and praises of him who hath called them.

(2) The apostle advises them to compare their former and their present state. Time was when they were not a people, nor had they obtained mercy, but now they are taken in again to be the people of God, and have obtained mercy.

V. He warns them to beware of fleshly lusts, v. 11. Knowing the difficulty, and yet the importance of the duty, he uses his utmost interest in them: Dearly beloved, I beseech you. The duty is to abstain from fleshly lusts. These Christians ought to avoid, considering, 1. The respect they have with God: They are dearly beloved. 2. Their condition in the world: They are strangers and pilgrims, and should not impede their passage by giving in to the lusts of the country through which they pass. 3. The grand mischief that sin does to man is this, it wars against the soul. Of all sorts of sin, none are more injurious to the soul than fleshly lusts.

VI. He exhorts them further to an honest conversation. They lived among the Gentiles who were inveterate enemies to them, and constantly spoke evil of them as of evil-doers. "A good conversation may not only stop their mouths, but may possibly be a means to bring them to glorify God, and turn to you, when they shall see you excel all others in good works. Vindicate yourselves by good works, this is the way to convince them. When the gospel shall come among them, and take effect, a good conversation will encourage them in their conversion, but an evil one will obstruct it."

Verses 13–25

A Christian conversation must be honest.

1. The case of subjects. Christians were not only reputed innovators in religion, but disturbers of the state; it was highly necessary, therefore, that the apostle should settle the rules of obedience to the civil magistrate.

1. The duty required is submission.

2. The persons or objects to whom this submission is due are described. More generally: Every ordinance of man. Magistracy is certainly of divine right; and this is a general rule, binding in all nations, let the established form of government be what it will. Particularly: To the king, as supreme, or unto governors, who are sent by him, commissioned by him to govern.

3. The reasons to enforce this duty are,

(1) For the Lord's sake, who has ordained magistracy for the good of mankind.

(2) From the end and use of the magistrate's office, which are, to punish evil-doers and to praise and encourage all those that do well. True religion is the best support of civil government. The best way the magistrate can take to discharge his own duty, and to amend the world, is to punish well and reward well.

(3) Christians should submit to the civil magistrate, v. 15. The will of God is, to a good man, the strongest reason for any duty. A Christian must endeavour, in all relations, to behave himself so as to put to silence the unreasonable reproaches of the most ignorant and foolish men.

(4) The spiritual nature of Christian liberty. The apostle tells the Christians that they were free, but from what? Not from duty or obedience to God's law, which requires subjection to the civil magistrate. They were free spiritually, but must still remember they were the servants of God. All the servants of Christ are free men. The servants of Jesus Christ ought to be very careful not to abuse their Christian liberty.

4. The apostle concludes with four admirable precepts: (1) Honour all men. A due respect is to be given to all men; the poor are not to be despised; the wicked must be honoured, not for their wickedness, but for any other qualities. (2) Love the brotherhood. All Christians are a fraternity. They should therefore love one another with an especial affection. (3) Fear God with the highest reverence. If this be wanting, none of the other three duties can be performed as they ought. (4) Honour the king.

II. The case of servants. They imagined that their Christian liberty set them free from their unbelieving and cruel masters; Servants, be subject, v. 18.

1. He orders them to be subject, and that not only to the good and gentle, but even to the crooked and perverse. The sinful misconduct of one relation does not justify the sinful behaviour of the other; the servant is bound to do his duty, though the master be sinfully froward and perverse. Good people are meek and gentle to their servants and inferiors.

2. He condescends to reason with them about it.

(1) If they were patient under their hardships, while they suffered unjustly, this would be acceptable to God, v. 19, 20. There is no condition so mean but a man may glorify God in it; the meanest servant may do so. The most conscientious persons are very often the greatest sufferers. For conscience towards God, they suffer wrongfully; they do well, and suffer for it; but sufferers of this sort are praiseworthy, they do honour to God and they are accepted of him. Deserved sufferings must be endured with patience.

(2) More reasons to encourage Christian servants to patience under unjust sufferings, v. 21. From their Christian calling. From the example of Christ. Good Christians are a sort of people called to be sufferers, and therefore they must expect it; they are bound to deny themselves, and take up the cross. Jesus Christ suffered for you, or for us, in our stead and for our good, v. 24. The sufferings of Christ should quiet us under the most unjust and cruel sufferings we meet with in the world. Shall not we sinners submit to the light afflictions of this life, which work for us unspeakable advantages afterwards?

3. The example of Christ's subjection and patience is here explained: Christ suffered, (1) Wrongfully, v. 22. His words, as well as his actions, were all sincere, just, and right. (2) Patiently, v. 23. Provocations to sin can never justify the commission of it. The reasons for sin can never be so great, but we have always stronger reasons to avoid it.

4. Lest any should think that Christ's death was designed merely for an example of patience under sufferings, the apostle here adds a more glorious design and effect of it: Who his own self. The person suffering—Jesus Christ: His own self—in his own body. The expression his own self is emphatic to distinguish him from the Levitical priests (who offered the blood of others). The sufferings he underwent were stripes and the death of the cross—servile and ignominious punishments! The reason of his sufferings: He bore our sins. Christ, in his sufferings, stood charged with our sins. He bore the punishment of them. As the scape-goat did typically bear the sins of the people on his head, and then carried them quite away, so the Lamb of God does first bear our sins in his own body, and thereby take away the sins of the world. The fruits of Christ's sufferings. Our sanctification. Our justification. By his stripes we are healed.

5. The difference between their former and present condition, v. 25. (1) Man's sin: he goes astray; it is his own act. (2) His misery: he goes astray from the shepherd, and from the flock. (3) The recovery of these by conversion. This return is to Christ, who is the true careful shepherd, that loves his sheep, who is the most vigilant pastor, and bishop, or overseer of souls.

CHAP. III

The duties of husbands and wives one to another, ver. 1–7. He exhorts Christians to unity and patience under sufferings; to oppose the slanders of their enemies, ver. 8–17. To encourage them to this he proposes the example of Christ, ver. 18, to the end.

Verses 1–7

I. Lest the Christian matrons should imagine that their conversion to Christ exempted them from subjection to their pagan or Jewish husbands, the apostle here tells them,

1. In what the duty of wives consists.

(1) In subjection, which obliging conduct would be the most likely way to win those unbelieving husbands who had rejected the word, or who attended to no other evidence of the truth of it than what they saw in the exemplary conversation of their wives. A cheerful subjection, and a loving, reverential respect, are duties which Christian women owe their husbands, whether they be good or bad. There is nothing more powerful, next to the word of God, to win people, than a good conversation.

(2) In fear, or reverence to their husbands.

(3) In a chaste conversation. Evil men are strict observers of the conversation of the professors of religion. A chaste conversation is an excellent means to win them to the faith of the gospel.

(4) In preferring the ornaments of the mind to those of the body, v. 3. Here are three sorts of ornaments forbidden: plaiting of hair, which was commonly used in those times by lewd women; wearing of gold; putting on of apparel with too much nicety and costliness in it. Religious people should take care that all their external behaviour be answerable to their profession. The outward adorning of the body is very often sensual and excessive. The attire of a harlot can never become a chaste Christian matron. He directs Christian wives to put on much more excellent and beautiful ornaments, v. 4. First, The part to be adorned: The hidden man of the heart. Take care to adorn and beautify your souls rather than your bodies. Secondly, The ornament prescribed. It must be something not corruptible. The ornaments of the body perish in the using; but the grace of God, the longer we wear it, the brighter and better it is. The finest ornament of Christian women is a meek and quiet spirit. If the husband be harsh, and averse to religion, there is no way so likely to win him as a prudent meek behaviour. A true Christian's chief care lies in the right ordering and commanding of his own spirit. Where the hypocrite's work ends, there the true Christian's work begins. The endowments of the inner man are the chief ornaments of a Christian; but especially a composed, calm, and quiet spirit, renders either man or woman beautiful and lovely.

2. The apostle enforces them by the example, (1) Of the holy women of old, who trusted in God, v. 5. "The duties imposed upon you are not new, but what have ever been practised by the greatest and best women in the world." (2) Of Sara, who obeyed her husband, and followed him. "Whose daughters you are if you imitate her in faith and good works." The subjection of wives to their husbands is a duty which has been practised universally by holy women in all ages. Christians ought to do their duty to one another, not out of fear, nor from force, but from a willing mind, and in obedience to the command of God.

II. The husband's duty to the wife.

1. The particulars are: Cohabitation. Dwelling with the wife according to knowledge, as wise and sober men, who know the word of God and their own duty. Giving honour to the wife—giving due respect to her, and placing a due trust and confidence in her.

2. The reasons are, Because she is the weaker vessel. The wife is, in other and higher respects, equal to her husband; they are heirs together of the grace of life, and therefore should live peaceable one with another, and, if they do not, their prayers one with another and one for another will be hindered.

Verses 8–15

I. How Christians and friends should treat one another. Christians should endeavour to be all of one mind in the great points of faith, in real affection, and in Christian practice. Though Christians cannot be exactly of the same mind, yet they should have compassion one for another, and love as brethren. Christianity requires pity to the distressed, and civility to all.

II. He instructs us how to behave towards enemies.

1. "When they rail at you, do you bless them; when they give you evil words, do you give them good ones; for Christ has called you to bless those that curse you, and has settled a blessing on you as your everlasting inheritance." The laws of Christ oblige us to return blessing for railing (Matt. v. 44). We must pity, pray for, and love those who rail at us. A Christian's calling, as it invests him with glorious privileges, so it obliges him to difficult dutics.

2. An excellent prescription for a comfortable happy life in this quarrelsome ill-natured world (v. 10): it is quoted from Ps. xxxiv. 12–14. It is lawful to consider temporal advantages as motives and encouragements to religion. The practice of religion, particularly the right government of the tongue, is the best way to make this life comfortable and prosperous; a sincere, inoffensive, discreet tongue, is a singular means to pass us peaceably and comfortably through the world. It is the duty of Christians not only to embrace peace when it is offered, but to seek and pursue it when it is denied.

3. Christians need not fear that such patient inoffensive behaviour will invite the cruelty of their enemies (v. 12). His ears are open to their prayers. But the face of the Lord is against those that do evil. He is more an enemy to wicked persecutors than men are. God hath a special care and paternal affection towards all his righteous people. God doth always hear the prayers of the faithful.

4. This patient humble behaviour of Christians is further urged. This will be the best and surest way to prevent suffering, v. 13. "Ordinarily, there will be but few so diabolical and impious as to harm those who live so innocently and usefully as you do." But if you suffer for righteousness' sake (v. 14), it will be your glory and your happiness. "You need not be afraid of anything they can do to strike you with terror, neither be much troubled nor concerned about the rage or force of your enemies." To follow always that which is good is the best course we can take to keep out of harm's way. To suffer for righteousness' sake is the honour and happiness of a Christian. Christians have no reason to be afraid of the threats or rage of any of their enemies. Instead of terrifying yourselves with the fear of men, be sure to sanctify the Lord God in your hearts (v. 15). "When this principle is laid deeply into your hearts, the next thing, as to men, is to be always ready to give an answer to every man that asketh a reason of your hope. The hope and faith of a Christian are defensible against all the world. Every Christian is bound to answer for the hope that is in him. Christians should have a reason ready for their Christianity, that it may appear they are not actuated either by folly or fancy. These confessions of our faith ought to be made with meekness and fear.

Verses 16, 17

The confession of a Christian's faith cannot credibly be supported but by a good conscience and a good conversation. Conscience is good when it is kept clear from guilt. A good conversation in Christ is a holy life. "Look well to your conscience, and to your conversation; and then, though men falsely accuse you as evil-doers, you will bring them to shame. Be not discouraged, for it is better for you, though worse for your enemies, that you suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing." The most conscientious persons cannot escape the censures and slanders of evil men. Christ and his apostles were so used. False accusation generally turns to the accuser's shame. As well-doing sometimes exposes a good man to suffering, so evil-doing will not exempt an evil man from it. If the sufferings of good people for well-doing be so severe, what will the sufferings of wicked people be for evil-doing?

Verses 18–20

I. The example of Christ is proposed as an argument for patience. Jesus Christ himself was not exempted from sufferings in this life. The reason of Christ's suffering was the sins of men: Christ suffered for sins. In the case of our Lord's suffering, it was the just that suffered for the unjust. He that knew no sin suffered instead of those that knew no righteousness. The merit and perfection of Christ's sacrifice. The legal sacrifices were repeated but the sacrifice of Christ, once suffered, purgeth away sin. The blessed design of our Lord's sufferings was to bring us to God. The issue of Christ's suffering. He was put to death in his human nature, but he was quickened and raised again by the Spirit. If Christ was not exempted from sufferings, why should Christians expect it? If he, though perfectly just, why should not we, who are all criminals? If he once suffered, and then entered into glory, shall not we be patient under trouble?

II. The apostle passes from the example of Christ to that of the old world. They had now an offer of mercy; those that accepted of it should be saved, but those who rejected Christ should be as certainly destroyed as ever the disobedient in the times of Noah were. 1. The preacher—Christ Jesus. He went and preached, by his Spirit striving with them. 2. The hearers. He properly calls them spirits now in prison; not that they were in prison when Christ preached to them. 3. The sin of these people: They were disobedient. This their sin is aggravated from the patience and long-suffering of God. 4. The event of all: Their bodies were drowned. Noah and his family, who believed and were obedient, were saved in the ark. Though the patience of God wait long upon sinners, yet it will expire at last; it is beneath the majesty of the great God always to wait upon man in vain. The way of the most is neither the best, the wisest, nor the safest way to follow: better to follow the eight in the ark.

Verses 21, 22

Noah's salvation in the ark upon the water prefigured the salvation of all good Christians by baptism.

I. What he means by saving baptism; not the outward ceremony of washing with water, but it is that baptism wherein there is a faithful answer of a resolved good conscience.

II. The efficacy of baptism to salvation depends not upon the work done, but upon the resurrection of Christ. The sacrament of baptism, rightly received, is a means and a pledge of salvation. Baptism now saveth us. The external participation of baptism will save no man without an answerable good conscience and conversation. There must be the answer of a good conscience towards God.

III. The apostle proceeds to speak of his ascension, and sitting at the right hand of the Father, v. 22. If the advancement of Christ was so glorious after his deep humiliation, let not his followers despair, but expect that after these short distresses they shall be advanced to transcendent joy and glory. Upon his ascension into heaven, Christ is enthroned at the right hand of the Father. Angels, authorities, and powers, are all made subject to Christ Jesus.

CHAP. IV

The work of a Christian is twofold—doing the will of God and suffering his pleasure. This chapter directs us in both. The duties we are here exhorted to employ ourselves in, ver. 1–11. The directions for sufferings are that we should not be surprised at them, but rejoice in them. The best way to preserve their souls is to commit them to God in well-doing.

Verses 1–3

I. How the exhortation is expressed. Christ had suffered for us in the flesh, or in his human nature. "Arm and fortify yourselves likewise with the same mind. As Christ suffered in his human nature, do you make your corrupt nature suffer, by putting to death the body of sin by self-denial and mortification. Cease from sin." Some of the strongest and best arguments against all sorts of sin are taken from the sufferings of Christ. All sympathy and tenderness for Christ as a sufferer are lost if you do not put away sin. The beginning of all true mortification lies in the mind, not in penances and hardships upon the body.

II. How it is further explained, v. 2. Negatively, a Christian ought no longer to live the rest of his time in the flesh, but, positively, he ought to conform himself to the revealed will of the holy God. The lusts of men are the springs of all their wickedness. Let occasional temptations be what they will, they could not prevail, were it not for men's own corruptions. True conversion makes a marvellous change in the heart and life of everyone who partakes of it. It alters the mind and conversation of everyone who has experienced it.

III. How it is enforced (v. 3). "It is but just that as you have hitherto all the former part of your life served sin and Satan, so you should now serve the living God." When a man is truly converted, it is very grievous to him to think how the time past of his life has been spent. While the will of man is unsanctified and corrupt, he walks continually in wicked ways, and he makes a bad condition daily worse and worse. One sin, allowed, draws on another. Here are six named. (1) Lasciviousness, expressed in looks, gesture, or behaviour. (2) Lusts, acts of lewdness. (3) Excess of wine. (4) Revellings, too frequent, too full, or too expensive. (5) Banquetings, by which is meant gluttony. (6) Abominable idolatry; the idol-worship of the Gentiles. It is a Christian's duty not only to abstain from what is grossly wicked, but also from those things that are generally the occasions of sin.

Verses 4–6

I. Here you have the visible change wrought in those who were represented as having been in the former part of their life very wicked. The conduct of their wicked acquaintance towards them. 1. They think it strange that their old friends should not run with as much violence as they used to do to the same excess of riot. 2. They speak evil of them. Those that are once really converted will not return to their former course of life. Neither persuasion nor reproach will prevail with them to be or to do as they were wont to do. The temper and behaviour of true Christians seem very strange to ungodly men. The ungodly cannot comprehend. The best actions of religious people cannot escape the censures and slanders of those who are irreligious. They will speak evil of good people, though they themselves reap the fruits of their charity, piety, and goodness.

II. For the comfort of the servants of God, it is here added,

1. That all wicked people shall give an account to him who is ready to judge. The malignant world shall in a little time give an account to the great God of all their evil speeches against his people.

2. That for this cause was the gospel preached also to those that are dead, v. 6. The mortifying of our sins and living to God are the expected effects of the gospel preached to us. God will certainly reckon with all those who have had the gospel preached to them, but without these good effects produced by it. It is no matter how we are judged according to men in the flesh, if we do but live according to God in the Spirit.

Verses 7–11

We have here an awful position and an inference drawn from it. The position is that the end of all things is at hand. Consequently, the time of their persecution is but very short. Your own life and that of your enemies will soon come to their utmost period. Nay, the world itself will not continue very long. The inference from this comprises a series of exhortations.

1. To sobriety and watchfulness, v. 7. Do not suffer yourselves to be caught with your former sins and temptations, v. 3. And watch unto prayer. Take care that you be frequent in prayers, lest this end come upon you unawares. Those who would pray to purpose must watch unto prayer.

2. To charity, v. 8. Christians ought to love one another. This mutual affection must not be cold, but fervent, that is, sincere, strong, and lasting. This sort of earnest affection is recommended above all things, which shows the importance of it. One excellent effect of it is that it will cover a multitude of sins. Have charity among yourselves. There is a special relation between all sincere Christians, and a particular amiableness and good in them, which require special affection. It is not enough for Christians not to bear malice, nor to have common respect for one another, they must intensely and fervently love each other. It is the property of true charity to cover a multitude of sins. It inclines people to forgive and forget offences against themselves, to cover the sins of others, rather than aggravate them and spread them abroad. It prepares for mercy at the hand of God, who hath promised to forgive those that forgive others.

3. To hospitality, v. 9. The proper objects of Christian hospitality are one another. The manner of performing this duty is this: it must be done in an easy, kind, handsome manner, without grudging or grumbling at the expense or trouble. Christians ought not only to be charitable, but hospitable, one to another.

4. To the improvement of talents, v. 11.

(1) Whatever gift, whatever power, of doing good is given to us, we should minister with the same one to another. In receiving and using the manifold gifts of God we must look upon ourselves as stewards only.

(2) The apostle exemplifies his direction about gifts in two particulars—speaking and ministering. If any man speak or teach, he must do it as the oracles of God. What Christians in private, or ministers in public, teach and speak must be the pure word and oracles of God. If any man minister let him do it as of the ability which God giveth. That God in all things may be glorified, through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion for ever and ever. Amen. First, It is the duty of Christians in private, as well as ministers in public, to speak to one another of the things of God. Secondly, It highly concerns all preachers of the gospel to keep close to the word of God, and to treat that word as becomes the oracles of God. Thirdly, Whatever we are called to do for the honour of God and the good of others we should do it with all our might. Fourthly, In all the duties and services of life we should aim at the glory of God; all other views must be subservient to this. Fifthly, God in all things must be glorified through Jesus Christ, who is the only way to the Father.

Verses 12–19

The frequent repetition of comfort to Christians, considered as sufferers, in every chapter of this epistle, shows that the greatest danger these new converts were in arose from the persecutions to which their embracing Christianity exposed them. The apostle comes here to direct them in the necessary duty of patience under sufferings.

I. The apostle's kind manner of address: they were his beloved, v. 9.

II. His advice to them, relating to their sufferings.

1. They should not think them strange, nor be surprised at them.

(1) Though they be sharp and fiery, yet they are designed only to try, not to ruin them. They ought rather to rejoice under their sufferings, because theirs may properly be called Christ's sufferings. He suffers in them, and feels in our infirmities; and, if we be partakers of his sufferings, we shall also be made partakers of his glory. The apostle owns these poor afflicted Christians, and calls them his beloved. True Christians never look more amiable one to another than in their adversities. There is no reason for Christians to wonder at the unkindnesses and persecutions of the world, because they are forewarned of them. Christ himself endured them. Christians ought not only to be patient, but to rejoice, in their sharpest sorest sufferings for Christ. Those who rejoice in their sufferings for Christ shall eternally triumph and rejoice with him in glory.

(2) The apostle descends to a lower degree of persecution, v. 14. They would be reviled, evil-spoken of, and slandered for the name or sake of Christ. In such case he asserts, Happy are you. "You have the Spirit of God with you and the Spirit of God is also the Spirit of glory. This glorious Spirit resteth upon you. By your patience and fortitude in suffering he is on your part glorified; but by the contempt and reproaches cast upon you the Spirit itself is evil-spoken of and blasphemed." The happiness of good people not only consists with, but even flows from, their afflictions: Happy are you. That man who hath the Spirit of God resting upon him cannot be miserable, let his afflictions be ever so great. When good people are vilified for the name of Christ his Holy Spirit is glorified in them.

2. They should take care they did not suffer justly, as evil-doers, v. 15. Their enemies charged them with these and other foul crimes: therefore the apostle thought these cautions necessary. If any man suffer for the cause of Christianity, and with a patient Christian spirit, he ought not to account it a shame, and ought to glorify God who hath thus dignified him, v. 16. But there is very little comfort in sufferings when we bring them upon ourselves by our own sin and folly. It is not the suffering, but the cause, that makes the martyr.

3. Their trials were now at hand, v. 17, 18.

(1) The time had come when judgment must begin at the house of God. This renders all the foregoing exhortations to patience necessary for you. These judgments will but begin with you that are God's house. "Your troubles will be but light and short, in comparison of what shall befall the wicked world. What shall the end be of those who obey not the gospel of God?" The best of God's servants have so much amiss in them as renders it fit and necessary that God should sometimes correct and punish them. Judgment begins at the house of God. Those who are the family of God have their worst things in this life. Their worst condition is tolerable, and will soon be over. The apostle distinguishes the disobedient from the house of God. What shall the end be of those that obey not the gospel?

(2) He intimates the irremediable doom of the wicked, v. 18. The grievous sufferings of good people in this world are sad presages of much heavier judgments coming upon impenitent sinners. It is as much as the righteous can do to be saved. Let the absolute necessity of salvation balance the difficulty of it. Your difficulties are greatest at first; God offers his grace and help.

4. When called to suffer, according to the will of God, they should look chiefly to the safety of their souls, committing them to God, who will undertake the charge, for he is their Creator, v. 19. All the sufferings that befall good people come upon them according to the will of God. It is the duty of Christians to look more to the keeping of their souls than to the preserving of their bodies. Good people have great encouragement to commit their souls to God, because he is their Creator, and faithful in all his promises.

CHAP. V

In which the apostle gives particular directions, first to the elders, ver. 1–4; then to the younger, ver. 5–7. He then exhorts all, praying earnestly for them; and so concludes his epistle.

Verses 1–4

I. The persons to whom this exhortation is given—elders by office, rather than by age, ministers of those churches to whom he wrote this epistle.

II. He tells them he was their fellow-elder, and so puts nothing upon them but what he was ready to perform himself. He was also a witness of the sufferings of Christ. He was also a partaker of the glory that shall be completely enjoyed at the second coming of Jesus Christ. It was the peculiar honour of Peter, and a few more, to be the witnesses of Christ's sufferings; but it is the privilege of all true Christians to be partakers of the glory that shall be revealed.

III. The pastor's duty described. 1. To feed the flock, by preaching to them the sincere word of God. 2. The pastors of the church must take the oversight thereof. 3. They must be examples to the flock, and practice the holiness which they preach and recommend to their people. These duties must be performed, not by constraint, but from a willing mind that takes pleasure in the work: not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind, regarding the flock more than the fleece; neither as being lords over God's heritage, tyrannizing over them. These poor, dispersed, suffering Christians were the flock of God. The rest of the world is a brutal herd. These are an orderly flock, redeemed to God by the great Shepherd. They are also dignified with the title of God's heritage, chosen out of the common multitude for his own people. They are God's people, and should be treated with love, meekness, and tenderness, for the sake of him to whom they belong.

IV. In opposition to that filthy lucre the apostle sets before them the crown of glory designed by the great shepherd for all his faithful ministers. Jesus Christ is the chief shepherd of the whole flock and heritage of God. He is also the chief shepherd over all inferior shepherds. This chief shepherd will appear, to judge all ministers and undershepherds. Those that are found to have done their duty shall receive from the grand shepherd a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

Verses 5–7

The apostle comes now to instruct the flock.

I. He exhorts those that are younger and inferior to submit themselves to the elder. As to one another, the rule is that they should all be subject one to another, so far as to receive the reproofs and counsels one of another. He advises them to be clothed with humility. "If you be disobedient and proud, God will set himself to oppose you; for he resisteth the proud, when he giveth grace to the humble." Humility is the great preserver of peace and order in all Christian societies, consequently pride is the great disturber of them. There is a mutual opposition between God and the proud. Where God giveth grace to be humble, he will give more grace and humility. Hence the apostle adds: "Since God resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble, therefore humble yourselves, not only one to another, but to the great God. His hand is almighty, and can easily pull you down if you be proud, or exalt you if you be humble." Humbling ourselves to God under his hand is the next way to deliverance and exaltation.

II. The apostle rightly supposes that what he had foretold of greater hardships yet coming might excite in them abundance of care. Foreseeing this anxious care would be a heavy burden, and a sore temptation, he gives them the best advice. His advice is to cast all their care, or all care of themselves, upon God. Trust in him with a firm, composed mind, for he careth for you. He is willing to release you of your care, and take the care of you upon himself. The best of Christians are apt to labour under the burden of anxious and excessive care. The cares even of good people are very burdensome, and too often very sinful. The best remedy against immoderate care is to cast our care upon God. A firm belief of the rectitude of the divine will calms the spirit of man.

Verses 8, 9

I. He shows them their danger from an enemy whom he describes,

1. By his characters and names. He is an adversary: "That adversary of yours." The devil, the grand accuser of all the brethren. He is a roaring lion, the fierce and greedy pursuer of souls.

2. By his business: He walks about, seeking whom he may devour; his whole design is to devour and destroy souls.

II. Hence he infers that it is their duty to be sober, to be vigilant, to be watchful and diligent to prevent his designs and save their souls. To resist him steadfast in the faith. It was the faith of these people that Satan aimed at. This strong trial and temptation they must resist, by being steadfast in the faith.

III. The like afflictions befell their brethren in all parts of the world, all the people of God were their fellow-soldiers in this warfare. The devil is the grand persecutor, as well as the deceiver and accuser, of the brethren. Sobriety and watchfulness are necessary virtues at all times, but especially in times of suffering and persecution. If your faith give way, you are gone. The consideration of what others suffer is proper to encourage us to bear our own share in any affliction: The same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren.

Verses 10–14

We come now to the conclusion of this epistle.

I. The apostle begins with a most weighty prayer, which he addresses to God as the God of all grace.

1. What he prays for on their account. After they had suffered awhile that God would perfect his work in them. Those who are called to be heirs of eternal life through Jesus Christ must, nevertheless, suffer in this world, but their sufferings will be but for a little while. Therefore he is earnestly to be sought unto by continual prayer, and dependence upon his promises.

2. His doxology, v. 11.

II. He recapitulates the design of his writing this epistle to them (v. 12). The doctrine of salvation, which he had explained and they had embraced, was the true account of the grace of God, foretold by the prophets and published by Jesus Christ. As they had embraced the gospel, they would continue steadfast in it. A firm persuasion that we are in the true way to heaven will be the best motive to stand fast, and persevere therein.

III. He recommends Silvanus, the person by whom he sent them this brief epistle. The prejudices that some of these Jews might have against Silvanus, as a minister of the Gentiles, would soon wear off when they were once convinced that he was a faithful brother.

IV. He closes with salutations and a solemn benediction. In this salutation he particularly joins Mark the evangelist, who was then with him, and who was his son in a spiritual sense. All the churches of Jesus Christ ought to have a most affectionate concern one for another; they should love and pray for one another. He exhorts them to fervent love and charity one towards another, and to express this by giving the kiss of peace (v. 14), and so concludes with a benediction, which he confines to those that are in Christ Jesus. The blessing he pronounces upon them is peace, by which he means all necessary good.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE SECOND EPISTLE GENERAL OF

PETER

The design of this second epistle is the same with that of the former, as is evident from the first verse of the third chapter, whence observe that, in the things of God, we have need of precept upon precept, and line upon line, and all little enough to keep them in remembrance; and yet these are the things which should be most faithfully recorded and frequently remembered by us.

CHAP. I

I. An introduction leading to what is principally designed by the apostle, ver. 1–4. II. An exhortation to advance and improve in all Christian graces, ver. 5–7. III. To enforce this exhortation he adds, 1. A representation of the very great advantage which will thereby accrue to them, ver. 8–11. 2. A promise of the best assistance the apostle was able to give, ver. 12–15. 3 A declaration of the certain truth of the gospel of Christ.

Verses 1–4

I. We have here a description of the person who wrote the epistle, by the name of Simon, as well as Peter, and by the title of servant, as well as that of apostle. He here styles himself a servant (as well as an apostle) of Jesus Christ. How great an honour is it to be the servants of this Master! This is what we cannot, without sin, be ashamed of.

II. We have an account of the people to whom the epistle is written. They are described as having obtained precious faith in our Lord Jesus Christ. True saving faith is a precious grace. True faith is very excellent and of very great use and advantage to those who have it. The just lives by faith. Faith is alike precious in the private Christian and in the apostle; it produces the same precious effects in the one and in the other. Faith, in whomsoever it exists, takes hold of the same precious Saviour, and applies the same precious promises. This precious faith is obtained of God. Faith is the gift of God. The preciousness of faith, as well as our obtaining it, is through the righteousness of Christ.

III. We have the apostolical benediction.

1. An account of the way and means whereby grace and peace are multiplied—it is through the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ.

2. What we have already received should encourage us to ask for more. All things that have any relation to, and influence upon, the true spiritual life, the life and power of godliness, are from Jesus Christ. Knowledge of God, and faith in him, are the channel whereby all spiritual supports and comforts are conveyed to us; but then we must own and acknowledge God as the author of our effectual calling, for so he is here described: Him that hath called us to glory and virtue. The design of God in calling or converting men is to bring them to glory and virtue. It is the glory of God's power to convert sinners. The apostle goes on to encourage their faith and hope in looking for an increase of grace and peace. (1) The good things which the promises make over are exceedingly great. Pardon of sin is one of the blessings here intended. To pardon sins that are numerous and heinous is a wonderful thing. (2) The promised blessings of the gospel are very precious. The great promise of the New Testament is the Holy Ghost. (3) Those who receive the promises of the gospel partake of the divine nature. Their hearts are set for God and his service. (4) Those in whom the Spirit works the divine nature are freed from the bondage of corruption. The dominion that sin has in the men of the world is through lust; their desires are to it, and therefore it rules over them. The dominion that sin has over us is according to the delight we have in it.

Verses 5–11

Having already obtained precious faith, and been made partakers of the divine nature is a very good beginning, but it is not to be rested in, as if we were already perfect. He exhorts them to press forward for the obtaining of more grace. Those who will make any progress in religion must be very industrious in their endeavours. Without giving all diligence, there is no gaining any ground in the work of holiness.

I. The believer's way is marked out step by step. 1. He must get virtue, by which some understand justice; and then the knowledge, temperance, and patience that follow. By virtue here we may understand strength and courage, without which the believer cannot stand up for good works. A cowardly Christian must expect that Christ will be ashamed of him another day. We have need of virtue while we live, and it will be of excellent use when we come to die. 2. The believer must add knowledge to his virtue, prudence to his courage. Christian prudence regards the persons we have to do with and the place and company we are in. 3. We must add temperance to our knowledge. We must be moderate in desiring and using the good things of natural life; an inordinate desire after these is inconsistent with an earnest desire after God and Christ. 4. Add to temperance patience, which must have its perfect work. We are born to trouble, and must through many tribulations enter into the kingdom of heaven. Our sufferings are less than our sins deserve. 5. To patience we must add godliness. When Christians bear afflictions patiently, they get an experimental knowledge of the loving-kindness of their heavenly Father, and hereby they are brought to the child-like fear and reverential love wherein true godliness consists. 6. We must add brotherly-kindness, a tender affection to all our fellow-christians, who are children of the same Father, and therefore are to be loved, as those who are peculiarly near and dear to us. 7. Charity, or a love of goodwill to all mankind. God has made of one blood all nations, and all the children of men are partakers of the same human nature, are all capable of the same mercies, and liable to the same afflictions. Thus must all believers in Christ evidence that they are the children of God, who is good to all.

II. All the forementioned graces must be had. The advantages that redound to all who successfully labour so as to get these things to be and abound in them, v. 8–11.

1. More generally, v. 8. The being and abounding of all Christian graces in us will make us neither inactive nor unfruitful, it will make us very zealous and lively, and eminently fruitful in the works of righteousness. These will bring much glory to God, by bringing forth much fruit among men, being fruitful in knowledge, or the acknowledging of our Lord Jesus Christ. This is the necessary consequence of adding one grace to another; for, where all Christian graces are in the heart, they improve and strengthen one another. Wherever grace abounds there will be an abounding in good works. How desirable it is to be in such a case the apostle evidences, v. 9. He who has not the forementioned graces is blind, that is, as to spiritual and heavenly things. He cannot see far off. This present evil world he can see, and dotes upon, but has no discerning at all of the world to come. How wretched is their condition who are thus blind as to the awfully great things of the other world. But this is not all the misery of those who do not add to their faith virtue, knowledge, &c. They are as unable to look backward as forward, their memories are slippery and unable to retain what is past. Often call to mind, and seriously meditate on, your solemn engagement to be the Lord's, to lay aside all filthiness of flesh and spirit.

2. Two particular advantages: stability in grace, and a triumphant entrance into glory. Giving diligence to make our calling and election sure. It requires a great deal of diligence and labour to make sure our calling and election; there must be a very close examination of ourselves. "But, how great soever the labour is, do not think much of it, for great is the advantage you gain by it. By this you will be kept from falling." When many fall into errors, they shall be preserved sound in the faith, and stand perfect and complete in all the will of God. Those who are growing in grace, and abounding in the work of the Lord, shall have an abundant entrance into the joy of their Lord, and they shall reign with him for ever and ever.

I. Peter will not be negligent, but will be exemplarily diligent, and that in the work of a remembrancer. We need to be put in mind of what we already know to prevent our forgetting it, and to improve our knowledge, and reduce all to practice. We must be established in the belief of the truth, that we may not be shaken by every wind of doctrine, and especially in that which is the present truth, the truth more peculiarly necessary for us to know in our day. If the people need teaching and exhortation while they are in the body, it is very meet and just that ministers should, as long as they are in this tabernacle, instruct and exhort them, and bring those truths to their remembrance that they have formerly heard.

II. The apostle tells us (v. 14) what makes him earnest in this matter. The body is but the tabernacle of the soul. This tabernacle must be put off. We are not to continue long in this earthly house. The nearness of death makes the apostle diligent in the business of life. He must soon be removed from those to whom he wrote; and his ambition being that they should remember the doctrine he had delivered to them, after he himself was taken away from them, he commits his exhortation to writing.

Verses 16–18

These things are not idle tales, or a vain thing, but of undoubted truth and vast concern. The gospel is not a cunningly devised fable. The apostle's preaching was a making of these things known. 1. The preaching of the gospel is a making known the power of Christ. 2. The coming of Christ also is made known by the preaching of the gospel. This coming of Christ the gospel is very plain and circumstantial in setting forth; but there is a second coming, which it likewise mentions. He will come to judge the world in righteousness by the everlasting gospel. During our blessed Saviour's abode here on earth he sometimes manifested himself to be God, and particularly to our apostle and the two sons of Zebedee, who were eye-witnesses of his divine majesty, when he was transfigured before them. Besides the visible glory there was an audible voice from heaven. What a gracious declaration was made: This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased—the best voice that ever came from heaven to earth; God is well pleased with Christ. He received honour and glory from God the Father. This is the person whom God delights to honour. This voice is from heaven, called here the excellent glory. This voice was heard, and that so as to be understood, by Peter, James, and John. They not only heard a sound, but they understood the sense. God opens the ears and understandings of his people to receive what they are concerned to know. Blessed are those who not only hear, but understand, who believe the truth, and feel the power of the voice from heaven.

Verses 19–21

In these words the apostle lays down another argument to prove the truth and reality of the gospel. For this is foretold by the prophets of the Old Testament, who spoke and wrote according to the direction of the Spirit of God.

I. The description that is given of the scriptures of the Old Testament: they are called a more sure word of prophecy. It is a prophetical declaration of the power and coming of our Saviour. But the New Testament is a history of that whereof the Old Testament is a prophecy. Read the Old Testament as a prophecy of Christ, and with diligence and thankfulness use the New as the best exposition of the Old. How firm and sure should our faith be, who have such a firm and sure word to rest upon! All the prophecies of the Old Testament are more sure and certain to us who have the history of the accomplishment of them.

II. The encouragement the apostle gives us to search the scriptures. We do well if we take heed to them; apply our minds to understand the sense, and our hearts to believe the truth, of this sure word. If we thus apply ourselves to the word of God, we certainly do well in all respects, what is pleasing to God and profitable to ourselves. They must use the scripture as a light which God hath sent into the world, to dispel that darkness which is upon the face of the whole earth. They must acknowledge their own darkness. Every man in the world is naturally without that knowledge which is necessary in order to attain eternal life. If ever men are made wise to salvation, it is by the shining of the word of God into their hearts. Natural notions of God are not sufficient for fallen man. When the light of the scripture is darted into the dark understanding by the Holy Spirit of God, then the spiritual day dawns and the day-star arises in that soul. This enlightening of a dark benighted mind is like the day-break that spreads and diffuses itself through the whole soul, till it makes perfect day. It is a growing knowledge. All who do truth come to this light, while evil-doers keep at a distance from it.

III. The apostle lays down one thing as previously necessary, and that is the knowing that all prophecy is of divine origin. No scripture prophecy is of private interpretation, but the revelation of the mind of God. This was the difference between the prophets of the Lord and the false prophets. The prophets of the Lord did not speak nor do anything of their own mind. The prophets and penmen of the scripture spoke and wrote what was the mind of God. Every private man ought to search it, and come to understand the sense and meaning thereof. This important truth of the divine origin of the scriptures is to be known and owned by all who will give heed to the sure word of prophecy. As a man not barely believes, but knows assuredly that that very person is his particular friend in whom he sees all the distinguishing marks and characters of his friend, so the Christian knows that book to be the word of God in which he sees all the proper marks and characters of a divinely inspired book. The divinity of the scriptures must be known and acknowledged in the first place, before men can give good heed to them.

IV. The apostle (v. 21) tells us how the Old Testament came to be compiled. 1. They were holy men of God who were employed about that book which we receive as the word of God. All the penmen of the scriptures were holy men of God. 2. These holy men were moved by the Holy Ghost. The Holy Ghost is the supreme agent, the holy men are but instruments. The Holy Ghost inspired and dictated to them what they were to deliver of the mind of God. He effectually engaged them to speak (and write) what he had put into their mouths. Mix faith therefore with what you find in the scriptures; esteem and reverence your Bible as a book written by holy men, inspired, influenced, and assisted by the Holy Ghost.

CHAP. II

The apostle now comes to remove what he could not but apprehend would hinder their complying with his exhortation. He therefore gives them fair warning of false teachers I. He describes these seducers as impious in themselves, and very pernicious to others, ver. 1-3. II He assures them of the punishment that shall be inflicted on them, ver 3 6. III He tells us how contrary the method is which God takes with those who fear him, ver. 7-9. IV. A further description of those seducers.

Verses 1–3

I. In all ages of the church the devil sends some to deceive, false prophets in the Old Testament, and seducing teachers in the New. Their business is to bring in destructive errors, even damnable heresies. Those who introduce destructive heresies deny the Lord that bought them. Those who bring in errors destructive to others bring swift (and therefore sure) destruction upon themselves. Self destroyers are soon destroyed.

II. The consequence with respect to others. Corrupt leaders seldom fail of many to follow them. Men drink in iniquity like water, and are pleased to live in error. The spreading of error will bring up an evil report on the way of truth; the way of salvation by Jesus Christ.

III. The method seducers take to draw disciples after them: they use feigned words; they flatter, and by good words and fair speeches deceive the hearts of the simple. All this is through covetousness, with design to get more wealth, or credit, or commendation, by increasing the number of their followers.

Verses 3–6

How successful and prosperous soever false teachers may be, yet their judgment lingereth not. Such unbelievers are condemned already. Examples of the righteous judgment of God.

I. The angels who sinned. No excellency will exempt a sinner from punishment. God did not spare them. By how much the more excellent the offender, by so much the more severe the punishment. Sin debases and degrades the persons who commit it. The angels of heaven are divested of all their glory upon their disobedience. Sin is the work of darkness, and darkness is the wages of sin. Those who will not walk according to the light and direction of God's law shall be deprived of the light of God's countenance.

II. He spared not the old world. If the sin be universal, the punishment shall likewise extend to all. But if there be but a few righteous, they shall be preserved. God does not destroy the good with the bad. In wrath he remembers mercy. The procuring cause of destruction: it was a world of ungodly men. Ungodliness puts men out of the divine protection, and exposes them to utter destruction.

III. Sodom and Gomorrah. He destroys the old world by water, and Sodom by fire. He who keeps fire and water from hurting his people can make either to destroy his enemies; therefore they are never safe. Those who are sinners exceedingly before the Lord must expect the most dreadful vengeance. The punishment of sinners in former ages is designed for the example of those who come after. Men who live ungodly must see what they are to expect if they go on still in a course of impiety.

Verses 7–9

When God sends destruction on the ungodly, he commands deliverance for the righteous. This we have an instance of in his preserving Lot. 1. The character given of Lot; he is called a just man. He does not follow the multitude to do evil, but in a city of injustice he walks uprightly. 2. The impression the sins of others made upon this righteous man. In bad company we cannot escape either guilt or grief. 3. The duration and continuance of this good man's grief and vexation: it was from day to day. Being accustomed to hear and see their wickedness did not reconcile him to it. (1) The Lord knows those that are his. He has set apart him who is godly for himself; and, if there is but one in five cities, he knows him. (2) The wisdom of God is never at a loss about ways and means to deliver his people. They are often utterly at a loss; but he can find a way of escape. (3) The deliverance of the godly is the work of God, both his wisdom to contrive the way and his power to work out the deliverance out of temptation. (4) The unjust has no share in the salvation God works out for the righteous. The wicked are reserved to the day of judgment.

Verses 10–22

The apostle's design being to warn us of seducers, he now returns to discourse more particularly of them.

I. These walk after the flesh. They, in their lives, act directly contrary to God's righteous precepts, and comply with the demands of corrupt nature. Evil opinions are often accompanied with evil practices; and those who are for propagating error are for improving in wickedness. They go on in their sinful course, and increase unto more ungodliness. They also pour contempt on those whom God has set in authority over them and requires them to honour.

II. This he aggravates, by setting forth the very different conduct of more excellent creatures, even the angels. They are greater in power and might, and that even than those who are clothed with authority and power among the sons of men. Angels bring their accusations of sinful creatures before the Lord. It is before the Lord, who is the Judge, and will be the avenger, of all impiety and injustice. Good angels mingle no bitter revilings nor base reproaches with any of the accusations they bring. Let us imitate the angels. If we complain of wicked men, let it be to God, and that not with rage and reviling, but with compassion, that may evidence that we belong to him who is meek and merciful.

III. The apostle proceeds (v. 12) to show how like they are to the most inferior. Men, under the power of sin, are so far from observing divine revelation that they do not exercise reason. Brute-creatures follow the instinct of their sensitive appetite, and sinful man follows the inclination of his carnal mind. These persons shall be utterly destroyed in their own corruption. Whatever they meet with is the just reward of their unrighteousness. Such sinners as sport themselves in mischief deceive themselves and disgrace all they belong to, for by one sort of sins they prepare themselves for another; so that their eyes are full of adultery, their wanton looks show their own impure lusts and are directed to kindle the like in others; and this is what they cannot cease from. Those who are themselves incessant in sin are very often successful in drawing others into the same excess of riot. Those who are in the greatest danger of being led away into error and impiety, are the unstable. Those whose hearts are not established with grace are easily turned into the way of sin. These are not only riotous and lascivious, but covetous also; they pant after riches, and the desire of their souls is to the wealth of this world. If men abandon themselves to all sorts of lusts, we cannot wonder that the apostle should call them cursed children.

IV. The apostle (v. 15, 16) proves that they are cursed children. They have forsaken the right way. They have gone into a wrong way: they have erred and strayed from the way of life. This he makes out by showing it to be the way of Balaam, the son of Bosor. The love of riches and honour turned Balaam out of the way of his duty, although he knew that the way he took displeased the Lord. Hardened sinners sometimes meet with rebukes for their iniquity. God stops them in their way. If rebuking a sinner for his iniquity would have made a man return to his duty, surely the rebuke of Balaam must have produced this effect. The dumb ass is enabled to speak, and she exposes the madness of his conduct and opposes his going on in this evil way, and yet all in vain.

V. The apostle proceeds (v. 17) to a further description of seducing teachers.

1. As wells, or fountains, without water. The word of truth is the water of life, but these deceivers are set upon spreading and promoting error, and therefore are set forth as empty, because there is no truth in them.

2. As clouds carried with a tempest. These are clouds which yield no rain, for they are driven with the wind, but not of the Spirit, but the stormy tempest of their own ambition. Clouds obstruct the light of the sun, and darken the air, and, seeing these men are for promoting darkness in this world, it is very just that the mist of darkness should be their portion in the next. They allure those they deal with. It is with great swelling words of vanity which have a great sound but little sense. They work upon the corrupt affections and carnal fleshly lusts of men. By application and industry men attain a skilfulness and dexterity in promoting error. They are as artful and as successful as the fisher, who makes angling his daily employment. Persons who have for a while adhered to the truth, and kept clear of errors, may be so far deceived as to fall into those errors they had for a while clean escaped. To prevent these men's gaining proselytes, he tells us that they are the servants of corruption; their own lusts have gotten a complete victory over them, and they are actually in bondage to them. This consideration should prevent our being led away by these seducers; and to this he adds another (v. 20). It is a real detriment to those who have clean escaped from those who live in error, for hereby their latter end is made worse than their beginning. Some men are, for a time, kept from the pollutions of the world, by the knowledge of Christ. A religious education has restrained many whom the grace of God has not renewed, but we must receive the love of the truth, and hide God's word in our heart, or it will not sanctify and save us. When men are once entangled, they are easily overcome. If men who have once escaped are again entangled, the latter end is worse with them than the beginning.

VI. A state of apostasy is worse than a state of ignorance; for it is a condemning of the way of righteousness, after they have had some knowledge of it. The misery of such deserters of Christ and his gospel is more intolerable than that of other offenders. God is more highly provoked by those who by their conduct despise the gospel, and pour contempt upon his grace. No wonder it should be so when they have licked up their own vomit again, returning to the same impieties that they had once cast off, and wallowing in that filthiness from which they appeared once to be really cleansed.

CHAP. III

The apostle begins this last chapter with repeating the account of his design in writing a second time to them, ver. 1–2. II. One thing that induced him to write this second epistle, namely, the coming of scoffers, ver. 3–7. III. He instructs them in the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ to judgment, ver. 8–10. IV. The use Christians ought to make of Christ's second coming, ver. 11–18.

Verses 1, 2

The better to recommend the matter, he tells them that what he would have them to remember are, The words spoken by the holy prophets, who were divinely inspired. The commandments of the apostles of the Lord and Saviour. What God has spoken by the prophets of the Old Testament, and Christ has commanded by the apostles of the New, cannot but demand and deserve to be frequently remembered. It is by these things the pure minds of Christians are to be stirred up.

Verses 3–7

There will be scoffers, men who will make a mock of sin, and of salvation from it. God's way of saving sinners by Jesus Christ is what men will scoff at, and that in the last days, under the gospel. The spirituality and simplicity of New Testament worship are directly contrary to the carnal mind of man. This is mentioned as a thing well known to all Christians.

I. What sort of persons they are: they walk after their own lusts, they follow the devices and desires of their own hearts. They live as they list, and they speak as they list. As they will walk in their own way, and talk their own language, so will they also think their own thoughts, and form principles which are altogether their own.

II. They will scoffingly say, Where is the promise of his coming? (v. 4). Without this, all the other articles of the Christian faith will signify very little; this is that which fills up and gives the finishing stroke to all the rest. Till our Lord shall have come, they will not themselves believe that he will come; nay, they will laugh at the very mention of his second coming. The believer not only desires that he may come, but, having a promise that he will come, he is also firmly and fully persuaded that he will come: on the other hand, these seducers, because they wish he never may, therefore do all that in them lies to cheat themselves and others into a persuasion that he never will come. They will laugh at that very promise: Where is the promise, say they, of his coming?

III. While they laugh they will pretend to argue too, v. 4. This is a subtle, though not a solid way of reasoning; it is apt to make impressions upon weak minds, and especially upon wicked hearts. Those are all dead to whom the promise was made, and it was never made good in their time, and there is no likelihood that it ever will be in any time; why should we trouble ourselves about it? To this very day all things continue as they were, without any change, even from the beginning of the creation. What he never has done they would conclude he never can do or never will.

IV. The apostle puts us in remembrance of a change already past, which was the drowning of the world in the days of Noah. This they willingly are ignorant of (v. 5), they choose to pass it over in silence. It is hard to persuade men to believe what they are not willing to find true. They do not know because they do not care to know. But let not sinners think that such ignorance as this will be admitted as an excuse for whatever sin it may betray them into.

1. The apostle's account of the destruction which has once already come upon the world (v. 5, 6). At the time of the universal deluge, the case is strangely altered; the waters which God had divided before, now does he, in anger, throw together again in a heap. All this was done by the word of God; it was by his powerful word that the world was made at first. By the word of the Lord the heavens were of old and the earth standing out of the water and in the water. The after-confusion and ruin of the world, as well as the utter destruction of its inhabitants, were also by the same word. This was the change which God had before brought upon the world, and which these scoffers had overlooked.

2. What the apostle says of the destructive change which is yet to come upon it, v. 7. Here we have an awful account of the final dissolution of the world. The judgment here spoken of is yet to come, and will surely come, though we know not when. That the world has once been destroyed by a universal deluge renders it the more credible that it may be again ruined by a universal conflagration. Let therefore the scoffers, who laugh at the coming of our Lord to judgment, at least consider that it may be. The heavens and the earth which now are, are kept in store. They are reserved unto fire. The day of judgment is the day of the perdition of ungodly men. Those who now scoff at a future judgment shall find it a day of vengeance. "Give diligence therefore to be found in Christ, that that may be a time of refreshment and day of redemption to you."

Verse 8

We may clearly discern the tenderness and affection wherewith he speaks to them, calling them beloved; he had a compassionate concern and a love of goodwill for the ungodly wretches who refused to believe divine revelation, but he has a peculiar respect for the true believers.

I. The truth which the apostle asserts—that with the Lord one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years are as one day. All things past, present, and future, are ever before him.

II. The importance of this truth: This is the one thing the apostle would not have us ignorant of. This is a truth that belongs to our peace, and therefore he endeavours that it may not be hidden from our eyes; as it is in the original, Let not this one thing be hidden from you. Yet how hard is it to conceive of eternity!

Verses 9, 10

We are here told that the Lord is not slack—he does not delay beyond the appointed time; he will keep to the time appointed in coming to judge the world. Good men are apt to think God stays beyond the appointed time, that is, the time which they have set, but they set one time and God sets another.

I. What men count slackness is truly longsuffering, and that to us-ward; it is giving more time to his own people that they may bring glory to God, and improve in a meetness for heaven; for God is not willing that any of these should perish, but that all of them should come to repentance. God has no delight in the death of sinners. His goodness and forbearance do in their own nature call to repentance all those to whom they are exercised; and, if men continue impenitent when God gives them space to repent, he will deal more severely with them.

II. The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, v. 10. 1. The certainty of the day of the Lord. The day has not yet come, it assuredly will come. God has appointed a day and he will keep his appointment. 2. The suddenness of this day: It will come as a thief in the night, at a time when men are sleeping and secure. The time which men think to be the most improper and unlikely, and when therefore they are most secure, will be the time of the Lord's coming. 3. The solemnity of this coming. The heavens shall pass away with a great noise. The elements shall melt with fervent heat. The earth also, and all the works that are therein, shall be burnt up. All must pass through the fire, which shall be a consuming fire to all that sin has brought into the world, though it may be but a refining fire to the works of God's hand.

What a difference there will be between the first coming of Christ and the second! May we be so wise as to prepare for it, that it may not be a day of vengeance and destruction unto us.

Verses 11–18

The apostle, having instructed them in the doctrine of Christ's second coming,

I. Takes occasion thence to exhort them to purity and godliness in their whole conversation. Seeing all these things must be dissolved, how holy should we be. Inasmuch as this dissolution is in order to their being restored to their primitive beauty and excellency, how pure and holy should we be, in order to our being fit for the new heaven and new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness! Those things which we now see must in a little while pass away, and be no more as they now are: let us look therefore at what shall abide and continue. This looking for the day of God is one of the directions the apostle gives us, in order to our being eminently holy and godly in all manner of conversation. The coming of the day of God is what every Christian must hope for and earnestly expect. Though it cannot but affright the ungodly to see the visible heavens and the elements melting, yet the believer can rejoice in hope of more glorious heavens after these have been refined by that dreadful fire which shall burn up all the dross of this visible creation. 1. What true Christians look for: new heavens and a new earth. In these new heavens and earth only righteousness shall dwell. 2. What is the ground and foundation of this expectation and hope—the promise of God. To look for anything which God has not promised is presumption; but if our expectations are according to the promise, we cannot meet with a disappointment.

II. In v. 14 he resumes his exhortation from the consideration that they shall be again renewed. It nearly concerns you to see in what state you will be when the Judge of all the world shall come to pass sentence upon men, therefore get ready to appear before the judgment-seat of Christ.

1. "That you be found of him in peace, in a state of peace and reconciliation with God through Christ. Those whose sins are pardoned and their peace made with God are the only safe and happy people; therefore follow after peace." Peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ. Peace in our own consciences. Peace with men.

2. That you be found of Christ without spot, and blameless. Follow after holiness as well as peace. We must be pressing towards spotless purity, absolute perfection. Christians must be perfecting holiness. It is only the diligent Christian who will be the happy Christian in the day of the Lord. He will certainly reward us if we be diligent in the work he has allotted us; now, that you may be diligent, account the longsuffering of our Lord to be salvation. "Does your Lord delay his coming? It is so much space to repent that men may have time to prepare for eternity." Our apostle quotes St. Paul as directing men to make the same good use of the divine forbearance. What an honourable mention does this apostle of the circumcision make of that very man who had openly, before all, reproved him. He calls him brother, not only that he is a fellow-christian, but a fellow-apostle. Though many seducing teachers denied Paul's apostleship, yet Peter owns him to be an apostle. He calls him beloved. He mentions Paul as one who had an uncommon measure of wisdom given unto him. How desirable is it that those who preach the same gospel should treat one another according to the pattern Peter here sets them! (1) The excellent wisdom that was in Paul is said to be given him. The understanding and knowledge that qualify men to preach the gospel are the gift of God. (2) The apostle imparts to men according as he had received from God. He endeavours to lead others as far as he himself was led into the knowledge of the mysteries of the gospel. But the apostle Peter proceeds to tell us that in those things which are to be met with in Paul's epistles there are some things hard to be understood. Some are not easy to be understood because of their own obscurity, others cannot be so easily understood because of their excellency and sublimity, and others are with difficulty taken in because of the weakness of men's minds. And here the unlearned and unstable make wretched work; for they wrest and torture the scriptures. Those who are not well instructed and well established in the truth are in great danger of perverting the word of God. Where there is a divine power to establish as well as to instruct men in divine truth, persons are effectually secured from falling into errors. How great a blessing this is we learn by observing what is the pernicious consequence of the errors that ignorant and unstable men fall into—even their own destruction.

III. The apostle gives them a word of caution, v. 17, 18.

1. The knowledge we have of these things should make us very watchful, inasmuch as there is a twofold danger, v. 17. (1) We are in great danger of being seduced, and turned away from the truth. Many who have the scriptures and read them do not understand what they read; and too many of those who have a right understanding are not established in the belief of the truth, and all these are liable to fall into error. (2) We are in great danger by being seduced. If men corrupt the word of God, it tends to their own utter ruin. When men wrest the word of God, they fall into the error of the wicked. If we imbibe their opinions, we shall too soon imitate their practices. Those who are led away by error fall from their own steadfastness. They are wholly unhinged and unsettled, and know not where to rest.

2. The apostle directs us what to do, v. 18. We must grow in grace. By how much the stronger grace is in us, by so much the more steadfast shall we be in the truth. We must grow in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. Such a knowledge of Christ as conforms us more to him, and endears him more to us, must needs preserve us from falling off in times of general apostasy. To him be glory both now and for ever. Amen.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE FIRST EPISTLE GENERAL OF

JOHN

The continued tradition of the church attests that this epistle came from John the apostle. There is scarcely a critic or competent judge of diction, or style of argument and spirit, but will adjudge this epistle to the writer of that gospel that bears the name of the apostle John.

The epistle is styled general, as being not inscribed to any particular church; it is, as a circular letter sent to divers churches in order to confirm them in their steadfast adherence to the Lord Christ, against seducers; and to instigate them to adorn that doctrine by love to God and man, and particularly to each other.

CHAP. I

Concerning Christ's person and excellency, ver. 1, 2. The knowledge thereof gives us communion with God and Christ (ver. 3), and joy, ver. 4. A description of God, ver. 5. How we are thereupon to walk, ver. 6. The benefit of such walking, ver. 7. The way to forgiveness, ver. 9. The evil of denying our sin, ver. 8–10.

Verses 1–4

I. An account of the Mediator's person. 1. As the Word of life, v. 1. He is not a mere vocal word, but a vital one: the Word of life. 2. As eternal life, He was from eternity. He is the eternal Word of the eternal living Father. 3. As life manifested (v. 2), manifested in the flesh. Kindness indeed, that eternal life should come to visit mortals, and to procure eternal life for them, and then confer it on them!

II. The evidences that the apostle and his brethren had of the Mediator's presence in this world. The life, the word of life, the eternal life, as such, could not be seen and felt; but the life manifested might be, and was so. 1. To their ears, v. 1, 3. The life assumed a mouth and tongue, that he might utter words of life. The divine word would employ the ear, and the ear should be devoted to the word of life. 2. To their eyes, v. 1–3. The Word would become visible, would not only be heard, but seen with our eyes—with all the use and exercise that we could make of our eyes. His apostles must be eye-witnesses as well as ear-witnesses of him. 3. To their internal sense, to the eyes of their mind: for so (possibly) may the next clause be interpreted: Which we have looked upon. The word is not applied to the immediate object of the eye, but to that which was rationally collected from what they saw. The senses are to be the informers of the mind. 4. To their hands and sense of feeling: And our hands have handled of the Word of life. The invisible life and Word was no despiser of the testimony of sense. Sense is a means that God has appointed for our information. Our Lord took care to satisfy all the senses of his apostles, that they might be the more authentic witnesses of him to the world. The apostles could not be deceived in such long and various exercise of their sense. Sense must minister to reason and judgment; and reason and judgment must minister to the reception of the Lord Jesus Christ and his gospel.

III. The apostles publish these assurances for our satisfaction, v. 2, 3. It became the apostles to open to the disciples the evidence by which they were led. It concerned the disciples to be well assured of the truth of the institution they had embraced. They should see the evidences of their holy religion.

IV. The reason of the apostle's asserting this summary of sacred faith.

1. That the believers of it may be advanced to the same happiness with them (with the apostles themselves), v. 3. It is communion with heaven, and in blessings that come thence and tend thither. There is a communion (or common participation of privilege and dignity) belonging to all saints, from the highest apostle to the lowest believer. What it is and where it is: And truly our fellowship (or communion) is with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ. See to what the gospel revelation tends—to advance us far above sin and earth and to carry us to blessed communion with the Father and the Son. See for what end the eternal life was made flesh—that he might advance us to eternal life in communion with the Father and himself.

2. That believers may be enlarged and advanced in holy joy, v. 4. The mystery of the Christian religion is for the joy of mortals. Those live beneath the use and end of the Christian revelation who are not filled with spiritual joy. Were they confirmed in their holy faith, how would they rejoice!

Verses 5–7

I. Here is the message from the Lord Jesus (v. 5). The apostles are the messengers of the Lord Jesus; it is their honour to bring his messages to the world. He that put on human nature will honour earthen vessels. It was the ambition of the apostles faithfully to deliver the messages they had received. The present one is this—That God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. He is all that beauty and perfection that can be represented to us by light. There is no defect or imperfection, v. 5. It is meet that to this dark world the great God should be represented as pure and perfect light. What more could be included in one word than in this, God is light, and in him is no darkness at all?

II. There is a just conclusion to be drawn from this message. 1. For the conviction of such professors as have no true fellowship with God: If we say we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth. To walk in darkness is to live and act according to such ignorance, and erroneous practice, as are contrary to our holy religion. They may profess to have communion with God; and yet their lives may be irreligious, immoral, and impure. To such the apostle would not fear to give the lie: They lie, and do not the truth. Their practice gives their profession and pretences the lie, and demonstrates the folly and falsehood of them. 2. For the conviction and consequent satisfaction of those that are near to God: But, if we walk in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin. Those that so walk show that they know God. Then we have fellowship one with another, they with us and we with them, and both with God. The blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin. His blood procures for us those sacred influences by which sin is to be subdued more and more, till it is quite abolished.

Verses 8–10

I. The apostle, having supposed that even those of this heavenly communion have yet their sin, proceeds here to justify that supposition, v. 8. We must beware of deceiving ourselves in denying or excusing our sins. The Christian religion is the religion of sinners. The Christian life is a life of continued repentance, of continual faith in, thankfulness for, and love to the Redeemer, v. 10. The denial of our sin not only deceives ourselves, it challenges his veracity. God has given his testimony to the continued sinfulness of the world, by providing a sacrifice for sin, that will be needed in all ages, and to the continued sinfulness of believers themselves by requiring them continually to confess their sins.

II. The way to the continued pardon of the believer's sin. 1. His duty in order thereto, v. 9. Penitent confession and acknowledgment of sin are the means of his deliverance from his guilt. 2. His encouragement thereto. This is the righteousness, and clemency of God, to whom he makes such confession, v. 9. God is faithful to his word, wherein he has promised forgiveness to penitent believing confessors. He is clement and gracious also, and so will forgive, to the contrite confessor, all his sins and cleanse him from the guilt of all unrighteousness.

CHAP. II

Here the apostle encourages against sins of infirmity (ver. 1, 2), shows the true knowledge and love of God (ver. 3–6), renews the precept for fraternal love (ver. 7–11), addresses the several ages of Christians (ver. 12–14), warns against worldly love (ver. 15–17), against seducers (ver. 18, 19), shows the security of true Christians (ver. 20–27), and advises to abide in Christ, ver. 28, 29.

Verses 1, 2

He gives them both dissuasion and support.

1. Dissuasion. He would leave no room for sin, v. 1. The design of this letter is to dissuade and drive them from sin. See the familiar affectionate compellation with which he introduces his admonition. Certainly the gospel most prevailed where such ministerial love most abounded.

II. The believer's support and relief in case of sin, v. 1. Believers themselves have yet their sins. There are some who, though they really sin, yet, in comparison with others, are said not to sin. And this must be the support and refuge of believers: We have an Advocate. Here is an advocate in heaven and with the Father. The Judge with whom our advocate pleads is the Father. He who was our Judge in the legal court (the court of the violated law) is our Father in the gospel court, the court of heaven and of grace. His throne or tribunal is the mercy-seat. Our advocate is recommended to us upon these considerations: 1. By his person and personal names. It is Jesus Christ the Son of the Father, one anointed by the Father for the whole work of salvation, and consequently for that of the intercessor. 2. By his qualification for the office. It is Jesus Christ the righteous. The clients are guilty; their innocence and legal righteousness cannot be pleaded. It is the advocate's own righteousness that he must plead for the criminals. He has been righteous to the death, righteous for them. Upon this score he pleads, that the clients' sins may not be imputed to them. 3. By the plea he has to make, the ground and basis of his advocacy, v. 2. He is the propitiatory sacrifice. The Mediator of intercession, the Advocate for us, is the Mediator of redemption, the propitiation for our sins. It is his propitiation that he pleads. He ever lives to make intercession for those that come to God through him. 4. By the extent of his plea. It is not confined to one nation, v. 2; not only for the past, or us present believers, but for the sins of all who shall hereafter come to God through him. The extent and intent of the Mediator's death reach to all tribes, nations, and countries.

Verses 3–6

Here now succeeds the trial or test of our light and of our love.

I. The trial of our light, v. 3. Divine light and knowledge are the beauty and improvement of the mind. Young Christians are apt to magnify their new light and applaud their own knowledge; and old ones are apt to suspect the sufficiency and fulness of their knowledge. Here is the evidence of the soundness of our knowledge, if it constrain us to keep God's commandments. A careful conscientious obedience to his commands shows that the apprehension and knowledge of these things are graciously impressed upon the soul; and therefore it must follow in the reverse that he that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him, v. 4. A disobedient life is the confutation and shame of pretended religious knowledge.

II. The trial of our love, v. 5. To keep the word of God, or of Christ, is sacredly to attend thereto in all the conduct and motion of life; in him that does so is the love of God perfected. The phrase denotes here our love to God; so v. 15, so ch. iii. 17. We know that we belong to him, and that we are united to him by that Spirit which assists us to this obedience; and if we acknowledge our relation to him, and our union with him, it must have this continued enforcement upon us: He that saith he abideth in him ought himself to walk even as he walked, v. 6. Those who profess to be on his side, and to abide with him, must walk with him, walk after his pattern and example.

Verses 7–11

The precept of fraternal love is recommended,

I. As an old one, v. 7. The precept of love must be as old as human nature. And so it is the old commandment.

II. As a new one: "Again, a new commandment I write unto you, which thing is true in him, and it is true in you; this law is in some measure written upon your hearts; you are taught of God to love one another, and that because the darkness is past, your deplorable ignorance of God and of Christ is now past, and the true light now shineth" (v. 8). We should see that that grace which was true in Christ be true also in us. The more our darkness is past, and gospel light shines unto us, the deeper should our subjection be to the commandments of our Lord, whether considered as old or new. Another trial of our Christian light; before, it was to be approved by obedience to God; here by Christian love. 1. He who wants such love in vain pretends his light, v. 9. These cannot be swayed by the sense of the love of Christ to their brethren, and therefore remain in their dark state. 2. He who is governed by such love approves his light to be good and genuine, v. 10. He sees how meet it is that we should love those whom Christ hath loved; there is no occasion of stumbling in him (v. 10). Christian love teaches us highly to value our brother's soul, and to dread everything that will be injurious to his innocence and peace. 3. Hatred is a sign of spiritual darkness, v. 11. He then who is possessed with malignity towards a Christian brother must needs be destitute of spiritual light; consequently he walks in darkness, and he knows not whither he goes, because darkness hath blinded his eyes, v. 11. It is the Lord Jesus that is the great Master of love: it is his school that is the school of love. His disciples are the disciples of love, and his family must be the family of love.

Verses 12–17

I. All Christians are not of the same standing and stature; there are babes in Christ, there are grown men, and old disciples. There are precepts and a correspondent obedience common to them all, as particularly mutual love and contempt of the world.

1. The lowest in the Christian school, v. 12. There are novices in religion, babes in Christ. He addresses the children in Christianity, (1) Because their sins were forgiven them for his name's sake, v. 12. The youngest sincere disciple is pardoned. Sins are forgiven either for God's name's sake, or for Christ's name's sake, and those that are forgiven of God are strongly obliged to relinquish this world. (2) Because of their knowledge of God, v. 13. We say, It is a wise child that knows his father. These children cannot but know theirs. Those that know the Father may well be withdrawn from the love of this world.

2. To those of the highest station, to the seniors in Christianity (v. 13, 14). The apostle immediately passes from the bottom to the top of the school. Those that are of longest standing in Christ's school have need of further advice and instruction. None are too old to learn. He writes to them upon the account of their knowledge, v. 13, 14. Those who know him that was from the beginning may well be induced thereby to relinquish this world.

3. To the middle age of Christians, v. 13, 14. There are the adults in Christ Jesus. The apostle applies to them, (1) Upon the account of their martial exploits. Dexterous soldiers they are in the camp of Christ, v. 13. Those that are well taught in Christ's school can handle their arms and vanquish the evil one; and those that can vanquish him may be called to vanquish the world too. (2) Upon the account of their strength, discovered in this their achievement, v. 14. Young men are wont to glory in their strength. It will be their glory, and it will try their strength, to overcome the devil. The same strength must be exerted in overcoming the world as is employed in overcoming the devil. (3) Because of their acquaintance with the word of God, v. 14. Those in whom the word of God dwells are well furnished for the conquest of the world.

II. A caution fundamental to vital practical religion, v. 15. Be crucified to the world. Their love should be reserved for God; throw it not away upon the world. The reasons of this dissuasion and caution.

1. The inconsistency of this love with the love of God, v. 15. The heart of man is narrow, and cannot contain both loves.

2. The prohibition of worldly love or lust; it is not ordained of God, v. 16. This love or lust is not appointed of God but it intrudes itself from the world. The things of the world are distinguished into three classes, according to the three predominant inclinations of depraved nature, (1) There is the lust of the flesh. This lust is usually called luxury. (2) There is the lust of the eyes. This is the lust of covetousness. (3) There is the pride of life. This is ambition. The objects of these appetites must be abandoned and renounced, v. 16. The Father disallows them. The lust or appetite to these things must be mortified and subdued.

3. The vain and vanishing state of earthly things, v. 17. The things of the world are fading and dying apace.

4. The immortality of the lover of God, v. 17. The object of his love in opposition to the world that passeth away, abideth for ever. Love shall never fail; and he himself is an heir of immortality and endless life.

Verses 18, 19

I. The end is coming, v. 18. It is meet that the disciples should be warned of the haste and end of time.

II. The sign of this last time (v. 18), that many oppose the kingdom of Christ. It should be no great offence nor prejudice to the disciples that there are such antichrists: 1. One great one has been foretold, v. 18. Even now there are many antichrists, the mystery of iniquity already worketh. 2. They were foretold also as the sign of this last time, v. 18.

III. Some account of these seducers or antichrists: "They went out from us (v. 19), from our company and communion." The purest churches may have their apostates. "For, if they had been of us, they would have continued with us (v. 19); had the sacred truth been rooted in their hearts it would have held them with us." Those that apostatize from religion sufficiently indicate that, before, they were hypocrites in religion. But this was done (or they went out) that they might be made manifest that they were not all of us, v. 19. Some of the hypocritical must be manifested here, and that for their own shame and benefit too, in their reduction to the truth.

Verses 20–27

Here, I. The apostle encourages the disciples in this hour of seducers. But you have an unction from the Holy One, and you know all things. 1. The blessing wherewith they were enriched: You have an unction. True Christians are anointed ones, their name intimates as much. They are anointed by the Spirit of grace. 2. From whom this blessing comes—from the Holy One. The Lord Christ disposes of the graces of the divine Spirit, and he anoints the disciples to make them like himself. 3. The effect of this unction: "And thereby you know all things (v. 20), all these things concerning Christ and his religion."

II. The mind and meaning with which he wrote to them. 1. By way of negation; not as suspecting their knowledge, v. 21. It is good to surmise well concerning our Christian brethren. A just confidence in religious persons may both encourage and contribute to their fidelity. 2. By way of assertion, But because you know it (you know the truth in Jesus), and that no lie is of the truth. Those who know the truth in any respect are thereby prepared to discern what is inconsistent therewith. No lie belongs to religion, either natural or revealed. No lie is of the truth; frauds and impostures then are very unfit means to support and propagate the truth.

III. The apostle further arraigns these seducers. 1. They are liars: Who is a liar, but ye that denieth that Jesus is the Christ? There is no truth so sacred and fully attested but some or other will contradict or deny it. 2. They are direct enemies to God as well as to the Lord Christ, v. 22. He that opposes Christ denies the witness and testimony of the father. The apostle may well infer, Whosoever denies the Son the same has not the Father. But he that acknowledgeth the Son has the Father also, v. 23.

IV. The apostle advises the disciples to continue in the old doctrines at first communicated to them, v. 24. Truth is older than error. The truth concerning Christ, that was at first delivered to the saints, is not to be exchanged for novelties. The Christian truth may plead antiquity, and be recommended thereby.

1. The sacred advantage they will receive by adhering to the primitive truth and faith. (1) They will continue thereby in holy union with God and Christ, v. 24. It is the truth of Christ abiding in us that is the means of severing us from sin and uniting us to the Son of God. (2) They will thereby secure the promise of eternal life, v. 25. Great is the promise that God makes to his faithful adherents. It is eternal life, which none but God can give.

2. The design of the apostle's writing to them. This letter is to fortify them against the deceivers of the age (v. 26), and therefore, if you continue not in what you have heard from the beginning, my writing and service will be in vain.

3. The instructive blessing they had received from heaven, v. 27. True Christians have an inward confirmation of the divine truth they have imbibed. This sacred chrism is commended on these accounts: (1) It is durable and lasting, v. 27. Divine illumination must be something continued. Temptations, snares, and seductions, arise. The anointing must abide. (2) It is better than human instruction, v. 27. You were instructed by us before you were anointed; but now our teaching is nothing in comparison to that. (3) It is a sure evidence of truth, v. 27. The Holy Spirit must needs be the Spirit of truth. The Spirit of truth will not lie; and he teacheth all things. (4) It will preserve those in whom it abides against seducers and their seduction, v. 27. It teaches you to abide in Christ; and, as it teaches you, it secures you.

Verses 28, 29

And now, little children, abide in him, v. 28. He would persuade by love, and prevail by endearment as well as by reason. Those that are anointed by the Lord Jesus are highly obliged to abide with him. This duty of perseverance and constancy is strongly urged: 1. From the consideration of his return at the great day of account, v. 28. It is here taken for granted that the Lord Jesus will come again. This was part of that truth they had heard from the beginning. Those who have continued with him throughout all their temptations shall have confidence, and joy, in the sight of him. On the contrary, those that have deserted him shall be ashamed before him. The apostle includes himself in the number. "Let not us be ashamed of you," as well as, "you will not be ashamed of yourselves." 2. From the consideration of the dignity of those who still adhere to Christ, v. 29. He that doeth righteousness may here be justly enough assumed as another name for him that abideth in Christ. Such a one must needs be born of him. He is renewed by the Spirit of Christ, after the image of Christ. He that is constant to the practice of religion in trying times gives good evidence that he is born from above, from the Lord Christ.

CHAP. III

The love of God in our adoption, ver. 1, 2. He thereupon argues for holiness (ver. 3), and against sin, ver. 4–10. He presses brotherly love, ver. 11–18. How to assure our hearts before God, ver. 19–22. The precept of faith, ver. 23. And the good of obedience, ver. 24.

Verses 1–3

The apostle,

I. Breaks forth into the admiration of that grace that is the spring of such a wonderful vouchsafement: Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God! It is wonderful condescending love of the eternal Father, that such as we should be made and called his sons. Strange, that the holy God is not ashamed to be called our Father, and to call us his sons!

II. Infers the honour of believers above the cognizance of the world, v. 1. Little does the world perceive the happiness of the genuine followers of Christ. Little does the world think that these poor, humble, contemned ones are the favourites of heaven, and will be inhabitants there ere long. Their Lord was here unknown as well as they, v. 1. Let the followers of Christ be content with hard fare here, since they are in a land of strangers, among those who little know them, and their Lord was so treated before them.

III. Exalts these persevering disciples in the prospect of the certain revelation of their state and dignity. 1. Their present honourable relation is asserted, v. 2. We have the nature of sons by regeneration. 2. The glory pertaining to the sonship and adoption is reserved for another world. The sons of God must walk by faith, and live by hope. 3. The time of the revelation of the sons of God is determined: But we know that when he shall appear we shall be like him. The sons of God will be known and be made manifest by their likeness to their head. 4. Their likeness to him is argued from the sight they shall have of him: We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is. All shall see him, but not as he is, to those in heaven. The wicked shall see him in his frowns; but these shall see him in the smiles and beauty of his face. Their likeness shall enable them to see him as the blessed do in heaven.

IV. Urges to the prosecution of holiness, v. 3. The sons of God know that their Lord is holy and pure. Those then who hope to live with him must study the utmost purity, their hope of heaven will dictate and constrain them so to do. It is a contradiction to such hope to indulge sin and impurity. As we are sanctified by faith, we must be sanctified by hope. That we may be saved by hope we must be purified by hope.

Verses 4–10

Multiplied arguments against sin, and all communion with the works of darkness.

I. From the nature of sin. It is a contrariety to the divine law, v. 4. Commission of sin now is the rejection of the divine law, and this is the rejection of the divine authority, and consequently of God himself.

II. From the errand of the Lord Jesus in this world, which was to remove sin, v. 5. He takes sin away, that he may conform us to himself, and in him is no sin. Those that expect communion with Christ above should study communion with him here in the utmost purity.

III. From the opposition between sin and a real union with the Lord Christ, v. 6. He that abideth in Christ continues not in the practice of sin. Those that abide in Christ abide in their covenant with him. They abide in the potent light and knowledge of him; and therefore it may be concluded that he that sinneth hath not seen him, neither known him. Practical renunciation of sin is the great evidence of saving knowledge of the Lord Christ.

IV. From the connection between the practice of righteousness and a state of righteousness. The practice of sin and a justified state are inconsistent: "Little children, let no man deceive you. He that doeth righteousness is righteous." It may appear that righteousness may in several places of scripture be justly rendered religion, as Matt. v. 10, Blessed are those that are persecuted for righteousness' sake, that is, for religion's sake. To do righteousness then is to practise religion. The practice of religion cannot subsist without a principle of integrity and conscience.

V. From the relation between the sinner and the devil, and thereupon from the design of the Lord Christ. 1. From the relation between the sinner and the devil. To commit sin is here to live under the power and dominion of it; and he who does so is of the devil. 2. From the design and office of the Lord Christ against the devil, v. 8. He came into our world that he might conquer him. Sin will he loosen and dissolve more and more, till he has quite destroyed it. Let not us serve or indulge what the Son of God came to destroy.

VI. From the connection between regeneration and the relinquishment of sin: Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin. To be born of God is to be inwardly renewed, and restored to a holy rectitude of nature by the power of the Spirit of God. Such a one committeth not sin, his seed remaineth in him. Renewing grace is an abiding principle. Religion is not an art, an acquired dexterity and skill, but a new nature. And thereupon the consequence is the regenerate person cannot sin. He cannot continue in the course and practice of sin. And the reason is because he is born of God. There is that light in his mind which shows him the evil and malignity of sin. There is that bias upon his heart which disposes him to loathe and hate sin. There is the spiritual disposition, that breaks the force and fulness of the sinful acts. It is not reckoned the person's sin, in the gospel account, where the bent and frame of the mind and spirit are against it. The unregenerate person is morally unable for what is religiously good. The regenerate person is happily disabled for sin.

VII. From the discrimination between the children of God and the children of the devil. They have their distinct characters, v. 10. Now the seed of the serpent is known: 1. By neglect of religion: Whosoever doeth not righteously is not of God, but, on the contrary, of the devil. 2. By hatred of fellow-christians, v. 10.

I. He recommends fraternal Christian love, v. 11. We should love the Lord Jesus, and value his love, and consequently love all the objects of it.

II. He dissuades from what is contrary thereto and that by the example of Cain. He was as the first-born of the serpent's seed; was of the wicked one. He imitated and resembled the first wicked one, the devil. His ill-will had no restraint; it proceeded so far as to accomplish murder, v. 12. Sin, indulged, knows no bound. He was vexed with the superiority of Abel's service, and envied him the favour and acceptance he had with God. And for these he martyred his brother, v. 12. Ill-will will teach us to hate and revenge what we should admire and imitate.

III. He infers that it is no wonder that good men are so served now, v. 13. The serpentine nature still continues in the world. Wonder not then that the serpentine world hates and hisses at you.

Verses 14–19

The beloved apostle can scarcely touch upon the mention of sacred love, but he must enlarge upon the enforcement of it.

I. It is a mark of our transition into a state of life, v. 14. We may know it by the evidences of our faith in Christ, of which this love to our brethren is one. This love,

1. Supposes a general love to mankind. Mankind are to be loved: (1) As the excellent work of God, made by him, and made in wonderful resemblance of him. (2) As being beloved in Christ. A world so beloved of God should accordingly be loved by us. This love will include all due love to enemies themselves.

2. It includes a peculiar love to the Christian society. They are not so much loved for their own sakes as for the sake of God and Christ, who have loved them. This is the issue of faith in Christ, of our passage from death to life.

II. The hatred of our brethren is a sign of our deadly state, v. 14. This the apostle argues, v. 15. Hatred of the person is a hatred of life and welfare, and naturally tends to desire the extinction of it. Now he who by the disposition of his heart is a murderer cannot have eternal life abiding in him.

III. The example of God and Christ should inflame our hearts with this holy love, v. 16. The great God has given his Son to the death for us. Surely we should love those whom God hath loved, and so loved.

IV. The apostle proceeds to show us what should be the effect of this our Christian love. 1. It must be so fervent as to make us willing to suffer even to death for the safety and salvation of the dear brethren, v. 16. How mortified should the Christian be to this life, and how well assured of a better! 2. It must be compassionate, liberal, and communicative to the necessities of the brethren, v. 17. Those who have this world's good must love a good God more, and their good brethren more, and be ready to distribute it for their sakes. This love to the brethren is love to God in them; and where there is none of this love to them there is no true love to God at all. There may be other fruits of this love, v. 18. Compliments and flatteries become not Christians; but the sincere expressions of sacred affection, and the services or labours of love, do.

V. This love will evince our sincerity in religion, and give us hope towards God, v. 19. It is a great happiness to be assured of our integrity in religion. The way to secure our inward peace, is to abound in love and in the works of love.

The apostle proceeds here,

I. To establish the court of conscience, v. 20. Our heart here is our self-reflecting judicial power, whereby we can take cognizance of ourselves, and accordingly pass a judgment upon our state towards God; and so it is the same with conscience. Conscience is God's viceregent, calls the court in his name, and acts for him. If conscience condemn us, God does so too. God is a greater witness than our conscience, and knoweth more against us than it does: he knoweth all things. If conscience acquit us, God does so too (v. 21). Then have we assurance that he accepts us now, and will acquit us in the great day of account. Let conscience therefore be heard, be well-informed, and diligently attended to.

II. To indicate the privilege of those who have a good conscience towards God. They have interest in heaven; their suits are heard there, v. 22. Obedient souls are prepared for blessings, and they have promise of audience.

I. What his commandments are, v. 23. To discern what he is, according to his name, the Son of God, and the anointed Saviour of the world. To approve him in judgment and conscience. To consent to him as our Redeemer. To trust to him for the full discharge of his saving office. This faith is a needful requisite to those who would be prevalent petitioners with God, because it is by the Son that we must come to the Father. That we love one another, as he gave us commandment, v. 23. As goodwill to men was proclaimed from heaven, so goodwill to men must be carried in the hearts of those who go to God and heaven.

II. The blessedness of obedience to these commands. The obedient enjoy communion with God, v. 24. We dwell in God and God dwells in us. The trial of his divine inhabitation (v. 24), is by the frame of soul that he hath conferred upon us.

CHAP. IV

The apostle exhorts to try spirits (ver. 1), gives a note to try by (ver. 2, 3), shows who are of the world and who of God (ver. 4–6), urges Christian love (ver. 7–16), describes our love to God, and the effect of it, ver. 17–21.

Verses 1–3

I. He calls the disciples to caution and scrutiny about the spirits that had now risen. 1. To caution: "Beloved, believe not every spirit; follow not every pretender to the Spirit of God." There had been real communications from the divine Spirit and therefore others pretended thereto. 2. To scrutiny, to examination of the claims that are laid to the Spirit, v. 1. To the disciples is allowed a judgment of discretion. A reason is given for this trial, v. 1. It should not seem strange to us that false teachers set themselves up in the church: it was so in the apostles' times.

II. He gives a test whereby the disciples may try these pretending spirits. They were to be tried by their doctrine, v. 2. He who confesses and preaches Christ, does it by the Spirit of God. The sum of revealed religion is comprehended in the doctrine concerning Christ, his person and office. We see then the aggravation of a systematic opposition to him and it, v. 3. The anti-christian spirit began betimes, even in the apostles' days. But we have been forewarned that such opposition would arise, and the more we see the word of Christ fulfilled the more confirmed we should be in the truth of it.

Verses 4–6

The apostle encourages the disciples against this seducing antichristian spirit. He assures them of a more divine principle in them, v. 4, 6. We are born of God. He gives them hope of victory, v. 4. "There is a strong preserver within you, v. 4. The Spirit of God dwells in you, and that Spirit is more mighty than men or devils." The Spirit of God hath framed your mind for God and heaven; but they are of the world, and therefore speak they of the world. This worldly design procures them proselytes, v. 5. They are followed by such as themselves: the world will love its own, and its own will love it. "He that knoweth God heareth us. He who knows the purity and holiness of God, the love and grace of God, must know that he is with us; and he who knows this will attend to us, and abide with us. He that is not of God heareth not us. Thus you have a distinction between us and others," v. 6.

Verses 7–13

The Spirit of truth is known by love, v. 7. The apostle would unite them in his love, that he might unite them in love to each other.

I. The high and heavenly descent of love: For love is of God, v. 7. The Spirit of God is the Spirit of love. Love comes down from heaven.

II. Love argues a true apprehension of the divine nature, v. 7, 8. What attribute of the divine Majesty so clearly shines in all the world as his communicative goodness, which is love. He that loveth not knoweth not God. Knowledge of God dwells not in such a soul; for God is love (v. 8). Love is natural and essential to the divine Majesty: God is love. He hath loved us, such as we are (v. 9). Strange that God should love impure dust and ashes! He has loved us at such an incomparable value as he has given for us, v. 9. Mystery and miracle of divine love that such a Son should be sent into our world for us! God loved us first, v. 10. He loved us, when we had no love for him, when we lay in our guilt. He gave us his Son for such service and such an end. For such service, to be the propitiation for our sins. For such an end (v. 9), that we might live with God, and live in eternal glory and blessedness with him. O what love is here!

III. Divine love to the brethren should constrain ours, v. 11. This should be an invincible argument. Shall we refuse to love those whom the eternal God hath loved? We should be admirers of his love, and lovers of his love, and consequently lovers of those whom he loves.

IV. The Christian love is an assurance of the divine inhabitation, v. 12. The sacred lovers of the brethren are the temples of God; the divine Majesty has a peculiar residence there.

V. Herein the divine love attains accomplishment in us, v. 12. God's love is not perfected in him, but in and with us. Faith is perfected by its works, and love perfected by its operations. When the divine love has wrought us to the love of God, and thereupon to the love of the brethren, for his sake, it is therein perfected. How ambitious should we be of this love, when God reckons his own love to us perfected thereby, v. 13. One would think that to speak of God dwelling in us, and we in him, were to use words too high for mortals, had not God gone before us therein. What it fully is must be left to the revelation of the blessed world. But this mutual inhabitation we know, says the apostle, because he hath given us of his Spirit.

Verses 14–16

I. The fundamental article of the Christian religion, v. 14. 1. The Lord Jesus's relation to God; he is Son to the Father. 2. His relation and office towards us—the Saviour of the world. 3. The ground on which he became so: The Father sent the Son. 4. The apostle's assurance of this—he and his brethren had seen it; they had seen the Son of God in his human nature. 5. The apostle's attestation of this: "We have seen and do testify."

II. The excellent privilege attending the due acknowledgment of this truth, v. 15. He who thus confesses Christ, and God in him, is possessed by the Spirit of God.

III. God's love is thus seen and exerted in Christ Jesus, v. 16. The Christian revelation is the revelation of the divine love; the articles of our revealed faith are but so many articles relating to the divine love. The history of the Lord Christ is the history of God's love to us.

1. God is love; he is essential boundless love; he has incomprehensible love for us of this world, which he has demonstrated in the mission of his beloved Son. What will he not do then when he designs to demonstrate his love, that he himself is love? In such a dispensation as that of giving an eternal Son for us and to us, he will commend his love to us indeed. Then may it well be inscribed upon the whole creation of God, God is love.

2. He that dwelleth in love dwelleth in God, and God in him. He that dwells in sacred love has the love of God shed abroad upon his heart, and will ere long go to dwell with God for ever.

He recommends it in both the branches of it, both as love to God, and love to our brother.

I. As love to God. 1. It will give us peace and satisfaction of spirit in the day when it will be most needed, v. 17. There must be a day of universal judgment. Happy they who shall have boldness before the Judge at that day, who shall be able to lift up their heads, and to look him in the face, as knowing he is their friend. So may do the lovers of God. And we have this boldness towards Christ because of our conformity to him, v. 17. Love hath conformed us to him. 2. It prevents servile fear (v. 18); so far as love prevails, fear ceases. We must here distinguish between the fear of God and being afraid of him. The fear of God is often mentioned and commanded as the substance of religion. Such fear is consistent with love, yea, with perfect love. But then there is a being afraid of God, which arises from a sense of guilt; and so fear here may be rendered dread: There is no dread in love. Love puts off dread, and puts on joy in him; and, as love grows, joy grows too; so that perfect love casteth out fear or dread. They well know that God loves them, and they thereupon triumph in his love. Because fear hath torment (v. 18) —fear is known to be a disquieting passion, but perfect love casteth out torment, for it teaches the mind a perfect acquiescence in the beloved, and therefore perfect love casteth out fear. He that feareth is not made perfect in love, it is a sign that our love is far from being perfect. 3. We cannot but love so good a God, who loved us when we were both unloving and unlovely. The divine love stamped love upon our souls.

II. As love to our brother in Christ; such love is urged on these accounts: 1. As consonant to our Christian profession. In the profession of Christianity we profess to love God as the root of religion (v. 20). That such a one loves not God the apostle proves, v. 20. The eye is wont to affect the heart; things unseen less catch the mind, and thereby the heart. The member of Christ has much of God visible in him. How then shall the hater of a visible image of God pretend to love the invisible God himself? 2. As suitable to the express law of God, v. 21. We must love God originally and supremely, and others in him. It cannot but be a natural suitable obligation that he who loves God should love his brother also.

CHAP. V

I. The dignity of believers, ver. 1. II. Their obligation to love, ver. 1–3. III. Their victory, ver. 4, 5. IV. The confirmation of their faith, ver. 6–10. V. The advantage of their faith in eternal life, ver. 11–13. VI. The audience of their prayers, ver. 14–17. VII. Their preservation from sin and Satan, ver. 18. VIII. Their happy distinction from the world, ver. 19. IX. Their true knowledge of God (ver. 20), upon which they must depart from idols, ver. 21.

Verses 1–5

I. Our Christian brethren are nearly related to God; they are his children, v. 1. Here the Christian brother is, 1. Described by his faith; he that believeth that Jesus is the Christ accordingly yields himself up to his care and direction. 2. Dignified by his descent, v. 1. All believers, though by nature sinners, are spiritually descended from God, and accordingly are to be beloved, v. 1. It seems but natural that he who loves the Father should love the children also.

II. The apostle shows, 1. How we may discern the truth of our love to the regenerate. The ground of it must be our love to God, v. 2. Our love to them appears to be sound and genuine when we love them because they are God's children, and so in them God himself is loved. 2. How we may learn the truth of our love to God, v. 2. Then we truly love God: For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments; and the keeping of his commandments requires a spirit delighting therein, v. 3. His commandments are thereby made easy and pleasant to us. 3. What is the result of regeneration, v. 4. He that is born of God is born for God, and consequently for another world. He can repel and conquer this, v. 4. Faith is the cause of victory. In and by faith we cleave to Christ in opposition to the world. It receives and derives strength from the object of it, the Son of God, for conquering the world.

III. It is the real Christian that is the true conqueror of the world, v. 5. He who believes that Jesus is the Son of God believes therein that Jesus came from God to be the Saviour of the world. And he who so believes must needs by this faith overcome the world. He sees it must be a great part of the Saviour's work, and of his own salvation, to be redeemed and rescued from this malignant world. He perceives that the Lord Jesus conquered the world, not for himself only, but for his followers. He is possessed with a spirit and disposition that cannot be satisfied with this world, that looks beyond it. It is the Christian revelation that is the great means of conquering the world, and gaining another that is blessed and eternal. The Saviour designs not this world for the inheritance and portion of his saved company. It is the real Christian that is the proper hero, who vanquishes the world. Who in all the world but the believer on Jesus Christ can thus overcome the world?

Verses 6–9

The faith of the Christian believer had need to be well founded, and it is so; Christ brings his credentials along with him.

I. In the way and manner by which he came: This is he that came by water and blood (v. 6).

1. We are inwardly and outwardly defiled. Inwardly, by the pollution of sin in our nature. For our cleansing from this we need spiritual water. We are defiled outwardly by the guilt of sin upon our persons. From this we must be purged by atoning blood.

2. Both these ways of cleansing were represented in the old ceremonial institutions of God. Persons and things must be purified by water and blood.

3. Upon the death of Jesus Christ, his side being pierced with a soldier's spear, out of the wound there immediately issued water and blood. This the beloved apostle saw. Now this water and blood are comprehensive of all that is necessary to our salvation. By the water our souls are washed and purified. By the blood God is glorified, his law is honoured. By the blood we are justified, reconciled, and presented righteous to God. The water and the blood then comprehend all things that can be requisite to our salvation.

II. In the witness that attends him, v. 6. The apostle adds the commendation of this witness. He is the Spirit of God, and cannot lie. He is indeed the Spirit of truth. And that the Spirit is truth, and a witness worthy of all acceptation, appears in that he is a heavenly witness. But here,

1. We are stopped in our course by the contest there is about the genuineness of v. 7. It is alleged that many old Greek manuscripts have it not. We shall not here enter into the controversy. It can scarcely be supposed that, when the apostle is representing the Christian's faith in overcoming the world, and the foundation it relies upon in adhering to Jesus Christ, he should omit the supreme testimony that attended him (v. 9). Upon our present reading here is a noble enumeration of the several witnesses and testimonies supporting the truth of the Lord Jesus.

2. The apostle, having told us that the Spirit that bears witness to Christ is truth, shows us that he is so, by assuring us that he is in heaven, v. 7.

(1) Here is a trinity of heavenly witnesses, such as have testified and vouched to the world the authority of the Lord Jesus in his claims. The first that occurs in order is the Father; he set his seal to the commission of the Lord Christ all the while he was here. The second witness is the Word, a mysterious name. He must bear witness to the human nature, or to the man Christ Jesus. The third witness is the Holy Ghost. True and faithful must he be to whom the Spirit of holiness sets his seal. These are witnesses in heaven; and they bear record from heaven; and they are one.

(2) To these there is opposed, though with them joined, a trinity of witnesses on earth, v. 8. Of these witnesses the first is the spirit. The regeneration or renovation of souls is a testimony to the Saviour. It is a testimony on earth, because it continues with the church here. To this Spirit belong not only the regeneration and conversion of the church, but its progressive sanctification, victory over the world. The second is the water. This was before considered as a means of salvation, now as a testimony to the Saviour himself, and intimates his purity and purifying power. And so it seems to comprehend the testimony of John's baptism, who bore witness of him and to the purity of his own doctrine, by which souls are purified and washed. The baptism that he has appointed for the initiation of his disciples. The third witness is the blood; this he shed, and this was our ransom. This testifies for Jesus Christ; in that it demonstrated unspeakable love to us; and none will deceive those whom they entirely love. In that it lays obligation on his disciples to suffer and die for him. This shows that neither he nor his kingdom is of this world. These are signified and sealed in the institution of his own supper. Such are the witnesses on earth. These three witnesses agree in one, in one and the same thing among themselves.

III. The apostle concludes, v. 9. Here is the witness whereby God hath testified of his Son. He has by himself proclaimed him to the world. The authority and acceptableness of his testimony. It is truth itself, of highest authority and most unquestionable infallibility. The application of the rule to the present case. God, that cannot lie, hath given sufficient assurance to the world that Jesus Christ is his Son, the Son of his love, to reconcile the world unto himself; he testified therefore the truth and divine origin of the Christian religion, and that it is the sure appointed way of bringing us to God.

I. The privilege and stability of the real Christian, v. 10. He hath not only the outward evidence that others have, but he hath in his own heart a testimony for Jesus Christ. He can allege what Christ and the truth of Christ have done for his soul and what he has seen and found in him. Christ is formed in him, and he is growing up to the fulness and perfection, or perfect image of Christ, in heaven.

II. The aggravation of the unbeliever's sin, the sin of unbelief, v. 10. He must believe that God did not send his Son into the world, or that Jesus Christ was not the Son of God.

III. The matter of all this divine testimony concerning Jesus Christ, v. 11. This is the sum of the gospel. 1. God hath given to us eternal life. He has designed it for us. He has made it over to us. 2. This life is in the Son. He is eternal life to us. It must follow, (1) He that is united to the Son is united to life (v. 12). (2) He who refuses the Son, who is life itself, and the way to it refuses life.

IV. The end of the apostle's preaching this to believers. 1. For their satisfaction and comfort: These believers have eternal life. These believers may come to know that they have eternal life, and should be encouraged, and comforted, in the prospect of it. 2. For their confirmation and progress in their holy faith (v. 13). Believers must persevere, or they do nothing.

Verses 14–17

I. A privilege belonging to faith in Christ, audience in prayer: v. 14. The Lord Christ emboldens us to come to God in all circumstances. Through him our petitions are accepted of God. The matter of our prayer must be agreeable to the declared will of God. We may have confidence that the prayer of faith shall be heard in heaven.

II. The advantage accruing to us by such privilege, v. 15. To know that his petitions are heard or accepted is as good as to know that they are answered.

III. Direction in prayer in reference to the sins of others, v. 16. 1. We ought to pray for others as well as for ourselves. 2. There is a great distinction in the heinousness and guilt of sin (v. 16), and (v. 17). (1) There is a sin unto death. There is a sin unto death in opposition to such sin as is here said not to be unto death. There is, therefore, (2) A sin not unto death. The gospel does not positively and peremptorily threaten death to the more visible sins of the members of Christ but only some gospel-chastisement. There is room left for divine wisdom or goodness, or even gospel severity, to determine how far the chastisement or the scourge shall proceed. There are sins which are unto death spiritual and evangelical, that is, are inconsistent with spiritual life in the soul and with an evangelical right to life above, such as total impenitence and unbelief.

IV. The direction for prayer according to the different sorts of sin. The prayer is supposed to be for life: He shall ask, and he shall give them life. Life is to be asked of God. He is the God of life; he gives it when and to whom he pleases. In the case of a brother's sin, which is not unto death, we may in faith and hope pray for him. But, in case of the sin unto death we have no allowance to pray. Perhaps the apostle's expression, I do not say, He shall pray for it, may intend no more than, "I have no promise for you in that case." The removal of evangelical penalties, or the prevention of death, can be prayed for only conditionally or provisionally. We cannot pray that the sins of the impenitent and unbelieving should, while they are such, be forgiven them. But we may pray for their repentance, for their being enriched with faith in Christ, and thereupon for all other saving mercies. The apostle seems to argue that there is sin that is not unto death (v. 17); for, were all unrighteousness unto death, then we were all peremptorily bound over to death, and, since it is not so, there must be sin that is not to death. Though there is no venial sin there is pardoned sin.

I. A recapitulation of the privileges of sound Christian believers. 1. They are secured against sin (v. 18); secured against that sin which is unto death. The new nature, and the inhabitation of the divine Spirit thereby, prevent the admission of such unpardonable sin. 2. They are fortified against the devil's destructive attempts (v. 18). It seems not to be barely a narration of the duty of the regenerate; but an indication of their power. 3. They are on God's side in opposition to the world, v. 19. Mankind are divided into two great parties, that which belongs to God and that which belongs to wickedness. The Christian believers belong to God. They are of God, and from him, and to him, and for him. On the contrary, the whole world, the rest, being by far the major part, lieth in wickedness. May the God of the Christian world continually demolish the devil's dominion, and translate souls into the kingdom of his dear Son! 4. They are enlightened in the knowledge of the true eternal God, v. 20. The Son of God has come into our world, and we have seen him, and know him. He has revealed unto us the true God, and he has opened our minds too to understand that revelation; and we are assured that it is the true God that he hath discovered to us. It is a great happiness to know the true God, to know him in Christ; it is eternal life. 5. They have a happy union with God and his Son, v. 20. The Son leads us to the Father, and we are in both, in the love and favour of both. In union with either, much more with both, we are united to the true God and eternal life.

II. The apostle's concluding monition, v. 21. Since you know the true God, and are in him, let your light and love guard you. Flee from the false gods of the heathen world. The God whom you have known is he who redeemed you by his Son, who has pardoned your sins, and given you eternal life. Cleave to him in faith, and love, and constant obedience. To this living and true God be glory and dominion for ever and ever. Amen.

THE SECOND EPISTLE OF

JOHN

Here we find a canonical epistle inscribed, principally, not only to a single person, but to one also of the softer sex. And why not to one of that sex? In gospel redemption, privilege, and dignity, there is neither male nor female; they are both one in Christ Jesus. No wonder then that a heroine in the Christian religion should be dignified also by an apostolical epistle.

The apostle here salutes an honourable matron and her children, ver. 1–3. Recommends to them faith and love, ver. 5, 6. Warns them of deceivers (ver. 7), and to take heed to themselves, ver. 8. Teaches how to treat those who bring not the doctrine of Christ, ver. 10, 11. Concludes the epistle, ver. 12, 13.

I. The saluter, not expressed by name, but by a chosen character: The elder. The expression, and style, and love, intimate that the penman was the same with that of the foregoing epistle. Possibly the oldest apostle now living. He was now old in holy service and experience, had seen and tasted much of heaven, and was much nearer than when at first he believed.

II. The saluted: To the elect lady and her children. A lady, a person of eminent quality. It is well that the gospel has got among such. It is a pity but lords and ladies should be acquainted with the Lord Christ and his religion. The elect lady; not only a choice one, but one chosen of God. And her children; probably the lady was a widow. We see that children may well be taken notice of in Christian letters, and they should know it too; it may avail to their encouragement. The respect paid them, 1. By the apostle himself: Whom I love in the truth, whom I sincerely and heartily love. He who was the beloved disciple had learnt the art or exercise of love. 2. By all her Christian acquaintance: And not I only, but also all those that have known the truth. Truth demands acknowledgment, and those who see the evidences of pure religion should confess and attest them. The ground of this love and respect was their regard to the truth: For the truth's sake which dwelleth in us, and shall be with us for ever. Those who love truth and piety in themselves should love it in others too. Religion should still dwell within us, in our minds and hearts, in our faith and love.

III. The salutation, which is indeed an apostolical benediction, v. 3. Sacred love pours out blessings upon this honourable Christian family; to those who have shall more be given.

1. From whom these blessings are craved, (1) From God the Father. He is the fountain of blessedness. (2) From the Lord Jesus Christ. He is also author and communicator of these heavenly blessings, the Son of the Father.

2. What the apostle craves, (1) Grace—divine favour and goodwill. (2) Mercy—free pardon and forgiveness; those who are already rich in grace have need of continual forgiveness. (3) Peace—tranquillity of spirit and serenity of conscience. And these are desired in truth and love. These blessings will continually preserve true faith and love in the elect lady and her children.

IV. The congratulation upon the prospect of the exemplary behaviour of other children of this excellent lady, v. 4. Possibly the lady's sons travelled abroad, and in their travels might come to Ephesus, where the apostle is supposed to have now resided, and might there happily converse with him. Let young travellers learn to carry their religion along with them, and not either leave it at home or learn the ill customs of the countries where they come. It is pleasant to see children treading in good parent's steps. How great a joy must it be to her ladyship to hear so good an account of them from so good a judge! We see here also the rule of true walking: the commandment of the Father. Then is our walk true, our converse right, when it is managed by the word of God.

Verses 5, 6

I. The apostle's request. Whether out of deference to her ladyship, or apostolical meekness, or both, he condescends to beseech: And now I beseech thee, lady. Love will avail where authority will not; and we may often see that the more authority is urged the more it is slighted.

II. The thing requested—growth in love. Those that are eminent in any Christian virtue have yet room to grow therein.

1. This love is recommended: From the obligation thereto—the commandment. From the antiquity of the obligation, v. 5. This commandment must everywhere attend Christianity, that the disciples of it must love one another.

2. Then this love is illustrated, v. 5. This is the evidence of our sincere, mutual, Christian love—that we walk after God's commands. Universal obedience is the proof of the sincerity of Christian virtues. This is a fundamental duty in the gospel-charter (v. 6), that is, walk in this love.

Verses 7–9

I. The ill news communicated to the lady, For many deceivers have entered into the world. Your stability is likely to be tried. 1. The description of the deceiver and his deceit (v. 7); he brings some error or other concerning the person of the Lord Jesus. Strange that after such evidence any should deny that the Lord Jesus is the Son of God and Saviour of the world! 2. The aggravation of the case (v. 7); he deludes souls and undermines the kingdom of the Lord Christ.

II. The counsel given hereupon, v. 8. Two things they must beware of, for some begin well, but at last lose all their pains. 1. Professors should take care not to lose what they have gained. Sad it is that fair and splendid attainments in the school of Christ should all be lost at last. 2. That they lose not their reward, none of it. That we receive a full reward. The way to attain the full reward is to abide true to Christ, and constant in religion to the end.

III. The reason of the apostle's counsel. 1. The danger and evil of departure from gospel light. It is in reality a departure from God himself: Whosoever transgresseth and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God. Those who revolt thence, in so doing revolt from God. 2. The advantage and happiness of firm adherence to Christian truth. He that abideth in the doctrine of Christ, he hath both the Father and the Son. We must retain that holy doctrine in faith and love, as we hope or desire to arrive at blessed communion with the Father and the Son.

Verses 10, 11

I. The apostle gives direction concerning the treatment of such: If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house. Neither bid him God speed. Bad work should not be consecrated or recommended to the divine benediction. God will be no patron of falsehood and sin. The propagation of fatal error we must not dare to countenance.

II. The reason of such direction: For he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds. Favour and affection partake of the sin. We may be sharers in the iniquities of others.

The apostle concludes this letter, for some things are better spoken than written. The use of pen and ink may be a mercy and a pleasure; but a personal interview may be more so. The children of thy elect sister greet thee. Grace was abundant towards this family; here are two elect sisters, and probably their elect children. May there be many such gracious ladies rejoicing in their gracious descendants and other relations! Amen.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE THIRD EPISTLE OF

JOHN

The apostle sends this encouraging epistle to his friend Gaius, in which also he complains of the quite opposite spirit of a certain minister, and confirms the good report concerning another.

In this epistle the apostle congratulates Gaius upon the prosperity of his soul (ver. 1, 2), upon the fame he had among good Christians (ver. 3, 4), and upon his hospitality to the servants of Christ, ver. 5, 6. He complains of Diotrephes (ver. 9, 10), recommends Demetrius (ver. 12), and expresses his hope of visiting Gaius shortly, ver. 13, 14.

I. The sacred penman who writes and sends the letter; not here indeed notified by his name: The elder. Some have questioned whether this were John the apostle or no; but his style and spirit seem to shine in the epistle. Gaius could not question from whom the letter came.

II. The person saluted and honoured by the letter. He is notified, 1. By his name,—Gaius. We read of several of that name, particularly of one whom the apostle Paul baptized at Corinth. 2. By the kind expressions of the apostle to him: The well-beloved, and whom I love in the truth. Love expressed is wont to kindle love. To love our friends for the truth's sake is true love, gospel love.

III. The salutation or greeting. 1. The apostle's good opinion of his friend, that his soul prospered, the greatest blessing on this side heaven. 2. His good wish for his friend that his body may prosper and be in health as well as his soul. Grace will improve health, health will employ grace.

Verses 3–8

I. The good report that the apostle had received concerning this friend of his (v. 3–6). 1. The testimony concerning Gaius—the truth that was in him, and this evinced by his charity. Faith should work by love. 2. The witnesses—brethren that came from Gaius testified. A good report is due from those who have received good. 3. The auditory before which the report and testimony were given—before the church. This seems to be the church at which the apostle now resided. They could not but testify what they found and felt.

II. The report the apostle himself gives of him, v. 5. He was hospitable, good to the brethren, even to strangers. All who were of the household of faith were welcome to him. He was conscientious in what he did: "Thou doest faithfully whatsoever thou doest; thou doest it as a faithful servant, and from the Lord Christ mayest thou expect the reward."

III. The apostle's joy therein, v. 3. The best evidence of our having the truth is our walking in the truth.

IV. Concerning further treatment of the brethren that were with him. It seems to have been customary in those days of love to attend travelling ministers and Christians, at least some part of their road. It is a kindness to a stranger to be guided in his way, and a pleasure to travellers to meet with suitable company: this is a work that may be done after a godly sort.

V. The reasons of this directed conduct: Because that for his name's sake these brethren went forth, taking nothing of the Gentiles. They went forth to preach the gospel; possibly they might be sent out by this apostle himself: they went forth to convert the Gentiles; they went forth for God and his name's sake; they went forth also to carry a free gospel about with them: Taking nothing of the Gentiles. There are those who are not called to preach the gospel themselves who may yet contribute to the progress of it. The gospel should be made without charge to those to whom it is first preached. We ought therefore to receive such, that we may be fellow-helpers to the truth. Those who cannot themselves proclaim it may yet help and countenance those who do.

Verses 9–11

I. Here is a very different example and character.

1. His name—a Gentile name: Diotrephes, attended with an unchristian spirit.

2. His temper and spirit—full of pride and ambition: He loves to have the pre-eminence.

3. His contempt of the apostle's authority, and letter, and friends. Of his authority: The deeds which he doeth prating against us with malicious words. Malice and ill-will in the heart will be apt to vent themselves by the lips. Of his letter (v. 9). To an ambitious aspiring spirit apostolical authority or epistle signifies but little. Of his friends, the brethren he recommended, v. 10. There might be some differences or different customs between the Jewish and Gentile Christians. Many are cast out of the church who should be received there with satisfaction and welcome.

4. The apostle's menace of this proud domineerer (v. 10). This seems to intimate apostolical authority.

II. Here is counsel upon that different character, v. 11. Caution and counsel are not needless to those who are good already. To this caution and counsel a reason is respectively subjoined. To the counsel: Follow that which is good; for he that doeth good is of God. To the caution: Follow not that which is evil, for he that doeth evil hath not seen God. Evil-workers vainly pretend or boast an acquaintance with God.

Verses 12–14

I. The character of another person, one Demetrius, not much known otherwise. But here his name will live. His commendation was, 1. General: Demetrius has a good report of all men. Few are well spoken of by all. But universal integrity and goodness are the way to (and sometimes obtain) universal applause. 2. Deserved and well founded, v. 12. 3. Confirmed by the apostle's and his friends' testimony: Yea, and we also bear record; And you know that our record is true. It is good to be well known, or known for good.

II. The conclusion of the epistle. The referring of some things to personal interview, v. 13, 14. Many things may be more proper for immediate communication than for letter. Good Christians may well be glad to see one another. The benediction: Peace be to you. The public salutation sent to Gaius: Our friends salute thee. The apostle's particular salutation of the Christians in Gaius's church or vicinity: Greet the friends by name. Those may well salute and greet one another on earth who hope to live together in heaven.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF

THE GENERAL EPISTLE OF

JUDE

This epistle is styled (as are some few others) general or Catholic, because it is not immediately directed to any particular person, family, or church, but to the whole society of Christians. The general scope of it is much the same with that of the second chapter of the second epistle of Peter. It is designed to warn us against seducers, to inspire us with a warm love to, and a hearty concern for, truth and that in the closest conjunction with holiness, of which charity is a most essential character.

I. An account of the penman of this epistle, ver. 1, 2. II. The occasion of writing this epistle, ver. 3. III. A character of evil and perverse men, ver. 4. IV. A caution against hearkening to and following after such, ver. 5-7. V. The seducers against whom he was warning them, from ver. 8 to 13. VI. He cites an ancient prophecy of Enoch, ver. 14, 15. VII. He enlarges on the seducers' character, ver. 16-19. VIII. Exhorts them, ver. 20, 21. IX. Directs them how to act towards the erroneous and scandalous, ver. 22, 23. X. Closes with an admirable doxology.

I. We have an account of the penman of this epistle, Jude, or Judas. He was name-sake to one of his ancestors, the patriarch-son of Jacob. This was a name of worth, eminency, and honour; yet, 1. He had a wicked name-sake. There was one Judas who was the betrayer of his and our Lord. The same names may be common to the best and worst persons. It may be instructive to be called after the names of eminently good men, but there can be no inference drawn thence as to what we shall prove, though we may conclude what sort of persons our good parents hoped we should be. But, 2. Our Judas was quite another man. He was a faithful servant of Jesus Christ, the other was his betrayer and murderer. Our apostle here calls himself a servant of Jesus Christ, esteeming that a most honourable title. He might have claimed kindred to Christ according to the flesh, but he waives this, and rather glories in being his servant. It is a great honour to the meanest sincere minister (and it holds proportionably as to every upright Christian) that he is the servant of Christ Jesus. The apostles were servants before they were apostles, and they were but servants still. And brother of James, to wit, of him whom the ancients style the first bishop of Jerusalem. Of this James our Jude was brother, whether in the strictest or a larger acceptation I determine not.

II. To whom this epistle is directed; to all those who are sanctified by God the Father, and preserved in Jesus Christ, and called. The apostle may speak of their being called to be Christians. Christians are the called, called out of the world,—called from sin to Christ. Sanctified: Sanctified by God the Father. All who are effectually called are sanctified. Our sanctification is not our own work. Our corruption and pollution are of ourselves; but our sanctification and renovation are of God and his grace. The called and sanctified are preserved in Christ Jesus. Where he begins he will perfect; though we are fickle, he is constant.

III. We have the apostolical benediction: Mercy to you, &c. The mercy of God is the spring and fountain of all the good we have or hope for. Next to mercy is peace, which we have from the sense of having obtained mercy. As from mercy springs peace, so from peace springs love, his love to us, our love to him, and our brotherly love to one another. These the apostle prays may be multiplied, that Christians may not be content with scraps and narrow scantlings of them.

Verses 3-7

I. The design of the apostle in writing this epistle: to establish them in the Christian faith, and a practice and conversation truly conformable thereunto, and in an open and bold profession thereof. 1. The gospel salvation is a common salvation, in a most sincere offer and tender of it to all mankind. None are excluded from the benefit of these gracious offers and invitations, but those who exclude themselves. It is made to all believers; it is made to the weak as well as to the strong. Here let us abide; here we are safe; if we stir a step further, we are in danger of being either entangled or seduced. The apostles and evangelists all wrote to us of this common salvation. They have fully declared to us all that is necessary for every one to believe and do, in order to obtain a personal interest in the common salvation. The apostle (though inspired) gave all diligence to write of the common salvation. Those who speak of sacred things ought always to speak of them with the greatest reverence, care, and diligence. Those who have received the doctrine of this common salvation must contend earnestly for it. Earnestly, not furiously. But how? As the apostles did; by suffering patiently and courageously for it.

II. The occasion the apostle had to write to this purport. As evil manners give rise to good laws, so dangerous errors often give just occasion to the proper defence of important truths. 1. Ungodly men are the great enemies of the faith of Christ and the peace of the church. Those who deny or corrupt the one, and disturb the other, are here expressly styled ungodly men. Ungodly men raise scruples, start questions, cause divisions, widen breaches. Nothing cuts us off from the church but that which cuts us off from Christ; namely, reigning infidelity and ungodliness. Those are ungodly men who live without God in the world, who have no regard to God and conscience. 2. Those are the worst of ungodly men who turn the grace of God into lasciviousness, who take encouragement to sin more boldly because the grace of God has abounded, and still abounds, so wonderfully. 3. Those who turn the grace of God into lasciviousness do in effect deny the Lord God, and our Lord Jesus Christ; they deny both natural and revealed religion. They strike at the foundation of natural religion, for they deny the only Lord God; and they overturn all the frame of revealed religion, for they deny the Lord Jesus Christ. These stand or fall together, and they mutually yield light and force to each other. Never two tallies answered more exactly to each other than these do. 4. Those who turn the grace of God into lasciviousness are ordained unto condemnation. Those who thus sin must needs die of their wounds, of their disease. 5. We ought to contend earnestly for the faith, in opposition to those who would corrupt or deprave it, such as have crept in unawares. The more busy and crafty the instruments and agents of Satan are, to rob us of the truth, the more solicitous should we be to hold it fast.

III. The fair warning which the apostle, in Christ's name, gives to those who, having professed his holy religion, do afterwards prove false to it, v. 5–7. I will put you in remembrance. What we already know we still need to be put in remembrance of. Preaching is not designed to teach us something new in every sermon; but to put us in remembrance, to call to mind things forgotten. Though you know these things, yet you still need to know them better.

1. The destruction of the unbelieving Israelites in the wilderness, v. 5. They had miracles in abundance: they were their daily bread; yet even they perished in unbelief. We have greater advantages than they had; let their error be our awful warning.

2. We are here put in remembrance of the fall of the angels, v. 6. There were a great number of the angels who left their own habitation. They quitted their post, and rebelled against God. But God did not spare them. Those who would not be servants to their Maker were made captives to his justice, and are reserved in everlasting chains under darkness. Hear and fear, O sinful mortals of mankind!

3. The apostle here calls to our remembrance the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, v. 7. Their ruin is a particular warning to all people to take heed of, and fly from, fleshly lusts that war against the soul. God is the same holy, just, pure Being now as then; and can the beastly pleasures of a moment make amends for your suffering the vengeance of eternal fire?

Verses 8–15

A charge against deceivers who were now seducing the disciples of Christ. He calls them filthy dreamers, forasmuch as delusion is a dream, and the beginning of, and inlet to, all manner of filthiness. These filthy dreamers dream themselves into a fool's paradise on earth, and into a real hell at last.

I. The character of these deceivers is described.

1. They defile the flesh. The flesh or body is the immediate seat, and often the irritating occasion, of many horrid pollutions; yet these, though done in and against the body, do greatly defile and grievously maim and wound the soul.

2. They despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities. Such evil-speakers despise the dominion of conscience, make a jest of it, and would banish it out of the world; and as for the word of God, the rule of conscience, they despise it. Religion and its serious professors have been always and everywhere evil spoken of.

The apostle brings in Michael the archangel, &c., v. 9. Interpreters are at a loss what is here meant by the body of Moses. He durst not bring, &c. Not that he was afraid of the devil, but he believed God would be offended if, in such a dispute, he went that way to work. A memorandum to all disputants, never to bring railing accusations into their disputes. Truth needs no supports from falsehood or scurrility. The Lord rebuke thee. He would not stand disputing with the devil. Divine rebukes are harder to be borne than careless sinners now think for.

3. They speak evil of the things which they know not, &c., v. 10. If they had known them, they would have spoken well of them, for nothing but good and excellent can be truly said of religion. Men are most apt to speak evil of those persons and things that they know least of. On the other hand, retirement screens some even from just censure. But what they know naturally, &c. The apostle likens such to brute beasts, though they often think and boast themselves if not as the wisest, yet at least as the wittiest part of mankind. In those things they corrupt themselves. The fault, whatever it is, lies in their depraved wills.

4. In v. 11 the apostle represents them as followers of Cain, and in v. 12, 13, as atheistical and profane people,—as greedy and covetous, who, so they could but gain present worldly advantages, cared not what came next—who, like Core, ran into attempts in which they must assuredly perish, as he did. These are spots in your feasts of charity, or love-feasts. Yet how common in all Christian societies here on earth, the very best not excepted, are such blemishes! When they feast with you, they feed themselves without fear. Arrant gluttons, no doubt, they were; such as minded only the gratifying of their appetites. In common eating and drinking a holy fear is necessary, much more in feasting. Clouds they are without water, which promise rain in time of drought, but perform nothing of what they promise. Such is the case of formal professors. Carried about of winds, easily driven about as the wind happens to set; such are empty, ungrounded professors, an easy prey to every seducer. How happy would our world be if men either knew more or practically knew how little they know! Trees whose fruit withereth, &c. Trees they are, for they are planted in the Lord's vineyard, yet fruitless ones. Twice dead. One would think to be once dead were enough. They had been once dead in their natural state; but they seemed to recover, and to be brought to life again, when they took upon them the profession of the Christian religion. But now they are dead again by the evident proofs they have given of their hypocrisy: whatever they seemed, they had nothing truly vital in them.—Plucked up by the roots, as we commonly serve dead trees, from which we expect no more fruit. Raging waves of the sea, full of talk and turbulency, foaming out their own shame, creating much uneasiness to men of calmer tempers, which yet will in the end turn to their own greater shame and just reproach. Raging waves are a terror to sailing passengers; but, when they have got to port, the waves are forgotten, their noise and terror are for ever ended. Wandering stars. A very lively emblem of false teachers, who are sometimes here and sometimes there, so that one knows not where nor how to fix them.

II. The doom of this wicked people is declared. False teachers are to expect the worst of punishments in this and a future world. If this will not make both ministers and people cautious, I know not what will.

Of the prophecy of Enoch (v. 14, 15) we have no mention made in any other part or place of scripture. The Lord cometh with his holy myriads, including both angels and the spirits of just men made perfect. What a glorious time will that be, when Christ shall come with ten thousand of these! He cometh, To execute judgment upon the wicked; to convince them. They shall have no excuse or apology to make that they either can or dare then stand by.

I cannot pass v. 15 without taking notice how often, and how emphatically, the word ungodly is repeated in it, no fewer than four times: ungodly men, ungodly sinners, ungodly deeds, ungodly committed. Godly or ungodly signifies little with men nowadays, unless it be to scoff at and deride even the very expressions; but it is not so in the language of the Holy Ghost. Hard speeches of one another, especially if ill-grounded, will most certainly come into account at the judgment of the great day.

Verses 15–25

Here, I. The apostle enlarges further on the character of these evil men and seducers, v. 16. A murmuring complaining temper lays men under a very bad character; such are very weak at least, and for the most part very wicked. They are angry at everything that happens, and never pleased with their own state and condition in the world, as not thinking it good enough for them. Their will, their appetite, their fancy, are their only rule.

II. He proceeds to caution and exhort those to whom he is writing, v. 17–23.

1. He calls them to remember how they had been forewarned, v. 17. The accomplishment of it is a confirmation of their faith, instead of being in the least an occasion of shaking and unsettling them therein. Those who would persuade must make it evident that they sincerely love those whom they would persuade. Bitter words and hard usage never did nor ever will convince, much less persuade anybody. We must not think it strange, but comfort ourselves with this, that in the midst of all this confusion Christ will maintain his church, and make good his promise. The more religion is ridiculed and persecuted the faster hold we should take and keep of it; being forewarned, we should show that we are fore-armed; under such trials we should stand firm.

2. He guards them against seducers by a further description of their odious character, &c., v. 19. Sensual men have not the Spirit, that is, of God and Christ, the Spirit of holiness. The worse others are the better should we endeavour to be; the more busy Satan, the more tenacious should we be of sound doctrine and a good conversation.

3. He exhorts them to persevering constancy in truth and holiness.

(1) Building up yourselves in your most holy faith, v. 20. Having laid our foundation well in a sound faith, we must build upon it; and we should take care with what materials we carry on our building. Right principles will stand the test even of the fiery trial.

(2) Praying in the Holy Ghost. Prayer is the nurse of faith. Our prayers are then most likely to prevail when we pray in the Holy Ghost, under his guidance and influence.

(3) Keep yourselves in the love of God, v. 21. Keep yourselves in the way of God, if you would continue in his love.

(4) Looking for the mercy, &c. Eternal life is to be looked for only through mercy; mercy is our only plea, not merit. Through the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ as Redeemer; all who come to heaven must come thither through our Lord Jesus Christ. A lively faith of the blessed hope will help us to mortify our cursed lusts.

4. He directs them how to behave towards erring brethren, v. 22, 23. We ought to do all we can to rescue others out of the snare of the devil. We are not only our own keepers, but every man ought to be, as much as in him lies, his brother's keeper. This must be done with compassion, making a difference. We must distinguish between the weak and the wilful. Of some we must have compassion, treat them with all tenderness, not be needlessly harsh and severe in our censures of them. If God has forgiven them, why should not we? We infinitely more need his forgiveness than they do ours. Others save with fear, urging upon them the terrors of the Lord: "Endeavour to frighten them out of their sins. Fear lest you frustrate your own good intentions, do not harden, instead of reclaiming." We are often apt to over-do, when we are sure we mean honestly, and think we are right in the main. "Hating even the garment spotted with the flesh, keeping yourselves at the utmost distance from what is or appears evil."

III. The apostle concludes this epistle with a solemn ascription of glory to the great God, v. 24, 25. God is able, and he is as willing as able, to keep us from falling and to present us faultless before the presence of his glory; not as those who never have been faulty, but as those whose faults shall not be imputed.—Before the presence of his glory. The glory of the Lord will shortly be present. This is now the object of our faith, but hereafter it will be the object of our sense; whom we now believe in, him we shall shortly see. When believers shall be presented faultless it will be with exceeding joy. Where there is no sin there will be no sorrow; where there is the perfection of holiness, there will be the perfection of joy. Surely, the God who can and will do all this is worthy to have glory, majesty, dominion, and power, ascribed to him, both now and for ever! Amen.

AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE REVELATION OF ST. JOHN

It ought to be no prejudice to the credit and authority of this book that it has been rejected by men of corrupt minds. The church of God has generally received it, and found good counsel and great comfort in it. Christ himself prophesied of the destruction of Jerusalem; and, about the time in which that was accomplished, he entrusted the apostle John with this book of revelation for the support of the faith of his people and the direction of their hope.

CHAP. I

This chapter is a general preface to the whole book. I. An inscription, ver. 1, 2. II. The apostolic benediction, ver. 3 8. III. A glorious appearance of the Lord Jesus Christ to the apostle John, when he delivered to him this revelation, ver. 9, to the end.

Verses 1, 2

I. It is the revelation of Jesus Christ. As the prophet of the church, he has made known to us the things that shall be hereafter. It is a revelation which God gave unto Christ. Our Lord Jesus is the great trustee of divine revelation; it is to him that we owe the knowledge we have of what we are to expect from God and what he expects from us. This revelation Christ sent and signified by his angel. Christ employed an angel to communicate it to the churches. The angels are God's messengers. The angels signified it to the apostle John. John was the apostle chosen for this service. Some think he was the only one surviving, the rest having sealed their testimony with their blood. John was to deliver this revelation to the church, to all his servants. They have all a right to the oracles of God.

II. The subject-matter of this revelation, the things that must shortly come to pass. We have in this revelation a general idea of the methods of divine providence. These events were such as should come to pass not only surely, but shortly.

III. Here is an attestation of the prophecy, v. 2. He was one who bore record of the word of God in general, and of the testimony of Jesus in particular, and of all things that he saw; he was an eye-witness, and he concealed nothing that he saw. As he added nothing to it, so he kept back no part of the counsels of God.

Verses 3–8

We have here an apostolic benediction on those who should give a due regard to this divine revelation.

I. More generally, to all who either read or hear the words of the prophecy. It is a blessed privilege to enjoy the oracles of God. It is a blessed thing to study the scriptures. It is a privilege not only to read the scriptures ourselves, but to hear them read by others. It is not sufficient to our blessedness that we read and hear the scriptures, but we must keep the things that are written.

II. The apostolic benediction is pronounced more especially and particularly to the seven Asian churches, v. 4. These seven churches are named in v. 11, and distinct messages sent to each of them.

1. What the blessing is. Grace, that is, the goodwill of God towards us and his good work in us; and peace, that is, the sweet evidence and assurance of this grace.

2. Whence this blessing is to come. In the name of God, of the whole Trinity. (1) The Father is first named: God the Father, who is, and who was, and who is to come, eternal, unchangeable. (2) The Holy Spirit, called the seven spirits, the infinite perfect Spirit of God, in whom there is a diversity of gifts and operations. He is before the throne; for, as God made, so he governs, all things by his Spirit. (3) The Lord Jesus Christ. Observe the particular account we have here of Christ, v. 5. The faithful witness; upon his testimony we may safely depend, for he is a faithful witness, cannot be deceived and cannot deceive us. The first-begotten or first-born from the dead. The prince of the kings of the earth; by him their power is limited; by him their counsels are over-ruled, and to him they are accountable. The great friend of his church and people. He has loved them. First, He has washed them from their sins in his own blood. Sins leave a stain upon the soul. Nothing can fetch out this stain but the blood of Christ; and, rather than it should not be washed out, Christ was willing to shed his own blood. Secondly, He has made them kings and priests to God and his Father. Having justified and sanctified them, he makes them kings to his Father. As kings, they overcome the world. He hath made them priests, given them access to God. For these high honours and favours they are bound to ascribe to him dominion and glory for ever. He will be the Judge of the world, v. 7. This book, the Revelation, begins and ends with a prediction of the second coming of the Lord Jesus Christ. John speaks as if he saw that day: "Behold, he cometh, as sure as if you beheld him with your eyes. He cometh with clouds, which are his chariot and pavilion. Every eye shall see him, the eye of his people, the eye of his enemies, every eye, yours and mine." He shall come, to the terror of those who have pierced him and have not repented and of all who have wounded and crucified him afresh by their apostasy from him, and to the astonishment of the pagan world. This account of Christ is ratified and confirmed by himself, v. 8. He is the beginning and the end; all things are from him and for him; he is the Almighty; he is the same eternal and unchangeable one.

Verses 9–20

I. The person who was favoured with this vision. His present state and condition. A persecuted man, banished, and perhaps imprisoned, for his adherence to Christ. He was their brother, though an apostle. He was their companion in tribulation: the persecuted servants of God did not suffer alone. He was their companion in patience, not only a sharer with them in suffering circumstances, but in suffering graces. By this account he acknowledges his engagements to sympathize with them, and to endeavour to give them counsel and comfort. The place where he was when he was favoured with this vision: he was in the isle Patmos. Under this confinement it was the apostle's comfort that he did not suffer as an evil-doer, but that it was for the testimony of Jesus. This was a cause worth suffering for; and the Spirit of glory and of God rested upon this persecuted apostle. The day and time in which he had this vision: it was the Lord's day. He was in the Spirit. He was not only in a rapture when he received the vision, but before he received it. God usually prepares the souls of his people for uncommon manifestations of himself, by the quickening influences of his good Spirit.

II. What he heard. An alarm was given as with the sound of a trumpet, and then he heard a voice, the voice of Christ, the first and the last, commanding the apostle to commit to writing the things that were now to be revealed to him, and to send it immediately to the seven Asian churches.

III. An account of what he saw. He turned to see the voice, and then a wonderful scene of vision opened itself to him.

1. He saw a representation of the church under the emblem of seven golden candlesticks. The churches are compared to candlesticks, because they hold forth the light of the gospel to advantage.

2. He saw a representation of the Lord Jesus Christ in the midst of the golden candlesticks.

(1) The glorious form in which Christ appeared.

(2) The impression this appearance of Christ made upon the apostle John (v. 17). He was overpowered with the greatness of the lustre and glory in which Christ appeared, though he had been so familiar with him before.

(3) The condescending goodness of the Lord Jesus to his disciple, v. 17. He raised him up; he put strength into him, he spoke kind words to him. Words of comfort and encouragement: Fear not. Words of instruction, telling him particularly who he was that thus appeared to him. He acquaints him, First, With his divine nature: The first and the last. Secondly, With his former sufferings: I was dead. Thirdly, With his resurrection and life: "I live, and am alive for evermore, have conquered death, and am partaker of an endless life." Fourthly, With his office and authority: I have the keys of hell and of death, a sovereign dominion in and over the invisible world. Fifthly, With his will and pleasure: Write the things which thou hast seen, and the things which are, and which shall be hereafter. Sixthly, With the meaning of the seven stars, and of the seven candlesticks.

CHAP. II

I. The message sent to Ephesus, ver. 1–7. II To Smyrna, ver 8–11. III. To Pergamos, ver. 12–17. IV To Thyatira, ver. 18, &c.

Verses 1–7

I. The inscription. 1. To the church of Ephesus. 2. From whom this epistle to Ephesus was sent. He that holds the stars in his right hand. The ministers of Christ are under his special care and protection. The ministers of the gospel are in his hand. He supports them, or else they would soon be falling stars; and all the good they do is done by his hand with them. He walks in the midst of the golden candlesticks. This intimates his relation to his churches. Though Christ is in heaven, he walks in the midst of his churches on earth.

II. The contents of the epistle.

1. The commendation Christ gave this church, which he brings in by declaring that he knows their works, and therefore both his commendation and reprehension are to be strictly regarded; for he does not in either speak at a venture: he knows what he says. Now the church of Ephesus is commended, (1) For their diligence in duty, v. 2–3. (2) For their patience in suffering, v. 2. It is not enough that we be diligent, but we must be patient—no Christian can be without it. There must be bearing patience, and there must be waiting patience, that they may receive the promise, v. 3. (3) For their zeal against what was evil, v. 2. We must show all meekness to men, yet we must show a just zeal against their sins. True zeal proceeds with discretion; none should be cast off till they be tried.

2. The rebuke given to this church, v. 4. Those that have much good in them may have something much amiss in them. Thou hast left thy first love; not left and forsaken the object of it, but lost the fervent degree of it that at first appeared. The first affections of men towards Christ are usually lively and warm. These lively affections will abate and cool if great care be not taken.

3. The advice and counsel given them from Christ. Those that have lost their first love must remember whence they have fallen; they must compare their present with their former state, and consider how much better it was with them then than now. They must repent. They must return and do their first works. They must as it were begin again. They must endeavour to revive and recover their first zeal.

4. This good advice is enforced and urged, (1) By a severe threatening, if it should be neglected. If the presence of Christ's grace and Spirit be slighted, we may expect the presence of his displeasure. (2) By an encouraging mention of what was yet good among them, v. 6. "Though thou hast declined in thy love to what is good, yet thou retainest thy hatred to what is evil." An indifference of spirit between truth and error, good and evil, may be called charity and meekness, but it is not pleasing to Christ.

III. We have the conclusion of this epistle.

1. A call to attention. What is said to one church concerns all the churches, in every place and age.

2. A promise of great mercy to those who overcome. We must never yield to our spiritual enemies, but fight the good fight, till we gain the victory, and the warfare and victory shall have a glorious triumph and reward. They shall eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise of God, not in the earthly paradise, but the heavenly.

Verses 8–11

I. The preface or inscription in both parts. 1. The superscription: To the angel of the church in Smyrna. 2. The subscription. Jesus Christ is the first and the last. It is but a little scantling of time that is allowed to us in this world, but our Redeemer is the first and the last. He was dead and is alive. He was dead, and died for our sins; he is alive, and he ever lives to make intercession for us.

II. The subject-matter of this epistle.

1. The improvement they had made in their spiritual state. But thou art rich. Some who are poor outwardly are inwardly rich, rich in faith and in good works. Where there is spiritual plenty, outward poverty may be better borne.

2. Their sufferings: I know thy tribulation and thy poverty. Jesus Christ takes particular notice of all their troubles.

3. He knows the wickedness and the falsehood of their enemies: I know the blasphemy of those that say they are Jews, but are not; that is, of those who pretend to be the only peculiar covenant-people of God, when indeed they are the synagogue of Satan. For the synagogues of Satan to give themselves out to be the church or Israel of God is no less than blasphemy.

4. He foreknows the future trials of his people. (1) He forewarns them of future trials, v. 10. They had been impoverished by their tribulations before; now they must be imprisoned. (2) Christ forearms them against these approaching troubles, [1] By his counsel: Fear none of these things. This is not only a word of command, but of efficacy. [2] By showing them how their sufferings would be alleviated and limited. They should not be universal. It would be some of them, not all. They were not to be perpetual, but for a short time: Ten days. It should be to try them, not to destroy them. [3] By proposing a glorious reward to their fidelity: Be thou faithful to death, and I will give thee a crown of life. He has said it that is able to do it; and he has undertaken that he will do it. The suitableness of it. A crown, to reward their poverty, their fidelity, and their confiict. A crown of life, to reward those who are faithful even unto death.

III. The conclusion of this message. A call to universal attention. It concerns all the inhabitants of the world to observe God's dealings with his own people. A gracious promise to the conquering Christian, v. 11. There is not only a first, but a second death. This second death is unspeakably worse than the first death. It is eternal death. From this death Christ will save all his faithful servants. The first death shall not hurt them, and the second death shall have no power over them.

Verses 12–17

I. The inscription of this message. To the angel of the church of Pergamos. The church of Pergamos was infested with men of corrupt minds, and Christ, being resolved to fight against them by the sword of his word, takes the title of him that hath the sharp sword with two edges. The word of God is a sword; it is a weapon both offensive and defensive. It is a sharp sword. No heart is so hard but it is able to wound it. It is a sword with two edges. There is the edge of the law against the transgressors of that dispensation, and the edge of the gospel against the despisers of that dispensation.

II. The contents of the epistle.

1. Christ takes notice of the trials and difficulties this church encountered, v. 13. Now that which added very much lustre to the good works of this church was the circumstance of the place where this church was planted, a place where Satan's seat was. His circuit is throughout the world, his seat is in some places that are infamous for wickedness, error, and cruelty.

2. He commends their steadfastness. "Thou holdest fast my name; thou art not ashamed of thy relation to me, but accountest it thine honour that my name is named on thee. That which has made thee thus faithful is the grace of faith: thou hast not denied, nor departed from the Christian faith." They had been steadfast even in those days wherein Antipas his faithful martyr was slain among them. He sealed his faith and fidelity with his blood in the place where Satan dwelt. They were not discouraged nor drawn away from their steadfastness.

3. He reproves them for their sinful failures (v. 14). The filthiness of the spirit and the filthiness of the flesh often go together. To continue in communion with persons of corrupt principles and practices draws a guilt and blemish upon the whole society.

4. He calls them to repentance, v. 16. It is the duty of churches and communities as well as particular persons; those who sin together should repent together. When God comes to punish the corrupt members of a church, he rebukes that church itself for allowing such to continue in its communion, and some drops of the storm fall upon the whole society. The word of God will take hold of sinners, sooner or later, either for their conviction or their confusion.

III. There is the promise of great favour to those that overcome, v. 17. 1. The hidden manna, the influences and comforts of the Spirit of Christ, coming down from heaven into the soul, from time to time. This is hidden from the rest of the world, and it is laid up in Christ. 2. The white stone, with a new name engraven upon it. This white stone is absolution from the guilt of sin, alluding to the ancient custom of giving a white stone to those acquitted on trial and a black stone to those condemned. The new name is the name of adoption. None can read the evidence of a man's adoption but himself.

Verses 18–29

I. The inscription. To the angel of the church of Thyatira. By whom it was sent: by the Son of God, who is here described as having eyes like a flame of fire, and feet like as fine brass. His eyes are like a flame of fire, signifying his piercing insight into all persons and all things. His feet are like fine brass. As he judges with perfect wisdom, so he acts with perfect strength and steadiness.

II. The contents of this epistle.

1. The honourable character and commendation Christ gives of this church. Christ makes honourable mention of their charity: there is no religion where there is no charity. Their service. Their faith, which was the grace that actuated all the rest. Their patience. Their growing fruitfulness: their last works were better than the first. It should be the ambition and earnest desire of all Christians that their last works may be their best works.

2. A faithful reproof for what was amiss. These wicked seducers are compared to Jezebel, and called by her name. The sin of these seducers was that they attempted to draw the servants of God into fornication, and to offer sacrifices to idols. They abused the patience of God to harden themselves in their wickedness. God gave them space for repentance, but they repented not.

3. The punishment of this seducer, v. 22, 23. I will cast her into a bed, into a bed of pain, not of pleasure. I will kill her children with death; that is, the second death.

4. The design of Christ in the destruction of these wicked seducers, was the instruction of others. God is known by the judgments that he executes.

5. The encouragement given to those who keep themselves pure and undefiled, v. 24. (1) What these seducers called their doctrines—depths, profound mysteries. (2) What Christ called them—depths of Satan, Satanical delusions and devices. (3) How tender Christ is of his faithful servants, v. 24, 25. "I only require your attention to what you have received." If they hold fast faith and a good conscience till he come, all the difficulty and danger will be over.

III. The conclusion of this message, v. 26–29. 1. The promise of an ample reward to the persevering victorious believer: Very great power and dominion over the rest of the world: Power over the nations. Knowledge and wisdom, suitable to such power and dominion: I will give him the morning-star. Christ is the morning-star. He brings day with him into the soul, the light of grace and of glory. 2. This epistle ends with the usual demand of attention.

CHAP. III

Here we have three more of the epistles of Christ to the churches: I. To Sardis, ver. 1–6. II. To Philadelphia, ver. 7–13. III. To Laodicea, ver. 14, to the end.

Verses 1–6

I. The preface. To the angel of the church of Sardis, said to have been the first city in that part of the world that was converted by the preaching of John; and, some say, the first that revolted from Christianity. By whom this message was sent—the Lord Jesus, that hath the seven spirits of God, and the seven stars. (1) He hath the seven spirits, that is, the Holy Spirit with his various powers. This epistle being sent to a languishing ministry and church, they are very fitly put in mind that Christ has the seven spirits, the Spirit without measure and in perfection, to whom they may apply themselves for the reviving of his work among them. (2) He hath the seven stars, the angels of the churches. The Holy Spirit usually works by the ministry, and the ministry will be of no efficacy without the Spirit; the same divine hand holds them both.

II. The body of this epistle. In this (and in the epistle to Laodicea) he begins,

1. With a reproof, and a very severe one. Hypocrisy, and a lamentable decay in religion, are the sins charged upon this church. This church had gained a great reputation; it had a name for a flourishing church. We read not of any unhappy divisions among themselves. Everything appeared well, as to what falls under the observation of men. This church was not really what it was reputed to be. There was a form of godliness, but not the power, a name to live, but not a principle of life. What little life was yet left among them was expiring, ready to die.

2. Our Lord proceeds to give this degenerate church the best advice, v. 2. (1) He advises them to be upon their watch. Whenever we are off our watch, we lose ground, and therefore must return to our watchfulness against sin, and Satan. (2) To strengthen the things that remain, and that are ready to die. Some understand this of persons. It is a difficult thing to keep up to the life and power of godliness ourselves, when we see a universal deadness and declension prevailing round about us. Or it may be understood of practices: I have not found thy works perfect before God; there is something wanting in them; there is the shell, but not the kernel. The inward thing is wanting, thy works are hollow and empty. When the spirit is wanting the form cannot long subsist. (3) To recollect themselves (v. 3); to remember what they had received and heard, how welcome the gospel and the grace of God were to them when they first received them. (4) To hold fast what they had received, that they might not lose all and repent.

3. Christ enforces his counsel with a dreadful threatening, v. 3. (1) When Christ leaves a people as to his gracious presence, he comes to them in judgment. (2) His judicial approach to a dead declining people will be surprising; their deadness will keep them in security.

4. Our blessed Lord does not leave this sinful people without some comfort and encouragement (v. 4). He makes honourable mention of the faithful remnant in Sardis, though but small. God takes notice of the smallest number of those who abide with him; and the fewer they are the more precious in his sight. He makes a very gracious promise to them. They shall walk with Christ, and what delightful converse will there be between Christ and them when they thus walk together! Those who walk with Christ shall walk with Christ in the white robes of honour and glory in the other world.

III. The conclusion of this epistle.

1. A great reward promised to the conquering Christian (v. 5). The purity of grace shall be rewarded with the perfect purity of glory. Holiness, when perfected, shall be its own reward; glory is the perfection of grace. To this is added another promise. Christ has his book of life. Christ will not blot the names of his chosen and faithful ones out of this book of life. The names of those that overcome shall never be blotted out. Christ will produce this book of life, and confess the names of the faithful who stand there, before God, and all the angels. How great will this honour and reward be!

2. The demand of universal attention finishes the message. Every word from God deserves attention from men.

Verses 7–13

I. The inscription.

1. For whom it was designed: The angel of the church of Philadelphia. It was its ancient name, on account of the love and kindness which the citizens had and showed to each other. This was an excellent spirit, and would render them an excellent church, as indeed they were, for here is no one fault found with this church.

2. By whom this letter was signed; even by the same Jesus. You have his personal character: He that is holy and he that is true; holy in his nature, and therefore he cannot but be true to his word. The acts of his government. [1] He opens. He opens a door of opportunity to his churches; he opens a door of entrance, opens the heart; and he opens the door of admission into the church triumphant. [2] He shuts the door. When he pleases, he shuts the door of opportunity, and he shuts the door of heaven against the workers of iniquity. The way and manner in which he performs these acts is absolute sovereignty. When he works, none can hinder.

II. The subject-matter of this epistle.

1. Christ puts them in mind of what he had done for them, v. 8. I have set it open, and kept it open, though there be many adversaries. Wicked men envy the people of God their door of liberty, and would be glad to shut it against them. If we do not provoke Christ to shut this door against us, men cannot do it.

2. This church is commended, v. 8. In this there seems to be couched a gentle reproof: "Thou hast a little strength, a little grace." True grace, though weak, has the divine approbation; yet believers should not rest satisfied in a little, but should strive to grow in grace. True grace, though weak, will enable the Christian to keep the word of Christ, and not to deny his name.

3. The great favour God would bestow on this church, v. 9, 10.

(1) Christ would make this church's enemies subject to her. [1] Those enemies are described to be such as said they were Jews, but were really the synagogue of Satan. [2] Their subjection to the church is described: They shall worship at thy feet; shall be convinced that they have been in the wrong. How shall this great change be wrought? By the power of God upon the hearts of his enemies, and by signal discoveries of his peculiar favour to his church: They shall know that I have loved thee. Christ can discover this his favour to his people in such a manner that their very enemies shall see it, and be forced to acknowledge it. This will, by the grace of Christ, soften the hearts of their enemies.

(2) Another instance of favour that Christ promises (v. 10). The gospel of Christ is the word of his patience. It is the fruit of the patience of God to a sinful world. After a day of patience we must expect an hour of temptation. Those who keep the gospel in a time of peace shall be kept by Christ in an hour of temptation.

4. Christ calls the church to persevere. "Hold fast that which thou hast; thou hast been possessed of this excellent treasure, hold it fast. Behold, I come quickly. I am just coming to relieve them under the trial, to reward their fidelity, and to punish those who fall away. The persevering Christian shall win the prize from backsliding professors."

III. The conclusion of this epistle, v. 12, 13.

1. Our Saviour promises a glorious reward to the victorious believer in two things: (1) He shall be a monumental pillar in the temple of God; not a pillar to support the temple, but a monument of the grace of God, a monument that shall never be defaced nor removed, as many stately pillars erected in honour to the Roman emperors and generals have been. (2) On this there shall be an honourable inscription, as in those cases is usual. [1] The name of God, and the name of the city of God, the new Jerusalem, which came down from heaven. [2] The new name of Christ. By this it will appear under whose banner this conquering believer had enlisted, and under whose influence he fought the good fight, and came off victorious.

2. The epistle is closed up with the demand of attention.

We now come to the last and worst of all the seven Asian churches. Here is nothing commended.

I. The inscription. To the angel of the church of Laodicea. The apostle Paul was very instrumental in planting the gospel in this city, from which he wrote a letter, as he mentions in the epistle to the Colossians. Here our Lord Jesus styles himself the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of the creation of God. The Amen, one that is steady and unchangeable in all his purposes and promises. The faithful and true witness, whose testimony of God to men ought to be received. The beginning of the creation of God, either of the first creation, or of the second creation, the church; as it is in ch. i. 5.

II. The subject-matter.

1. The heavy charge drawn up against this church, v. 15. Lukewarmness or indifference in religion is the worst temper in the world. If religion is worth anything, it is worth everything. Here is no room for neutrality. Christ expects that men should declare themselves in earnest either for him or against him.

2. A severe punishment threatened: I will spew thee out of my mouth. As lukewarm water turns the stomach, and provokes to a vomit, lukewarm professors turn the heart of Christ against them. He is sick of them, and cannot long bear them. They shall be rejected.

3. We have one cause of this indifference assigned, and that is self-conceitedness or self-delusion, v. 17. What a difference there was between the thoughts they had of themselves and the thoughts that Christ had of them. The high thoughts they had of themselves. Perhaps they were well provided for as to their bodies, and this made them overlook the necessities of their souls. Or they thought themselves well furnished in their souls. How careful should we be not to put the cheat upon our own souls! Doubtless there are many in hell that once thought themselves to be in the way to heaven. The mean thoughts that Christ had of them. They were poor, really poor, when they said and thought they were rich. Their souls were starving in the midst of their abundance. They were blind; they could not see their state, nor their way; they could not see into themselves; yet they thought they saw. They could not see Christ. They could not see God. They were naked. They were without clothing, had neither the garment of justification nor that of sanctification.

4. We have good counsel given by Christ to this sinful people, v. 18. Our Lord Jesus Christ continues to give good counsel to those who have cast his counsels behind their backs. These people were poor; Christ counsels them to buy of him gold tried in the fire, that they might be rich. He lets them know where they might have true riches and how they might have them. Where they might have them—from himself. How must they have this true gold from him? They must buy it. "Part with self-sufficiency, and come to Christ with your poverty and emptiness, that you may be filled with his hidden treasure." These people were naked; Christ tells them where they might have clothing. This they must receive from Christ; and they must only put off their filthy rags that they might put on the white raiment which he had provided for them. They were blind; and he counsels them to buy of him eye-salve, that they might see, to give up their own wisdom and reason, and resign themselves to his word and Spirit, and their eyes shall be opened.

5. Great and gracious encouragement to this sinful people to take the admonition well that Christ had given them, v. 19, 20. "You may think I have given you hard words and severe reproofs; it is all out of love to your souls." Sinners ought to take the rebukes of God's word as tokens of his goodwill to their souls. Better are the frowns and wounds of a friend than the flattering smiles of an enemy. If they would comply with his admonitions, he was ready to make them good to their souls, v. 20. Christ is graciously pleased by his word and Spirit to come to the door of the heart of sinners. He finds this door shut against him; the heart of man is by nature shut up against Christ. When he finds the heart shut, he does not immediately withdraw, but he waits to be gracious. Those who open to him shall enjoy his presence. He will sup with them; he will accept of what is good in them; and he will bring the best part of the entertainment with him.

III. The conclusion of this epistle.

1. The promise made to the overcoming believer. It was possible that by the reproofs and counsels of Christ they might be inspired with fresh zeal and vigour, and might come off conquerors in their spiritual warfare. If they did so they should have a great reward, v. 21. Christ himself had met with his temptations and conflicts. He overcame them all, and was more than a conqueror. Those who are conformed to Christ in his trials and victories shall be conformed to him in his glory.

2. All is closed up with the general demand of attention (v. 22). Thus end the messages of Christ to the Asian churches.

CHAP. IV

In this chapter the prophetical scene opens. He, I. Records the heavenly sight he saw, ver. 1–7. And then, II. The heavenly songs he heard, ver. 8, to the end.

Verses 1–8

We have here an account of a second vision with which the apostle John was favoured.

I. The preparation made for the apostle's having this vision.

1. A door was opened in heaven. We can know nothing of future events but what God is pleased to discover to us; they are within the veil, till God opens the door.

2. To prepare John for the vision, a trumpet was sounded, and he was called up into heaven, to have a sight there of the things which were to be hereafter.

3. To prepare for this vision, the apostle was in the Spirit. He was in a rapture. His spirit was possessed with the spirit of prophecy, and wholly under a divine influence.

II. The vision itself. 1. He saw a throne set in heaven, the seat of honour, and authority, and judgment. All earthly thrones are under the jurisdiction of this throne that is set in heaven. 2. He saw a glorious one upon the throne. There was one in it who filled it, and that was God. His countenance was like a jasper and a sardine-stone; he is not described by any human features, so as to be represented by an image, but only by his transcendent brightness. 3. He saw a rainbow about the throne, like unto an emerald, v. 3. The rainbow was the seal and token of the covenant of providence that God made with Noah. This rainbow looked like the emerald; the most prevailing colour was a pleasant green, to show the reviving and refreshing nature of the new covenant. 4. He saw four-and-twenty seats round about the throne, with four-and-twenty elders. They are clothed in white raiment, the righteousness of the saints; they had on their heads crowns of gold, signifying the honour and authority given them of God, and the glory they have with him. 5. He perceived lightnings and voices proceeding out of the throne. Thus he gave forth the law on mount Sinai; and the gospel has not less glory and authority than the law. 6. He saw seven lamps of fire burning before the throne (v. 5), the various gifts, graces, and operations of the Spirit of God. 7. He saw before the throne a sea of glass like unto crystal. In this all those must be washed that are admitted into the gracious presence of God. 8. He saw four animals, living creatures, between the throne and the circle of the elders (as seems most probable), standing between God and the people; these seem to signify the ministers of the gospel. The elders sit and are ministered unto; these stand and minister: they rest not night nor day.

Verses 8–11

We have considered the sights that the apostle saw in heaven: now let us observe the songs that he heard.

I. He heard the song of the four living creatures, which refers to the prophet Isaiah's vision, ch. vi. They adore one God, and one only, the Lord God Almighty. They adore three holies in this one God.

II. He heard the adorations of the four-and-twenty elders, v. 10, 11.

1. The object of their worship: Him that sat on the throne, the eternal everliving God. There is but one God, and he alone, as God, is worshipped by the church on earth and in heaven.

2. The acts of adoration. They fell down before him that sat on the throne. They cast their crowns before the throne; they gave God the glory of the holiness wherewith he had crowned their souls on earth and the honour and happiness with which he crowns them in heaven. It is their glory to be glorifying God.

3. The words of adoration, v. 11. In this they tacitly acknowledge that God is exalted far above all blessing and praise. He was worthy to receive glory, but they were not worthy to praise.

4. We have the ground of their adoration. (1) He is the Creator of all things; and none but the Creator of all things should be adored; no made thing can be the object of religious worship. (2) He is the preserver of all things. All beings but God are dependent upon the will and power of God, and no dependent being must be set up as an object of religious worship. (3) He is the final cause of all things: For thy pleasure they are and were created. It was his will and pleasure to create all things.

CHAP. V

Now the counsels and decrees of God are set before the apostle, as in a book, and this book is represented, I. As sealed in the hand of God, ver. 1–9. II. As taken into the hand of Christ the Redeemer, to be unsealed and opened, ver. 6, to the end.

Verses 1–5

Hitherto the apostle had seen only the great God, the governor of all things. Now,

I. He is favoured with a sight of the methods of his government, as they are all written down in a book which he holds in his hand; and this we are now to consider as shut up and sealed. But there is a transcript of so much as was necessary to be known in the book of the scripture in general, in the prophetical part of scripture especially. God holds this book in his right hand, to declare the authority of the book. It is known to none but himself, till he allows it to be opened. It is sealed with seven seals. Each part seems to have its particular seal. These seven parts are not unsealed and opened at once, but successively, one scene of Providence introducing another, and explaining it.

II. He heard a proclamation made concerning this sealed book. The crier was a strong angel. This angel seems to come out as a champion, with a challenge to any or all the creatures to try the strength of their wisdom in opening the counsels of God. The cry or challenge, v. 2. None in heaven or earth could accept the challenge and undertake the task. None under the earth, none of the fallen angels. Satan himself, with all his subtlety, cannot do it; the creatures cannot open it, nor look on it; they cannot read it. God only can do it.

III. The apostle wept much; it was a great disappointment to him. By what he had seen in him who sat upon the throne, he was very desirous to see and know more of his mind and will. Those who have seen his glory desire to know his will.

IV. The apostle was comforted and encouraged to hope this sealed book would yet be opened. Who it was that gave John the hint: One of the elders. God had revealed it to his church. Who it was that would do the thing—the Lord Jesus Christ, called the lion of the tribe of Judah, according to his human nature, and the root of David according to his divine nature. He who bears the office of Mediator between God and man, is fit and worthy to open and execute all the counsels of God towards men.

Verses 6–14

I. The apostle beholds this book taken into the hands of the Lord Jesus Christ. His place and station. He was on the same throne with the Father. Christ, as man and Mediator, is subordinate to God the Father, but is nearer to him than all the creatures. The form in which he appeared. Before he is called a lion; here he appears as a lamb slain. He is a lion to conquer Satan, a lamb to satisfy the justice of God. He appears as a lamb, having seven horns and seven eyes, perfect power to execute all the will of God and perfect wisdom to understand it all. For he hath the seven Spirits of God, he has received the Holy Spirit without measure. His act and deed (v. 7), not by violence, nor by fraud, but he prevailed to do it (as v. 5), he prevailed by his merit and worthiness.

II. No sooner had Christ received this book out of the Father's hand than he received the applauses and adorations of angels and men, yea, of every creature.

1. The church begins the doxology, as being more immediately concerned in it (v. 8). (1) The object of their worship—the Lamb, the Lord Jesus Christ. (2) Their posture: They fell down before him, gave him the most profound adoration. (3) The instruments used in their adoration—harps and vials; the harps were the instruments of praise, the vials were full of odours or incense, which signify the prayers of the saints. (4) The matter of their song. Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof. They mention the grounds of this worthiness, yet they chiefly insist upon the merit of his sufferings; these more sensibly struck their souls with thankfulness and joy. They mention his suffering: "Thou wast slain." The fruits of his sufferings. [1] Redemption to God. [2] High exaltation, v. 10.

2. The doxology is carried on by the angels, v. 11. They are said to be innumerable, and to be the attendants on the throne of God. Though they did not need a Saviour themselves, yet they rejoice in the redemption and salvation of sinners, and they agree with the church that he is worthy to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honour, and glory, and blessing.

3. This doxology is resounded by the whole creation, v. 13. Heaven and earth ring with the high praises of the Redeemer. The whole creation fares the better for Christ. That part which is made for the whole creation is a song of blessing, and honour, and glory, and power. To him that sits on the throne, to God the Father. To the Lamb, the Mediator of the new covenant. We worship and glorify one and the same God for our creation and for our redemption. Thus we have seen this sealed book passing with great solemnity from the hand of the Creator into the hand of the Redeemer.

CHAP. VI

Now we are to launch into the deep, and our business is not so much to fathom it as to let down our net to take a draught. We shall only hint at what seems most obvious. In this chapter six of the seven seals are opened, and the visions attending them are related; the first seal in ver. 1, 2, the second seal in ver. 3, 4, the third seal in ver. 5, 6, the fourth seal in ver. 7, 8, the fifth seal in ver. 9–11, the sixth seal in ver. 12, 13, &c.

Verses 1, 2

Christ, the Lamb, opens the first seal. We have the vision itself, v. 2. 1. The Lord Jesus appears riding on a white horse. 2. He had a bow in his hand. The convictions impressed by the word of God are sharp arrows, they reach at a distance. 3. A crown was given him. When Christ was going to war, one would think a helmet had been more proper than a crown; but a crown is given him as the earnest of victory. 4. He went forth conquering, and to conquer. As long as the church continues militant Christ will be conquering. He conquers his enemies in his people; their sins are their enemies and his enemies; when Christ comes with power into their soul he begins to conquer these enemies, and he goes on conquering, in the progressive work of sanctification, till he has gained us a complete victory. And he conquers his enemies in the world, wicked men. The successful progress of the gospel of Christ in the world is a glorious sight, worth beholding. Christ's work is not all done at once. We are ready to think, when the gospel goes forth, it should carry all the world before it, but it often meets with opposition, and moves slowly. Christ will do his own work effectually, in his own time and way.

Verses 3–8

The next three seals give us a sad prospect of judgments with which God punishes those who abuse the everlasting gospel.

I. Upon opening the second seal another horse appears, a red horse, v. 4. This signifies the desolating judgment of war. The sword of war is a dreadful judgment; it takes away peace from the earth. Men, who should love one another and help one another, are, in a state of war, set upon killing one another.

II. Upon opening the third seal another horse appears, a black horse, signifying famine (v. 5). One judgment seldom comes alone; the judgment of war naturally draws after it that of famine. The famine of bread is a terrible judgment; but the famine of the word is more so.

III. Upon opening the fourth seal there appears another horse, of a pale colour. 1. The name of the rider—Death, the king of terrors. 2. The attendants of this king of terrors—hell. There is a natural connection between one judgment and another: war is a wasting calamity, and draws scarcity and famine after it; and famine draws the pestilence after it. God has published threatenings against the wicked as well as promises to the righteous; and it is our duty to believe the threatenings as well as the promises.

IV. After the opening of these seals we have this general observation, v. 8. To the three great judgments of war, famine, and pestilence, is here added the beasts of the earth, another of God's sore judgments. When a nation is depopulated by the sword, famine, and pestilence, the small remnant that continue become an easy prey. Others, by the beasts of the field, understand brutish, cruel, savage men.

Verses 9–17

I. The fifth seal. It does not contain a new prophecy, but rather opens a spring of consolation to those who still were under great tribulation.

1. The sight this apostle saw at the opening of the fifth seal (v. 9). He saw the souls of the martyrs. Where he saw them—in the most holy place; he saw them in heaven, at the foot of Christ. God has provided a good place in the better world for those who are faithful to death and are not allowed a place any longer on earth. The cause in which they suffered —the word of God and the testimony which they held. A noble cause, the best that any man can lay down his life for.

2. The cry he heard, v. 10. Even the spirits of just men made perfect retain a proper resentment of the wrong they have sustained by their cruel enemies. They commit their cause to him to whom vengeance belongeth; they are not for avenging themselves, but leave all to God.

3. The kind return that was made to this cry (v. 11). What was given to them—white robes, the robes of victory and of honour. What was said to them—that they should be easy in themselves, for it would not be long ere the number of their fellow-sufferers should be fulfilled. He will recompence tribulation to those who trouble them, and to those that are troubled full and uninterrupted rest.

II. We have here the sixth seal opened, v. 12.

1. The tremendous events that were hastening; and here are several occurrences that contribute to make that day and dispensation very dreadful (v. 13). It would be a judgment that should astonish all the world.

2. The dread and terror that would seize upon all sorts of men in that great and awful day, v. 15. The degree of their terror and astonishment; it should prevail so far as to make them call to the mountains to fall upon them, and to the hills to cover them. The cause of their terror—the wrath of the Lamb. Though God be invisible, he can make the inhabitants of this world sensible of his awful frowns. Though Christ be a lamb, yet he can be angry, and the wrath of the Lamb is exceedingly dreadful. As men have their day of opportunity, and their seasons of grace, so God has his day of righteous wrath.

CHAP. VII

This comfortable chapter secures the graces and comforts of the people of God in times of common calamity. I. An account of the restraint laid upon the winds, ver. 1–3. II. The sealing of the servants of God, ver. 4–8. III. The songs of angels and saints on this occasion, ver. 9–12. IV. A description of the honour and happiness of those who had faithfully served Christ, and suffered for him, ver. 13, &c.

Verses 1–12

I. An account of the restraint laid upon the winds. By these winds we suppose are meant those errors which would occasion a great deal of trouble and mischief to the church of God. The spirits of error are compared to the four winds, contrary one to another, but doing much hurt to the garden and vineyard of God. Errors are as wind, by which those who are unstable are shaken. They are restrained by the ministry of angels, standing on the four corners of the earth; the spirit of error cannot go forth till God permits it. Angels minister to the good of the church by restraining its enemies. Their restraint was only for a season, and that was till the servants of God were sealed in their foreheads.

II. An account of the sealing of the servants of God. 1. To whom this work was committed—to an angel. Another angel was employed to mark out and distinguish the faithful servants of God. 2. How they were distinguished—the seal of God was set upon their foreheads. By this mark they were set apart for mercy and safety in the worst of times. 3. The number of those that were sealed. A particular account of those that were sealed of the twelve tribes of Israel—twelve thousand out of every tribe. A general account of those who were saved out of other nations (v. 9). Though the church of God is but a little flock, in comparison of the wicked world, yet it is no contemptible society, but really large, and to be still more enlarged.

III. We have the songs of saints and angels, v. 9–12.

1. The praises offered up by the saints. (1) The posture of these praising saints: they stood before the throne, and before the Lamb, before the Creator and the Mediator. The throne of God would be inaccessible to sinners were it not for a Mediator. (2) Their habit: they were clothed with white robes, and had palms in their hands, as conquerors used to appear in their triumphs. (3) Their employment: they cried with a loud voice, saying, Salvation to our God who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb. This may be understood either as a hosannah, or as a hallelujah. Both the Father and the Son are joined together in these praises; the Father contrived this salvation, the Son purchased it, and those who enjoy it must and will bless the Lord and the Lamb.

2. Here is the song of the angels as they fell on their faces and worshipped (v. 11, 12). What humility then, and what profound reverence, become us vile frail creatures, when we come into the presence of God! They consented to the praises of the saints, their Amen thereto; and then they added more of their own. We see what is the work of heaven, and we ought to get our hearts tuned for it, and to long for that world where our praises, as well as happiness, will be perfected.

Verses 13–17

A description of the happiness of those who have faithfully served the Lord Jesus Christ.

I. A question asked by one of the elders, not for his own information, but for John's instruction. The lowest saint in heaven knows more than the greatest apostle in the world.

II. The answer returned by the apostle, in which he tacitly acknowledges his own ignorance: Thou knowest.

III. The account given to the apostle concerning that noble army of martyrs. 1. The low and desolate state they had formerly been in; they had been in great tribulation. The way to heaven lies through many tribulations; but tribulation shall not separate us from the love of God. 2. The means by which they had been prepared for the great happiness they now enjoyed, v. 14. This is the only blood that makes the robes of the saints white and clean. 3. The blessedness to which they are now advanced. (1) They are happy in their station, for they are before the throne of God night and day; and he dwells among them. (2) They are happy in their employment, for they serve God continually. (3) They are happy in their freedom from all the inconveniences of this present life. From all want and sense of want: They hunger and thirst no more; all their wants are supplied. From all sickness and pain: they shall never be scorched by the heat of the sun any more. (4) They are happy in the love and guidance of the Lord Jesus: He shall feed them, he shall lead them to living fountains of waters. (5) They are happy in being delivered from all sorrow. God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes. God himself, with his own gentle and gracious hand, will wipe those tears away, and they would not have been without those tears, when God comes to wipe them away. In this he deals with them as a tender father who finds his beloved child in tears, he comforts him, he wipes his eyes, and turns his sorrow into rejoicing.

CHAP. VIII

In this chapter we have, I. The preface to the sounding of the trumpets, ver. 1–6. II. The sounding of four of the trumpets, ver. 7, &c.

Verses 1–6

I. The opening of the last seal. This was to introduce a new set of events.

II. A profound silence in heaven for the space of half an hour. A silence of expectation; great things were upon the wheel of providence, and the church of God, both in heaven and earth, stood silent, to see what God was doing.

III. The trumpets were delivered to the angels who were to sound them.

IV. To prepare for this, another angel must first offer incense, v. 3. This incense he was to offer up, with the prayers of all the saints, upon the golden altar. 1. All the saints are a praying people; none of the children of God are born dumb. 2. Times of danger should be praying times, and so should times of great expectation; both our fears and our hopes should put us upon prayer. 3. The prayers of the saints themselves stand in need of the incense and intercession of Christ to make them acceptable and effectual. No prayer, thus recommended, was ever denied audience or acceptance. These prayers that were thus accepted in heaven produced great changes upon earth. The same angel in the same censer took of the fire of the altar, and cast it into the earth, and this presently caused strange commotions, voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake. And now, all things being thus prepared, the angels discharge their duty.

Verses 7–13

I. The first angel sounded the first trumpet, v. 7. It was a very terrible storm—fire, and hail, and blood: a strange mixture! The limitation of it: it fell on the third part of the trees, and on the third part of the grass, and blasted and burnt it up. The most severe calamities have their bounds and limits set them by the great God.

II. The second angel sounded, v. 8. Here was still a limitation to the third part, for in the midst of judgment God remembers mercy.

III. The third angel sounded, v. 10. A star from heaven fell: Upon a third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters. It turned those springs and streams into wormwood, made them very bitter, that men were poisoned by them. The souls of men found their ruin where they sought for their refreshment.

IV. The fourth angel sounded. The nature of this calamity; it was darkness; it fell therefore upon the great luminaries of the heaven, that give light to the world—the sun, and the moon, and the stars. The limitation: it was confined to a third part of these luminaries; there was some light both of the sun by day, and of the moon and stars by night. Where the gospel comes to a people, and is but coldly received, it is usually followed with dreadful judgments. God gives warning to men of his judgments before he sends them, so that, if a people be surprised, it is their own fault. Yet God does not in this world stir up all his wrath, but sets bounds to the most terrible judgments.

V. Before the other three trumpets are sounded here is solemn warning how terrible the calamities would be that should follow them, v. 13. The messenger was an angel flying in the midst of heaven, as in haste. Here are three woes, to show how much the calamities coming should exceed those that had been already. If less judgments do not take effect, but the church and the world grow worse under them, they must expect greater.

CHAP. IX

The sounding of the fifth and sixth trumpets, the appearance that attended them, and the events that were to follow; the fifth trumpet, ver. 1–12, the sixth, ver. 13, &c.

Verses 1–12

1. A star falling from heaven to the earth. 2. To this fallen star was given the key of the bottomless pit. It becomes the devil's turnkey, to let loose the powers of hell against the churches of Christ. 3. Upon the opening of the bottomless pit there arose a great smoke, which darkened the sun and the air. The devil carries on his designs by extinguishing light and knowledge. Wretched souls follow him in the dark, or they durst not follow him. 4. Out of this dark smoke there came a swarm of locusts, and these had, by the just permission of God, power to hurt those who had not the mark of God in their foreheads. 5. The hurt they were to do them was not a bodily, but a spiritual hurt. They should not in a military way destroy all by fire and sword; the trees and the grass should be untouched, and those they hurt should not be slain. 6. They had no power so much as to hurt those who had the seal of God in their foreheads. 7. The power given to these factors for hell is limited in point of time: five months, a certain season, and but a short season. 8. Though it would be short, it would be very sharp, v. 6. 9. These locusts were of a monstrous size and shape, v. 7, 8, &c. They were equipped for their work like horses prepared to battle. They had crowns like gold on their heads; it was not a true, but a counterfeit authority. They had the show of wisdom and sagacity, the faces of men, though the spirit of devils. They had all the allurements of seeming beauty—hair like women. Though they appeared with the tenderness of women, they were really cruel creatures. They had the defence and protection of earthly powers—breastplates of iron. They made a mighty noise in the world, and the noise of their motion was like that of an army with chariots and horses. Though at first they soothed and flattered men with a fair appearance, there was a sting in their tails. The king and commander of this hellish squadron is here described as an angel. The angel of the bottomless pit; an angel still, but a fallen angel, fallen into the bottomless pit. His true name is Abaddon, Apollyon—a destroyer, for that is his business, to which he diligently attends.

Verses 13–21

I. The preface to this vision, v. 13, 14. When nations are ripe for punishment, those instruments of God's anger that were before restrained are let loose upon them, v. 14.

II. The vision itself, v. 15, 16. 1. The time of their military operations is limited to an hour, and a day, and a month, and a year. Prophetic characters of time are hardly to be understood by us. How far the execution shall prevail, even to a third part of the inhabitants of the earth. 2. The army that was to execute this great commission is mustered, and the number found to be of horsemen two hundred thousand thousand; but we are left to guess what the infantry must be. In general, it tells us, the armies should be vastly great. 3. Their formidable equipage and appearance, v. 17. As the horses were fierce, like lions, so those who sat upon them were clad in bright and costly armour. 4. The vast havoc and desolation that they made. 5. Their artillery, by which they made such slaughter, described by fire, smoke, and brimstone, issuing out of the mouths of their horses, and the stings that were in their tails. 6. The impenitancy of the antichristian generation under these dreadful judgments (v. 20). They still persisted in those sins for which God was so severely punishing them. Though God has revealed his wrath from heaven against them, they are obstinate, and impenitent. Impenitency under divine judgments is an iniquity that will be the ruin of sinners; for where God judges he will overcome.

CHAP. X

This chapter is an introduction to the latter part of the prophecies of this book. I. A remarkable description of a very glorious angel with an open book in his hand, ver. 1–3. II. An account of seven thunders which the apostle heard, as echoing to the voice of this angel, ver. 4. III. The solemn oath taken by him who had the book in his hand, ver. 5–7. IV. The charge given to the apostle, and observed by him, ver. 8–11.

Verses 1–7

Another vision the apostle was favoured with.

I. The person communicating this discovery to John—an angel from heaven, another mighty angel.

II. His station and posture: He set his right foot upon the sea and his left foot upon the earth. And he held in his hand a little book opened, probably the same that was before sealed, but was now opened, and gradually fulfilled by him.

III. His awful voice (v. 3) was echoed by seven thunders, seven solemn and terrible ways of discovering the mind of God.

IV. The prohibition given to the apostle, v. 4. The apostle was for preserving and publishing everything he saw and heard in these visions, but the time had not yet come.

V. The solemn oath taken by this mighty angel. He lifted up his hand to heaven, and swore by him that liveth for ever, that there shall be time no longer; either, 1. That there shall be now no longer delay in fulfilling the predictions of this book than till the last angel should sound, v. 7. Or, 2. That when this mystery of God is finished time itself shall be no more.

Verses 8–11

I. A strict charge given to the apostle, 1. That he should go and take the little book out of the hands of that mighty angel. 2. To eat the book. Before he should publish what he had discovered he must more thoroughly digest the predictions.

II. An account of the taste which this little book would have; at first, while in his mouth, sweet. But, when this book of prophecy was more thoroughly digested by the apostle, the contents would be bitter; these were things so awful and terrible, that the foresight of them would not be pleasant.

III. The apostle's discharge of the duty he was called to (v. 10): he found the relish to be as was told him.

IV. This book of prophecy was not given him merely to gratify his own curiosity, but to be communicated by him to the world. He is ordered to prepare for another embassy, to convey those declarations of the mind and will of God to all the world, and such should be read and recorded in many languages.

CHAP. XI

In this chapter we have an account, I. Of the measuring-reed given to the apostle, to take the dimensions of the temple, ver. 1, 2. II. Of the two witnesses of God, ver. 3–13. III. Of the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and what followed upon it, ver. 14, &c.

Verses 1, 2

This prophetical passage about measuring the temple is a plain reference to what we find in Ezekiel's vision, Ezek. xl. 3, &c. The design of this measurement seems to be the preservation of it in those times of public danger and calamity that are here foretold.

I. How much was to be measured. 1. The temple; the gospel church in general. 2. The altar. Whether the church has the true altars. 3. The worshippers too must be measured, whether they make God's glory their end and his word their rule.

II. What was not to be measured (v. 2): The court which is without the temple measure it not. Herod, in the additions made to the temple, built an outer court, and called it the court of the Gentiles. This was no part of the temple, and therefore God would have no regard to it. Both that and the city were trodden under foot for a certain time—forty and two months. Those who worship in the outer court are either such as worship in a false manner or with hypocritical hearts. Those who worship in the outer court will be rejected, and only those who worship within the veil accepted.

God has reserved to himself his faithful witnesses.

I. The number of these witnesses. 1. It is but small. One witness, when the cause is upon trial, is worth many at other times. 2. It is a sufficient number; for in the mouth of two witnesses every cause shall be established. Christ sent out his disciples two by two, to preach the gospel.

II. The time of their prophesying. A thousand two hundred and threescore days; that is (as many think), to the period of the reign of antichrist.

III. Their habit: they prophesy in sackcloth, as those that are deeply affected with the low and distressed state of the churches.

IV. How they were supported: they stood before the God of the whole earth. He made them to be like Zerubbabel and Joshua, the two olive-trees and candlestick in the vision of Zechariah, ch. iv. 2, &c.

V. Their security and defence during the time of their prophesying, v. 5. Some think this alludes to Elias's calling for fire from heaven, to consume the captains and their companies that came to seize him, 2 Kings i. 12, and restraining the dews of heaven, shutting heaven up, that no rain should fall for many days, as God did at the prayers of Elias, 1 Kings xvii. 1.

VI. The slaying of the witnesses. To make their testimony more strong, they must seal it with their blood. The time when they should be killed: When they have finished their testimony. They are immortal, till their work be done. The enemy that should overcome and slay them—the beast that ascendeth out of the bottomless pit. Antichrist should make war against them with open force and violence; and God would permit his enemies to prevail against his witnesses for a time. The barbarous usage of these slain witnesses; the malice of their enemies, pursued even their dead bodies. They would not allow them a quiet grave; their bodies were cast out in the open street. Their death was a matter of mirth and joy to the antichristian world, v. 10.

VII. The resurrection of these witnesses. The time of their rising again (v. 11). God's witnesses may be slain, but they shall rise again. God will revive his work, when it seems to be dead in the world. The Spirit of life from God entered into them, and they stood upon their feet. God put not only life, but courage into them. The effect of their resurrection upon their enemies: Great fear fell upon them. A persecuting spirit, though cruel, is not a courageous, but a cowardly spirit.

VIII. The ascension of the witnesses into heaven, v. 12, 13. 1. Their ascension. To this honour they did not attempt to ascend, till God called them, and said, Come up hither. The Lord's witnesses must wait for their advancement, till God calls them. 2. The consequences of their ascension—a mighty shock and convulsion and the fall of a tenth part of the city. The fear of God fell upon many. They gave glory to the God of heaven. Thus, when God's work and witnesses revive, the devil's work and witnesses fall before him.

Verses 14–19

What he before expected he now heard—the seventh angel sounding.

I. Loud and joyful acclamations of the saints and angels in heaven. They rose from their seats, and fell upon their faces, and worshipped God. They thankfully recognise the right of our God and Saviour to rule and reign over all the world, v. 15. They give him thanks because he had taken to him his great power. They rejoice that this his reign shall never end. None shall ever wrest the sceptre out of his hand.

II. Angry resentments in the world at these actings of the power of God (v. 18): The nations were angry; their hearts rose up against God. They fretted against God, and so increased their guilt and hastened their destruction.

III. The opening of the temple of God in heaven. What was seen there: the ark of God's testament. This was in the holy of holies; in this ark the tables of the law were kept. As before Josiah's time the law of God had been lost, but was then found, so in the reign of antichrist God's law was laid aside. Now the scriptures are opened, now they are brought to the view of all. What was heard and felt there: Lightnings, voices, thunderings, an earthquake, and great hail. By terrible things in righteousness God would answer those prayers that were presented in his holy temple, now opened.

CHAP. XII

In this chapter we have an account of the contest between the church and antichrist, the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent. I. As it was begun in heaven, ver. 1–11. II. As it was carried on in the wilderness, ver. 12, &c.

Verses 1–11

I. The attempts of Satan to prevent the increase of the church.

1. The church is represented, (1) As a woman, the spouse of Christ, and the mother of the saints. (2) As clothed with the sun. Having put on Christ, who is the Sun of righteousness, she shines in his rays. (3) As having the moon under her feet. Her heart and hope are not set upon sublunary things, but on the things that are in heaven, where her head is. (4) As having on her head a crown of twelve stars, that is, the doctrine of the gospel preached by the twelve apostles. (5) As in travail and now in pain, to bring forth a holy progeny to Christ.

2. How the grand enemy of the church is represented. (1) A dragon for strength and terror—a red dragon for fierceness and cruelty. (2) As having seven heads. It is probable that pagan Rome is here meant. (3) As having ten horns, divided into ten provinces, as the Roman empire was by Augustus Cæsar. (4) As having seven crowns upon his head, which is afterwards expounded to be seven kings, ch. xvii. 10. (5) As drawing with his tail a third part of the stars in heaven, and casting them down to the earth. (6) As standing before the woman, to devour her child as soon as it should be born, very vigilant to crush the Christian religion in its birth.

II. The unsuccessfulness of these attempts. She was safely delivered of a man-child (v. 5). Care was taken of this child. The Christian religion has been from its infancy the special care of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ. Care was taken of the mother as well as of the child, v. 6. Furthermore her obscure and private state was for a limited time.

III. The attempts of the dragon not only proved unsuccessful against the church, but fatal to his own interests (v. 7). Heaven will espouse the quarrel of the church.

1. The seat of this war—in heaven, in the church, which is the kingdom of heaven on earth, under the care of heaven.

2. The parties: Christ, the great Angel of the covenant, and his faithful followers; and Satan and all his instruments. The strength of the church lies in having the Lord Jesus for the captain of their salvation.

3. The success of the battle: The dragon and his angels fought and prevailed not. The victory fell to Christ and his church, and the dragon and his angels were not only conquered, but cast out.

4. The triumphant song that was composed and used on this occasion, v. 10, 11. The conqueror is adored. The salvation and strength of the church are all to be ascribed to the king and head of the church. The conquered enemy is described. By his malice he appeared before God as an adversary to the church. Though he hates the presence of God, yet he is willing to appear there to accuse the people of God. How the victory was gained. The servants of God overcame Satan, (1) By the blood of the Lamb. (2) By the word of their testimony—by a resolute powerful preaching of the everlasting gospel. By their courage and patience in sufferings; they loved not their lives unto the death; their love to their own lives was overcome by stronger affections of another nature.

Verses 12–17

I. The warning given of the distress that should fall upon the inhabitants of the world in general. Being defeated in his designs against the church, he is resolved to give all the disturbance he can to the world in general, v. 12.

II. His second attempt upon the church now in the wilderness, v. 13. 1. The care that God had taken of his church. He had conveyed her as on eagles' wings, into a place of safety provided for her. 2. The continual malice of the dragon against the church. Her obscurity could not altogether protect her. 3. The seasonable help provided in this dangerous juncture, v. 16. 4. His malice against the woman pushes him on to make war with the remnant of her seed. Fidelity will expose men still, to the end of the world, when the last enemy shall be destroyed.

CHAP. XIII

A further description of the church's enemies after another manner. They are represented as two beasts; the first you have an account of, ver. 1–10, the second, ver. 11, &c.

Verses 1–10

An account of the first beast. He seemed to the apostle to stand upon the sea-shore. Whence this beast came—out of the sea. The form and shape of this beast. In some part of this description there seems to be an allusion to Daniel's vision of the four beasts, which represented the four monarchies, Dan. vii. 1–3, &c. The seven heads and the ten horns seem to design its several powers; the ten crowns, its tributary princes; the word blasphemy on its forehead proclaims its direct enmity to the glory of God. The source and spring of his authority—the dragon. He was set up by the devil, and the devil lent him all the assistance he could. A dangerous wound given him, and yet unexpectedly healed, v. 3. The honour and worship paid to this infernal monster: All the world wondered after the beast. They paid honour and subjection to the devil and his instruments, and thought there was no power able to withstand them. How he exercised his infernal power and policy: He had a mouth, speaking great things, and blasphemies; and he made war with the saints, and overcame them. And against those that dwell in heaven. The malice of the devil shows itself against heaven and the blessed inhabitants of heaven. These are above the reach of his power. All he can do is to blaspheme them; but the saints on earth are more exposed to his cruelty, and he sometimes is permitted to triumph over them. The limitation of the devil's power and success. He is limited in point of time (v. 5). He is also limited as to the persons that he shall entirely subject to his will. It will be only those whose names are not written in the Lamb's book of life. Those who have killed with the sword shall themselves fall by the sword (v. 10), and those who led the people of God into captivity shall themselves be made captives.

Verses 11–18

I. The form and shape of this second beast: He had two horns like a lamb, but a mouth that spoke like the dragon. All agree that this must be some great impostor, who, under a pretence of religion, shall deceive the souls of men.

II. The power which he exercises (v. 12) to draw men off from worshipping the true God to worship those who by nature are no gods.

III. The methods by which this second beast carried on his designs. Lying wonders, pretended miracles, by which they should be deceived. They would pretend to bring down fire from heaven. God sometimes permits his enemies to do things that seem very wonderful, and by which unwary persons may be deluded. They have the mark of the beast in their forehead and in their right hand, and they have the name of the beast and the number of his name. They make an open profession of their subjection.

IV. We have here the number of the beast, given in such a manner as will sufficiently exercise all the wisdom and accuracy of men: The number is the number of a man, and it is 666. Only this we know, God has written Mene Tekel upon all his enemies; he has numbered their days, and they shall be finished, but his own kingdom shall endure for ever.

CHAP. XIV

The day begins now to dawn, and here we have represented, I. The Lord Jesus at the head of his faithful followers, ver. 1–5. II. Three angels sent successively to proclaim the fall of Babylon, ver. 6–13. III. The vision of the harvest, ver. 14, &c.

Verses 1–5

The Lord Jesus Christ at the head of his faithful. 1. How Christ appears: as a Lamb standing upon Mount Zion. A counterfeit lamb is mentioned as rising out of the earth in the last chapter, which was really a dragon; here Christ appears as the true paschal Lamb. 2. How his people appear. All who were sealed; not one of them lost in all the tribulations through which they had gone. They had the name of God written in their foreheads. Their songs of praise (v. 3). They are described by their chastity and purity: They are virgins. They had not defiled themselves either with corporal or spiritual adultery. By their loyalty and steadfast adherence to Christ: They follow the Lamb whithersoever he goes. By their former designation to this honour, v. 4. They were the first-fruits to God and to the Lamb, and the earnest of many more who should be followers of them, as they were of Christ. There was no guile found in them, and they were without fault before the throne of God. Their hearts were right with God, and they were freely pardoned in Christ.

Verses 6–12

Three angels or messengers sent from heaven to give notice of the fall of Babylon.

I. The first angel was sent on an errand antecedent to it, v. 6, 7. The gospel is an everlasting gospel. It is a work fit for an angel to preach this everlasting gospel. The everlasting gospel is of great concern to all the world. The gospel is the great means whereby men are brought to fear God, and to give glory to him. It is by the preaching of the gospel that men are turned from idols to serve the living God, v. 7.

II. The second angel follows the other, and proclaims the actual fall of Babylon. By Babylon is generally understood Rome. The wickedness of Babylon will make her fall just, v. 8.

III. A third angel follows the other two, v. 9, 10. If after this any should persist in their idolatry, they must expect to drink deep of the wine of the wrath of God. Those who refuse to come out of Babylon must receive of her plagues. When the treachery and rebellion of others shall be punished, then it will be said, to the honour of the faithful (v. 12): Here is the patience of the saints; you have before seen their patience exercised, now you see it rewarded.

Verses 13–20

The vision of the harvest and vintage.

I. The preface, v. 13. This prophecy came down from heaven, and not from men, and therefore it is of certain truth. It was to be preserved and published—by writing; it was to be matter of record, that the people of God might have recourse to it for their comfort upon all occasions. It principally intended to show the blessedness of all the faithful servants of God, both in death and after death: Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth, &c. The description of those that are and shall be blessed—such as die in the Lord. They are blessed in their rest. They are blessed in their recompence: Their works follow them; as their evidence of having lived and died in the Lord.

II. The vision itself.

1. A harvest (v. 14, 15), an emblem that sometimes signifies the cutting down of the wicked, and sometimes the gathering in of the righteous. This seems rather to represent God's judgments against the wicked.

(1) The Lord of the harvest—one so like unto the Son of man that he was the same, even the Lord Jesus. The chariot in which he sat—a white cloud, a cloud that had a bright side turned to the church, how dark soever it might be to the wicked. The ensign of his power: On his head was a golden crown, authority to do whatsoever he would do. The instrument of his providences: In his hand a sharp sickle.

(2) The harvest-work, to thrust the sickle into the corn, and reap the field.

(3) The harvest-time; when the corn is ripe, when the measure of the sin of men is filled up. Then he will spare them no longer; he will thrust in his sickle, and the earth shall be reaped.

2. A vintage, v. 17. To whom this vintage-work was committed—another angel that came out from the altar. The work of the vintage, which consists of two parts: (1) Gathering the clusters of the vine, fully ripe, v. 18. (2) Casting these grapes into the wine-press (v. 19). It was the wrath of God, without the city, where the army lay that came against Babylon. The quantity of the wine, that is, of the blood that was drawn forth by this judgment (v. 20). But here we are left to doubtful conjectures.

CHAP. XV

The vision of the seven vials. I. A sight of those angels in heaven who were to have the execution of this great work, ver. 1–4. II. A sight of these angels coming out of heaven to receive those vials which they were to pour out, ver. 5, &c.

Verses 1–4

The pouring out of the seven vials, which was committed to seven angels. The work they had to do, which was to finish the destruction of antichrist. The spectators and witnesses of this their commission: all that had gotten the victory over the beast, &c. These stood on a sea of glass singing the song of Moses. They extol the greatness of God's works. They call upon all nations to render unto God the fear due to such a discovery of his truth and justice: Who shall not fear thee? (v. 4).

Verses 5–8

I. How these angels appeared, v. 5. Here is an allusion to the holiest of all in the tabernacle and temple, where was the mercy-seat, covering the ark of the testimony. In the judgments God was now about to execute he was fulfilling the prohecies and promises of his word and covenant, which were there always before him.

II. How they were equipped. Their array, v. 6. This was the habit of the high priests when they went in to enquire of God, and came out with an answer from him. They do everything in a pure and holy manner. Their artillery was seven vials filled with the wrath of God; they were armed with the wrath of God against his enemies.

III. They were all wrapt up in clouds of smoke, which filled the temple, from the glorious and powerful presence of God; so that no man was able to enter into the temple, till the work was finished. God himself was now preaching to the church and to all the world, by terrible things in righteousness; but when this work was done, the temple would be opened.

CHAP. XVI

The pouring forth of these vials that were filled with the wrath of God. I. Upon the earth, ver. 2. II. Upon the sea, ver. 3. III. Upon the rivers and fountains of water, ver. 4. Here the heavenly hosts applaud the righteousness of the judgments of God. IV. The fourth vial was poured out on the sun, ver. 8. V. The fifth on the seat of the beast. VI. The sixth on the river Euphrates. VII. The seventh in the air, upon which the cities of the nations fell.

Verses 1–7

I. Though everything was made ready before, yet nothing was to be put in execution without an order from God; and this he gave out of the temple.

II. No sooner was the word of command given than it was immediately obeyed. God says, Go your ways, and pour out the vials; and immediately the work is begun. We have here a reference and allusion to several of the plagues of Egypt. Their sins were alike, and so were their punishments. These vials have a plain reference to the seven trumpets, which represented the rise of antichrist. The fall of antichrist shall be gradual; as Rome was not built in one day, so neither shall it fall in one day. The fall of the antichristian interest shall be universal. Everything that any ways belonged to them, all consigned over to ruin, all accursed for the sake of the wickedness of that people.

1. The first angel, v. 2. Where the vial fell—upon the earth, upon the common people. What it produced—noisome and grievous sores on all who had the mark of the beast. They had marked themselves by their sin, now God marks them out by his judgments.

2. The second angel poured out his vial. Where it fell—upon the sea. It turned the sea into blood, as the blood of a dead man, and every living soul died in the sea. God discovered not only the vanity and falsehood of their religion, but the pernicious and deadly nature of it.

The next angel poured out his vial. Where it fell—upon the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters. It turned them into blood. The following doxology (v. 5, 6). The instrument that God makes use of in this work is here called the angel of the waters, who extols the righteousness of God in this retaliation, to which another angel answered by full consent, v. 7.

Verses 8–11

The fourth angel poured out his vial, and that fell upon the sun. That sun which before cherished them with warm and benign influences shall now grow hot against these idolaters, and shall scorch them, which yet will be so far from bringing them to repentance, that it will cause them to curse God. They will be hardened to their ruin. The fifth angel, v. 10. Where this vial fell—upon the seat of the beast, upon Rome itself. The whole kingdom of the beast was full of darkness. Darkness is opposed to wisdom and penetration, and forebodes the confusion and folly which the idolaters should discover at that time. It is opposed to pleasure and joy.

Verses 12–16

The sixth angel poured out his vial.

I. Where it fell—upon the great river Euphrates. Some take it literally. Others take it for the river Tiber.

II. What did this vial produce? The drying up of the river. A way is hereby prepared for the kings of the east. The last effort of the great dragon; he is resolved to have another push for it. The instruments he makes use of: Three unclean spirits like frogs. These would muster up the devil's forces for a decisive battle. The means these instruments would use. They would work pretended miracles. The field of battle—a place called Armageddon; that is, say some, the mount of Megiddo. The further account of it is suspended till we come to the nineteenth chapter, v. 19, 20. The warning which God gives of this great and decisive trial, v. 15. When God's cause comes to be tried, and his battles to be fought, all his people shall be ready and be faithful and valiant in his service.

Verses 17–21

An account of the seventh and last angel pouring forth his vial, which was the finishing stroke.

I. Where this plague fell—on the air, upon the prince of the power of the air, that is, the devil. Here is a vial poured out upon his kingdom, and he is not able to support his tottering cause and interest any longer.

II. What it produced. 1. A thankful voice from heaven, pronouncing that now the work was done. It is finished. 2. An earthquake, so great as never was before, and this ushered in by thunder and lightnings. 3. The fall of Babylon (v. 19). God now remembered this great and wicked city. Now he gives unto her the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath, and every island and every mountain, that seemed by nature and situation the most secured, were carried away in the deluge of this ruin.

III. How the antichristian party were affected with it. Though it fell upon them as a dreadful storm, as if the stones of the city, tossed up into the air, came down upon their heads, like hailstones of a talent weight each, yet they were so far from repenting that they blasphemed that God who thus punished them.

CHAP. XVII

This antichrist is now described as a great whore. I. The apostle is invited to see this vile woman, ver. 1, 2. II. He tells us what an appearance she made, ver. 3–6. III. The mystery of it is explained to him, ver. 7–12. And, IV. Her ruin foretold, ver. 13, &c.

Verses 1–6

Here we have a new vision. 1. The invitation given to the apostle, v. 1. This is a name of great infamy. She had been a prostitute to the kings of the earth, whom she had intoxicated with the wine of her fornication. 2. The appearance she made, v. 4. 3. Her principal seat and residence—upon the beast that had seven heads and ten horns; that is to say, Rome, the city on seven hills. 4. Her name, which was written on her forehead. She is named from her place of residence—Babylon the great. She is named from her infamous way and practice; not only a harlot, but a mother of harlots. 5. Her diet: she satiated herself with the blood of the saints and martyrs of Jesus. She drank their blood with such greediness that she intoxicated herself with it.

Verses 7–13

Here we have the mystery of this vision explained. But it is so explained as still to need further explanation. 1. This beast was, and is not, and yet is; it was a seat of idolatry and persecution; and is not, not in the ancient form, and yet it is truly the seat of idolatry and tyranny. It ascends out of the bottomless pit, and it shall return thither and go into perdition. 2. This beast has seven heads, which have a double signification. Seven mountains—the seven hills on which Rome stands. Seven kings—seven sorts of government. Five of these were extinct; one was then in being; and the other was yet to come, v. 10. This beast makes an eighth. 3. This beast had ten horns; which are said to be ten kings which have as yet received no kingdoms.

Verses 14–18

I. War begun between the beast and his followers, and the Lamb and his followers. One would think an army with a lamb at the head of them could not stand before the great red dragon.

II. Victory gained by the Lamb: The Lamb shall overcome. He will be sure to meet with many enemies, but he will also be sure to gain the victory.

III. The ground or reason of the victory. 1. From the character of the Lamb: He is King of kings and Lord of lords. All the powers of earth and hell are subject to his check and control. 2. From the character of his followers: They are called, and chosen, and faithful. Such an army, under such a commander, will at length carry all the world before them.

IV. The victory is justly aggrandized. 1. By the vast multitude who paid obedience and subjection to the beast and to the whore, v. 15, 18. 2. By the powerful influence which God hereby showed he had over the minds of great men. It was of God, and to fulfil his will, that these kings agreed to give their kingdom unto the beast. It was of God that afterwards their hearts were turned against the whore.

CHAP. XVIII

I. An angel proclaiming the fall of Babylon, ver. 1, 2. II. Assigning the reasons of her fall, ver. 3. III. Giving warning to all who belonged to God to come out of her (ver. 4, 5), and to assist in her destruction, ver. 6–8. IV. The great lamentation made for her by those who had been large sharers in her sinful pleasures and profits, ver. 9–19. V. The great joy that there would be among others at the sight of her irrecoverable ruin, ver. 20, &c.

Verses 1–8

Here is another angel sent from heaven, v. 1. He had not only light in himself, to discern the truth of his own prediction, but to inform and enlighten the world about that great event. This angel publishes the fall of Babylon, as a thing already come to pass. Here seems to be an allusion to the prediction of the fall of pagan Babylon (Isa. xxi. 9), where the word is repeated as it is here: has fallen, has fallen, v. 2. This is also borrowed from Isa. xxi. 9, and seems to describe not so much her sin as her punishment, it being a common notion that unclean spirits, as well as ominous and hateful birds, used to haunt a city or house that lay in its ruins. The reason of this ruin is declared (v. 3). She had not only forsaken the true God herself, and set up idols, but had drawn all sorts of men into the spiritual adultery, and by her wealth and luxury had retained them in her interest. All that expect mercy from God should not only come out of her, but be assisting in her destruction, v. 4, 5. God may have a people even in Babylon. Those that are resolved to partake with wicked men in their sins must receive of their plagues. Though private revenge is forbidden, yet God will have his people act under him, when called to it, in pulling down his and their implacable enemies, v. 6. God will proportion the punishment of sinners to the measure of their pride, and security, v. 7. When destruction comes on a people suddenly, the surprise is a great aggravation of their misery, v. 8.

Verses 9–24

I. A doleful lamentation made by Babylon's friends for her fall.

1. The mourners, those who had been bewitched by her fornication, and those who had been gainers by her wealth and trade—the kings and the merchants of the earth.

2. The manner of their mourning. They stood afar off. Even Babylon's friends will stand at a distance from her fall. Though they had been partakers with her in her sinful pleasures and profits, they were not willing to bear a share in her plagues. They made a grievous outcry, v. 19. Those who have most indulged themselves in pride and pleasure are the least able to bear calamities.

3. The cause of their mourning; not their sin, but their punishment. The spirit of antichrist is a worldly spirit, and their sorrow is a mere worldly sorrow. The wealth and merchandise of this city, all which was suddenly lost (v. 12, 13), and lost irrecoverably (v. 14). The church of God may fall for a time, but she shall rise again; but the fall of Babylon will be an utter overthrow. Godly sorrow is some support under affliction, but mere worldly sorrow adds to the calamity.

II. The joy and triumph there was both in heaven and earth at the irrecoverable fall of Babylon, v. 20. 1. How universal this joy would be: heaven and earth, angels and saints, would join in it. 2. How just and reasonable. (1) Because the fall of Babylon was an act of God's justice. Though they did not take pleasure in the miseries of any, yet they had reason to rejoice in the discoveries of the glorious justice of God. (2) Because it was an irrecoverable ruin (v. 21). The place shall be no longer habitable by man, no work shall be done there, no comfort enjoyed, no light seen there, but utter darkness and desolation, as the reward of her great wickedness, v. 24. Such abominable sins deserved so great a ruin.

CHAP. XIX

I. A further account of the triumphant song of angels and saints for the fall of Babylon, ver. 1–4. II. The marriage between Christ and the church proclaimed, ver. 5–10. III. Another warlike expedition of the glorious head of the church, ver. 10, &c.

Verses 1–4

The fall of Babylon being finished, and declared to be irrecoverable, this begins with a holy triumph over her. The form of their thanksgiving, Alleluia, praise you the Lord: with this they begin, with this they go on, and with this they end (v. 4); their prayers are now turned into praises, their hosannas end in hallelujas. They praise him for the truth of his word, and the righteousness of his providential conduct, especially in this great event—the ruin of Babylon (v. 2). When the angels and saints cried Alleluia, her fire burned more fiercely, v. 3. Praising God for what we have is praying in the most effectual manner for what is yet further to be done for us; the praises of the saints blow up the fire of God's wrath against the common enemy. The blessed harmony between the angels and the saints in this triumphant song, v. 4.

Verses 5–10

An epithalamium, or marriage-song, begins, v. 6.

I. The concert of heavenly music. The chorus was large and loud, as the voice of many waters and of mighty thunderings.

II. The occasion of this song, v. 7. 1. A description of the bride, how she appeared; not in the gay and gaudy dress of the mother of harlots, but in fine linen, clean and white, which is the righteousness of saints; in the robes of Christ's righteousness. These her nuptial ornaments she did not purchase by any price of her own, but received them as the grant of her blessed Lord. 2. The marriage-feast which is declared to be such as would make all those happy who were called to it, a feast made up of the promises of the gospel, the true sayings of God, v. 9. 3. The transport of joy which the apostle felt. He fell down at the feet of the angel to worship him. The angel refused it, and this was with some resentment: "See thou do it not. I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren which have the testimony of Jesus. Thou, as an apostle, having the Spirit of prophecy, hast the same testimony to give in; and therefore we are in this brethren and fellow-servants. Worship God, and him alone."

Verses 11–21

The glorious head of the church is called out to a new expedition, which seems to be the great battle that was to be fought at Armageddon.

I. The description of the great Commander. The seat of his empire; and that is heaven. His equipage: he is again described as sitting on a white horse. He is faithful and true, he is righteous in all his proceedings, he has a penetrating insight into all the strength of his enemies, he has a large and extensive dominion, many crowns. His armour; and that is a vesture dipped in blood. His name: The Word of God, a name that none fully knows but himself. His perfections are incomprehensible by any creature.

II. The army which he commands (v. 14).

III. The weapons of his warfare—a sharp sword proceeding from his mouth (v. 15).

IV. The ensigns of his authority, his coat of arms, v. 16.

V. An invitation given to the fowls of heaven, that they should come and share in the spoil and pillage of the field (v. 17, 18).

VI. The battle joined. The enemy falls on with great fury; the powers of earth and hell gathered, to make their utmost effort, v. 19.

VII. The victory gained by the great head of the church: The beast and the false prophet are taken prisoners, and cast into the burning lake, and their followers are given up to military execution, and made a feast for the fowls of heaven.

CHAP. XX

Here we have an account, I. Of the binding of Satan for a thousand years, ver. 1–3. II. The reign of the saints with Christ for the same time, ver. 4–6. III. Of the loosing of Satan, and the conflict of the church, with Gog and Magog, ver. 7–10. IV. Of the day of judgment, ver. 11, &c.

Verses 1–10

I. A prophecy of the binding of Satan. To whom this work of binding Satan is committed—to an angel from heaven. Christ never wants proper powers and instruments to break the power of Satan. The execution of this work, v. 2, 3. Neither the strength of the dragon, nor the subtlety of the serpent, was sufficient to rescue him. He cast him into the bottomless pit. He is brought back to that prison, and there laid in chains. He is shut up, and a seal set upon him. We have the term of this confinement of Satan—a thousand years, after which he was to be loosed again for a little season.

II. An account of the reign of the saints for the same space of time in which Satan continued bound (v. 4–6). Who those were that received such honour —those who had suffered for Christ, and all who had faithfully adhered to him. The honour bestowed upon them. They were raised from the dead, and restored to life. They reigned with Christ a thousand years. Those who suffer with Christ shall reign with Christ. This is called the first resurrection, which none but those who have served Christ and suffered for him shall be favoured with. The happiness of these servants of God. They are blessed and holy, v. 6. None can be blessed but those that are holy; and all that are holy shall be blessed. They are secured from the power of the second death. Those who have had experience of a spiritual resurrection are saved from the power of the second death.

III. An account of another mighty conflict, very sharp, but short and decisive. The restraints laid on Satan are at length taken off. While this world lasts, Satan's power in it will not be wholly destroyed. No sooner is Satan let loose than he falls to his old work, deceiving the nations, and so stirring them up to make a war with the saints and servants of God. His last efforts seem to be the greatest, v. 8. The principal commanders in this army under the dragon—Gog and Magog. Of Gog and Magog together we only read in Ezek. xxxviii. 2, a prophecy whence this in the Revelation borrows many of its images. The march and military disposition of this formidable army (v. 9). The doom and punishment of the grand enemy, the devil: he is now cast into hell, with his two great officers, the beast and the false prophet, to be there tormented night and day, for ever and ever.

The utter destruction of the devil's kingdom leads to an account of the day of judgment. This will be a great day, the great day, when all shall appear before the judgment-seat of Christ. 1. We behold the throne, great and white, very glorious and perfectly just and righteous. 2. The Judge, the Lord Jesus Christ. The earth and the heaven flee from his face, and there is no place found for them. 3. The persons to be judged (v. 12). None are so mean but they have some talents to account for, and none so great as to avoid the jurisdiction of this court; not only those that are found alive at the coming of Christ, but all who have died before. 4. The rule of judgment settled: The books were opened. The book of God's omniscience, and the book of the sinner's conscience. And another book shall be opened—the book of the scriptures, the statute-book of heaven, the rule of life. 5. The cause to be tried; the works of men, what they have done and whether it be good or evil. 6. The issue of the trial and judgment. All those who have made a covenant with death, and an agreement with hell, shall then be condemned with their infernal confederates, cast with them into the lake of fire. But those whose names are written in that book shall then be justified and acquitted by the Judge.

CHAP. XXI

The day breaks, and the shadows flee away; a new world now appears, the former having passed away. I. An introduction to the vision of the new Jerusalem, ver. 1–9. II. The vision itself, ver. 10, &c.

Verses 1–8

I. A new world now opens to our view (v. 1). To make way for the commencement of this new world, the old world passed away.

II. In this new world the apostle saw the holy city, the new Jerusalem, coming down from heaven. This new Jerusalem is the church of God in its new and perfect state, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband.

III. The blessed presence of God with his people is here proclaimed, v. 3. The presence of God with his church is the glory of the church. The presence of God with his people in heaven will not be interrupted as it is on earth, but he will dwell with them continually. They shall be his people. God himself will be their God.

IV. This new and blessed state will be free from all trouble and sorrow. All tears shall be wiped away. God himself, as their tender Father, with his own kind hand, shall wipe away the tears of his children; and they would not have been without those tears when God shall come and wipe them away. All the causes of future sorrow shall be for ever removed: There shall be neither death nor pain; and therefore no sorrow nor crying; former things have passed away.

V. The truth and certainty of this blessed state are ratified by the word and promise of God, v. 5, 6. God would have it committed to writing, for perpetual memory, and continual use to his people. These words are faithful and true; and it follows, It is done, is as sure as if it were done already. We may and ought to take God's promise as present payment; if he has said that he makes all things new, it is done. His titles of honour as a pledge of the full performance, Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. As his power and will were the first cause of all things, his pleasure and glory are the last end, and he will not lose his design. Men may begin designs which they can never bring to perfection; but the counsel of God shall stand. It would be inconsistent with the goodness of God, and his love to his people, to create in them holy desires, and then deny them their proper satisfaction; and therefore they may be assured that he will give them of the fountain of the water of life freely.

VI. The greatness of this future felicity is declared. The freeness of it: He gives of the water of life freely. The fulness of it. They inherit all things (v. 7). He is all in all. The tenure and title by which they enjoy this blessedness as the sons of God, a title most sure and indefeasible. The vastly different state of the wicked, v. 8. The sins of those who perish. The fearful lead the van in this black list. Those who were so dastardly as not to dare to take up the cross of Christ, were yet so desperate as to run into all manner of abominable wickedness. Their punishment. They could not burn at a stake for Christ, but they must burn in hell for sin. They must die another death after their natural death; the agonies and terrors of the first death will consign them over to the far greater terrors and agonies of eternal death.

Verses 9–27

We now come to the vision itself.

I. The person that opened the vision to the apostle, v. 9. God has a variety of work and employment for his holy angels. They readily execute every commission they receive from God.

II. The place from which the apostle had this glorious view. He was taken into a high mountain. Those who would have clear views of heaven must get as near heaven as they can, into the mount of vision.

III. The subject-matter of the vision (v. 10); the church of God in her glorious, perfect, triumphant state.

1. The exterior part of the city—the wall and the gates.

(1) The wall for security. Heaven is a safe state. The height of it (v. 17), sufficient both for ornament and security. The matter of it: It was as jasper, v. 11. This city has a wall that is impregnable as well as precious. The form of it: In the new Jerusalem all shall be equal in purity and perfection. The measure of the wall (v. 15, 16). Here is room sufficient for all the people of God—many mansions in their Father's house. The foundation of the wall (v. 19). The foundations are described by their number—twelve, alluding to the twelve apostles (v. 14). The matter of these foundations, it was various and precious, set forth by twelve sorts of precious stones.

(2) The gates for entrance. Heaven is not inaccessible; there is a free admission to all those that are sanctified. Their number—twelve gates, answering to the twelve tribes of Israel. All the true Israel of God shall have entrance into the new Jerusalem. Their guards—twelve angels, to admit and receive the several tribes of the spiritual Israel. The inscription on the gates—the names of the twelve tribes, to show that they have a right to the tree of life, and to enter through the gates into the city. The situation of the gates. As the city had four equal sides, answering to the four quarters of the world, so on each side there were three gates, signifying that there is as free entrance from one part of the world as from the other. The materials of these gates—they were all of pearls: Every gate one pearl. Christ is the pearl of great price, and he is our way to God. There is nothing magnificent enough in this world fully to set forth the glory of heaven.

2. The interior part of the new Jerusalem, v. 22–27. The first thing which we observe there is the street of the city, v. 21. The saints in heaven tread upon gold. The saints are then at rest, but it is not a mere passive rest; but a state of delightful motion: The nations that are saved walk in the light of it. They walk with Christ in white. They have communion not only with God, but with one another.

(1) The temple of the new Jerusalem, which was no material temple, for the Lord God Almighty, and the Lamb, are the temple thereof.

(2) The light of this city, v. 23. There is no want of the light of the sun, for the glory of God lightens that city, and the Lamb is the light thereof. There is no need of the sun or moon, any more than we here need to set up candles at noon day.

(3) The inhabitants of this city. Their numbers—whole nations of saved souls. All those multitudes who were sealed on earth are saved in heaven. Their dignity—some of the kings and princes of the earth. God will have some of all ranks and degrees of men to fill the heavenly mansions, high and low. Their continual accession and entrance into this city: The gates shall never be shut. Those that are sanctified always find the gates open.

(4) The accommodations of this city: All the glory and honour of the nations shall be brought into it. Whatever is excellent and valuable in this world shall be there enjoyed in a more refined kind, and to a far greater degree.

(5) The unmixed purity of all who belong to the new Jerusalem, v. 27. There the saints shall have no impure thing remaining in them. Now they feel a sad mixture of corruption with their graces; but, at their entance into the holy of holies, they are washed in the laver of Christ's blood, and presented to the Father without spot. There the saints shall have no impure persons admitted among them. In the new Jerusalem there is a society perfectly pure. Free from such as are openly profane. There are none admitted into heaven who work abominations. Free from hypocrites, such as make lies. They cannot intrude into the new Jerusalem.

CHAP. XXII

I. A further description of the heavenly state of the church, ver. 1–5. II. A confirmation of this and all the other visions of this book, ver. 6–19. III. The conclusion, ver. 20, 21.

Verses 1–5

The heavenly state is here described as a paradise. A paradise in a city, or a whole city in a paradise! In the first paradise there were only two persons to behold the beauty of it; but in this second paradise whole cities and nations shall find abundant delight and satisfaction.

I. The river of paradise. Its fountain-head—the throne of God and the Lamb. All our springs of grace, comfort, and glory, are in God; and all our streams from him are through the Lamb. Its quality—pure and clear as crystal. All the streams of earthly comfort are muddy; but these are clear, giving life, to those who drink of them.

II. The tree of life, in this paradise. Such a tree there was in the earthly paradise, Gen. ii. 9. This far excels it. The situation of it—in the midst of the street, and on either side the river. This tree of life is fed by the pure waters of the river that comes from the throne of God. The fruitfulness of this tree. It brings forth many sorts of fruit—twelve sorts. It brings forth fruit at all times—yields its fruit every month. There is always fruit upon it. The fruit is not only pleasant, but wholesome. The presence of God in heaven is the health and happiness of the saints.

III. The perfect freedom of this paradise from everything that is evil (v. 3). No serpent there, as there was in the earthly paradise. The devil has nothing to do there.

IV. The supreme felicity of this paradisaical state. There the saints shall see the face of God. God will own them, as having his seal and name on their foreheads. They shall reign with him for ever. All this shall be with perfect knowledge and joy, walking in the light of the Lord; and this not for a time, but for ever and ever.

Verses 6–19

We have here a solemn ratification of the contents of this book. 1. This is confirmed by the name and nature of that God who gave out these discoveries: he is the Lord God, faithful and true. 2. By the messengers he chose. The holy angels showed them to holy men of God. 3. They will soon be confirmed by their accomplishment. Christ will make haste, he will come quickly. 4. By the integrity of that angel who had been the apostle's guide and interpreter in these visions. 5. By the order given to leave the book of the prophecy open, to be perused by all. He does not speak in secret. 6. By the effect this book will have upon men; those that are filthy and unjust will take occasion thence to be more so, but it will further sanctify those that are upright with God. 7. It will be Christ's rule of judgment at the great day; he wil dispense rewards and punishments to men according as their works agree or disagree with the word of God. 8. It is the word of him who is the author, finisher, and rewarder of the faith and holiness of his people, v. 13, 14. He is the first and the last. He will by this word give to his people a right to the tree of life, and an entrance into heaven. 9. It condemns and excludes from heaven all wicked persons, and particularly those that love and make lies (v. 15). 10. It is confirmed by the testimony of Jesus, which is the Spirit of prophecy. He is the fountain of all light, the bright and the morning star, and has given to his churches this morning light of prophecy, to assure them of the light of that perfect day which is approaching. 11. It is confirmed by an open invitation to all to come and partake of the streams of the water of life; these are tendered to all who feel in their souls a thirst which nothing in this world can quench. 12. It is confirmed by the joint testimony of the Spirit of God, and that gracious Spirit that is in all the true members of the church of God; the Spirit and the bride. 13. It is confirmed by a most solemn sanction, v. 18, 19. This sanction is like a flaming sword, to guard the canon of the scripture from profane hands.

We have now come to the conclusion of the whole.

I. Christ's farewell to his church. Behold, I come quickly. As when he ascended into heaven, after his resurrection, he parted with a promise of his gracious presence, so here he parts with a promise of a speedy return. The vision is for an appointed time, and will not tarry. He will come quickly.

II. The church's hearty echo to Christ's promise. Her firm belief of it: Amen, so it is, so it shall be. Her earnest desire of it: Even so, come, Lord Jesus. We should never be satisfied till we find such a spirit breathing in us. This is the language of the church of the first-born, and we should join with them. What comes from heaven in a promise should be sent back to heaven in a prayer, "Come, Lord Jesus. Finish thy great design, and fulfil all that word in which thou hast caused thy people to hope."

III. The apostolical benediction, which closes the whole: The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all, Amen. Nothing should be more desired by us than that the grace of Christ may be with us in this world, to prepare us for the glory of Christ in the other world. To this most comprehensive prayer we should all add our hearty Amen, most earnestly thirsting after greater measures of the gracious influences of the blessed Jesus in our souls, and his gracious presence with us, till glory has perfected all his grace towards us.
